38. Before this, the News of the death of Arcadius was brought to Rome; and, after the departure of Honorius for Ravenna, was confirmed. Stilicho being got to Ravenna, and Honorius to Bononia, a City of Æmilia, ſeventy miles diſtant from Ravenna; Stilicho was thither ſent, to chaſtiſe and reduce the Soldiers into Order, who had mutined by the way. He, having called them together, and told them, how the Emperor's Command was, that they ſhould not only be chaſtiſed, but every tenth man be taken out, and put to death; ſtruck them with ſuch terror, that they all fell a weeping; and drew him to ſuch a Commiſeration of their Condition, that he promiſed them pardon from the Prince. This Honorius ratified: and then they fell into a Conſultation about the publick Affairs. Stilicho had a deſire to go into the Eaſt; and to ſettle the Concernments of Theodoſius, the young Son of Arcadius; who ſtood in need of Aſſiſtance: and Honorius himſelf thought of taking a Journey thither, to put the Affairs of his Nephew into good Order. Stilicho, having no mind to hear of this, by ſhewing him the vaſt Expence he muſt make in the Expedition, deterred him from his purpoſe. Beſides, he urged, that it was highly neceſſary that he ſhould not be much abſent from Italy, nor Rome it ſelf; becauſe Conſtantine, the Uſurper, had over-ran all Gall, and had taken up his Station at Arles. And, yet farther he preſſed, that Alarich was alſo to be feared; who had a great Power of Men, was a Barbarian, and deceitful: who, if he found Italy naked, and deſtitute of Aid, would not fail, ſuddainly to invade it. In concluſion, he added, that the beſt way was to ſend Alarich againſt the Tyrant, with part of the Barbarians he had with him, and the Roman Legions joyned together; which ſhould be joyntly commanded by him, and the Officers belonging to the ſaid Legions. And, that he himſelf ſhould be, by the Emperor, diſpatched away into the Eaſt, with Letters, containing the ſumm of what he would have there tranſacted.

Yet goes not.

39. Honorius, approving of all that was ſaid by Stilicho, wrote Letters to the Emperor of the Eaſt, and to Alarich; and departed from Bononia. But, as for Stilicho, he, notwithſtanding, continued where he was; neither taking his Journey for the Eaſt, nor putting in Execution any thing that had been reſolved. Neither did he remove thoſe Soldiers that lay at Ticinum, to Ravenna, nor any other place; leſt, having opportunity of ſpeaking with the Emperor, they ſhould put him upon attempting ſomething againſt himſelf. Thus, Stilicho, being neither conſcious of any unworthy thing, deſigned, either againſt the Emperor, or the Army, behaved himſelf. But, there was one Olympius, born about the Euxine Sea; who had got a ſplendid Employment at Court: and, under the ſhow and pretence of Chriſtian Piety, covered great Wickedneſs; and, counterfeiting great Soberneſs and Modeſty, was wont to diſcourſe much with the Emperor. He offered many things to beget prejudice in him againſt Stilicho: And, in particular, that he deſigned his Journey into the Eaſt for no other cauſe, but that, having taken Theodoſius out of the way, by ſending him to another World, he might transfer the Sovereignty of thoſe parts, upon his Son Eucherius. This he inſinuated upon the way, as he had time and convenience: And, when they were come to Ticinum; viſiting there the ſick and maimed Soldiers, he laid hold alſo on them by theſe Charms. Four days had but paſſed after his Arrival, when the Emperor called the Soldiers together, ſhewed himſelf to them, and incited them to the War againſt Conſtantine. Of Stilicho, yet, there was no mention, till Olympius openly beckened to the Soldiers, as it were, putting them in mind of what he had in private diſcourſed with them. Hereat they fell into a rage and madneſs, and killed Limenius, who had been Præfectus Prætorio in the Parts beyond the Alpes; together with Chariobaudes, a Magiſter Militum, alſo in thoſe Quarters: Both whom, had made their Eſcape from the Tyrant; and were come to the Emperor, to Ticinum. After this, they put to death Vincentius, who was Magiſter Equitum; and Salvius, the Comes Domeſticorum: And afterward, when the Emperor was withdrawn, and the other Magiſtrates had made their Eſcape, they poured themſelves into the City; and pulling them out of the Houſes where they thought to conceal themſelves, they ſlew them, and plundered the Town.

The Soldiers fall into a Mutiny.

40. The miſchief being grown to that height, that it ſeemed incurable; the Emperor, caſting a little Coat about him, without his Robe, or his Diadem, ran amongſt them; and, with great labour and pains, could hardly appeaſe their fury. Nemorius, Maſter of the Palatine Ranks; Patronius, the Comes Rei Privatæ; and Salvius, whoſe Office it was to dictate ſuch matters as the Emperor ordered; whom after the time of Conſtantine, they called Quæſtor; after they had eſcaped from the place of Mutiny, and thought they were now ſafe, were alſo ſlain; of whom, Salvius, though he hung at, and embraced the very feet of the Emperor, could not obtain his Life. The Uproar continuing till the Evening, the Emperor withdrew, leſt they ſhould attempt any thing againſt his own Perſon: and, in the mean time, they murdered Longinianus, who was Præfectus Prætorio of Italy. All theſe were Magiſtrates that periſhed by the madneſs of the Soldiers: but, of others who fell into their hands by chance, ſo great a multitude miſcarried, as was not eaſie to be reckoned. The Report of the Sedition being brought to Bononia, where Stilicho as yet continued, did exceedingly perplex him. He called together the Officers of the Confederate Barbarians, and conſulted with them what was to be done. It was unanimouſly reſolved; that, if the Emperor was killed, of which there was a rumour; then, all the Confederates ſhould fall upon the Roman Soldiers; and, by chaſtiſing them, keep the reſt in order. But, if the Magiſtrates were only made away, and he were ſafe; then ſhould the procurers of the Mutiny be puniſhed. Yet, Stilicho, when he heard that Honorius was alive, and no violence offered to his Perſon, left off thoughts of going to chaſtiſe the Army, and reſolved to remove to Ravenna: for, he conſidered how numerous it was; he knew, the Inclinations of the Emperor toward himſelf were inconſtant; and he thought it neither laudable in it ſelf, nor ſafe, to ſet the Barbarians upon the Roman Soldiers. While he was anxious, and deliberated about theſe things, the Officers that he had conſulted, endeavoured to perſwade him to put in practice what they had reſolved: But, when they could not accompliſh it, they purpoſed to ſtay in their ſeveral Quarters, and expect what the Emperor would determine concerning him. But Sarus, who, in Strength and Dignity, excelled all the other Barbarians, cauſed his Men to kill all thoſe of Stilicho's Guard, who kept conſtant Watch about him: and broke into his Tent; where he was muſing, what would be the Iſſue of theſe Difficulties.

41. Stilicho finding, that the Barbarians which he had about him, differed alſo amongſt themſelves, went to Ravenna; and adviſed ſuch Cities, where the Wives and Children of the Barbarians dwelt, that they ſhould not permit any of thoſe Nations to come amongſt them. But, Olympius, who now inclined the Emperor as he pleaſed, ſent his Letters to the Soldiers that lay at Ravenna; which commanded, that they ſhould lay hold on him, and commit him to free Cuſtody. He having ving notice thereof fled to a Church of the Chriſtians, late at night; thoſe that were with him arming themſelves and their Slaves, and expecting what would be done. When it was day, the Soldiers entred the Church; and, in the preſence of the Biſhop, affirmed to Stilicho, upon Oath, that they had not received from the Emperor, any orders to kill him; but only to keep him ſafe. But when he was out of the Church, in their Hands, other Letters were brought by him that was ſent with the former, wherein he was Adjudged to Death, for the Offences he had committed againſt the Common-Wealth. His Son Eucherius had now eſcaped and was fled toward Rome; but he himſelf was led to Death; which when the Barbarians that were near to him, his Servants and Friends ſeeing, were about to make reſiſtance and Prevent, he deterred them from it, and in a manner, offered his Neck to the Sword; a Man the moſt modeſt of all others, who at that time injoyed great Power and Authority. For though he had married the Daughter of Theodoſius the Elder his Brother; and had been intruſted with the Empires of both Theodoſius his Sons, and moreover had born the Office of a General, three and twenty Years, yet was he never found, for Mony, to have advanced any to commands in the Army, or to have converted the Allowance of Soldiers to his own Gaine. And having but one only Son, he raiſed him no farther than to the place of a Tribune of the Notaries, appointing that, as a boundary to his preferment. Now that Men that are curious in theſe matters, may not be ignorant of the time of his Death, it fell out, on the tenth Day before the Calends of September, in the Conſulſhip of Baſſus and Philippus, the Year that the Emperor Arcadius died.

Stilicho put to Death.

42. This is the whole account which Zoſimus gives concerning the Death of Stilicho, and the occaſion of it; wherein he endeavours to render him innocent, and to have unjuſtly ſuffered: And with him agrees Olympiodorus alſo, an Hiſtorian of thoſe times. But the general conſent of Writers is, that he was juſtly put to death, and that for ſeveral Crimes of no leſs conſequence than high Treaſon. They accuſe him of bringing Alarich into the Dominions of Honorius; and of letting the Barbarous Nations, as the Alans, Suevi and Vandalls, into the Weſtern Provinces. Some ſay he attempted to poiſon Honorius, and that he ſtamped Money, though without the Imperial Habit, or Image of an Emperor. The drift of all his deſignes, they ſay, was this, that (as Zoſimus writes of Olympius his Inſinuations,) he might transfer the Title and Dignity of Emperor, upon his own Son Eucherius. They who take a View of the opinions of theſe Diſſenters, obſerve, that the Pagan Writers acquit him of the Crime, and that Chriſtians lay it heavily to his Charge. But not only Chriſtians, but one Pagan Author alſo, a Poet of this time, Rutilius Numantianus in his Itinerary, writes of him as a betrayer of the Empire, and as him that called the Barbarians into Italy. This he did, they ſay, to give diſturbance to the Affaires of Honorius; to weaken the Empire, and make it more capable of his Attempts, when a ſeaſonable time ſhould come, for which he reſerved his Friend Alarich. Indeed Zoſimus tells us that the purpoſe of Stilicho was, when he ſaw that the Courtiers at Conſtantinople hated him, by contracting a League with Alarich, to lay the Cities of Illyricum to the Dominion of Honorius; and Olympiodorus ſaith, that he ſent for Alarich to ſubdue Illyricum; but gives another Reaſon for it; becauſe that Province had falne to Honorius his ſhare in the partition made by Theodoſius.

Oroſius, Hieronymus, Philoſtorgius.

Quo magis eſt facinus diri Stilichonis acerbum, Proditor arcani quod fuit Imperii.

43. To ſay truly, the management of the War againſt Alarich in Italy, ſo much as we can know of it, was very odd. Oroſius though he ſaid but little when he wrote thus: I ſay nothing concerning King Alarich often beaten with his Goths, often taken (as in a Pound or Net) and alwayes diſmiſſed, yet had reaſon to think much. If we well mark Claudian, we ſhall perceive him ſometimes put to it, to make the beſt of Matters; and ſometimes to write obſcurely concerning that War: particularly of that Alan who loſt his Life in Italy. What mean his flouriſhes, when he ſaith that he was worthy of the Elyſian Fields, and to be Celebrated in Verſe; who, though it were by his Death, burnt with a deſire to purge ſuſpected Fidelity, and with his Blood, waſhed off that undeſerved Stain? That Pagan Writers (ſo partial as we ſee they are,) ſhould bear great reſpect to the Cauſe and Perſon of Stilicho, we cannot wonder, when we are told by Oroſius, that his Son Eucherius, to procure the favour of the Gentiles, threatned that he would begin his Reign with the reſtitution of the Temples and deſtruction of Churches. But, the Encomium which Zoſimus gives him at parting, ſeems little to agree with what he ſaith in other places concerning his Actions. The great Modeſty and Abſtinence he ſpeaks of here, little ſuites with Rapacity, wherewith he charges him as well as Rufinus, after their entrance into the Office of Guardians; when all the Wealth flew into the Coffers of them two; the Cities being exhauſted. We cannot alſo but remember what he writes of his Luxury and Debauchery, when he undertook his expedition into Greece. But how Juſt or Unjuſt ſoever the Cauſe of putting this Perſon to death was, we muſt needs ſay that, the whole Story of him taken together, he was a very great Man, and illuſtrated by his many and great Actions, as well as his Alliance. Yet, by deſcent, Oroſius ſaith he was a Vandal, or ſprung from the race of that weak, covetous, perfidious and wily Nation. His firſt conſiderable advancement was to take care of the Emperor Theodoſius his Horſes; or to be his Comes Stabuli, as we learn from Claudian in the Poem he wrote in commendation of his Wife Serena; and thence he was promoted to be Magiſter Equitum, or rather Utrinſq; Militiæ, as we find he was, by other Teſtimonies.

Fælix, Elyſiiſque plagis & carmine dignus Qui male ſuſpectum nobis ardentius arſit Vel Læto purgare fidem; qui judice ferro Diluit immeritum laudato ſanguine crimen. De bello Getico. a v. 590.

His Commendation.

—Gemino mox idem culmine duxit Agmina. Quidam legere mavult gemino germine, ut ita fuerit Ductor militis pariter Barbari ac Romani.

After his death extraordinary Payments ceaſe.

44. So great was the Prejudice conceived againſt him, as the Author of the late Invaſions and Diſturbancies, that he being now taken out of the way, they thought the Storme to be over. For, preſently after his Death, as if now there was no need of extraordinary payments, which the Invaſions of Alarich and Radagiſus had made neceſſary, Honorius gave orders to Theodorus the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, for taking off the Burthen which had been laid upon that part of" the Country called Italia Annonaria, of finding thoſe Proviſions called Annonæ" Cellarienſes; of which we have formerly ſpoken; and he was as kind to Senators," as the ordinary ſort; commanding alſo that their Tax or the Glebalis Collatio," ſhould be removed. And now toward the latter end of September came out the" uſual Edict, for confiſcating the Eſtates of Traitors and their Complices, enjoyn-" ing Theodorus, that the Emperors Titles ſhould be fixed throughout their Fields" and all their Houſes; as alſo that what their Agents had received of the Fruits of" their Grounds, they ſhould preſently reckon for in the Treaſury, under Pain of Baniſhment and Proſcription. This Edict it ſeems did not operate ſo effectually but that there was need of another, a Month after, to reinforce what concerned the Agents, and ſuch as had to do with the Eſtate of Stilicho, commanding" them to bring in what they had kept back; but without any Penalty inflicted" for Faileur; ſo that Pardon for what was paſt, ſeems to be underſtood." Theſe two Conſtitutions reſpected the Eſtates of Stilicho and his Satellites or Partiſans, in the Surveying of which, there were Goods found mixed with them, that were claimed by other Perſons. But of theſe Claimers it was found, or ſuſpected, that ſome of them at leaſt had given Eſtates both Moveable and Immoveable to him, his Son, or their Satellites, for the inriching (or diſquieting) of Barbarians. And therefore by a third Edict, wherein he gives Stilicho the ſtile of Prædo Publicus, or publick Robber, he commands, that all ſuch mixed Eſtates be confiſcated," as were given for that purpoſe." It being always held for Law that no Action of recovery can lye where both the giver and receiver are found to be in turpitude or diſhoneſty; and in ſuch caſes, the Cauſe of the Exchequer is always held the better.

His eſtate and thoſe of his Friends confiſcated.

L. 4. De Indalgentiis Debitorum. Cod. Th. Lib. 11. tit. 28. Dat. Id. Septemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria. L. 20. De Bonis Proſcriptorum Cod. Th. Dat. 8. Cal. Octobr.

L. 21. ejuſd. tit. Dat. 8. Cal. Novemb.

L. 22. Ejuſd. tit. Dat. 10. Cal. Decemb. Abſ. a Cod. Juſt.

45. But let us hear what Zoſimus hath concerning the management of Matters after the death of Stilicho. All Affaires at Court were ordered according to the pleaſure of Olympius. As for places, he was promoted to that of Magiſter (Officiorum) and the reſt were diſtributed according to his recommendation. Now were all the familiar Friends, and ſuch as had taken the part of Stilicho, ſought out in all places, and amongſt the reſt Deuterius the Præpoſitus Cubiculi of the Emperor, and Peter the Tribune of the Schole of the Notaries, were called to account, and ſubjected to Examination by Torture; but being neither able to accuſe him nor themſelves, Olympius, though he gained nothing by this Inquiſition, yet cauſed them to be beaten to Death with Staves. Very many other alſo, as privy to the Deſignes of Stilicho, were drawn into Trouble and tortured, to diſcover his affecting the Imperial Dignity; but they all perſiſting in this, that they knew nothing of it, a ſtop was put to the Curioſity of thoſe who were active in fiſhing out ſuch matters. The Emperor depoſed his Wife Thermantia, and cauſed her to be ſent back to her Mother, though ſhe was not burthened by any ſuſpition; and her Brother Eucherius, to be diligently ſought for and put to Death, who was found to have fled to a Church in Rome, whence they diſmiſſed him, out of reverence to the place. In that City Heliocrates who was over the Treaſury, producing the Emperors Letters which commanded that the Eſtates of all thoſe ſhould be Sold, who during the Power of Stilicho had obtained any place of Magiſtracy, buſied himſelf in raiſing Moneys and filling the Coffers belonging to his Office, and not contenting himſelf or ſatiating his evil genius herewith, though

P. 811

What followed upon his Death

he laid ſuch Perſons in Chaines, and, God abſenting himſelf, turned all things upſide down, yet was added to thoſe Miſchiefs another thing of the like Nature. The Soldiers that were Quartered about in the Cities, when word was brought of Stilicho's Death, flew preſently upon the Wives and Children of the Barbarians that there lay; and as if the Signal had been given, putting them all to the Sword, then ſieſed on all they had. This when their Relations heard, they met together from all Quarters, and grievouſly provoked by the impious violation of that Faith, by the Romans, which had been given by calling God to Witneſs, they reſolved to joyn with Alarich, and in Conjunction with him to enter into a War againſt Rome. Upon this account Thirty Thouſand men, or more were gathered together, ready to go whither ever Occaſion ſhould direct.

Alarich his terms.

46. Alarich was not forward to accept of what they offered; but mindful of the Truce which had been made in the lifetime of Stilicho, preferred Peace before War. He ſent to Honorius and offered the confirmation of it, for no great ſumm of Mony; but he required that for performance of the Conditions, Ætius the Son of Jovius, and Jaſon the Son of Gaudentius, might be given up, as Hoſtages, into his Hands; in exchange for whom, he would ſend ſome of the Nobleſt of his own Nation; which being done, he would depart with his Forces out of Noricum into Pannonia. The Emperor rejected his Conditions. And if of two things he had done but one, he might have well enough provided for his Affairs. For he ſhould either have put off the War by obtaining Truce for a ſmall Sum of Mony; or if he reſolved for it, he ſhould have got his Forces together from all quarters; and there have placed them, where the Enemy was to make his paſſage, to give a ſtop to his farther progreſs. And he ought to have choſen Sarus for his General, who of himſelf was a terrour to the Enemy both for his Valour and Military Skill; and had with him of Barbarians, a ſufficient number to make reſiſtance. But neither making choice of Peace, nor embracing the Friendſhip of Sarus, nor drawing together the Roman Army, but relying wholly upon the fancies and wiſhes of Olympius, he became Author of great Calamities to the State. For he made ſuch, Officers of his Army, as would rather raiſe contempt and confidence in the minds of his Enemies, than otherwiſe; giving the Command of the Horſe to Turpillio; of the Foot to Varanes; and of the Wing of the Domeſticks, to Vigilantius, and other places he diſtributed to Men of equal fitneſs and capacity. This cauſed all Men to hang down their Heads, and deſpair; having now, as it were before their eyes, the deſtruction of Italy. So Zoſimus.

Rejected.

Strangers forbiden Rome.

L.20. de pœnis, Cod.Th.Dat.10. Cal. Octob.

L.alt.de Teſtimoniali Ex Tribunis & Protectoribus, Dat. 10.Cal.Decemb.

L.19.de pœnis, Cod.Th.Dat.3. Id.Nov. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

L.1.de litorum & itinerum cuſtodia, Cod. Th.lib.7.tit.16. Dat 4.Id. Dec.

Paſſage opened out of the Eaſtern into the Weſtern Empire.

47. But of ſuch ſtrength and continuance had the authority and Intereſt of Stilicho been; ſuch his influence into all ſorts of perſons, eſpecially thoſe of the Military Employment, that there was great need to have a watching eye over his Party; however, it ſuffered, as Zoſimus writes. Therefore did the Emperour forbid, “ that any of them that were proſcribed, ſhould come to Court, or ſet a foot “ within the City of Rome, under pain of Deportation: and alſo ſuch Soldiers as “ by procurement of Stilicho, or his Satellites, had before their time obtain'd “ Teſtimonials or Letters for Dignities, as of Tribunes and Protectors; thoſe of “ them excepted, whoſe Dwelling or Habitation was in Rome, from whom he “ did not apprehend ſuch danger, as from thoſe who had no juſt occaſion to go “ thither. “ Well might Honorius have ſome jealouſie and ſuſpicion of theſe perſons, when at this very time, after ten years had paſſed, he concerned himſelf about the Satellites of Gildo; ſome of whom, it ſeems, had lurked all this while, and concealed both themſelves and Eſtates. Having notice, that now ſome ſuch were diſcovered, he wrote back to Donatus the Proconſul of Africk, that they ſhould “ be committed to cuſtody, and proſcribed; or their Eſtates ſieſed and ſold; ſatisfying himſelf with this, without inflicting the pains of death, the preſcription of “ ten years having mollified the ſentence. “ At the end of the Year, he proceeded to remove ſome Abuſes, which had been introduced by Stilicho; of which we had had no knowledge, but for an Hiſtorical Conſtitution, as I may term it, directed now to Theodorus: herein he tells him, that Stilicho the Publick Enemy, had “ found out a new and unwonted device to ſet many Guards upon Shores and “ Havens, leſt any ſhould paſs out of the Eaſt into this part of the Empire. Mo- “ ved by the iniquity of which thing, and that Commerce might not be ſo rare as “ it had been; he commands that this pernicious cuſtody of the ſaid places, be re- “ moved, and that a free paſſage to and fro, may be opened. “ But becauſe at this time more than ever, the greater and richer ſort oppreſſed the poor and inferiour, (one of the forerunning ſigns of the Empires approaching ruine:) He prohibits

Sect. 2.

A. D. 408.

the Nobler, and the more Honourable, and richer perſons to uſe Merchandiſe, “ that there might be a more free Commerce betwixt Plebeians and their Chapmen. “

L.3. de Commerciis. Cod. Juſt.lib.4.tit. 63.

L.25.de Petitionib, &c. Cod. Th.Dat.4.Id. Decemb. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

48. So hard hearted and unmerciful were the rich Men of this Age, that they were ſo far from giving relief to the Diſtreſſed, that it pleaſed them even to add affliction to affliction. For the Emperour farther informs us,, that when an in- “ vaſion of the Barbarians was feared in the Weſtern Illyricum, a great number of “ the Inhabitants, out of fear, and to avoid deſtruction, forſook their own, and “ went into other Countries. Theſe, ſome perſons were ſo impudent as to make “ Slaves,and that by inſinuating ſomething concerning them to the Emperour,in way “ of begging. Perceiving the horridneſs of the practice, Honorius bids the Præfect to “ take notice, and have a care, that for the time to come, none of Illyricum, whe- “ ther living at home in their own Country, or elſewhere, be begged in ſuch man- “ ner. “ And ſome were yet more bold, without asking leave to ſeiſe upon the perſons of their Fellow Subjects, which cauſed Honorius further to declare, That “ all ſuch as were driven, or forced out of their own Countries, of whatſoever “ Province, Sex Condition or Age they were, ſhould not by any Man be retained, “ but ſuffered freely to return to their own homes. Neither if any Cloaths or “ Meat was given them, ſhould any thing be demanded for it, but ſet upon the Score “ of Humanity. But in caſe that any of them had been bought, or purchaſed of “ Barbarians, then thinks he it conducing to the publick utility, that the price be “ paid back to the purchaſers. That a conſideration of the loſs of ones Money “ may not hinder a Work of ſuch charity, he thinks it decent, that they that are “ redeemed, either return back what was paid, or elſe by the Labour, Work and “ Service of five years make them compenſation, and then enjoy that freedom to “ which they were born. He wills therefore, that with this reſtriction they be all “ ſent back into their own Countries, and there have all things entirely reſtored to “ them, according to the Jus Poſtliminii. If any Agent, Steward, or Farmer “ ſhall endeavour to render this Law ineffectual, he condemns him to the Iſles, and “ Deportation; and the Lord of the Ground he deprives of his Land, and baniſhes “ alſo into the Iſlands. For the more effectual putting of this order in execution, “ he will have the Chriſtians of the next places to take care of it: “ By which he means the Biſhops or Clergy, to whom the names of Chriſtian and Clerks are eſpecially appropriated, though at firſt they ſignified all the Faithful, or Believers; as in France, and here alſo with us the Conſiſtories or Audiences of Biſhops, have been, and are ſtill called Courts Chriſtian: He admoniſheth alſo the Curiales of the Neighbouring Cities, to take notice, that in ſuch emergencies the intent and purpoſe “ of the Law is to be obeyed. And will have all the Governours of Provinces to “ know that they ſhall forfeit ten pounds of Gold themſelves, and their Apparitors “ as much, if they neglect the execution of it. “

Fellow Subjects prohibited being Slaves.

L. ult. de Poſtliminio, Cod. Th.lib.5 tit. 5. & l. ult. Cod. Juſt.eod.tit.

A. D. 409.

Honorio 8, & Theodoſio 3, Coſſ.

Zoſimus, p.812.

49. The Conſuls for the Year CCCCIX, were the two Emperours, Honorius Auguſtus the eighth time, and Theodoſius the third. Before this, Alarich deriding the preparations made by Honorius, reſolved on his Expedition againſt Rome. And becauſe he would not attempt ſo great a matter on even hands only, but with advantages ſuperiour to thoſe of the Emperour, he ſent for Ataulfus, his Wifes Brother out of the upper Pannonia to have him for his Colleague and Aſſiſtant in the war, who had with him no ſmall number of Huns and Goths; yet he ſtaid not for his coming,but began his March, and paſſed Aquileia with the other Cities beyond Eridanus, viz. Concordia, Altinum and Cremona. Having croſſed the River, as on a Feſtival day without meeting with any adverſary, he came to a Caſtle of Bononia, called Oecubaria, whence having ranged Æmilia, and left Ravenna behind him, he proceeded to Arminium, a great City of Flaminia, and ſo at length into Picenum. Some ſay, that lying near Ravenna, he ſent to Honorius, and deſired peace, and that ſome place might be aſſigned to him and his in Italy to inhabit,promiſing,in return,to ſerve him faithfully as a Soldier. Honorius was ſenſible,that in ſtrength he was inferior,and could not well grapple with him,but was ſo confident in the fortifications of Ravenna,and hoped ſo much from the Forces which before the death of Stilicho he had ſent for out of the Eaſt; that he anſwered with great courage, that he could not yield to any of his demands; and that he ſhould do well to remember what became of his laſt expedition. Alarich not ſatisfied with this Anſwer, moved towards Rome; and in his paſſage rifled all the Cities and Villages, inſomuch, that if before the coming of the Barbarians into theſe parts, Arſacius and Terentius the Eunuchs had not preſently made their eſcape, and taken away Eucherius, the Son of Stilicho, to Rome, there to be put to death, which they inflicted upon him, the young Man had fallen into the hands of Alarich, and had eſcaped. But they having herein obeyed their orders, and reſtored Thermantia to her Mother, not being able to return the ſame way to Honorius, they took Ship, and ſailing toward Gall, came at length where he was. For their good ſervice Terentius was made Præpoſitus Cubiculi to the Emperour, who conferred the next place upon Arſacius. And Bathanarius being ſlain, who was Magiſter Militum in Libya, and had married the Siſter of Stilicho; the Government of that Province was delivered to Heraclianus, who killed Stilicho with his own hand.

Alarich pierceth into Italy.

Blocks up Rome.

50. Alarich now drawing near Rome, and ſtopping up all the paſſages to it, a dreadful tumult aroſe in the City, at ſo unexſpected a thing. Many Slaves and Barbarians made their eſcape to him; and the Pagans returning to their old Fable, contended, that the Chriſtian Religion, whence all thoſe miſchiefs proceeded, was to be forſaken. But the Senate had Serena in ſuſpicion, as if ſhe had brought the Barbarians againſt the City; and the Fathers, together with Placidia, the Emperour's Siſter, reſolved that ſhe ought to be put to death, as the cauſe of all theſe great calamities. They concluded, that if ſhe was removed out of the way, he would raiſe the Siege; there being none then remaining that would betray the place into his hands. This ſuſpicion was altogether falſe, and without ground, Serena having never once had ſuch a thought. But Zoſimus tells you, ſhe juſtly ſuffered puniſhment for offering violence to divine things, in ſuch manner as he is pleaſed to relate. At ſuch time as Theodoſius the elder, having ſuppreſſed the tyranny of Eugenius, came to Rome, he procured a contempt of ſacred worſhip in the minds of all Men, refuſing to allow, out of the publick ſtock, any thing to defray the expence of Sacrifices: then were the Prieſts of both Sexes driven away, and the Temples ſtood deſolate, and without their wonted Ceremonies. Then did Serena flout at them, and would needs ſee the Temple of the Mother of the Gods, where beholding a Bracelet about the Neck of Rhea, and worthy of that divine Worſhip, ſhe took it from the Image, aud put it about her own Neck. When an old Woman that was left of the Veſtal Virgins, ſaw it, ſhe upbraided her to her face with her impiety; but ſhe grievouſly reviled her, and made her Attendants drive her away, who, at her departing wiſhed, that ſuch vengeance as was due to ſuch wickedneſs might light on her, her Husband, and her Children. But ſhe giving no heed to ſuch things, carried away the Ornament, with which ſhe was very much pleaſed; but often afterward a thing appeared to her both ſleeping and waking, which denounced to her imminent death. Others alſo there were that had ſight of ſuch Apparitions. But though vengeance, the perſecutor of wicked perſons, did thus do her office; yet though Serena knew it, ſhe had no care of her ſelf; but at laſt gave that Neck to be broken by the Halter, which had worn the Necklace of the Goddeſs. Moreover, Stilicho himſelf, for an impiety of the like nature, did not eſcape the ſecret effects of vengeance, as the report went. For it was ſaid, that he commanded the Plates of Gold to be taken from the Doors of the Capitol at Rome, and thoſe that were commanded to do it, left this written upon the Doors: They are kept for a miſerable King. To which, the event anſwered; for he miſerably ended his life. Thus, Zoſimus the Pagan, attributes their death to what he eſteemed Sacrilege; whereas others, with more reaſon, believe them puniſhed for their ambitious practices to ſet up their Son.

Serena condemned to death by the Senate.

51. But however, the death of Serena did not procure the raiſing of the Siege; which Alarich ſo far inforced, that he blocked up all the Gates, and ſeiſing on Tiber, ſtopped all Commerce, and Proviſions from coming by Sea. The Romans reſolved to endure it, expecting every day relief from Ravenna; but when none came, they thought fit to diminiſh their ordinary and dayly expence of Proviſions by one half; and after that, when ſtill there was little hope, they lived on a third part of that which formerly they had allowed themſelves. Yet did not this courſe prevent a Famine, which by the many ill accidents it afforded, drew on a Plague, and all places were filled with dead Bodies. For, the Enemy having poſſeſſed himſelf of all the ways, the City it ſelf became the Sepulchre of the dead; which thing was enough to render the place deſolate; for if there had been no Famine at all, the ſtench ariſing from the Carcaſes would have deſtroyed the Inhabitants. Læta, who had been the Wife of Gratian, and Piſſamena, her Mother, relieved many, and that for a long time; having by the liberality of Theodoſius, obtain'd an allowance for a Royal Table, out of the Treaſury. But the matter having now proceeded to all extremity, and they being ready to devour one another, after attempts tempts made, which at another time would have ſeemed abominable, they reſolved to ſend to the Enemy, and to tell him, that they were ready to make a peace on reaſonable or moderate terms, yet more ready to fight; the People of Rome having, after it had once taken up Arms, not been accuſtomed to ſtand in fear of any. Baſilius was choſen for the Meſſenger, a Spaniard by original, and Preſident of a Province, with whom joyned himſelf one John, who was the Overſeer of thoſe Notaries of the Prince, which, Zoſimus tells us, they called Tribunes, being a Man fit enough, as known to Alarich. And yet they knew not certainly in Rome whether Alarich himſelf was at the Siege, a rumour being ſpread, that there was ſome other who had favoured the cauſe of Stilicho; but when the Meſſengers were come to the Camp, they ſaw in how great ignorance the People had been in ſo long time, and were aſhamed of it. When they had told their Errand, Alarich took eſpecial notice of this, that the People was ready to fight; and anſwering, that thick Graſs was more eaſily cut than thin, fell into a great laughter, and derided them.

52. When they came to the debate about peace, he uſed expreſſions exceeding even all Barbarous Inſolence. He affirmed, he would not raiſe his Siege till he had all their Gold and Silver, rich Houſhold Stuff, and ſuch Slaves as were of the Barbarous Nations, delivered into his hands. One of the Meſſengers hereat asking what then he would leave remaining to them in the City; he anſwered, their lives. Having obtained a Truce, in order to a further Treaty, they returned to Rome with his anſwer. And Zoſimus tells you, that the Romans being now convinced that it was Alarich that beſieged them, and deſpairing of all things which Man could perform, they bethought themſelves of that aſſiſtance of which the City had had experience, when vexed with Seditions, and how having forſaken their ancient Rites, they had been deprived of it. While they conſidered hereof, Pompeianus, the Præfect of the City, met by chance with ſome that were come from Tuſcia, and affirmed, that they had freed a Town, called Neveia, from imminent danger, by their Vows and Country Rites, having procured grievous Thunder and Lightning, you muſt know, and driven to flight the Barbarians. Having ſpoken with theſe Men, he did whatſoever was required by the Books of the Pontifices; but conſidering of the then prevalent opinion, that he might do it ſafely, he communicated his whole deſign to the Biſhop of the City, whoſe name was Innocent; who preferring the ſafety of the place before his own Opinion, permitted them to do what they thought fit. But they affirming, that nothing would avail the City, except the wonted Sacrifices were publickly reſtored, the Senate aſcending into the Capitol, and as well there, as in every Forum of the City, celebrating the uſual Rites, no body durſt be preſent at the Ceremonies of their Country, but thoſe Men that came from Tuſcia, being bid farewel, applied themſelves to appeaſe and mollifie the Barbarian all the other ways they could imagine. They ſent Meſſengers to him a ſecond time, and after much ſaid, and contended on both ſides, it was agreed, that the City ſhould pay down five thouſand pounds of Gold, thirty thouſand of Silver, four thouſand Silk Coats, three thouſand Skins of Purple Dye, and as many pounds of Pepper.

A Truce granted.

53. The City had nothing now in Bank, and therefore the Senators were to be taxed according to their Eſtates, the care whereof was committed to Palladius. He was not able to raiſe the Sum, either for that the owners concealed part of their Goods, or becauſe the City was grown poor, by reaſon of the covetous and continual exactions of the Emperours; and therefore (you hear Zoſimus) that wicked Genius which then governed the Affairs of mankind, impelled thoſe that were concerned in the raiſing of this Money, to the very height of Villany. For what was wanting in the Sum, they ſupplied out of the Ornaments belonging to the Images of the Gods, which amounted to no other than this, that thoſe Images which had been dedicated with Sacred Rites and Ceremonies, and decently adorned, becauſe they had preſerved the City in perpetual felicity, ſhould now by diminiſhing of theſe Ceremonies become altogether as inanimate and inefficacious. And becauſe all things which could tend to the deſtruction of the City were to concur, they not only deprived their Images of their Ornaments, but melted down ſome that were made of Gold and Silver; amongſt which was the Image of Valour; and it being thus deſtroyed, all that Fortitude or Valour which remained to the Romans, was extinguiſhed; which perſons that were skillful in divine matters, and exerciſed in the Rites of their Country, did predict. Money being raiſed in this manner, it was thought fit to ſend to the Emperour, to acquaint quaint him with the Agreement, and to let him know, that Alarich demanded not only Money, but the Sons of Noble Men for Hoſtages; and upon theſe terms would not only make a peace, but enter into a League offenſive and defenſive with him, and march againſt any one who ſhould act in an hoſtile manner againſt the Romans. Honorius was content, that Peace ſhould be made on theſe Conditions; and then the Money was paid to the Barbarians. And Alarich for three days, opened a Market to the hungry Citizens, granting them liberty to paſs out at certain Gates, and permitting Proviſions to be brought in from the Haven. The Citizens having thus refreſhed themſelves, the Barbarians departed from Rome, and encamped in the places about Tuſcia. But all the Slaves in a manner that were at Rome, fled away; every day ſome, and joyned with them, inſomuch that their number reached to forty thouſand; and while the Romans were employed in bringing in Neceſſaries from the Haven, the Barbarians ſtraggling up and down, fell upon them. This, Alarich, when he knew it, both ſeverely puniſhed, and prohibited for the time to come. This mitigation of miſchief, as it appeared, fell out at ſuch time as Honorius the Emperour entred the Conſulſhip at Ravenna, enjoying now that Honour the eighth time, and Theodoſius Auguſtus the third time, in the Eaſt.

The Siege of Rome raiſed by Money, as Zoſimus tells the Story.

54. This is Zoſimus his Relation, full of zeal for his ancient Country Rites and Ceremonies, which tranſported him ſo far out of the way of veracity, as to caſt dirt upon the memory of Innocent the Biſhop, as we may with as much reaſon as charity believe, becauſe the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, ſome of whom were prejudiced againſt him, lay no ſuch matter to his charge. The Men of Tuſcia we are to take for no other than Etruſcan Soothſayers, who were much skilled in ſuch like Myſteries. The Town they pretended to preſerve by their Conjuring, is by Sozomen called Larina in Tuſcia; and by Sigonius it is taken for Narnia. Why they could not ſhew ſuch Feats at Rome, Zoſimus gives but a ſlender account; for, others write, that many Senators of the Pagan Perſwaſion did really ſacrifice; and that the Soothſayers were not accidentally met, but ſent for on purpoſe by the Præfect: their Gods muſt have been very weak, or very angry, that could not, or would not deliver their Well-wiſhers, without ſo heavy a Compoſition as the City paid. Another Relation there is, of a certain Italian Monk, who hearing what danger Rome was in, haſted to the Siege, and laboured to perſwade Alarich to preſerve the City. To whom he anſwered, that he was willing ſo to do; but that there was one who continually was importunate upon him, and urged him to deſtroy it. If this be true, it came from a ſtronger hand than was that of Zoſimus his Gods.

Socrat. l.7.c.9. Sozom.l.9.c.7.

Zoſim.p.818.

55. But in the mean time, Conſtantine the Tyrant, who domineered in Gall, ſent ſome Eunuchs to Honorius, to beg his pardon, that he had received that Dignity which was conferred on him. For he profeſſed, he did not take it upon himſelf, but was forced to it by the Soldiers. Honorius conſidered, that ſo long as Alarich with his Barbarians preſſed ſo hard upon him, he could not think of any other Wars; and he had a reſpect to the ſafety of his Kinſmen, Verenianus and Didymius, kept Priſoners by the Tyrant, ſo as to conſent to what was done, and to ſend him the Imperial Habit; though he was deceived as to his Kinſmen, who were put to death before the coming of the Meſſengers. The Senate and People at the ſame time found as great reaſon ſtill to be concerned for their own ſafety, which was far from being ſure, or eſtabliſhed, the Emperour having neither given up the Hoſtages to Alarich, nor performed other Covenants. The Senate therefore made choice of Cecilianus, Attalus and Maximianus, to repreſent the ſadneſs of their condition to him, by ſhewing what they had already undergone, and what they muſt ſtill expect to ſuffer. But whether Honorius, for that he had taken off one Enemy, by conſenting to the promotion of Conſtantine, was grown high and ſecure; or, as Zoſimus ſaith, was governed by Olympius, who diſturbed all things, and hindered whatever was juſt and fitting, he ſent back the Meſſengers without any ſatisfactory Anſwer. But having removed Theodorus from the Præfectſhip of the City, he gave the place to Cecilianus: and Attalus he ſet over the Treaſury. Olympius ſtill bent his whole ſtudy and endeavour to find out ſuch as he imagined to know any thing of the Affairs of Stilicho; and now called to account Marcellianus and Salonius, two Brothers, and of the Emperour's Notaries. He delivered them up into the hands of the Præfectus Prætorio, by whoſe order, their Bodies were rent and torn with Scourges; but nothing did they offer to promote Olympius his Deſign. Honorius, convinced now that the City was in no good condition, thought fit to ſend for five Regiments of Dalmatians to defend it, in which were contained ſix thouſand Men, eſteemed the Flower of the Roman Army, both in reſpect of their courage, and their extraordinary ſtrength and ſtature.

Honorius ſendeth the Imperial Habit to Conſtantine the Tyrant.

Sect. 2. A. D. 409.

56. Valens their Commander, thinking it below the wonted courage and reſolution of the Romans to ſhun any paths or ways becauſe they were ſeiſed, and held by the Enemy, fell into the hands of Alarich and his Men, who waited for his coming; and ſcarcely one hundred eſcaped, amongſt whom was Valens himſelf, who with Attalus, ſent by the Senate as a Meſſenger to the Emperour, came ſafe into the City. Now greater miſchiefs ſtill following one another, when Attalus entred Rome, he diſcharged Heliocrates of that care, which by order of the Emperour, had by means of Olympius been impoſed upon him. His Employment was to ſearch after, and enquire out the Eſtates of thoſe who had been proſcribed upon the account of Stilicho, and bring them into the Treaſury. But being a Man of a moderate temper, and thinking it impious to inſult over miſerable people, he enquired not ſtrictly into the matter, but privily ſent to many concerned, to conceal their Goods as much as they could; whereupon as good for nothing he was ſent away to Ravenna, to ſuffer in the room of thoſe he had delivered; and had been put to death, but that he betook himſelf into a Church of the Chriſtians. As for Maximian, he was taken by the Enemy, and was redeemed by Marinianus, his Father, with thirty thouſand Aurei. But ſtill the Emperour deferring the Ratification of the Peace, and not making good the Covenants, the Romans could not freely, and without attempts made upon their Perſons, go out of the City. With this the Senate was ſo moved, as to ſend their Meſſengers again to him to perſwade him to embrace the Overtures; and amongſt them was the Biſhop of Rome, with whom were ſent ſome Barbarians by Alarich to ſecure them on their way, which the Enemy had every where beſet. While they were on their Journey, Ataulfus, who, as was ſaid, was ſent for by Alarich, paſſed the Alpes, which extend themſelves from Pannonia towards Venetia, or the Julian Alpes, ſo called. When he was come into Venetia, Honorius finding he had no numerous Forces, drew out all the Soldiers out of the Towns, and commanded them to oppoſe him, and hinder his conjunction with Alarich; which they did ſo effectually, that of the Goths they ſlew fifteen hundred, with the loſs but of ſeventeen Men. In the mean time, the Eunuchs at Court fell foul upon Olympius, and accuſed him as Author of all the Inconveniences under which the Empire at preſent laboured, and prevailed ſo far, that he was diſcharged of his place; which being done, that no greater miſchief might happen to him, he fled away into Dalmatia.

57. The Emperour now made Attalus Præfect of the City, and in his place ſet Demetrius over the Treaſury, with deſign that he ſhould diligently enquire into whatever might belong to it, that nothing might be concealed. Several Officers he turned out, and preferred others, as he pleaſed, amongſt whom was Generidus, to whom he gave the Command of all the Dalmatick Soldiers, and beſides them, of all that lay in Garriſon, through the upper Pannonia, Noricum, and Rhætia, as far as the Alpes. This Generidus was a Barbarian, but every way virtuouſly inclined, and moſt free from covetouſneſs, who ſtill adhered to the Rites of his Forefathers, neither would be drawn from the worſhip of the Gods. But of late there had been an Edict publiſhed, which forbade any that was not a Chriſtian to wear the Military Girdle at Court. Obliged by this Law, he, who alſo had a Command in Rome, layd by his Girdle, and quietly kept himſelf at home. The Emperour required, that he who was an Officer ſhould attend at the Palace according to his Rank and Place. To this he anſwered, that there was a Law which forbade any one to wear the Girdle, or be capable of any Employment that did not profeſs the Chriſtian Religion. Honorius replied, that the Law ſhould indeed bind others, but not him who had done ſuch ſervices for the Commonwealth; but he perſiſted, that he would not receive any advantage in that which tended to the injury of all other perſons concerned; neither would he attend any buſineſs, till the Emperour, compelled by ſhame and neceſſity, repealed the Law in all reſpects, and made it free to any one to hold his Opinion, together with the Employment he had before enjoyed. Beginning with this magnanimous Act, he kept his Men in continual Exerciſes, and furniſhing them with Conveniences, ſuffered none of their Proviſions to be drawn off to other uſes, as had been ordinarily practiſed. Nay, of his own allowance he gave rewards to ſuch of them as beſt deſerved. And behaving

Sect. 2.

A. D. 409.

having himſelf after this manner, he was both a terror to the neighbouring Barbarians, and protected thoſe Nations that were committed to his Charge.

The Soldiers mutiny at Ravenna.

58. In the mean time, the Soldiers that quartered at Ravenna fell into a Mutiny, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the Haven: which done, with a confuſed noiſe, they required, that the Emperor ſhould come to them. He thought not fit to venture his Perſon: but Jovius, who was advanced both to the Dignity of Præfectus Prætorio, and of Patrician, taking along with him Ellobichus, the Comes Domeſticorum Equitum, went to them, and pretending to be ignorant of the cauſe of their unquietneſs, though he himſelf was reported to be Author of it, demanded what had provoked them to ſuch a Seditious Act. They required that Turpillio and Vigilantius, two Officers in the Army, as alſo, that Terentius, the Præpoſitus Cubiculi, and Arſacius, that was next to him, ſhould be given up into their hands; aad Honorius durſt not deny them, for fear of a Revolt: ſo that the Officers were condemned to Baniſhment, and, in order to their Exile, carried on Ship-board; where they were made away by order of Jovius, leſt, returning again, they ſhould diſcover his practices againſt them, and procure the Emperor to puniſh him for it. As for Terentius, he was baniſhed into the Eaſt; and Arſacius was commanded to keep himſelf at Milan. Into the place of Terentius, was Euſebius promoted; the Command of Turpillio, was beſtowed on Valens; and that of Vigilantius on Ellebichus: by which the Mutiny now ſeemed to be appeaſed. Jovius, the Præfect, having got all the power into his own hands, reſolved to ſend to Alarich, to come as far as Ravenna, in order to a Treaty. Alarich ſo far complied with him, as to come to Arminium, at but thirty Miles diſtance; and thither Jovius ſpeedily betook himſelf: and, having lodged and contracted Friendſhip together, they fell into diſcourſe about the matter. Alarich his Demands were, that a certain ſumm of Gold, and a quantity of Corn and Proviſions might be yearly paid him: and, that both the Venetiæ, with Noricum and Dalmatia, might be aſſigned to him and his Men to inhabit and poſſeſs. Theſe Propoſitions were ſent away, in the preſence of Alarich, by Jovius; who, in other Letters, written apart, adviſed the Emperor to make Alarich a Magiſter Utriuſque Militiæ; thereby to ſweeten him, that he might remit ſomething of the harſhneſs of the Terms, and conſent to a Peace upon more tolerable and moderate conditions.

Jovius embroils the Emperor in new troubles.

59. The Emperor blamed the raſhneſs of Jovius; and wrote him word back, that, as for the quantity of Gold and Proviſions, he might be an equal Judge in that point, having, as Præfectus Prætorio, opportunity to be throughly ſkilled in ſuch matters: But, never would he grant the Dignity, or Office, of a Magiſter Militum to Alarich, or any of his Nation. Jovius, having received the Letter, did not read it privately, and to himſelf, but audibly in the hearing of Alarich; who was not moved at any other of the Contents, but fell into a Rage, when he found, that ſuch a Command ſhould be denyed to him and his Nation: and, he commanded his Barbarians to make ready to march to Rome, to be revenged for the Affront offered to their whole people. Jovius being quite put out of his way by thoſe unexpected Letters, knew not what courſe to take; but, to Ravenna he returned: where, to reingratiate, and make full amends for what he had done, he reſolved to overdo; and obliged Honorius by Oath, that he would never make Peace with Alarich, but wage War perpetually with him. This done, he himſelf touched the head of the Emperor, and alſo took an Oath to the ſame purpoſe; which he exacted, moreover, from the reſt that were in Place and Authority. In order to this extravagant Reſolution, the Emperor procured an Aid of ten thouſand Huns; for the ſuſtenance of whom, he cauſed Corn and Cattel to be brought out of Dalmatia. And he ſent out ſome, to eſpy and diſcover what way it was that Alarich took againſt Rome; gathering, in the mean time, together all his Forces. Alarich, by this time, repented of his purpoſe of attacking it; and procured the Biſhops to go to Honorius, and adviſe him by his neglect, not to ſuffer that City, which, now, for more than a thouſand years, had reigned over a great part of the World, to be waſted by Barbarians, nor ſuch beautiful Buildings to be burnt and defaced; but rather, ſubmit to ſome very moderate Conditions. Theſe were, not to enjoy the Dignity lately mentioned, nor the Provinces to be given up to inhabit; but only, both the Noricums, that lay upon the utmoſt part of Iſter, which were ſubject to continual Incurſions, and paid a very ſlender Tribute. For Proviſions, he would ſubmit to ſuch proportions as the Emperor himſelf ſhould think fit, and fully quit his Demand of Gold: deſiring, that betwixt him and the Romans, a Friendſhip and Society in War might be contracted, againſt any one that ſhould take Arms, or move, againſt the Commonwealth. Theſe things ſo mildly and modeſtly did Alarich propound, that all men admired his Temper. But, Jovius, and the reſt that were next about the Emperor, alledged, that they could not be granted, becauſe all in Office had taken an Oath, never to make Peace with him. And, if you will believe Zoſimus, they gave this reaſon; becauſe, if the Oath had been made to God, poſſibly it might have been neglected, by permitting to the Divine Benignity the Pardon of ſuch Wickedneſs: but, having ſworn by the head of the Emperor, it was not lawful for them to go againſt ſo heavy an Oath. So cautious, ſaith he, were the minds of theſe men, who (though without the care of God) governed Affairs at that time. And ſo he concludes the fifth Book of his Hiſtory.

take

UMI

Zoſim.lib.6. p. 824.

60. Alarich therefore finding himſelf abuſed, with his whole Army marched for Rome, reſolved to do his utmoſt in the Siege thereof. At which time came another Meſſenger from Conſtantine, out of Gall; one Jovius, a man of excellent Learning and Endowments, to ratifie the former Agreement, and to ask Pardon for the death of Didimius and Verenianus, the Kinſmen of the Emperor; who, he pretended, had been put to death without any Order received from Conſtantine. Finding Honorius in a great paſſion at the mention of their death, he told him, he ſhould do well, if, now entangled ſo much in the troubles of Italy, he gave ſome way to the time. And, if he would grant him leave to go back to him that ſent him, and to make known the condition that Italy was in; he would ſhortly return with all the Celtick, Spaniſh and Brittiſh Forces; and bring relief both to the City of, and the Country about, Rome. With this Propoſal, Jovius obtained leave to depart. Alarich being come to Rome, threatned he would take it by force, except the Citizens would joyn with him, and make War againſt Honorius. They ſticking hereat, he laid Siege to the City: and, proceeding on to the Haven, after he had ſpent ſome days in the Attack, he became Maſter of it. Now he had all the Proviſions in his power; and threatned to ſpend all upon his own Army, if they did not preſently ſubmit. Hereupon, the Senate aſſembled; and, after a full debate what was to be done, they conſented to what Alarich had propounded; for, death ſtood at every man's door, neither was there any way of evading it, no ſupply of Proviſions coming in from the Port. Therefore they thought fit, after the receiving of his Ambaſſadors, to invite him to the City: and, according to his Commands, they placed Attalus, the Præfect of Rome, in the Imperial Throne, adorned with Purple, and a Crown about his head.

Rome again yielded to Alarich.

The Citizens make Attalus Emperor.

61. This fine man thus promoted, could not but, out of his great ſtock, be liberal to others. He preſently declared Lampadius, Præfectus Prætorio; and Marcianus, Præfect of the City. As to the Army; he gave Command of the Horſe to Alarich, and of the Foot, to that Valens, who had been Captain of the Dalmatick Legions. Ataulfus (as Sigonius, out of ſome other than the Vulgar Copy, informs us) he made Comes Domeſticorum, and deſigned Tertullus Conſul for the following year: and having beſtowed the reſt of the places, was accompanied by a Royal Attendance to the Palace, though many ill Omens happened, as to his ſucceſs. The day after, he entred the Senate, and there made a ſpeech full of Arrogance; affirming, that he would bring the World into ſubjection to the Romans: and, he bragged of other matters; for which, perhaps, the Divine Power was angry with him, and not long after, as our Author hath it, turned out the man. But, however, the Romans were mightily pleaſed, having obtained ſuch Magiſtrates as underſtood their buſineſs; and they took moſt pleaſure in the Honour conferred upon Tertullus, the Conſul. Only, the Family of the Anicii, who ſeemed to carp at all things which tended to publick good, were againſt it; for, poſſeſſing the greateſt Eſtates, they could not endure the publick Felicity, as Zoſimus calls it. Alarich now adviſed Attalus to ſend away convenient Forces to Africk and Carthage; and, by that means to turn Heraclianus out of that Government; that, being obliged, as he was, by his duty to Honorius, he might give no interruption to his proceedings. But he nothing eſteemed this wholſom Counſel; but, as even, Zoſimus acknowledgeth, truſting to his Prophets, or Sooth-ſayers, (at another time) was perſwaded, that that Country would fall into his hands without a ſtroke. He neglected therefore, to ſend Drumas; who, with thoſe Troops of Barbarians which he commanded, might eaſily have defeated Heraclianus. And, deſpiſing the advice of Alarich the ſecond time, gave the Command of the African Forces to one Conſtantine; and ſent him away, ſlenderly provided.

Who ſillily manageth his Matters.

62. While all men expected what the iſſue of this would be, Attalus undertook an

A. D. 409.

an Expedition againſt Honorius, who ſtill held his Reſidence at Ravenna. And the Emperor was therewith ſo terrified, that he ſent to him, and offered to receive him as his Partner in the Empire. But, to this, Jovius, whom Attalus had made Præfectus Prætorio, and now ſent him to Honorius, anſwered; that his Maſter would not ſuffer Honorius to enjoy the Title, no, not to keep his very Body entire; ſome part whereof he would have him loſe by Mutilation, and afterwards be baniſhed into ſome Iſland. This prodigious Arrogance, raiſing aſtoniſhment in all that heard it, Honorius prepared to make his eſcape; and, for that purpoſe, procured no ſmall number of Ships to be brought into the Haven at Ravenna; when, in the mean time, ſix Cohorts of Soldiers arrived, who had been expected in the life time of Stilicho, out of the Eaſt; but came not till now, to his Aſſiſtance. With the ſight of theſe men, who in number were four thouſand, the Emperor revived, as out of a Swoon, and committed to them the care of Ravenna; where he reſolved to ſtay, till he could hear what became of the Affairs of Africk. In caſe Heraclianus prevailed, matters being then ſecured there, he would make War upon Attalus and Alarich; but, if he ſhould be beaten, as the laſt refuge, he purpoſed to go to Theodoſius into the Eaſt, and to quit the Weſtern Provinces. But, while he thought of theſe matters, he found means to have Jovius brought back to his Party, and perſwaded to be treacherous, as Zoſimus terms the deſerting of a Pagan Uſurper, and returning to his duty toward his Lawful Chriſtian Prince. He told the Senate plainly, that he would go on no more Errands; and ſpoke words in that Aſſembly, which our Writer calls indecent: and that, for as much as the Attempts of thoſe who were ſent into Africk had miſcarried, the Barbarians ought to be diſpatched thither, to make War with Heraclianus. Conſtantine, indeed, being ſlain, their hopes, as to Africk, began to abate: but, Attalus being much incenſed, managed his matters by other perſons; and ſent away Mony to repair, if poſſible, the Decay of his Intereſt in that Province.

Honorius reduced to great Straits.

Gothofredus in Philoſtorgii lib. 12. c. 3. putab. Zoſimum deceptum in his quæ narrat de reali Corporis mutilatione, cum figuratè tantum Jovius alluſerit hoc ſenſu, Imperium potius deponeret Honorius ſalva vita corporeque.

63. But, what ſaith Alarich? how doth he ſatisfie himſelf in this Pageantry, to which he had given the beginning? He was exceedingly perplexed, and began to deſpair of his Creature Attalus; perceiving him now, a man of no Judgment or Conduct. Having therefore purpoſed to preſs on the Siege of Ravenna, he now reſolved to depart, being adviſed ſo to do by Jovius; who, after the Defeat of Attalus his Forces in Africk, turned again to Honorius his ſide, and ceaſed not to perſwade Alarich, that Attalus, if he once eſtabliſhed himſelf, would, if he could, procure the deſtruction both of him and his Relations. But, while yet Alarich continued in Fidelity to Attalus, Valens, the Magiſter Equitum, as a Traitor, was put to death; and Alarich himſelf marched with his Troops to all the Cities of Æmilia: and, ſuch as refuſed to own Attalus, he reduced to obedience by force, except Bononia; which he beſieged, but could not maſter. Moreover, he undertook an Expedition into Liguria, to conſtrain it alſo to acknowledge him for Emperor; but, with what ſucceſs, Zoſimus, our Informer, doth not acquaint us. This is evident, that Honorius now wrote to the Cities of Brittain, who ſent to him for Aid, to provide for themſelves: and he gave a Congiary to the Soldiers, out of that Mony which had been ſent him by Heraclianus; and, living at his eaſe, ingratiated himſelf with Military Men in all Quarters.

Zoſim. lib. 6. p. 626.

64. In the mean time, Conſtans was again ſent into Spain, by Conſtantine, his Father. He took along with him, as his Captain-General, one Juſtus; at which, Gerontius was ſo enraged, as, diſdaining to have another brought over his head, he inveigled the Soldiers that lay thereabouts, and procured the Barbarians that were in Gallia Celtica, to revolt from Conſtantine. He was not in capacity to reduce them, his Forces being now in Spain: and therefore theſe Tranſrhenine Barbarians, as Zoſimus calls them, invaded all places, according to their luſt and pleaſure; and drove, both the Inhabitants of the Iſland of Britain, and ſome of the Celtick Nations, to that ſhift, that they revolted from the Empire; and obeying no longer the Roman Laws, lived according to their own Preſcripts. Therefore did the Britains take Arms; and, refuſing no dangers for the ſafety of their Country, freed it from the Barbarians which hovered upon it. As alſo, the Tract of Armorica, and other Provinces of Gall, immitating herein the Britains, in like manner freed themſelves; caſting out the Roman Officers, and ſettling their Government according to their own diſcretion. Others write, that Gerontius, out of anger that Juſtus was preferred before him; having got the Soldiers to his Party, put the Imperial Robe upon Maximus, a Creature of his own; and made him Auguſtus at Tarraco, or Arragon. That, on the other ſide, the Franks, excited by the ſluggiſh humour of Conſtantine, ſtantine, paſſed the Rhine, and poured themſelves like a Torrent into Gall, which they had formerly ſo often attempted with ſuch various ſucceſs: and, amongſt other Cities, took and plundered Triers, at this time the Imperial Seat in theſe Quarters. The Vandals, and other Nations, upon rumour hereof, repaired ſpeedily to the Rhine, to give a ſtop to their preſumption. But, the Franks, after that Reſpondialis, King of the Allemans, was returned from the Rhine with his Forces, Goar being fled to the Romans, fell with great violence upon the Vandals: and having ſlain Godegiſil, their King, cut in pieces almoſt twenty thouſand of them; and had deſtroyed them all, if the Alans, having notice of their diſtreſs, had not come in, in good time to their Aſſiſtance.

Sect. 2. A. D. 409.

65. The Vandals, Alans and Suevi, diſcouraged by this Defeat, and not daring to grapple and conteſt with the Franks, ſome ſay, now entred into Conſultation to quit Gall, and ſeek out ſome other Country, wherein to ſettle. That, having made Gunderich, the Son of Godigiſil, King in his Father's ſtead, they went to the Pirenæan Mountains; and, joyning to themſelves the Garriſon which Conſtans had left at the Straits, paſſed over into Spain; and, proceeding into the fartheſt parts thereof, fell upon the Roman Captains when they never expected it, and brought the Country into Subjection. This indeed, is the Year in which Caſſiodorus and Proſper note the Vandals to have entred, and ſiezed on Spain: of which Oroſius might have given us a full Account; living at this time, and being that Country man: but, thus much he tells us, in ſhort. "That, the Nations of the Suevi, Vandals, and many others with them, being incited by Stilicho; beat the Franks, and paſſed the Rhine; invaded Gall, and came as far as the Pyrenæans: Where, being ſtopped, they poured themſelves back into the Provinces. That Conſtantine, the Tyrant, who uſurped at ſuch time as they raged in Gall; ſent Judges into Spain, whom the Provinces obediently received: but, two Brothers, noble and rich, Didymus and Verenianus would not receive them; but, endeavoured to defend themſelves, and their Country, for the true and rightful Emperor, againſt the Tyrant and Barbarians. For ſome time gathering their own Servants together out of their Farms, at their own Charge they maintained them; and, not diſſembling their intentions, without diſturbing any one, they marched on toward the Pyrenæans. Againſt them Conſtantine ſent his Son Conſtans, whom, of a Monk alſo, he had made Cæſar, with certain Barbarians; who, having formerly been received into a League and Friendſhip, and taken into the Army, had the Name of Honoriaci. Hence aroſe the deſtruction of Spain. For, theſe Brothers being killed, who, at their own charge, endeavoured, with a private Garriſon, to ſecure the Alpes of the Pyrenæan, as he calls them; liberty of preying upon the Palatine Fields was firſt given to thoſe Barbarians, as a Reward for the Victory; and, afterwards was committed to them the care of that Mountain, and ſecuring of the Straits; the faithful and effectual cuſtody of the Country-men being removed. Therefore the Honoriaci, enriched with Booty, and allured with abundance; that they might the eaſilier go unpuniſhed, and have more liberty to be wicked, betrayed the Cuſtody of the Pyrenæan; and, opening the Straits, let all the Nations which wandered up and down Gall, into the Provinces of Spain, and joyned themſelves with them. And here, after great and bloody Rovings, after great waſte made, both of things and perſons, for which they are now ſorry, having by Lot diſtributed the Country, they remain and inhabit to this Day." So much Oroſius; whom to explain, as to the diſtribution of the Country, we are told by others, that the Alans poſſeſſed themſelves of the Provinces of Luſitania and Carthage, or Cartagena: that the Vandals, called Silingi, obtained Bætica: and that the Spaniards retiring to Cities and Caſtles, the Barbarians were Lords of the reſt. Gunderich the firſt King of the Vandals (in this Country) is ſaid to have reigned in the parts of Galicia ſixteen years.

Sigon. de Occid. Imp.

Lib.7.c.40.

66. For all this year we have been taken up with matters relating to War. Let us divert our ſelves a little, by taking a view of what elſe paſſed of Civil Concernment. While Alarich, at the beginning of the year, diſturbed all Italy; but, eſpecially, threatned Rome; Honorius, lying at Ravenna, when he could not protect the Cities from his Violence, yet, took care for the Eſtabliſhment of the Officers, who, in a civil and limited ſenſe, were called Defenſores Civitatum. Firſt, for the making of them, he ordained; "that, Being initiated in the Myſteries of the Orthodox Religion, they ſhould be appointed and ſettled by the Decree of the moſt reverend Biſhops; alſo, of the Clergy, Honorati, Poſſeſſors of Lands, and the Curiales: which Election muſt be reported to the moſt Illuſtrious Præfectus Pratorio, Honorius eſtabliſheth the Defenſors of the Cities.

L.8. de Defenſoribus Civitatum. Cod. Juſt. lib.1.tit.55. Dat.15. Cal. Febr.

Prætorio, and by his Letters be confirmed. Being thus appointed, he gives “ them in Charge, and authoriſeth them, if they hear of any violence offered to “ Poſſeſſors, to the breach of the publick Peace and Tranquility, thereof to make “ report to the Illuſtrious and Magnificent the Præfectus Prætorio, the Illuſtrious the “ Magiſtri Equitum and Peditum, the Magiſtri Officiorum, and both the Comites of “ the Treaſuries. “ Theſe directions he gave to Cæcilianus, the Præfectus Prætorio: and, four days after, added farther to them; that, The Defenſors ſhould by their “ care and forecaſt, prevent the Poſſeſſors being oppreſſed in Weights and Meaſures, “ by the Suſceptors, or Receivers of Tributes; of which, heavy complaint “ was made to him at this time. Their Office being to protect the Oppreſſed, he “ commands, that ſuch a Suſceptor being diſcovered, they ſend him to the Judge “ with ſignification and proof of his Crime. The Courſe in ſuch Caſes of Oppreſſion, “ and other Injuries, was to conteſt them before the Defenſors, the Courts, Curators, “ or Duumviri of Cities and Towns, the Criminals being brought, and the “ matters examined, and entred before them. Now, ſometimes it happened, that “ theſe perſons refuſed to deliver Copies of theſe Examinations and Proofs, out of “ favour to the Parties accuſed; ſo that the injured perſons could not further proſecute “ them. In ſuch caſes he declares, that they may conteſt the injury by a Libel “ publickly affixed in the moſt eminent and frequented places of the City; which “ Libel ſhall be recorded by the Scribes, Tabularii, or Clerks, that ſo the truth may “ be diſcovered by their Examination, and thoſe puniſhed by the Judge that denyed “ the Copy of the Acts. “

L.9.de Defenſ. Cod.Juſt. interpolata ex l.3.de Superexactionibus, Cod.Th.l. 11.tit.7.Dat. 11.Cal.Febr.

He makes a large Conſtitution in behalf of accuſed perſons.

67. Theſe Laws are but part of a large Conſtitution made by Honorius at this time concerning the manner of proceeding againſt Criminals; and eſpecially in favour of them, to mitigate the tyranny of Judges, and to reſtrain the malice of Accuſers. As his Father formerly had done, he now required, that a Criminal Action ſhould be ended within a year. Not that the Judge was to permit “ the Accuſer to loiter, or the matter at all to be delayed, but diſpatched as ſoon “ as poſſible; but though there might be ſome cauſe for the trial to be put off, yet “ ſhould not the proſecution extend beyond that limit. In caſe the Accuſer fail to “ perfect his proſecution within that time, he inflicts infamy upon him; or if he “ be a mean perſon, then condemns him to Baniſhment, (the uſual exchange for infamy “ in Men of baſe condition) except by conſent of both Parties a Diſcharge “ be made. But the conſent of both ſhall not impower the Judge to lengthen out “ the Action beyond a year, though he need not conclude it before that term, if “ the Parties joyntly requeſt to have that reſpite. This he ordained as well to put “ ſome concluſion to the harraſſing and vexing of accuſed perſons, as to quicken up “ the Judges, ſome of whom (poſſibly the illuſtrious, as Cæcilianus, to whom the “ Conſtitution is directed) were too apt to put off matters, pretending multiplicity “ of buſineſs. “ The Empire being ſo vaſt and large, perſons were often accuſed at a great diſtance, and brought to anſwer in another Country; whence many Caſualties and Accidents intervening, they never returned again, and being hurried away in haſte by the Accuſers or publick Officers, they had no time to ſettle their matters at home; and by that means, great detriment happened to their Children or Families. To prevent this, Theodoſius the Great granted moſt graciouſly to ſuch perſons leave to continue thirty days before they were removed, to ſettle their Eſtates and Families, and comfort themſelves and Relations under a moderate cuſtody. This his Son now confirmed, enjoyning that ſuch a perſon be asked before “ the Municipal Magiſtrates, who were to enter it amongſt their Acts, whether he “ would make uſe of the Benefit granted by that Law, or rather chuſe preſently to “ be ſent to his Trial. If he claimed the benefit, he ſhould not be refuſed; and if “ he choſe to be ſent away, this ſhould ſpeedily be done together with his Accuſers, “ whom he would not permit to keep or detain the Priſoner as long as they “ pleaſed, or till they ſhould think fit to begin the Journey. “ For as it is reaſonable to give reſpite to the Accuſed, who is ſurpriſed (as we may ſuppoſe,) to recollect himſelf, and ſettle his Affairs. So is there no reaſon to allow any ſuch delay to the Accuſer, who in laying any crime to the charge of another perſon ought to be ſuppoſed to come prepared, and to have conſidered what he is about.

L.ult.ut intra annum criminalis actio, &c. Cod.Th.lib.9. tit.36.

L. ult.de exhibend.& tranſmittend. reis, Cod.Th.lib.9. tit.2.

68. But ſtill farther to prevent that cruelty which was too frequently exerciſed upon Priſoners, he forbids the Municipal Magiſtrates to commit any who were “ accuſed before them of Murder, Robbery, Adultery, or the like crimes, to priſon “ by their own authority, but to ſend them with the informations to the Judges “ of the Provinces. “ Although this Conſtitution reſpects generally all Malefactors, yet Defenſores civitatum, Curatores, Magiſtratus, & ordines oblatos ſibi reos in carcerem non mittant, &c. l.5 ejuſd.tit.& l.7. de defenſorib.civitat.Cod. Juſt.

Sect. 2.

A. D. 409.

yet in an eſpecial manner it ſeems to intend Robbers or Highway-men, who often abounded in thoſe parts of Italy that lay toward the Mountains, and ſuch as were convenient for feeding of Cattel. For from another part of this Conſtitution we are aſſured, that Feeders of Cattel or Herdſmen were much addicted to this Trade, being always abroad in the Fields, and having opportunity to lie in wait for Travellers. Therefore Valentinian formerly forbade them the uſe of Horſes: and ſo Honorius did, who now further expreſly commands, That no Curialis, Plebeian or Poſſeſſor of Lands, board out their Sons with any Herdſman, though he permits “ that they place them with other Countrymen, which was uſual for the “ conveniency of Air. If after publication of this Law, any preſume to do it, he “ ſhall be looked upon as confeſſing himſelf of the Society of Robbers. “ This was to prevent the crime, and conſequently the impriſonment; and prevention is far better than puniſhment. But it ſo happening, that as a ſubſequent irregular courſe of life renders ineffectual, preventional Phyſick; ſo the wholſome Preſcripts of Princes are made invalid by the ſtubborneſs and unpliable humour of their Subjects; therefore ſuppoſing what uſually happens, when ſuch perſons were accuſed and apprehended, he preſcribes farther rules for the due and fair proſecution of the guilty, and for the clearing and acquitting of them who became Priſoners by no other guilt than that of the malice or temerity of their Accuſers. By the old cuſtom, an Accuſer might before ſuch time as the Action was accompliſhed, obtain a Superſedeas for the Suit, whether the Defendant was willing or not, to have it ended. But Antoninus and Verus thought fit to put ſome reſtraint upon this liberty, denying any ſuch Superſedeas (Abolitio, the word of the Law is) if the term was near, which was determined to criminal cauſes. They thought it unreaſonable to grant ſuch favour to the Accuſer of renouncing and nulling thoſe Acts by which he had ſo long vexed the accuſed Party, whoſe conſent muſt be proved. And this was farther carried by Valentinian, ſo as to cut off all ſuch liberty, if the Defendant had been injuriouſly treated by impriſonment, or, perha[illegible] Examination by torture.

L.un.Ne paſtoribus dentur filii nutriendi, Cod.Th.l.9.tit.30. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Societatem latronum videbitur confiteri.

69. Now Honorius thought fit to put ſtill a greater check upon malicious Accuſations, by allowing to the Accuſer only that term of thirty days to ſue for ſuch “ a Superſedeas, which was granted to the other Party to continue where he was, and to diſpoſe and order his Affairs before his conveyance from the cuſtody of the Officials “ of the Judge unto priſon. In this time wherein no great moleſtation had “ happened to him, he gives leave to his Adverſary to conſider, and if he pleaſe “ to repent of what he had done, or perſiſt in his Accuſation after his entring his “ name, and ſubmitting to the Lex Talionis; but afterwards he denies all deliberation “ and revocation without the conſent of the other party. In like manner, if a witneſs “ produced by him, was once ſubjected to examination by torture for diſcovery of the matter pretended, he denies him all power of revocation without his conſent. But in caſe he was only committed to cuſtody, whatſoever time had elapſed, “ he grants it, provided he pay him his Charges; except ſuch witneſs be alſo accuſed, “ as conſcious to the crime, in which caſe he will have him in the ſame “ condition, as the principal accuſed. But what is ſaid of Witneſſes, he will “ have only to be underſtood of theſe of ingenuous Condition, that is, neither Slaves nor Libertini, of whom the Roman Laws made no ſuch account; but that, notwithſtanding their torturing, this Abolition might be granted; and no ſuch “ reſpect was had of them as to Charges. “ Such order he thought fit to take about accuſed perſons, whether they ſhould be committed to Priſon or not. But when “ in Priſon, his care for them increaſed, that they might be uſed with humanity. He commands that every Lord's day, (a day conſecrated to Works of Piety and Charity) the Judges ſend for them out of Priſon, view them well, and inquire of “ them how they are treated by their Keepers, who too often were bribed to uſe “ them with ſufficient ſeverity; and ſtarve them, if not looked after. In the “ next place he orders them to be ſuſtained at the publick charge, if they have not “ wherewithal to maintain themſelves, for which purpoſe two or three Libellæ a “ day, or as much as the Judges ſhall think convenient, ſhall be allowed to the Commentarienſis “ to find them Victuals. He further wills, that under a ſure Guard “ they be conveyed to the Baths, to waſh off any naſtineſs contracted in Priſon. “ And in the laſt place, he wills the Biſhops to put the Judges in mind, that they “ execute this Law to the full. “ For, both by the Imperial Conſtitutions, and Eccleſiaſtical “ Canons they had power given them to viſit Priſons, and provide for the “ relief of the miſerable and oppreſſed. And indeed ſo great were the corruptions of the manners of this Age, that there being no truſt to be given to perſons of other conditions, the Emperour required them in ſeveral caſes to interpoſe themſelves, as preſumed moſt conſcientious, and as having ſome authority and awe amongſt the People. Theſe and ſome other things of religious Concernment did Honorius enact in one large Conſtitution, directed to Cecilianus the Præfect; and, as we may conclude, at the deſire of the Meſſengers ſent the ſecond time to him from the Senate, amongſt whom Innocentius the Biſhop of Rome went to lay open to him the great preſſures and grievances under which they groan'd.

L.ult. de Abolitionib.Cod.Th.lib.9.tit.37.l.ult. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc conflata eſt.

L.ult.de cuſtodia Reorum. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 3.& l.9. de Epiſcop. Cod. Juſt.

Another to remove another grievance about Marriage.

70. Another grievance we find at this time, of which the People had ſufficient reaſon to complain, which was repreſented to the Emperour by ſome other means than this Meſſage, the Law for redreſs of it not being inſcribed to Cæcilianus, but to Theodorus, his Predeceſſor; although in the Chronology of Laws it be placed after that large Conſtitution which to him is directed. It was too ordinary a practice for ſuch as had a deſign to marry, for their convenience, or according to their liking, when they could not have the conſent of the Parents (the true order of proceeding according to Law) to betake themſelves to the Prince by Petition, and pretending to have the conſent of the Woman, to procure him to interpoſe his Authority, and by a clandeſtine or ſurreptitious ſuggeſtion, obtain what elſe they deſpaired ever to accompliſh. Now ſuch kind of Marriages he prohibits by vigour of this Law, Matrimony certainly being to be contracted by the conſent of both “ parties, and of the Parents; and, of it ſelf, of ſuch a nature as ought to come ea- “ ſily on, and of its own accord without any Reſcript or interpoſition of the Em- “ perour. Such Reſcript obtained ſhall be underſtood to be ſurreptitious, and he “ who afterward ſhall obtain it, ſhall ſuffer loſs of Goods and Deportation; his Sons “ born in that Wedlock ſhall be illegitimate, and all hope of pardon is utterly cut off. But in caſe a Suitor hath had the conſent of the Woman and her Parents, the Re- “ ſcript of the Prince may be obtain'd for conſummation of the Marriage; for “ ſhe that hath been already betrothed, may juſtly be demanded, as alſo the four- “ fold of thoſe Arræ or Preſents which had been made to her, upon a breach, as “ the Law directed.“ Moreover, by other Laws, certain ſorts of Marriages otherwiſe forbidden, might be allowed by the Reſcript of the Prince; as that of a Woman with her Tutor or Guardian, if the Emperour approved of his manners and integrity, as to the management of her Eſtate. Moreover, by his Authority Matrimony might be contracted with a perſon of unequal Degree and Dignity. And ſo might that betwixt Couſin-Germans, or thoſe of the fourth Degree, as Honorius here terms it, (in a tranſverſal line) which his Father of triumphal Memory, as he words it, did not forbid any to procure by way of ſupplication; though he forbade it otherwiſe.

L. unico Si nuptiæ ex Reſcripto petantur. Cod. Th. l. 3. tit. 10. L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc interpolata eſt.

Marriage of Couſin Germans, how approved and diſapproved.

71. That Theodoſius did forbid the Marriage of Couſin-Germans is very certain from many teſtimonies, although the Law it ſelf be not now extant in any of our Books. And he ſeems to have forbidden it for this reaſon, that he that hath to do with his Couſin-German, hath to do, as it were, a Brother with his Siſter, they being in the next degree, and as little different as can be from really ſuch. It's thought alſo that the puniſhment he inflicted upon Offenders againſt that Law, was no leſs than death, and particularly by Fire, as alſo the loſs of Eſtate, as was wont in caſe of inceſt. This rigour his Son Arcadius thought fit to mitigate the year after his Father's death, inflicting upon the Offenders only confiſcation of Eſtate in certain caſes, as where there were none to ſucceed them by right of inheritance, the children of this and other inceſtuous conjunctions (ſo he makes it) being made incapable of receiving any thing from the Parent. And upon farther thoughts, at length after eight or nine years, he judged this Marriage good and legitimate enough, and, as ſuch, by another Law did declare it: of which opinion Juſtinian was alſo afterward, and made it good by inſerting this Law into his Code. However, in the Weſt, Honorius ſtill had obſerved his Father's Conſtitution, though his Brother was ſo uncertain in his Determinations; and, as he did not repeal the Law, ſo he now thought fit to allow of that mitigation that the Author himſelf made, by permitting a Diſpenſation to be obtained by a Reſcript. Indeed, the Law and Practice, both, as to this matter of Couſin-Germans, have been various in ſeveral Ages. There was no Law againſt this Marriage, till that of Theodoſius; but St. Auguſtine informs us, that ſeldom was the liberty made uſe of, being generally abhorred. Some did it, but it was diſapproved by the Generality; which, even, in thoſe days, by practice, ſeems to conſent to the opinion of the Canon Law; which approves not of the Marriage of Couſin-Germans, becauſe they are in the ſecond

L. 3. de inceſtis Nuptiis Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit, 12.

L. 19. de Nuptiis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 4.

De civitate Dei lib. 15.

Sect. 2. A. D. 409.

ſecond Degree. How lawful, or unlawful the thing may be in it ſelf, the common practice of it, at leaſt, is not expedient: the world being wide, and affording more conveniences than can be found in ſo near a Relation. And it tends to weaken, if not untie the Bond of humane Society, for preſervation whereof, that Father, as well as for other reaſons, will have Marriages of the neareſt Relations to have been prohibited in ancient times. Were this encouraged, and ordinarily practiſed, Mankind would not only be diſtinguiſhed into ſeveral Nations, as neceſſarily it muſt, but every Nation, nay, every Town into certain Clanns and Parties, whence would proceed narrowing of intereſts, a cantoniſing of the publick, and an alienation of affections, and ſuch effects as follow enmity and contention, riſing from eſtrangedneſs in converſation.

Care taken for defence of Africk.

Terrarum ſpatia quæ Gentilibus propter, &c. L.1.de terris limitaneis, Cod. Th.lib.7.tit.15.

72. But while Italy was ſo much endangered by Alarich, one thing there was diſcovered in Africk, which, if permitted, would have brought that Province alſo into farther danger. It had been an ancient cuſtom, that the Lands that lay upon the Borders or Limits, were aſſigned to the Limitaneous Soldiers, or ſuch as ſerved for defence of the Borders; and with this condition, that if their Sons were Soldiers, they ſhould then enjoy them; but if they were not, they ſhould not return into private hands. But now Honorius diſcovered, that ſo far ſome of thoſe in Africk were in private hands, that they who enjoyed them, did not perform the ſervice for the end of which they were granted over. They had, he ſaith, been granted by the humane proviſion of the Ancients for the care and defence of the Limit and Ditch, or that he calls Foſſatum, to the Soldiers that had the name of Gentiles, or ſuch as being Strangers of other Nations, ſerved the Romans in the “ Army; being much the ſame with the Læti, lately ſpoken of. But he found “ they were held by others, whom now he obliges to the ſame duty about the Foſſatum, and defence of the Limit, as Antiquity had obliged the former Poſſeſſors. “ Otherwiſe theſe Lands ſhall revert to the Gentiles, if they may be found; if not, they ſhall be conferred upon the Veterane Soldiers with the ſame Burthen, that “ Proviſion may be ſufficiently made for the Defence of the Borders of the Empire. “ Theſe Borders, as we have already ſaid, were either naturally fenced by Seas, Rivers, Mountains or Woods; or elſe by Ramparts made of Wood, Stone, or Earth, which they called Limits, or, by Ditches, or Trenches, which they termed Foſſata, ſo as alſo Caſtles ſometime are called, becauſe fortified by ſuch Foſſæ or Trenches. Now whereas theſe Lands were given with a condition of Service to be performed; could not be transferred upon private perſons, but according to the ſame condition, and might not deſcend to Sons, except they ſubmitted to the ſame ſervice of fighting, and defending the Borders, they much reſemble thoſe granted in Fee, as we ſay at this day. And ſome have been of opinion, that the Laws of the Feuda hence took their original, of which more largely we ſpeak in the Hiſtory of the Lombards. As for this Law, it is directed to Gaudentius, as Vicar of Africk, if Comes rather be not to be read, the place of whom he exerciſed in that Country eight years before; and things of Military Concernment, as this is, belonged to his Inſpection. The particular reaſon that urged the Government to the greater care of the Limits, and the making of it, we may take for no other than the danger that Africk was now in from the attempts of Attalus, of which ere while we heard ſufficiently.

How the Emperour's Affairs ſtood in Gall.

L.171.de Decurionibus Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

73. The Affairs of Honorius were now but in a mean condition in Gall, where Conſtantine and the Barbarous Nations had carried all before them. Yet we find that he had ſome good footing ſtill in that Country; for there Claudianus Poſthumus Dardanus was this Year his Præfectus Prætorio, a perſon of great Note, and very well known to the Learned and Religious Men of this Age, who, though he bore twice that Office, had little to do; and had leiſure enough to employ his time and charity in making of High Ways, and fencing them with Walls and Gates, as he is commemorated in an old Inſcription; yet there is extant one Reſcript directed to him concerning the Principales of Cities and Municipia, determining how long they ſhall hold their places, what perſons ſhall be elected, and concerning the Privileges of the ſecond of them in order. As for the time, he requires fifteen years wherein to attend the ſervice of the Courts, and the Emperour; a great “ part of their charge conſiſting in their adjuſting and levying of Tributes. And “ all thoſe that had within ſix years receded from the Employment, he will have “ forced back. He thinks this a ſufficient Incouragement, that having once ſerved “ their time, they were to be rewarded with ſuch Honours; as with the Dignity “ of Excomites, freedom from Employments, and from Torture. For the perſons “ he will have ſuch elected, as are moſt qualified for the place; Men of greateſt “ Integrity and Ability. In concluſion, he will have ſuch as held the ſecond place, “ if they have well behaved themſelves, and by reaſon of Age or Infirmity are not “ able to diſcharge the Office of the firſt, notwithſtanding to enjoy the ſame privileges “ and advantages.

How in the Eaſt at Conſtantinople.

74. While Honorius and his Officers were thus employed, and had their hands full in ſeveral reſpects at Ravenna, they at Conſtantinople were ſufficiently at their eaſe; though Anthemius, the principal Miniſter, omitted nothing he found to conduce to the publick ſecurity. He found at the beginning of the Year, that the City of Conſtantinople was in danger to want Proviſions, by reaſon that the Navarchi or Seamen, who had been appointed in the Eaſt to fetch Corn from Alexandria, were fallen to decay; the Company not being able to proſecute Navigation as formerly, but hovering about the Iſlands, and looking out for Veſſels when they ſhould have been in their Voyage. This moved him to bethink himſelf of the Mariners of Alexandria and the Fleet of Carpathus, or belonging to the Cyclades; which were much nearer to Conſtantinople, and far more convenient for the Deſign; and having communicated the matter to the Præfectus Auguſtalis, and the Preſident of the Iſlands (for they made up one Province under the mediate inſpection of the Proconſul of Aſia) he reſolved to transfer the charge upon them with a ſtipend out of the Tributes of Alexandria. Having a ſtipend for their Work, he thought fit they ſhould be anſwerable for Wrecks, or other Miſcarriages, which could not happen but by their own fault; as if they neglected their time, or went out of their way, as thoſe, who conveyed the Species belonging to the Treaſury, often did; and thereby ſuffered Shipwrack upon the Shallows, which this very Year Theodoſius made Capital for the great inconvenience ſuch careleſneſs procured. What Anthemius had thus eſtabliſhed, he procured now an Edict directed to himſelf for it's confirmation. And ſhortly after another for the choice of thoſe Officers called Diſcuſſors and Inſpectors, who having ſo great influence into raiſing of Tributes, it was fit they ſhould be perſons of Quality and Experience. Theodoſius commands, that when there is occaſion to uſe them, “ ſuch be choſen from amongſt them that have been Vicars of Dioceſſes, (as of “ Aſia, Pontica or Thrace) or Comites of the Eaſt, or Præfecti Auguſtales. And “ he is ſo reſolute herein, that he declares, a Reſcript obtain'd for the excuſing of “ ſuch perſons, ſhall be of no force at all. “

L.L. 32. 33. de Naviculariis, Cod.Th.& L.L. 4.5.Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. & L.de Naufrag.

L.11.de Cenſitorib.Cod.Th. Dat.10.Cal. Febr. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

The tender Age of that Emperour abuſed.

And his Authority aſſerted.

75. The tender Age and Minority of this Emperour gave (as is uſual) incouragement to ſome ſorts of People to act beyond the Bounds of Modeſty and Decorum. Some had been ſo bold, moved by avarice or other incentives, as to choak up his very Palace with private Buildings. For reformation hereof an Edict was directed to Monarxius the Præfect of the City, which being deſigned to check the irreverent and ſawcy behaviour of ſuch Men, is more full than ordinarily of expreſſions, which aſſert the Grandeur and Majeſty of the Prince. Affirming that the Palace is not to be ſtraitned with the Walls of private perſons; it “ backs the affirmation with a farther aſſertion, that a great diſtance ought to be “ kept betwixt the Emperour and all ſuch perſons. He declares therefore, that “ ſuch only ſhall have the liberty of living within the Palace, as are uſeful to his Ma- “ jeſty, or ſerviceable to the Commonwealth; which two ſorts of Men (either “ Palatine Dignities, or Officers of State) at this time we find to have Lodgings “ in the Emperour's Court. “ It had been for ſome time (ſince Chriſtianity introduced more ſevere practice) a queſtion whether Judges of Provinces ought to go to the Spectacula, or be preſent at the ordinary Plays and Shews. This Emperor now in order to ſolving of it, admoniſheth them to be preſent at them, that “ thereby they may procure the favour of the People; but he expreſly charges “ them, that they do not exceed the value of two Solidi, in the expence which “ they were wont to beſtow on the Players, or them that were Victors in the Game. “ There were Games in the Provinces celebrated by the Ordinary Judges, and alſo by the Prieſts of the ſaid Provinces; the Judges exhibited them at the Charge of the Common-wealth, or by virtue of a Collection made from the Curiales, Citizens, Principales, and Poſſeſſors of Lands; but the Prieſts of the Provinces at their own proper Coſts and Charges, to anſwer which, they had great Privileges and Advantages granted them by the ancient Laws. Theſe Prieſts had the names of Alytarchæ, and of Syriarchæ, Aſiarchæ, and others, acccording to the Countries wherein they had to do. But thoſe of Antioch were called Alytarchæ, either from the Sergeants or Bearers of Rods, whom the Eleans called Alyta, L.47. de operibus publicis. Cod.Th.lib.15. tit.1.& L. 17. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.Dat.9.Cal. Mart.

Sect. 2.

A. D. 409.

as *Cuiacius believed (who obſerves, that it was in old time permitted to this Alytarcha, to cut down one Cypreſs Tree out of the Grove of Daphne, which was afterward exchanged for a pound of Gold:) or elſe, as P.Faber thought, from* exulting or rejoycing; which Interpretation the word will bear. But there was a Prieſt called alſo Alytarcha, of the City of Piſa: and all theſe Theodoſius excepts from the Rule he gives for regulating of the Expences of the Judges, they being otherwiſe conſidered for their Charge.“

* Sic dictus quod ludis qui fiunt in honorem deorum τοις αλυταῖς id eſt Maſtigophoris præſit authore Phavorino. Obſ. lib. 2. c. 13.

* ab ἀλύειν, quod ſignificat lætari exultare geſtire.

A Dearth at Conſtantinople drives the people into a Sedition.

76. But, ſtill great ſcarcity continued at Conſtantinople, as often happened, by reaſon of the vaſt Confluence of people thither; ſo that Ægypt, though taken from Rome, and appropriated to its Service, was not able, in ſome years, to ſupply it. So ſorely it preſſed upon the Common Sort, that it drove them into a tumult; in which they fired the Houſe of Monaxius, the Præfect of their City. This put him and others upon ſerious Conſultation, what was to be done in ſuch caſes; and, by the liberality of Senators, and other perſons, a Stock was raiſed of five hundred pounds of Gold, or thirty ſix thouſand Solidi (which afterwards was increaſed to ſix hundred and eleven pounds of Gold, or forty three thouſand, nine hundred and ninety two Solidi) wherewith to buy Corn, for a Supply of ſuch Extremities. For the due management of this Stock, the Reſcript requires a due Account of the laying out of the Mony, and the Improvement that is made by the Sale of the Corn at ſuch moderate prizes as ſhall be thought convenient, before the Præfect, or Monaxius, to whom the Law is directed; who, having received it publickly, and upon Record, ſhall make a Report thereof to the Senate of Conſtantinople; which ſhall judge of it, as having reaſon to be moſt concerned, the thing having proceeded from its liberality. Then doth it prohibit any of this mony to be put to other uſes, though by the Authority and Intervention of the Præfect himſelf, under pain of reſtoring the double. In the laſt place, it declares, that none are forbidden to buy or import Corn, provided it be for their own private uſe.“ Otherwiſe, it ſeems to diſlike the practice; it being probable, that the poor people would be worſe uſed by ſuch as bought to make a Gain of it; than by the Publick, which had deſtinated this Stock to be employed for their Relief.

Care taken for a Supply by making a Stock.

L. 1. de Frumento urbis Conſtp. Cod To. lib. 14. tit. 16. Dat. 6. Cal. Maii. Abeſt ut Hiſtoric. a Cod. Juſt.

77. The Neceſſities of the Empire, both in Eaſt and Weſt, had, of late years, been ſo great; that the Provincials were, more than uſually, burthened with Taxes. And, as the ſtubbornneſs of ſome perſons gave Original to thoſe Officers called Compulſors; ſo the rigidneſs and ſeverity of theſe Officers became ſometimes ſo extravagant, that many ſought to evade their Power, by obtaining leave to pay their Tributes in themſelves: and ſuch, from doing the Duty themſelves, they called, in Greek, Autopracti. But, as in thoſe giddy times, which uſhered in Ruin and Confuſion, all ſorts of perſons were Excentrick, and acted in Tracts beſide the Paths of Vertue and Moderation; whereas, Men of Quality and Goodneſs, it might juſtly have been expected, would have made good uſe of this liberty; and, rather expreſſed a ſenſe of Gratitude, and what they pretended, have rather increaſed the Revenue; it proved quite otherwiſe; inſomuch, that both Honorius, in the Weſt, about this time; and now Theodoſius, were conſtrained to aboliſh and prohibit this Indulgence, and revive the ſolemn and uſual Courſe of exacting the Tributes by Compulſors, to be made out of the Curiales, or Apparitors, as the ordinary Courſe had been. He only excepts ſuch as Anthemius, the Præfectus Prætorio, ſhould approve of, as ſtill deſerving this new favour, aud make report of them to himſelf.“ And, as for the Emperors, or ſuch as about them compoſed the Laws, this truly may be ſaid, that, in their Edicts they keep generally an even temper; providing ſo for the payment of the publick Revenue, as to prevent withall the harraſing of the people by the covetous practices of Officers. At this time Theodoſius made it capital, as we ſaid, for thoſe that brought over the Corn, or other Materials, by their careleſneſs to make Ship-wrack upon the Shallows. By the ſame Conſtitution, he alſo took care, that the Proſecutors of Gold, as they were called, or ſuch as brought it to the Treaſury, ſhould not preſume to act, or keep the Gold in their hands, without Warrant had from the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum. But, if any one will complain, that he is overcharged or wronged in Payments; he bids him go boldly to the Judge, and lay open his Griefs: who, if he do not hear and relieve him, ſhall pay a Fine of thirty pounds of Gold, and his Apparitor another of fifty.“ Why the Apparitors, or Officers of Courts, ſhould be more heavily fined than the Judges we have already ſhewn.

Theodoſius takes care for his Revenue.

L. 4. Ne Conlationis tranſlatio poſtuletur, Cod. To. lib. 11. tit. 22. Dat. 4. Cal. Jun.

But alſo, to remove Grievances about it.

L. un. de Auri publici proſecutoribus, Cod. Th. lib. 12. tit. 7. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 13. Cal. Aug.

L 2. de Officio Civilium Judicum Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 45.

78. Yet ſtill another Grievance, they that governed the young Emperor thought fit to remove at this time: and that was practiſed by the Vicars and Proconſuls; who, ruling Dioceſſes, and ſo having ſeveral Provinces in their power, were wont, for the Celebration of Games and Feſtivals, to cauſe to be conveyed the *Curule-*Horſes, and Chariot-drivers, from one to another. This, now, is forbidden to be practiſed, in another Conſtitution, directed to Anthemius; both becauſe the " Countries were put to charge, and it hindred the mirth of the Cities, or elſe they, " whence they were taken, muſt provide themſelves elſewhere" But, a greater miſchief ſometimes happened in Egypt, which, beginning there, failed not to extend it ſelf as far as Conſtantinople; and it was now the time of the Year to take care for the prevention of it. The Reader, I preſume, is not ignorant that that Country is rendred ſo fruitful as it is, by the overflowing of the River Nile, and the derivation of the Waters thereof into its ſeveral Quarters. About the riſing of the Dog-Star, when the Sun begins to enter Leo, it begins to ſwell, towards the middle of July; and continues riſing in Auguſt and September, till about the Sun's Tranſite into Libra. The Egyptians reckoned the beginning of their Summer from the beginning of its Increaſe, and of Autumn from its Decreaſe: they ſowed their Ground in November, and reaped in the Month of May. If the River roſe not up to above twelve Cubits, a Dearth always followed, except in one year, which was accounted prodigious. If it exceeded ſixteen, Scarcity alſo happened; the Ground being too much ſoaked, and the Water ſtanding ſo long in it, as to hinder Sowing. Now, to promote a due Riſe and Increaſe of Waters, the Inhabitants were not wanting by their Arts. In ſome parts indeed, the River was kept in, and fenced, by natural Ramparts; and its alſo ſaid, by Swallows, for almoſt the length of a Furlong: which Birds, ſome ſay with Straw and Sticks, and others by Stones called Callotes, were wont to make Neſts againſt it; and effect that which neither Nature, nor the Art of Man procured; with ſuch pains and induſtry, that many of them yearly periſhed in the Service.

L.3. de Spectaculis, Cod.Th. lib.15.tit.5. & L.5. Cod.Juſt. eod.tit. Dat.3. Id. Aug.

Vide Wendelini Admiranda Nili & Gothofr. in L.un.de Nili Aggeribus non corrumpendis, Cod.Th.lib.9. tit.32. Vide L.un. Cod. Juſt.eod.tit. Dat.10. Cal. Octob.

79. How certain the Intelligence of Pliny, or others, is, as to this matter, the Natives did not fail to ſtop up the River on all ſides with Artificial Banks and Ramparts, till it had increaſed to its juſt proportion; and not till then to cut them, or let it out into their particular Fields. And there were certain Officers which watched and obſerved them, that none might cut Paſſages, or open Sluces before their time, till the full height was diſcovered in a Well, which had on its ſides the ſeveral marks of Increaſe and Decreaſe, once in the Temple of Serapis, at Memphis; afterward, by Conſtantine's Order, in a Church: where again it was appointed, after that Julian had altered the place as before. Now, it was an high Offence to cut down any Sycamore Trees, which were wont to be made uſe of for theſe Aggeres, or Ramparts; but eſpecially, to cut the Banks, or open any private Sluces before the time. Againſt which Theodoſius now ſhews himſelf ſo ſevere, that no leſs a Puniſhment than burning alive he will have inflicted upon the Offendor, in the " place where the Offence is committed; there where he violated the reverence " of Antiquity, and, in a manner, the publick Security, as he words it." For indeed, the publick Security was endangered, when by this or other means it happened, that Conſtantinople could not be ſupplyed with a ſufficient quantity of Corn. The Acceſſaries to the Fact, he condemns to Deportation to Oaſis, without all poſſibility, by petitioning, to recover their places of Citizens, their Dignities or Eſtates. There were two or three places in Egypt which had the name of Oaſis, being encompaſſed about by ſandy and dry Deſerts; and into them it was the cuſtom of Criminals to be baniſhed, as alſo to Gypſus, an Iſland of that Country. Theodoſius will have theſe Acceſſaries to be without hope of Redemption; which being, in a manner, as bad as death. Tribonian omits to mention this to Oaſis; but only, Deportation in general. For, the place was, in a manner, peſtilential, by reaſon of the unwholeſome Winds; and ſo peſtered with Gnats, and the greater ſort of Flies, that thence the baniſhed perſons often got their death, as Cuiacius hath obſerved. Therefore, by another Law, Juſtinian ordained, that Perſons convicted of Crimes ſhould be baniſhed for one year at fartheſt, into Gypſus or Oaſis; and that only by the Magiſtrate of Alexandria and Thebais.

Logographi Commatum.

Care taken about the overflowing of the Nile.

Vide Cuiacii, lib.8.obſervat. 27.& lib.26. Obſ.31.

At multa contraria Olympiodorus in excerptis Photii.

L.ult. de Pœnis, Cod.Juſt.

80. Theodoſius, or rather Anthemius, ſhewed himſelf ſo much for Merit and Induſtry at this time, in the ſame Conſtitution; as to determine a Queſtion concerning Precedence betwixt thoſe who, by vertue of the Emperor's Letters or Codicils, were promoted to ſuch a Dignity or Degree of Service, per ſaltum; and them that had arrived at it by their own Labour, and Continuance in the Employment: ſo as the latter ſhall precede the other, though made equal in time by the Codicils, and " that

Several other Acts of Grace.

L.ult. Quis in gradu,&c.Cod. Th. lib.7. tit.3. conjungenda. cum L.un.d Neili Aggerib.

Sect. 2.

A. D. 409.

that, according to the diſtance of three years. " They were very kind to the Duumviri, or Magiſtrates of Antioch; who, being exhauſted with the Charge of ſetting out Games and Paſtimes, according to the Cuſtom and Dignity of that great and noble City, they ſupplyed with a Summ of ſix hundred Solidi, granted out of the Cuſtoms. This was deviſed by Anthemius, and confirmed by an Edict directed " to him for that purpoſe. " To the Palatine Officers they granted back, by another Branch of this Conſtitution, the Exaction of the Tributes belonging to the Largitiones; which had been taken from them, and the Agentes in Rebus, by a Law of " Theodoſius the Great. " Which his Grandſon now repeals, as it concerns only the Palatines; though the former Law was approved by Tribonian, preferred before this, and put into Juſtinian's Code. But, the hands of the Emperor and his Præfect being now in for making Acts of Grace and Indulgence to the people, they extended part of this favour to the Provincials of the Eaſt, and of Egypt, that they might not be too much burthened by the mony they paid in lieu of the Annona or Proviſions to Military Families. For the Convenience of the Soldiers, Meat had been changed into Mony: and, whereas there had been no certainty of time, but the cuſtom varied in ſeveral places, the Provincials, by being too early called upon, might be brought to too great Inconvenience. It was thought fit therefore, to appoint, that The Collection or Payment of one Indiction or Year ſhould not be paid " in the ſame Year or Indiction, but when November following was compleated. " By this means they had eighteen Months time, wherein to ſell their Wine or their Goods, and pay their Mony.

L.169. de Decurionibus. Cod. Th. Dat. 5. Cal. Octobr.

L.18. de Exactionibus, Cod. Th.

L.31. de Erogatione militaris Annonæ, Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 4. Dat. Prid. Cal. Dec.

81. There were a ſort of Men in the Eaſt, which, having their Names from keeping and preſerving the Peace, were found to be the greateſt diſturbers of it. They were the Irenarchæ, who ſeem no other than as the Stationary Soldiers in the Weſt; or rather, thoſe that commanded and overſaw them. They were, as we have already ſaid, inſtituted by Auguſtus, for keeping the Peace, by watching in their ſeveral Stations, or the Territories of the Cities; for Apprehenſion of Thieves or Highway-men, and ſending them, with their Charges and Examinations, to the Judges. But, as the Edict affirms, being ſuch as would not ſuffer the Concord " or Peace of the Territories to ſtand, were therefore to be rooted out: and power " thereby is given to Anthemius, the Præfect, to commit the Peace of the Provinces " into the hands of other perſons of the moſt wealthy of all the Provincials, to " whom the Title of Irenarchæ continued: However, as to theſe Soldiers, it was " blaſted by this Law: Which was afterward ſo much altered by Juſtinian, as to " ſay, that the Irenarchæ cauſed or procured the Peace of the Provinces; and to " commit the Nomination, from the Præfectus Prætorio, to the Decuriones, according " to the Judgment of the Preſidents, or ordinary Judges. " Its high time to cloſe this Year with a Reprehenſion, or Check, given by the Emperor, to the Judges or Magiſtrates, in an Edict directed to Monaxius, for forcing the troubleſome " Office of Guardians upon the Husband-men belonging to the Prince his Patrimony, " or ſuch as were excuſed by Privilege, as Soldiers were. "

L. un. de Hirenarchis, Cod. Th. lib. 12. tit. 13. & L. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc interpolata eſt & in contrarium ſenſum detorta.

L. ult. Qui dare Tutores &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 34.

A. D. 410.

Varane Conſ.

Zoſimus, lib. 6. p. 830.

A great Famine in Rome.

82. For the year CCCCX was only Varanes Legally nominated Conſul in the Eaſt, they in the Weſt having ſomething elſe to do than to think of Honours and Titles. Rome was ſtill held by Attalus, through the power of Alarich and his Goths, and was more miſerably diſtreſſed by Famine than ever; becauſe Heraclianus having heard how matters went in Italy, and underſtood the Eſtate and Condition of Honorius, ſtopped up all the Ports of Africk, and would not ſuffer any Corn, or Oyl, or other Neceſſaries to paſs over. The people lived on Cheſnuts inſtead of Wheat, the Dearth being ſo much the more, for that by reaſon of the War, the Land had lyen untilled the former year, and the Merchants kept up the Grain they had; hoping to make what advantage of it they pleaſed. The City was reduced to ſuch Straits, that the people thinking now of nothing but devouring Humane Bodies, cried out at the Circenſian Games, that a Rate ſhould be put upon Man's Fleſh; and there was a Report, that ſome Mothers laid violent hands upon the Fruit of their own Bowels. Attalus, herewith moved, went to Rome, and called together the Fathers; amongſt whom it was moved, that the Barbarian Soldiers might be ſent, together with the Romans, over into Africk, under the Command of Drumas, a Man of approved Fidelity. The Generality of Voices concluded that they ſhould be ſent, but Attalus, and ſome few with him, oppoſed it; fearing that, by that means, the Goths might find an Entrance into Africk. Now, Tertullus, whom they had deſigned Conſul for this year, ſo much preſumed upon his Ethnick Intereſt, as to uſe theſe words in the Senate.

Sect. 2.

A. D. 410.

83. I ſhall ſpeak to you, Conſcript Fathers, both as Conſul, and as Pontifex; the place of one whereof I already hold, and the other I have in expectation. For which he was derided, as ſufficiently arrogant. But Alarich, being weary of his Mock-Emperor Attalus, reſolved to agree with Honorius, and to deprive him of his pretended Dignity; Jovius having, by his continual Criminations, driven him to it. He drew him out of Ariminum, where he then had his abode; and, in the preſence of his Followers, took from him the Purple and Diadem; which he ſent to the Emperor. Being thus reduced to a private Life, he kept him, and his Son Ampelius, with him, till he could procure them Pardon from Honorius. Placidia, the Emperor's Siſter, was now alſo with him in the way of an Hoſtage; but he treated her according to her Birth and Quality. Conſtantine, in Gall, about this time, having given to his Son Conſtans, in ſtead of Cæſar, the Title of Auguſtus, abrogated the power of Apollinaris, and made another Præfectus Prætorio in his Room. In the mean time, Alarich going to Ravenna, to make a firm and laſting Peace with Honorius, another Impediment happened, which tended to produce that State of Affairs which followed ſhortly after. Sarus, of whom we formerly ſpoke, neither joyning himſelf with one ſide, nor the other, kept himſelf Neutral, and his Abode in Picenum. Thither Ataulphus, the Brother of Alarich, betwixt whom and him there was a mortal Feud, came, and ſat down with all his Forces. Sarus perceiving he was coming, and finding he was no way able to grapple with him, as having but three hundred men; reſolved to fly to Honorius, and enter into a ſtrict League, Offenſive and Defenſive, againſt Alarich. And, here breaks off the Hiſtory of Zoſimus; concerning whoſe Veracity, ſo much hath been ſaid, that nothing need be repeated. But, had the reſt of his Work remained, it would have been very ſerviceable in ſo great a Defect of Writers, as we now find to handle the matters of thoſe confuſed times.

Alarich depoſeth his Mock-Emperor Attalus.

Zoſimus his Hiſtory breaks off.

84. From other Authentick Records we find, that in the beginning of February, Honorius reinforced his Army by new Levies. For this purpoſe he gave order to Macedonius, his Comes Rei Privatæ, to require of the Officials of Judges, and of the Honorati of Africk, Mony for the ſetting forth of Soldiers, as the cuſtom had been, " and now was practiſed, as to the Honorati; not only in the Provinces of that " Country, but alſo, in Sardinia, Sicily and Corſica. But, he excuſeth ſuch of " them as had at preſent ſome Service or Employment impoſed on them; as alſo, " ſuch as were, by the violence of the Barbarians, driven out of Italy, or the Soil " of the City, as he terms the Suburbicarian Regions. For every Tiro, or new Soldier, " he requires thirty Solidi, the Rate having often varied; being ſet, ſometimes " at twenty, otherwhiles at thirty ſix, or half a pound of Gold. " But, as to the matter of Attalus, or his Depoſing, Sozomen adds to the Narration of Zoſimus; that, when he laid down the Enſigns of Majeſty, his Captains alſo laid down their Girdles; but Honorius forgave them, and permitted every man to retein that Honour and Degree which he had formerly enjoyed. There is indeed extant an Act of Indulgence, which bears Date but five days after that about raiſing Soldiers, inſcribed to Gaiſo, as Comes and Magiſter Officiorum; but not ſo full as what Sozomen writes. For it permits ſuch only to enjoy their places they had before the " Uſurpation, as came timely off from the Uſurper, and returned to Obedience before " his Affairs grew deſperate; diſtinguiſhing betwixt true Repentance and Neceſſity, " or Conſtraint; with which whoſoever were moved, he commands, that " their Names be expunged out of the Matricula, or Regiſter; as alſo theirs who " had betaken themſelves from one ſort of Employment to another. "

Honorius reinforceth his Army.

L.20. de Tironibus, Cod.Th.Dat. 6.Id.Feb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Lib.9. c.8.

L.11. de Indulgentiis criminum, Cod.Th. Dat.prid.Id. Feb. Abeſt ut temporaria a Cod. Juſt.

85. They that timely repent are to be pardoned, and kindly received; but ſuch as have ever continued faithful, to be gratified and rewarded. This moved Honorius to conſider the Devotion of Africk, as he terms it, how loyal it had been, though attempted by Attalus: and therefore, toward the latter end of June, he thought fit to remit ſuch Tributes as were due to the Receipt, either of the Præfectus Prætorio, " or to that of the Largitiones, or Res Privata, till the fifth Indiction, " or the Year CCCCVIII. " This Edict being placed after another, which in time it preceded through the heedleſneſs of the Compilers of Theodoſius his Code, is directed to Macrobius, the Proconſul of Africk; whom Gothofred thinks the ſame with him, who was, as ſeveral Conſtitutions ſhew, ten years before this, Vicar of Spain; and twelve years after, Præpoſitus S. Cubiculi, and the very Author of the Saturnalia, yet extant. Thus much favour the Emperor thought fit to ſhew his Subjects of Africk in June: but ſuch was ſtill their behaviour, as to deſerve ſo well at his hands, as farther to enlarge it in November followi[illegible];

Conſiderantes Africæ devotionem, &c. L.6. de Indulgentiis Debitorum, Cod. Th. Dat. 7. Cal. Jul. Varane Conſ.

ing; at the latter end of which Month, he forgave all the Debts that were ow-“ ing, to that preſent time, in a Conſtitution directed to the Honorati and Poſſeſ-“ ſors throughout Africk; and ſubſcribed thus: After the eighth Conſulſhip of Ho-“ norius, and the third of Theodoſius.“ For, there being no Conſul in the Weſt this year, Varanes, a Stranger, was ſcarcely thought of, though mentioned in the former Law. Theſe Acts of Indemnity and Grace paſſed, as we ſaid, afret the depoſing of Attalus. But we are told by Oroſius, that, In him being made Emperor, then unmade; made again, and then unmade; and all this, in a manner, ſooner done than ſaid; Alarich laughed, as it were, at a Mimick, and gazed at a Play of Empire. From this it appeares, that Alarich reſtored him again, after his taking him out of Ariminum, and deveſting him of the Purple; and, that afterward, tataking again diſtaſte, he ſcorned and derided him, and plucked off his Fool's Coat.

L.5.ejuſd.tit. Dat.7. Cal.Dec. Poſt Conſ. Honorii 8. & Theod. 3. Abſ.a Cod. Juſt.ut temporariæ.

In hoc Alaricus Imp. facto, infecto, refecto & defecto, citius his omnibus actis pene quam dictis, &c. lib. 7.c.42.

86. As therefore, Honorius, after his firſt Depoſing, paſſed that Act of Grace, lately mentioned in behalf of ſuch as had come timely in. Six Months after, or at the beginning of Auguſt, The Commonwealth being, as he tells Palladius,“ the Præfectus Prætorio, freed from the Injury of Tyranny, he commanded thoſe“ that were guilty of all Crimes, to be releaſed; giving thereby, a full and free“ Pardon to all Crimes relating to the Uſurpation.“ But, however the Commonwealth was freed, this Freedom continued but a very little time: For, though Alarich was inclined to make Peace with Honorius; yet, by means of Sarus, matters were again diſturbed: Who, as Sozomen writes, with his three hundred Men, fell upon the Goths when they expected a Peace, and that all things ſhould be in Repoſe and Quiet. And what he purpoſed, took effect; for, with this Act, to which he thought Honorius privy and conſenting, Alarich was ſo incenſed, that, ſuppreſſing yet his Indignation, he returned to his Army near Rome, and the ſecond time beſieged the City. Here John Baptiſta Egnatius, a Venetian, tells us, he could not but exceedingly admire; that ſo great was either the injury of times, or lazyneſs of Writers, both Ancient and Modern; that, whereas all with one conſent report, that Rome, the Queen of the World, was taken by Alarich, the King of the Goths, in the one thouſand, one hundred, and ſixty fourth year after her founding; yet, they either enquired not into the manner of it, or, if they did, wrapped it up in Oblivion, as a matter ignoble, and not worth the knowing. He falls into a great Exclamation, that a City, the Queen of the Univerſe, which may be believed to have been ſo luckily founded that it ſhould always be Lady and Miſtreſs of the Earth, and which had ſo often triumphed over the Barbarous Nations, and the World; ſhould be taken through the craft of the Goths, and yet, the ſeries and order of the thing ſhould be unknown. He tells us, he will in no wiſe endure this; but, being ſtudious to illuſtrate all Antiquity, will not neglect a paſſage ſo memorable. Now, it was taken, ſaith he, by the craft of the Barbarians, after this manner; which Procopius, of all that I have read, doth alone relate; and I cannot but admire, that the whole matter is diſſembled by his Tranſlator, or elſe not known, becauſe he light upon ſome imperfect Greek Copy. But thus he writes.

L.ult.de Indulg. criminum, Cod. Th.Dat.7.Id. Aug. Abeſt à Cod.Juſt.

Alarich the ſecond time beſiegeth Rome.

Roman. Princip. lib.1.

87. Alarich had now, for two years, beſieged Rome, neither could or durſt Ho-“ norius, who lay idle at Ravenna, afford it any ſuccour; for, being ſolicitous for no-“ thing leſs than the ſafety of the City; Stilicho being once dead, he made no Gene-“ ral to carry on the War againſt the Goths. This ſuggeſted to them thoughts and“ hopes of beſieging the City, the Roman Soldier being either gone from his Colours,“ or demeaning himſelf very ſluggiſhly: yet this Barbarous Enemy not being able to“ conquer it by force, had recourſe to Wiles and Treachery. He pretends to retreat“ into his own Country; and chuſes out three hundred young men, excellently qua-“ lified, both in Body and Mind, to beſtow on the principal Romans; inſtructed be-“ fore hand how to behave themſelves with all diligence and obſequiouſneſs to their“ Maſters; and on a certain day, about Noon, when they were aſleep, or minded little,“ to haſten to the Gate called Porta Aſinaria; and there killing the Guard on a ſuddain“ Onſet, to open the Gate to him, who would be at hand, ready to enter. The Goths“ deferred their Journey, under pretence of want of ſeveral things; and in the mean“ time, theſe young men, excellently improving their advantages, opened the Gate“ at the appointed day to their friends: who, breaking into the City, treated it with“ more Ignominy than Damage, though they ravaged it throughout. Some there are“ that think the Gate was opened by Proba, an Illuſtrious and moſt wealthy Lady,“ out of compaſſion to the ordinary ſort of people; which died like Sheep, by the vio-“ lence of Famine and Diſeaſes. Two things there are, not unworthy to be known:“
The one is, that Alarich gave order, that ſuch as fled to Churches, eſpecially thoſe“

Sect. 2.

A. D. 410.

of Peter and Paul ſhould ſuffer no violence; which was faithfully obſerved. The " other, that when Honorius had word brought him to Ravenna, that Rome was loſt, " he thought that thereby was meant a Cock, whoſe name was Rome; and he exceedingly " admired that he ſhould be loſt, who had, a little before, made him ſo very " good ſport. Of ſo ſtupid a diſpoſition was this Prince, having nothing in him of his " Father's or Grandfather's vertue: which alſo is objected againſt his Brother Arcadius. " For, being uxorious, amongſt other ill things he did, out of compliance with his Wife " Eudoxia, he baniſhed Chriſoſtom, a Prelate of extraordinary Sanctity and Learning. "

88. Thus the Illuſtrator of all Antiquity (as he ſaith, who ſhould not ſay it) whoſe Lucubrations are ſo illuſtrious, that a man may uſe them as Spectacles, and yet ſee very little, or never the better for them. How true this Relation is in the beginning, where it ſays, that Alarich beſieged Rome two years, we have ſeen already: as alſo, that Honorius made no General after the death of Stilicho; he rather made too many. What we have already written, concerning the ſwarming of Goths in Rome, and what multitudes of Slaves there were of theſe Barbarous Nations, may reſolve us what to judge of that fine ſtory of the three hundred young men given to the Romans, and the Romantick Tale, that three hundred men, in ſo vaſt a City, in ſuch vaſt Confluence of people, though at Noon time, ſhould bear all before them, and open the Gates to an Enemy; which, lying at the Walls, could not but be ſuſpected. St. Jerom hints, that it was taken in the Night time; and it appears, that it was rather ſurprized, and not after any long Siege; ſo that there was no occaſion for Proba her Commiſeration: ſhe might ſpare her pity of the people, which could not be pinched for want of bread in ſo ſmall a time. It ſeems Procopius and Egnatius miſtook this latter for the former Siege, wherein Rome, indeed, was ſeverely ſtraitned.

Which he takes.

When.

89. Whatever the Circumſtances of taking it were, as to the time, it muſt have been after the making of the Edict, or Act of Grace, we laſt mentioned. For, it is generally agreed, that it was not taken till Attalus his Uſurpation was removed; which was done about the beginning of Auguſt, as the words of the Edict ſufficiently evince. Baronius therefore, with good reaſon, embraceth the report of the Author of the Hiſtoria Miſcella; which will have Rome taken, or Alarich to have entered it on the three and twentieth of Auguſt, rather than the Opinion of ſome more modern Writers, who caſt it back to the firſt of April. Beſides, the Council of Carthage, which was held this year, before the taking of Rome, was celebrated but in the Month of June. Therefore, the offence taken by Alarich, upon occaſion of the violence offered to the Goths by Sarus, or ſome other pretence, muſt have been after the later depoſing of Attalus, and in the Month of Auguſt. But, why ſhould he vent his Spleen upon Rome? Why revenge himſelf upon that City, where he had lately been ſo familiar, which had been the Seat and Habitation of his late Mock-Emperor? With the choice of whom, and other Magiſtrates, Zoſimus tells us the Citizens were ſo well pleaſed? Becauſe he fell out now with Attalus, would he quarrel with Rome, that had received him? Or, quarrelling with Honorius, would he fall out with the City which had owned his Rival in the Empire? Shall we not rather think, that the honeſt Chriſtian Party, which was greateſt, and Loyal to the true Emperor, began to get Ground in Rome, and obliged him to depoſe Attalus; which done, they were encouraged to proceed to aſſert the Emperor's Intereſt: and thereupon Contentions happened, which recalled Alarich, to whom the Party of Attalus betrayed the City? That it was taken by Treachery, Sozomen writes; and Proſper, that Attalus being outed of his Empire, gave it up to the Goths. Or, in the laſt place, ſhall we not rather give credit to what the Poet Claudian ſays ſo much of the deſire wherewith he was inflamed to take Rome; that this was the great and only thing he aimed at, in comparriſon? And, that he was glad to catch at any pretence, to accompliſh ſo ambitious a deſign, as to be Maſter of the Miſtreſs of the World?

Vide in Annal. ad h. An.

And upon what occaſion.

90. However, the ſuddainneſs of the Enterprize may excuſe the wonder and ſurprize of Honorius, who could not imagine the City of Rome to be in danger of taking. If therefore, the ſtory of the Cock be true, there was no ſuch reaſon to make ſuch a ſtir as the Pagans did with it, and any thing elſe, whereby they could revile or expoſe him to Hatred and Contempt. For, they attributed all Calamities to Chriſtian Religion, and his Conſtancy therein, and had great hopes and expectations from Attalus; though he and they were deceived by the Anſwers of their Gods, as Zoſimus confeſſeth; and their Sacrifices and other Ceremonies could not do them any good, nor ſtave off the publick Calamities. For, however Attalus had been made Emperor by Alarich, yet, when he took the City, the Pagans were ſo far from eſcaping, that they ſeem rather moſt to have ſuffered. Oroſius, in ſhort, ſays, that Alarich beſieged trem-

Lib. 7. c. 39.

A. D. 410.

bling Rome, diſturbed and brake into it; yet, having before given Command, that if any Perſons fled into the Churches, eſpecially, of St. Peter and Paul, they ſhould not in the leaſt moleſt them. In a word, that they might plunder what they would, but abſtain from blood. After ſome particular Inſtances of the Reverence ſhown by him and his Goths to Religion, he adds, that the Barbarians, on their own accord, quitted the City on the third day after their Entrance, having defaced ſome Houſes with Fire; but not with ſo much dammage as had happened to it in the ſeven hundredth Year after its founding. For, the wantonneſs of Nero exceeded the Anger of the Conqueror, that Fire which he kindled for a Shew and Paſtime, having far exceeded this: not to ſpeak of that which happened when the Galls took the City, over the Aſhes of which they inſulted almoſt an whole Year. That none may doubt but that the City was permitted to be taken for the Correction of its proud Wantonneſs and Blaſphemy: at the ſame time, he ſaith, the moſt eminent places in it that could not be burnt by the Enemy, were demoliſhed by Thunder. But for the main he affirms, that c. 40. in his time, when the memory of the thing was freſh; yet, if one conſidered the greatneſs of the Roman People, and heard the noiſe it made, he would think that, by the Irruption, nothing was done, only ſome ſmall Ruins of the Fire were ſtill remaining. He concludes the matter with acquainting us, that in this Irruption, Placidia, the Daughter of Theodoſius, was taken Priſoner by Ataulphus, the Kinſman of Alarich, who made her his Wife; Rome, as it were, by Divine Providence, delivering her up as an Hoſtage, or ſpecial Pledge, whereby the Barbarians were joyned in ſo great an Alliance, to the great advantage of the Commonwealth.

91. From ſeveral hands it appears how careful the Goths were to fulfil the Command of their King, for abſtaining from Blood, eſpecially of Chriſtians. Some affirm that, even in the Streets, ſuch as mentioned God and the Saints were ſpared, and many thouſands ſaved by this means; inſomuch, that many turned Chriſtians: and Pagans, as St. Auguſtine reproacheth them, eſcaped by taking Sanctuary in the places of Martyrs, and Churches of the Apoſtles. Yet was there not the ſame ſence of Religion in all the Goths, nor the ſame reſpect ſhown towards the Command of Alarich, in ſparing the Chriſtians. All eſcaped not upon this Account, though it fared worſe, generally, with thoſe that were not known to be ſuch; the Goths raging vehemently againſt the Pagans. This they ſtomached much afterward, and thereby endeavoured to raiſe ſtill greater Envy againſt Chriſtianity: which put the Biſhops upon anſwering their Calumnies, and to recount the great Dammages the Chriſtians alſo ſuffered. This doth St. Auguſtine excellently perform in his Book, De Civitate Dei, which he began to write the Year following; wherein he ſhews alſo, that the people of Rome had formerly ſuffered far greater Inconveniences from its own Citizens, and that the City had deſerved all this for the Impiety of the Gentiles; whereas, on the contrary, by means of the Chriſtian Worſhip, it had been kept from utter Deſtruction.

92. However, it was plundered, ſet on fire in certain places, and, of ſo great a multitude, many thouſands were killed or made Priſoners; amongſt whom was Placidia, the Siſter of Honorius; which Lady, it ſeems, Alarich had left at Rome: for we have ſeen lately from Zoſimus, that before this taking of Rome, he kept her as an Hoſtage, though he treated her in a moſt honourable manner. But, whereas three years ſeemed hardly ſufficient to the emptying of all the Wealth there in ſo many Ages hoarded up, the Goths, as Oroſius writes, were content with three days; though Cedrenus and Marcellinus will have them to have departed, not till the ſixth day after their Entrance: which ſoever of the two was true, this ſeemed, in effect, rather a ſhaking of the Rod over the City, than any ſound beating; inſomuch, that the people, as ſome relate, were preſently ſenſible of their a little intermitted pleaſures; crying out, that if the Circenſian Games were but reſtored to them, they were well enough. But great was the Alteration, extraordinary was the Change; that the Miſtreſs of the World, ſhe that had extended her Arms ſo far and wide, and ſo deſpiſed the Barbarous Nations; ſhould now be taken Captive, and become a Prey to a pitiful inconſiderable Rabble, driven out of their own Countries by greater Barbarians than themſelves. This Captivity of Rome fell out in the MCLXIII Year after its founding; in the eighteenth of Honorius, and the eighth Indiction.

SECT.

SECT. III.

The Third Step to the Ruin of the Empire in the Weſt;

From the taking of Rome by the Goths, to the death of Honorius, and the Government of a Woman (Placidia) and (her Son Valentinian) a Child.

Containing the ſpace of thirteen Years.

A. D. 410.

1. AN extraordinary providence it was that attended Rome, and the Roman Empire in this calamity. That Alarich, who having now in his power the Head, might eaſily with his victorious and triumphant Army have bidden fair for the Conqueſt of the whole Body; being, as it were, ſtruck with madneſs, and neglecting a greater opportunity than Hannibal had after the Battel of Cannæ (like to whom he knew how to get, but not to improve a victory) ſhould neither keep the City he had got, nor take care to have it kept for him; nor move againſt Honorius, whom altogether unprepared, he might eaſily have deſtroyed. Driven out rather by an Almighty Hand, than going of his own Account; with ſtraggling Troops rather than a well ordered Army he invaded Campania, and the parts lying toward Sicily, which he harraſſed; and ſeverely handled Church-men, to wreſt from them all the Gold he could poſſibly compaſs.

2. Honorius having received intelligence of his motions, kept himſelf at Ravenna the remaining part of the year, expecting how far his fury would tranſport him. But ten days before the taking of Rome, the Emperour ſeems again to have undertaken the care of ſupplying the City, after it was returned to obedience, and had ſo deeply ſuffered in the want of Neceſſaries. For whereas ordinarily the Navicularii were not bound to paſs the Seas, or ſail in Winter; yet now upon ſo pinching and extraordinary an occaſion, he commanded, that Winter it ſelf ſhould not excuſe them, when the Wind ſerved, and the Weather was good. By an Edict inſcribed to Fauſtinus the Præfectus Prætorio, he impoſeth a ſevere penalty “ upon the Judges, and alſo the Decuriones and Bodies Corporate; even loſs of “ Eſtate, if they ſuffer any laden Ships to remain in their Havens upon pretence of “ Winter, if the Seaſon be convenient for Navigation; and on the Navicularii “ themſelves he inflicts Deportation, if they be convicted to have uſed any fraud to “ hinder their Voyage. The Principals of the Agentes in rebus he now gratified “ highly, by confirming on them the Dignity of Proconſuls, and equalling them “ with ſuch, who formerly indeed had been preferred before Rationales, but came “ after Preſidents, though afterwards made equal with Conſulares. And conſidering the time and the preſent exigency of Affairs, he was highly kind and indulgent to thoſe that ſerved in the Scrinia. For though Rome had been taken and plundered, and the Enemy was yet in the Bowels of the Country; yet when there ſeemed greater need for ſupply than ever, did he give Command to Miletius the Præfectus Prætorio, that when there was an Indiction of Horſes, or other things, theſe “ perſons ſhould be ſpared; ſo as neither while ſerving, nor having ſerved their “ time, they ſhould be liable to that Burthen. And he threatens the Judges and “ their Apparitors with the forfeiture of ten pounds of Gold, if they do not “ refrain from moleſting them in this kind; all other perſons not privileged being to “ be called on, as need ſhall require.

L.34. de Naviculariis, Cod. Th.& l.ult.Cod. Juſt. eod.tit. Dat.18. Cal. Sept.

L.7.de Principib. Agentum in rebus,Cod.Th. &l.3.Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.Dat.7. Cal. Octobr.

L.15.de Proximis, &c. Cod. Th.Dat.16. Cal. Decemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 410.

Theodoſius endeavours to preſerve his Houſe from the flame.

3. Though the Houſe of Honorius was ſo much on fire this Year, as to threaten the reducing it to very Aſhes, yet was he deſirous, that it ſhould not ſo ſpread, as to catch hold on the Habitation of his Neighbour. His Nephew Theodoſius had no great reaſon to be uneaſie at Conſtantinople, except it was out of Commiſeration towards his Uncle, and apprehenſion, that if he was ruined, he ſhould but have the favour which Polypheme promiſed Ulyſſes, to be the laſt that ſhould be devoured. To prevent it as well as he could, he held intelligence with his Uncle; and it was agreed betwixt them for their mutual ſecurity and aſſiſtance, that the Coaſts of the Eaſtern Empire ſhould be well ſecured, where they lay toward the Weſtern Border. In purſuance of this, an Edict was directed to Anthemius, who carefully watched for the ſafety of his Prince, and that toward the latter end of April, commanding, that all Roads, Havens, Shores, and all remote and privy places in the Provinces, together with the Iſlands, ſhould by the diſpoſition of his “ Magnificence, as it ſtiles him, be prudently and carefully kept and ſecured, ſo as no “ manner of perſon, either by force and violence, either openly or privately, ſhould “ convey himſelf within the Territories of the Empire, but be ſtopped, or apprehended, “ except he brought a Paſs or Letters from the Lord Honorius, the Emperor's “ Uncle; and that evidently appeared. Moreover, if any ſuch perſon pretended “ to bring Letters to any of private condition, theſe Letters and all Papers about “ him ſhould be carefully ſent to Theodoſius; For this, ſaith he, the preſent occaſion “ of Tyrannick Fury, and Barbarick Ferity doth perſwade. And ſo, after having ſent “ and received an anſwer, it is agreed betwixt me and my Lord and Uncle Honorius. “ By tyrannick fury he means the Uſurpation of the Tyrant Attalus. By Barbarick Ferity, the rudeneſs and cruelty of the Goths, and other Barbarous Nations, which now ſwarmed in Italy, Spain and other Provinces of the Weſtern Empire.

L.2.de litorum & itinerum cuſtodia, Cod. To. Dat 8. Cal. Maii.

4. But in ſo extraordinarily dangerous times, Theodoſius, or Anthemius rather, did not only think fit to ſecure the Borders, lying Weſtward, from Spies and Diſcoverers, but the other alſo of the Eaſt; though at this time the League, made by Arcadius with the Kingdom of Perſia, was in force. For there is another Law, which, though without Date of Year, or Day, yet inſcribed alſo to Anthemius, and concerning this ſame ſubject, is rationally thought to have made up with the former, one and the ſame Conſtitution. This prohibits Merchants, as well Subjects “ of the Empire, as of the Perſian King, to hold any Markets or Fairs in any other places than thoſe that had been agreed on when the Law was made; leſt ſecrets “ ſhould be diſcovered. No Subject of the Empire ſhall dare to go beyond Niſibis, Callinicus, and Artaxata to traffick with the Perſians. Both Buyer and “ Seller muſt know, that ſuch Wares as ſhall be bought or ſold beyond theſe places, “ ſhall be confiſcated, and the Party himſelf baniſhed, beſides the loſs of the price, “ or things exchanged. Moreover the Judges and their Apparitors of every Limit, “ through which any Roman or Perſian paſſeth to any prohibited place, for “ every ſuch unlawful Bargain ſhall incur a Fine of thirty pounds of Gold. But “ ſuch are excepted as ſhall accompany Ambaſſadors that come to the Emperour “ from the Perſian Court; for they are allowed to traffick out of the forementioned “ places, provided, that they abuſe not this privilege granted for the ſake of the “ Embaſſy, by ſtaying longer than the Ambaſſadors themſelves. “ By this we ſee the manner of preventing Spies and Diſcoverers in this Age, by hindring Commerce; which being a ſpecious pretence, under the Vizard of Merchants many of them have in all times concealed themſelves. Towards the latter end of the Year it was thought fit to mitigate the rigour of the Law, whereby married perſons were tied up ſo, as if they had no Children they could not receive above a tenth part of the Eſtates of each other. So ſevere was that Law called Lex Papa Decimaria, which Conſtantine the Great did not repeal, though he took away ſeveral penalties belonging to Cælibate, and Burdens that lay upon ſuch as had no Children. “ But now thoſe about Theodoſius thought it convenient to repeal this alſo, and in this “ reſpect to grant the Jus Liberorum to all married perſons, that they might receive “ by the Gifts or Teſtaments of each other as much as thoſe that had Children. “ Though for encouragement of propagation, other privileges ſtill remained peculiar to ſuch.

L 4. de Commerciis & Mercatoribus. Cod. Juſt. lib. 4 tit. 63.

L L.2.3. de Jure Liberorum. Cod. Th. lib. 3 tit. 17. Dat. prid. Non. Septemb.

A. D. 411. Theodoſio Aug. 4, Conſſ.

5. For the Year CCCCXI Theodoſius Auguſtus was Conſul the fourth time alone; and ſometimes it is marked thus, After the Conſulſhip of Varanes. Alarich having waſted Italy, and gratified his humour to the full upon the Continent, reſolved to paſs over now into Sicily, and there alſo to act according to his covetous and cruel inclinations. For this purpoſe he drew down his Forces to Rhegium, and put them on Board, but in his attempt to paſs over, was ſeiſed by a Tempeſt; which ſo diſordered the Fleet, that he was conſtrained to return into Calabria, where he fell upon Conſentia, a ſtrong City that refuſed to obey him, and having taken it, permitted it to be plundered. Here he conſulted what to do, and whither to turn his Arms, when he was ſuddenly ſummoned to give an account of what he had done already; for, falling ſick, his Diſeaſe quickly diſpatched him to another world in the height and carier of his ſucceſs. His Goths were exceedingly perplexed at the death of their King, under whoſe conduct they had proſpered ſo long a time. As ſoon as grief would give them leave, when they conſidered what great miſchiefs he had done to the Romans, imagining, that if they buried him in any place that was eaſie of acceſs, his Body might be digged up, and ill treated by thoſe whom he had injured; by the aſſiſtance of Slaves they digged a Ditch, and drained the Water out of the Channel of the River Baſentius. There in the middle of the Channel did they bury him with abundance of Wealth; which done, they let go the Water back into the Channel, and the ſtream returned to its ancient courſe; after which they killed the Slaves that had been employed in the Work, that none might give notice of the place. Having done this laſt office to their deceaſed King, they held a Conſultation whom to elect into his Room, and made choice of Ataulf, his Wives Brother, who thus promoted, procured the conſent of Galla Placidia, the Siſter of Honorius, a Woman of excellent parts and perſon, to marry him at the place called Forum Cornelii; which Marriage, as Sozomen obſerves, happened very well for the Empire, ſhe mollifying his fierce and cruel humour, by the cunning art ſhe had of working upon him, and procuring him of his own accord to deſire peace of the Romans.

Alarich dieth.

His Burial.

Ataulf ſuceeds him.

Paulus Diaconus.

Quem nimia dilectione lugentes, Barentinum amnem juxta Conſentinam civitatem de alveo ſuo derivant. Jornandes de Rebus Geticis.c.30.

Atta-ulfe Gothice patris auxilium.

6. This is much more probable and true than what the Writer of the Hiſtoria Miſcella ſpeaks of Ataulfus his returning to Rome, with the Army preſently after the death of Alarich; his plundering of it, and thence taking away Placidia to be his Wife. For as to Placidia, others ſignifie, that ſhe was in the hands of the Goths before Alarich his death, as we have ſeen already; and that violence was again offered to Rome preſently after his Deceaſe, is no where elſe to be found. But Oroſius, who living at this time had reaſon to be well acquainted with the Affairs of it, tells us, that as the report went, and as his end ſufficiently diſcovered, Ataulfus was a ſtudious endeavourer after peace, and deſigned to ſerve Honorius faithfully, and to employ the Forces of the Goths for the intereſt of the Roman Commonwealth. He adds, that he himſelf had heard a certain perſon, (who having ſerved Theodoſius in an eminent Command in the Army, afterward had the teſtimony of S. Jerome for a religious, prudent and grave Man) at Bethlehem in Paleſtine, ſay that he was very familiar with Ataulphus at Narbon, the place of his Nativity; that then he underſtood from him, as others did, that being high in his Deſign, in his power and wit, as he himſelf was wont to relate, he had a vehement thirſt and deſire to have the Roman Name obliterated, and all the extent of the Territories of the Romans to be called the Empire of the Goths, or to ſpeak vulgarly, that it ſhould be called Gothia, inſtead of Romania; and the name of Ataulfus ſhould be ſubſtituted in the room of that of Cæſar Auguſtus. But having by manyfold experience proved, that the Goths, by reaſon of their unbridled Barbarity could not be brought to obey Laws, and that the Commonwealth could not ſubſiſt without them, he then reſolved to provide for his own Security and Glory, by reſtoring fully the Roman intereſt, by the force and aſſiſtance of the Goths; that he might be eſteemed by poſterity, as the Author of the Reſtitution of Rome, ſeeing he could not be of an Alteration. For this purpoſe he endeavoured to abſtain from War, and laboured for peace all the ways he could, eſpecially being tempered and inclined by his Wife Placidia to all good Offices, ſhe being a Woman of a very ſharp Wit, and unblameable as to Religion. Being ſtudiouſly intent after the procurement of peace, he was at length killed at Barcinone, a City of Spain, through the treachery as was reported, of his own Men.

Lib.7.c.43.

7. This happened ſome time after, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place. At preſent leaving Ataulfus newly married to Placidia; and as ſome write, purpoſing for Gall; we ſhall haſte thither before him, being called by the motions that now happened betwixt Conſtantine and Gerontius. Sozomen acquaints us, that Gerontius being the Chief of all his Commanders, now turned his Enemy, and adorned with the Imperial Habit one Maximus, a familiar acquaintance, whom he thought fit to be made an Uſurper. Him he permitted to ſtay at Tarracon, and he himſelf led

Sect. 3.

A. D. 411.

Gerontius puts Conſtans to death.

led his Army again Conſtantine, hoping to ſurpriſe his Son, who then lay at Vienna, and ſpeedily to diſpatch him. Conſtantine when he heard what had happened about Maximus, made Edobecchus his Captain General (whom ſome make King of the Franks) and he ſent him beyond the Rhine to draw the Franks and the Allemanns into a confederacy. To Conſtans, his Son, he committed the cuſtody of Vienna, and the other Cities. But Gerontius marching thither, fell upon Vienna, took it, and therein Conſtans, whom he put to death. Thence he removed to Arles, and in that place beſieged Conſtantine, whom he hoped in a ſhort ſpace to ſend after his Son. It happened not long before, that Honorius obſerving the reſtleſs humour of this man, though he had owned him as Emperour, and ſent him the Purple, yet ſeriouſly conſidered how he might rid Gall and himſelf of ſuch a Colleague. He caſt his eyes upon Conſtantius, one to whom Writers give the Title of Comes, a Roman of great Nobility, of great Valour and Prudence; and him he made Magiſter utriuſque Militiæ, and with a powerful Body of Men ſent him into Gall. He chanced to come into the Country at ſuch time as Gerontius lay encamped againſt Conſtantine, and there he alſo ſat down before Arles, eſteeming both of them as Enemies to his Maſter, though they were at enmity betwixt themſelves. And he ſo ordered his matters, that moſt of Gerontius his Soldiers came over to him, and forſook the Traitor, who thereupon, to avoid deſtruction, fled preſently into Spain.

Philoſtorgius Sozom.

8. Conſtantius continued the Siege of Arles, which he had begun; and not long after news was brought of the approach of Edobecchus with a great number of Franks and Allemanns. The report hereof ſo ſtruck the Officers of Honorius, that they thought of returning back into Italy; but Conſtantius reſolved with the Foot to abide his coming, and ſent Ulphilas, his chief Commander of Horſe, to lie in wait for him, and uſe all advantages which time or place might afford. He permitted Edobeccus to paſs by with all his Troops, that he might fall upon him in the Rere at ſuch time as his Front ſhould engage Conſtantius; and by this means it came to paſs, that he was utterly defeated, all his Men being ſlain or taken, except ſome few that eſcaped. He himſelf fled, and got ſafe to the Houſe of one Ecdicius, whom he had much obliged, and therefore took for his faithful Friend; but he fairly cut off his Head, and brought it to the Officers of Honorius, expecting great favour and rewards for ſo meritorious an Act. Conſtantius commanded them to receive the Head; and in the Name of the Commonwealth, that thanks ſhould be given to Ecdicius for executing what ſhould have been done by Ulphilas; but whereas he purpoſed to remain in the Army, he commanded him to be gone, not thinking it lucky, either to himſelf or it, to harbour ſo ingrateful a Man. But Conſtantine, who had endured a Siege of four Months, when he heard of the overthrow of Edobecchus, deveſted himſelf of the Purple, and fled to a Church, where, hoping thereby to ſecure himſelf, he obtain'd to be made Prieſt. This known, the Inhabitants of Arles having received an Oath from Conſtantius for their Indemnity, opened their Gates. Being entred, he cauſed Conſtantine with his other Son Julian to be ſecured, and ſent to Honorius into Italy; and he hearing of his coming, ſent thoſe to meet him, who, at the River Mincius, cut off his Head, and preſented it on the ſeventeenth of September. He had uſed the Title of Emperour five years from his firſt Uſurpation. For an Uſurper he was at firſt. But being owned by Honorius afterward, who ſent him the Purple, and had power to make or receive a Colleague; according to that Law and Cuſtom which in the Empire was now obſerved, of Emperour we can ſcarcely deny him the Title.

Conſtantine, his Father, taken by Conſtantius, and put to death.

9. Gerontius, as we ſaid, fled into Spain, but there was not received according to his hopes. For, as unfortunate Men are ever deſpiſed by the Vulgar, the Soldiers there now eſteeming him not at all, becauſe of his flight, reſolved to put an end to his life and reputation both together; and for that purpoſe beſet his Houſe. He ſo ſtoutly demeaned himſelf, that with the aſſiſtance of an Alan, his familiar Friend, and a few Slaves, by Darts and other means he killed three hundred of them. But when thoſe Weapons failed them, the Slaves fled and made their eſcape, which Gerontius might alſo have done; but the love of his Wife Nonnichia detained him. The Soldiers now meeting with no farther reſiſtance, ſet fire to the Houſe, and Gerontius finding there was no hope, firſt cut off the Head of his Friend the Alan, who deſired it, then of his Wife, who with tears and lamentations met the Sword, and rather than to fall into the hands of the Enemies, was glad to die with her Husband, and earneſtly begged this laſt favour of him. Then at laſt he wounded himſelf three times; but theſe Blows not diſpatching him, he took his Dagger, which hung at his ſide, and therewith ſtruck himſelf into the heart. Maximus, his Mock-Emperour, that he had ſet up, not long after periſhed, as Sozomen hath it: but Oroſius writes, that depoſed and forced to a private life, being forſaken by the Gallican Soldiers (who firſt paſſed over into Africk, and again returned into Italy) at ſuch time as he concluded his Hiſtory, he lived as a baniſhed Man in Spain amongſt the Barbarians. This time being fruitful in Tyrants, the boldneſs of one encouraging another to ſuch Attempts as they could not yet but obſerve to be tragical in the end; one Jovinus, a Man of great Nobility, and Power amongſt the Arverni, took upon him alſo the Enſigns of Majeſty, and hoped by the aſſiſtance of the Franks, Burgundians, and Allmans to defend his uſurped power.

Gerontius in Spain, being in danger, killeth himſelf.

Sect. 3. A. D. 411.

Jovinus uſurps in Gall.

10. Thus miſerably were the Provinces of the Weſt harraſſed this Year; Italy and Gall, as we have ſeen; and ſtill the farther Spain by the Vandals, Alans, and Sueves. And the Eaſt had alſo its ſhare in the publick calamity, though ſmall in compariſon of what the Weſt did ſuffer, which had the ill hap to be the Receptacle of ſuch inundations as did but in tranſitu afflict the Eaſtern Provinces. S. Jerom writes, that preſently after the captivity of Rome, the whole Eaſt trembled with "the terrible Meſſages that were brought, how Swarms of Huns, which proceeded from the utmoſt extent of Mæotis, between frozen Tanais and the ſavage Nations of the Maſſagetes, with their ſwift Horſes flew up and down, and filled all places with terrour and Slaughters. Now, he ſaith, the Roman Armies were detained by Civil Wars in Italy; ſo that the Barbarians had ſcope enough to go whither they pleaſed, and by their ſpeed to prevent the very fame of their coming. They had no reſpect, either to Religion or Dignity; no Age they ſpared, neither had any pity for the crying Infant, but compelled theſe to die, who yet had not begun to live, and knowing not their danger, when in the Enemies Hands, ſmiled at theſe Weapons which were immediately to deſtroy them. He adds, that the conſtant rumour was, that they purpoſed for Jeruſalem." Some are of opinion, that out of Aſia they poured themſelves into Thrace, and ſo into Pannonia. For it appears, that after the Goths had quitted Illyricum, they were ſucceeded by the Huns, who eſpecially ſeiſed on Pannonia; Honorius now not being in a condition to make any conſiderable oppoſition; ſo that he yielded to an agreement with them, and as he received, ſo he gave up Hoſtages, amongſt whom was Ætius, who had formerly been delivered up to Alarich on the ſame account.

Epitaph. Fabiolæ.

The Huns invade the Provinces.

Sigon.

11. This Invaſion of the Huns in the Eaſtern Parts foreſeen, or feared, put thoſe about Theodoſius upon an endeavour to ſecure as well as they could the Northern Limits. Beſides the Fortifications of Caſtles and Walls, upon ſuch Rivers as parted the Empire from the Territories of Barbarians, there were kept certain Veſſels of War called Luſoriæ from their playing or plying about, whereof ſome were employed in continual Watches and Diſcoveries, leſt the Barbarians ſhould attempt any thing ſuddenly and unſeen; and others kept their ſtations, as occaſion required, to oppoſe their motions, if they offered to paſs the Water. A Fleet of theſe Frigats called Luſoriæ (as thoſe that were at Sea Liburnæ) there was ever on the Rhine for defence of the Empire againſt Germany, another, as the Reader may remember, was ſettled on the Moſa, or Meuſe; and in the Eaſt there was a third, which plyed upon the Danube for defence of the Mœſian and Scythian Limits, which lay in Mœſia and Scythia, two Provinces of the Dioceſs of Thrace. To reinforce theſe Limits, a Reſcript we find directed about this time to Conſtans, by the Title of Magiſter Militum throughout Thrace, dated on the twenty ſeventh of January, thus: Our Lord Theodoſius Auguſtus the fifth time being Conſul, and he who (in the Weſt) ſhall be declared. Now, as for the year, Theodoſius was Conſul but the fourth time in this whereof we write, and in that following was the fifth time adorned with the Conſular Ornaments. But Theodoſius being this year Conſul alone, whereas in the following, his Uncle was joyned with him; and in the Date of the Law no other being expreſſed, but only this added: And he who ſhall be declared, this ſeems to direct us this preſent Year, wherein no Conſul being declared in the Weſt, they in the Eaſt at the latter end of January were ſtill in ſuſpence and expectation who ſhould be the Man. The fifth time alſo might eaſily be miſtaken by the Scribe for the fourth. However, the matter is not great, it being certain, that in one or other of theſe Years the Law was enacted; and therefore the Chronology of Theodoſius his Code, to make ſure of it, ſets it at both the one and the other. It ordains, that in the Scythian Limit, "(becauſe it was larger, and extended to a greater diſtance upon the Borders) ſhall be employed one hundred Judiciariæ dictæ. Agrarienſes.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 411.

L. un. de Luſoriis Danuvii. Cod. Th. l. 7. tit. 17. Dat. 5. Cal. Febr. Conſtp. D. N. Theodoſio A. 5. Conſ. Et qui fuerit nunciatus, Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

dred twenty ſix of theſe Luſoriæ, ſo as every year ſeventeen new ones ſhall “ be built, and furniſhed with all conveniences. Of theſe, five ſhall be for “ Diſcovery, and twelve to keep the uſual ſtations. In that of Mœſia ſhall be “ employed one hundred Luſoriæ, ſo as every year fourteen new ones ſhall be built, “ whereof four of the firſt, and ten of the latter ſort; that ſo in the ſpace of ſeven “ years the whole number (almoſt) may be repaired. This muſt be done at the “ inſtance of the Duces of the Limits, the Magiſter Militum of the whole Dioceſs, “ taking care, that they do their Duties, and that materials be provided for “ the building of the Veſſels. In the laſt place, order is taken, that theſe Luſoriæ “ be duly repaired, when grown old and leaky, and appointed to the tranſportation “ of Corn and other Neceſſaries for the Armies.“

A. D. 412.

Honorio A. 8, & Theodoſio A. 5, Coſſ.

Jovinus driven out of Gall.

12. In the Year CCCCXII, Honorius Auguſtus the eighth time, and Theodoſius Auguſtus the fifth, (as we lately hinted) received the Conſular Ornaments. Honorius this Year made his Abode at Ravenna, and Theodoſius at Conſtantinople. Ataulfus now with all his Goths quitted Italy, and went into Gall, where he choſe to inhabit the Province of Narbon, with the conſent and allowance of Conſtantius, who ſetting himſelf againſt Jovinus the late Uſurper, overthrew him in Battel, and drove him at length out of Gall. After his overthrow his Brother Sebaſtian ſet up for himſelf, as if the Soveraignty had been entailed upon their Family; but Conſtantius made his Reign to be very ſhort, putting an end to that and his life together in a little time. Having done this, and puniſhed ſuch as had encouraged the Rebellion amongſt the Arverni, he went into Spain, and there eaſily maſtered the Uſurper Maximus, whom, finding a mean Fellow, and nothing anſwering to his name, he deſpiſed him, and let him go; ſo as Oroſius writes, he lived aftewards among the Barbarians. Theſe Barbarians were the Vandals and Suevi, who by this time, in a diviſion of Countries they had over-run, had Gallæcia fallen to them for their ſhare; the Alans, who poſſeſſed Luſitania, or the Turcilingi, to whom ſome aſſign the parts of Bœtica. Theſe now held the farther Spain, being modelled in certain forms of Government under their ſeveral Kings. But the hither parts of that Country, Conſtantius, by ſubduing the Uſurpers, now reduced into obedience to Honorius, the rightful Prince; and this performed, he returned into Gall.

What Barbarians held Spain.

Honorius declares what perſons ſhall be excuſed from the finding of Tirones.

L. un. Quia præbitione Tironum & equorum excuſentur, Cod. Th. l. 11. tit. 18. Dat. 15. Cal. Mart. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

13. The Goths being removed out of Italy, Honorius was much at eaſe, but the Treaſury was quite exhauſted; and the Affairs of the Empire were in ſuch a poſture as required he ſhould be upon his Guard, and provided againſt ſuch accidents as he had too great reaſon to expect. More Men were to be raiſed, and the Money paid uſually in the room of finding Tirones, was to be exacted. But the Burthens of State were ſo great, that to evade them, all perſons that had any pretence flew to their privileges, which put Honorius to the pains of declaring what perſons they were that he would hold excuſed. Theſe were the Illuſtrious, the Præfecti Prætorio, the Magiſtri Militum, the Comites Domeſticorum (it being, he “ ſaith, improper, that they ſhould be bound to find Soldiers, whoſe Valour makes “ his Enemies Captives, and prepares them for his Triumphs) the Præpoſitus, or “ Primicerius of his Bed-Chamber, the Caſtrenſis, the Comes Sacræ Veſtis, and the “ other Chamberlains, the Magiſter Officiorum, the Quæſtor, and the two illuſtrious “ Comites, or High Treaſurers. Eight of theſe perſons were Illuſtrious, after whom “ he ſubjoyns others, of the degree of Spectabilis. The Primicerius of the Notaries, “ the Conſiſtorian Comites, the Magiſtri of the Scrinia, the Tribunes and Notaries, “ the principal Phyſicians, (or Comites Archiatorum) the Comites Stabuli, the “ Cura Palatii, the Scholares, the Proximi of the Scrinia, and the Scrinia themſelves; “ the Comites Diſpoſitionum, the Decuriones, the Magiſter Admiſſionum; “ ſuch other perſons in Dignity, or Comites, as were aſſociate to the labours of the “ Prince, as he words it; and in the laſt place, the Tribunes or Præpoſiti of the Army, “ who had received teſtimony of ancient ſervice. All theſe perſons he excuſeth, “ as well after their Employments, as when in Office, both from the payment “ due for finding of Soldiers, for Horſes, and that of Gold. He adds, that “ he will have them only obnoxious to thoſe payments, whom Antiquity called Honorary; “ or who, having obtain'd Civil Dignities, had beſtowed no pains in ſuch “ Employments. As alſo ſuch as having the Military Titles of Præpoſitus, or Tribune, “ knew not what belonged to the Camp, and never looked the Enemy in the “ face.“

14. This gives us an account of the Ranks and Orders of Court, and Military Officers; but ſuch as in ſome things differs from that we premiſed to our Hiſtory from the Notitia of the Empire. At this time the Comites Domeſticorum had an higher place than afterward, when the Notitia was compoſed, as Gothofred well obſerves; becauſe at this time they often executed the Offices of Magiſtri Militum, and the Law it ſelf gives teſtimony to their Valour. They that are called Comites Stabuli were Maſters of the Horſe, and ſometimes have the Title of Tribunes, as Valens had under Valentinian, his Brother. But farther, by this ſame Conſtitution directed to Meletius the Præfect, Honorius declares, that he excuſeth illuſtrious“ Perſons, not only from thoſe payments, for Soldiers, Horſes, and that of“ Gold, but from all both ſordid and extraordinary ſervices:“ Whereas by the Laws of Valentinian the younger, and Honorius, they had only been freed from ſordid Employments. He was now put in mind of ſeveral things which ought to be reformed in Africk, which had of late been ſorely harraſſed, and yet had very well deſerved of him. Complaint was boldly made, that the Poſſeſſors of Lands were burdened, by being compelled to pay, not only for their own Grounds, but ſuch as were barren or forſaken. We have formerly ſpoken of the Epibole, which was deviſed for equitable reaſons; for oftentimes Lands were ſo alienated, that the beſt and moſt fertile were bought up, and others utterly neglected, though with diligence and care they might alſo have been rendred ſufficiently fruitful; a practice ſo common in ſome Provinces, that it was neceſſary for the reſtraint thereof to make a Compenſation or Adjection, ſo as the barren ſhould be added to the fertile, and Tribute paid for both together. But this was only when both ſorts of Grounds had belonged to one Man, or the occupation of them proceeded from the ſame Right and Title; not when they had no Relation one to another. But now in Africk, the Officers of the Revenue extended this Epibole too far, making ſuch Poſſeſſors pay for deſerted Lands, as had no obligation at all to do it. To redreſs the Grievance, Honorius gave in charge to Seleucus the Præfect of Italy, that Inſpectors“ ſhould be ſent into that Dioceſs to view and conſider the grounds and reaſons“ of the Complaint; and thereof make a report, that all matters relating to the“ Tributes might be put into a due poſture.

L. ult. de extraordinariis, &c. Cod. Th. & L. ult. Cod. Juſt. de excuſat. munerum.

He regulates the Epibole in Africk.

L. 31. de Annona & Tributis, Cod. Th. & L. 12. Cod. Juſt. de omni agro deſerto, Dat. prid. Cal. Febr.

14. But particularly as to the payment of Gold and Silver, ſuch care had formerly been taken by Theodoſius the Great, that neither the Money might be diverted to other uſe, nor the Poſſeſſors forced twice to pay the ſame Duty; therefore did he ordain, that payment ſhould be made before the Defenſors of the Cities, and Acquittances delivered in their preſence. But this, it ſeems, proved not effectual to prevent oppreſſion, which appearing to Honorius, he now enjoyned Eucharius, the Proconſul of Africk, that all payments of Gold and Silver ſhould be“ made in the City of Carthage, the place of his Reſidence; who being the great“ Officer and Magiſtrate of the Country, would ſtrike more awe into the Collectors, ſo as not to dare to refuſe the giving of full and fitting Diſcharges. In the ſame City of Carthage, and that in the Secretarium of the Proconſul; he preſiding“ on the Tribunal, and the People being let in, and ſtanding about him, he will“ have the Exactors of Tributes choſen at the appointed times. If any of them“ ſhall be found faulty in their places, others ſhall be choſen to ſucceed them; and“ if they be found guilty of oppreſſion ſhall be capitally puniſhed, and their Eſtates anſwerable for fourfold of the value of what they ſuperexacted. If any of the Judges“ ſhall neglect to ſee thoſe orders put in practice, he ſhall incur a Fine of thirty“ pounds of Gold.“

L. 32. ejuſd. tit. Cod. Th. Dat. prid. Cal. Mart. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L. 20. de Exactionib. Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

15. The Curiales made as heavy complaints, that they were not only employed in buſineſs relating to their Charge, but hurried about, and forced to be Stewards and Bailiffs of the Lands belonging to the Res privata of the Prince; to collect the Cloaths that the Provincials found for Soldiers, and to undergo other labours. Theſe two things he particularly prohibits, and in general, that the Curiales“ be vexed with mean Employments and extraordinary Burthens; laying them“ upon the Shoulders of the Officials, belonging to the Governours of Provinces,“ and in Africk to the Proconſul. For, the whole Welfare and proſperity of Cities“ depending upon the Curiales, if they were thus diverted from their charges,“ the intereſt of the Provinces muſt be much impaired, and the Officials were more“ proper for ſuch Employments. Being Soldiers themſelves, they had better reaſon“ to underſtand the Habits that were moſt proper to ſuch; and beſides, they“ received ſome profit from the furniſhing of theſe Cloaths; and therefore“ reaſonable it was, that the advantage belonging to them, the Burthen ſhould be“ alſo theirs. Other publick Officers there were, which in this ſame Conſtitution he gives order to Eucharius to reform. Particularly to put a ſtop to the injuſtice

L. 21. ejuſd. tit. & L. 31. de Suſceptorib. Cod. Th. & L. 14. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

And redreſſes other Grievances.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 412.

and Inſolence of the Mancipes, or ſuch as bought and exacted Horſes for the Curſus Publicus,“ where the Provincials were not wont to furniſh them; as in Africk.“ They were careleſs in their Choice, and therefore, he will have the loſs accruing by any unſound or unfit, to redound to themſelves. In the laſt place, Eucharius had complained, that ſeveral Officials that had belonged to him, as Proconſul, had deſerted their Stations, and betaken themſelves to Palatine Employments, for this reaſon; that, being obnoxious to Puniſhment for their ill Behaviour, or oppreſſing the Country, they might ſhelter themſelves in an higher and more privileged Service. To redreſs this Inconvenience, Honorius wrote, both to him, being principally concerned; to Seleucus, the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, as the Prime Miniſter of State in that Diſtrict; and to Probus, the Comes Largitionum, to whoſe Office the Fugitives had betaken themſelves: Commanding that they ſhould all be “ forced back to their ſeveral places; “ and, for the time to come, if any ſhould preſume to offend in this nature, they ſhould, during life, be condemned to ſerve as “ Mancipes of the Curſus, or to the receiving of Tributes.“ Which Laws, this very Year, by another Conſtitution, he was couſtrained to reinforce.

L. 9. de Curioſis, Cod. Th.

L L. 22, 23, 24. de Cohortalibus, Cod. Th.

L. 25. ejuſd. tit.

16. Indeed it was the misfortune of the Provinces of Africk all along, to be more harraſſed with Grievances than any others, becauſe they lay at ſuch a diſtance beyond the Sea; and Complaints were ſtifled before they could be fairly repreſented to the Prince, as we have ſeen heretofore, in the days of Valentinian. This encouraged Officers to be ſo faulty and corrupt, that even ſuch as were ordained to prevent Miſchief and Diſorder, made uſe of their places and power to commit greater Outrages than thoſe they were appointed to redreſs. The Reader may remember that there were, upon occaſion, certain Inquiſitors ſent into the Provinces, to look after Deſertors, and ſuch as ſtragled from their Colours. Uſually the Protectors were employed in the buſineſs, and ſuch as had the Title of Tribunes. Theſe men were come to that height of Inſolence and Oppreſſion, making uſe of their Power to prey upon the Country; that, to anſwer the grievous Complaints of the Provincials, Honorius was now conſtrained, by an Edict directed to Conſtantius, as Magiſter Militum, to aboliſh the Name very and Office throughout Africk, as unlucky; and to make it Capital for any to aſpire to this condemned Employment, out of deſire to prey upon the people. The Neceſſities of Rome, and the frequent occaſions for marching of Soldiers, ſolicited him now again to quicken up Seleucus to take care that the Body of the Navicularii ſhould be full, and neither any Perſons or “ Lands eſcape that were obnoxious to that Function.“ For their encouragement, he ſhortly after confirmed the Privileges of thoſe of Africk, by a Conſtitution directed to them themſelves; wherein he ſentenceth ſuch Judge or Magiſtrate as “ ſhall not give them Relief and Protection in caſe of any Grievance, to have his “ Eſtate liable and obnoxious to the Function, without any hope of Pardon or Releaſe. “ He impoſeth a Mulct of ten pounds of Gold upon any Judges of Provinces, “ upon the Proconſul, Vicar and Præfectus Annonæ of Africk, and their Officers, if “ they ſuffer any thing to be diminiſhed of the hundredth part allowed them for “ Leakage, and if they permit any to recieve any Preſent from them; and con- “ demneth the Receiver beſides, to pay four-fold the value into the Treaſury. And “ whereas the Tribune Notaries, and the Apparitors belonging to the Præfects, were “ wont to be ſent and employed by the Emperor and Præfects, to direct, aſſiſt and “ expedite the bringing in of Corn. If they ſhall receive any thing from the Navi- “ cularius, or from the Maſter of the Ship, he commands, that they be puniſhed at “ the diſcretion and inſtance of the Judge or Magiſtrate of the place.“

In futurum autem iſtud nequaquam vocabulum vel officium infauſtum Conſtituimus per Africam eſſe debere, L. ult. de Deſertoribus, Cod. Th. Dat. prid. Cal. Mart.

L. 35. de Naviculariis, Cod. Th. Dat. prid. Nov. Mart.

L. L. 36, & 37. ejuſd. tit. Dat. 16. Cal. Apr.

17. He farther provides for them in caſe they ſuffered Shipwrack; That the “ Judges preſently hear their Cauſes, the Hanging of the Secretarium being removed, “ ſo as they and others may freely enter, and be heard. And, if any Officers “ or Clerks belonging to the Court, ſhall require or take any thing of them, he “ gives power to the Judge to mulct, remove or proſcribe them, according to the “ Quality of the Perſons. And, in caſe the Judge, having Application made to “ him, either by offering Libel or bringing the Matter to a full Hearing, ſhall not “ determine it within the allotted time, or the ſpace of two Years; then ſhall he “ pay one half of the loſs ſuſtained by Shipwrack, and his Office the other half. “ There being ſcarcely an end of Complaints out of Africk, the Duumviri of one City were ſaid to preſs upon thoſe of the leſſer or inferior, and to extend their Juriſdiction beyond their Bounds. Of this Honorius was alſo obliged to take notice to Eucharius; Giving order to puniſh ſuch of them as ſhould erect the Faſces of their “ Authority beyond the Limits of their Territories.“ By which it appears, that at this

Velo levato.

L. ult. de Naufragiis, Cod. Th. & L. 5. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 17. Cal. Apr.

L. 174. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. & L. 53. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 412.

this time Duumviri, or Municipal Officers, had Faſces, or bundles of Rods carried before them; whereas, of old, they had neither Faſces nor Axes, which were peculiar to Governors of Provinces, but only ſome Beadles, or Apparitors, that carried Staves before them, as their name imported; which we may learn from the Acts of the Apoſtles. He was perſwaded alſo, to give order, that the Curiales ſhould be “ put upon the Prieſthood, as formerly; the people ſtill being unwilling to quit their “ Ethnick Paſtimes; and, that the Sons of the Curiales ſhould be drawn back to “ their Cities. “ ραβδοῦχοι, c. 16. v. 35. Ibi Duumviri appellantur, a S. Luca στρατηγοί.

He labours to prevent the Expoſing of Infants.

19. Such Devaſtations were made by the Barbarous Nations, of Corn, and other ſorts of Proviſions throughout the Provinces, that ſo great ſcarcity followed as provoked Lords of Slaves, and Patrons of Freed men, to expoſe ſuch Infants as were born under their power. To obviate which Inhumane Practice, Honorius now thought fit to transferr the Dominion and Intereſt of ſuch perſons in the Children, “ upon thoſe who would take, and bring them up; provided they produced Witneſſes of their ſo doing, and reduced theit Teſtimony into Writing, which he will “ have confirmed by ſubſcription of the Biſhop. “ This Juſtinian, afterward did not ſo far approve, as to allow ſuch Infant to be Slave to him that took him up; but would have him, if expoſed, to be of ingenuous and free condition. There was more reaſon now to reſtrain this cuſtom of Expoſing in Italy, becauſe the Barbarians were withdrawn, and the Country began to be a little at reſt, after ſuch Depopulations as it had undergone. And the City of Rome now again beginning to lift up her head, it was fit, that thoſe multitudes which had forſaken her, and betaken themſelves into the Iſlands, and the Eaſtern Parts, ſhould return, repair her Ruins, and reſtore her to her former Eſtate. This the Emperor thought himſelf obliged to procure. So as, by an Edict directed to Palmatus, Præfect of it, he required, that By the Care of the Governors of Provinces, all Corporati, or thoſe that belonged “ to the Bodies or Companies which ſerved the Cities (as the Bakers, Suarii, and o- “ thers) ſhould be compelled to return to their Stations, and to diſcharge ſuch Fun- “ ctions, as anciently had been impoſed on them. “ Into the Country it was alſo fit, that the Poſſeſſors of Lands, and ſuch as had cultivated the Grounds, ſhould return. But many of them could not but be diſcouraged from returning to ſuch places as were harraſſed by the late Invaſions, and ſuch Lands as were rendred barren, and could not for ſome time be brought in tune again. Nay, ſuch as poſſeſſed Lands, though fertile, yet were diſcouraged, to think, that by vertue of the Epibole, or Compenſation, they muſt be burthened with that Cenſus, or Tax, which was wont to be paid by thoſe that had been deſerted, and lay untilled. To give eaſe in this caſe, and to provide for the repeopling of depopulated places; Honorius rejecting the Epibole, and the former way of Compenſation, ſent Directions to John, the Præfect of Italy, that ſuch Lands as did not anſwer the Cenſus, ſhould be exactly “ viewed, and their Worth carefully and faithfully entred into the Ceſs-Books. “ This done, with all Juſtice and Moderation, they ſhould be put into the hands of “ their Owners, or their Heirs: and, if ſuch could not be found, of Neighbours or “ Strangers, who ſhould pay no more than the Grounds would well and ſufficiently “ affoard. And not this neither, for ſome time; for, he allows them the Immuni- “ ty of two Years, wherein they ſhall pay no Tax, the better to enable them to re- “ cover their Grounds to their former fruitfulneſs.

L. ult. de Expoſit. Cod. Th. Dat. 14. Cal. Apr.

L. ult. Cod. Juſt. de Infant. Expoſ.

L. ult. de Privilegiis Corporatorum, V. R. Cod. Th. Dat. 4. Cal. Apr.

He provides for repeopling of depopulated places.

L. 12. de Cenſitoribus, Cod. Th. Dat. 8. Id. Jun. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

20. The Wantonneſs and Unnaturalneſs of ſome Women, who, often having had Children by former Husbands, either married ſuddainly again, without a regard had to Modeſty and Reſpect of the Dead: or, if they did not do it ſuddainly, yet, when they did marry had no care of their Children by the ſaid Husbands; had formerly provoked Theodoſius the Great to make ſevere Laws for reſtraining their Irregular Appetite. Whereas formerly, from the time of Romulus, it had not been lawful to marry within ten Months after the Husbands death, he made it unlawful for them to contract a ſecond Matrimony within twelve Months, or an whole Year. Such as ſhould dare to do it, he branded with Infamy, as they had been formerly by the Law. And further ordained, that they ſhould loſe whatſoever Goods or Eſtates were coming to them from ſuch Husbands, whom they had ſo ſoon forgotten; ſo as not to eſcape this Puniſhment by the Reſcript or Indulgence of the Prince. This Law, afterward, Juſtinian ſo far approved as to put it into his Code; yet, leaving out the laſt Clauſe of it, becauſe he would reſerve Power to himſelf to grant Indulgence, as of old the Senate had done during the Commonwealth, and former Emperors, when a Woman was found not to be with Child; and to remit the Infamy, and reſtore to Fame when he ſaw convenient.

L. 1. de Secundis Naptiis, Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 8. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 412.

21. Further, Theodoſius, to provide that Children of the firſt Marriage ſhould not be wronged, as it too frequently happens, from the Indearments of the ſecond; enacted by another Law, that, of all the Goods or Eſtate that came to a Mother from a former Husband, or from any Children of the ſaid Husband, the Propriety ſhould remain to the Children of that Husband ſurviving; ſo as the Mother, marrying again, ſhould only have the Uſus-Fructus, or Profits thereof during her life: Only, he left it free to her to aſſign ſuch Eſtate to whom of the Children ſhe pleaſed, his deſign being to ſecure it from paſſing unto Strangers: which Election of the Mother, whether ſhe married again or not, ſucceeding Princes thought fit to take away; ſo as ſhe could only conſign the Profits, during her own life, to whom ſhe pleaſed; the thing it ſelf being equally to be divided amongſt the Sons after her Deceaſe. In caſe one of the Children died, brothers were to ſucceed Brothers, and excluded the Mother. If no Brother was left, then the Mother came in with the Siſters, ſhe ſharing one half, and they another. But afterward Juſtinian altered the Law, ſo as to give the Mother leave to come in, with her Sons, to an equal ſhare of a Son's Eſtate; and with Daughters he aſſigned her but an equal ſhare alſo. This was in favour of Mothers, in compariſon of the old Law and Cuſtom, which gave Right of Succeſſion to the Grandfather by the Mother's ſide, and excluded the Mother, if married again. In caſe a Woman had Children, ſhe could have but the benefit of the Eſtate during life, if ſhe married the ſecond time; but, if ſhe had none, the entire Propriety came unto her; Theodoſius his intent being only to make proviſion for the Fatherleſs. And, as his care was eſpecially for thoſe that were Fatherleſs, he did not forget Motherleſs Children: but, betwixt Fathers and Mothers he put a difference. He ſuppoſed Fathers would be more prudent, and retein their Authority over their Wives and Families; while the weaker Sex was more ſubject to be overcome, by crafty Inſinuations, or downright Threats. Therefore he would not compel Fathers, when they married again, to aſſign all that came by their former Wives, to the Children they had by them: but he gravely admoniſhed and conjured them, by the Rights of Juſtice and Religion, to do that which, if good advice and fair words would not procure, then the force and efficacy of a Law muſt exact.

L. 2. Cod. Th. ejuſd. tit. & L. 3. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

22. And his Advice or Suaſory had not that effect which might have been expected, which forced his Grandſon, afterward, to make good what he hinted concerning the Force and Compulſion of a Law; and thenceforth, as well Men as Women, were alike concerned and obliged. But now, in Honorius his time, Husbands or their Sons were become ſo careleſs and diſ-ingenious, as to deprive their Wives or mothers, if they could of the Uſus-Fructus, or Profits of ſuch things, if they wedded again, though the Year was out, as had been ſettled upon them at their former Marriage. This conſtrained him this Year to take notice of it, in an Edict directed to John, the Præfect; And to reſtrain the malapertneſs of ſuch Sons as “ would not allow their Mothers ſuch proviſion as had juſtly been made for them, “ but enquired into their Age before the Day. As he acknowledges the Propriety “ of the things to be in them, ſo, on the other ſide, he aſſerts the Law of his Father, “ and the Right of their Mothers during life.“ Again, notwithſtanding his late Endeavours, ſuch Complaints were made of the Cities of Italy being ſtill empty and forſaken, that he was compelled to give order to Liberius, the Præfectus Prætorio, to force back both the Decuriones, the Officials or Apparitors, and alſo the Collegiati; “ of which, there were ſeveral Companies deſtined to the Pleaſure and Recreation “ of Cities; which now he thought fit to gratifie with ſuch Divertiſements, “ though they had their Original from Pagan Superſtition. And, as if one ſort of men infected another with negligence of Place and Duty, the Agentes in Rebus were now ſo guilty of this fault, that they provoked him, at the end of the Year, to command Namatius, the Magiſter Officiorum, to let them know, That ſuch as had “ loitered after the time was out that had been given them, ſhould return to Court, “ and there give an Account of their Abſence, before the firſt day of February next “ following. If this they did not do, their Names ſhould be expunged out of the “ Roll, and they ſhould be further puniſhed. And the Governors of Provinces, if “ they ſuffered any of them to ſtay and loiter within their Juriſdictions, muſt pay “ ſix Ounces of Gold for every Loiterer. “

For the Rights of Mothers.

L. 3. Cod. Th. ejuſd. tit. Dat. 19. Cal. Jul. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L. 25. de Cohortalibus. L. 170. de Decurionibus & L. 2. de Collegiatis Cod. Th. Dat. 6. Cal. Dec.

L. 15. de Agentibus in Rebus, Cod. Th. Dat. 7. Id. Decemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

23. As Honorius laboured this Year for repairing ſuch Breaches as the Misfortunes of the Wars had made; ſo, at Conſtantinople, his Nephew Theodoſius, or rather, Anthemius, his Prime Miniſter, endeavoured to prevent ſuch Calamities, which was better. It concerned them chiefly, to look to Illyricum, through which ſo great miſeries had

Sect. 3.

They at Conſtantinople endeavour to prevent miſchiefs ariſing from War.

A. D. 412.

entred into the Empire ; and therefore, Herculius, the Præfectus Prætorio of that Diſtrict, was injoyned to take care, that, No perſons by any Privileges ſhould be “ excuſed from contributing according to the quantity of what they poſſeſſed, towards “ the Repairing of Walls, and Conveyance of Corn, or other Species for the “ publick Defence; although Dignified Perſons were wont to be excuſed from “ other Collations. “ The great Fear and Anxiety wherewith all perſons could not but be ſtrook, that underſtood any thing of the dangers that threatned the whole Empire (though the Weſtern Provinces ſuſtained the ſhock) put thoſe that had the Government in their hands, upon the Promotion and Encouragement of all Works and Employments which tended to the Defence of the Borders. Amongſt others, the making of Arms in the Fabricæ, or Forges, eſpecially deſerved it. But, of this an ill Uſe and Advantage was made by ſuch Curiales as had a mind to run away from their Employments ; who betook themſelves to thoſe Forges, expecting to be connived at, as being therein very ſerviceable to the State. Great Complaint hereof was made by thoſe of the Eaſt ; who convinced Anthemius, that, though the Work of the Forges was by all means to be plyed, yet the Cities muſt not be exhauſted and ruined ; for the Defence of which, the making of Arms was only deſigned. He procured a Reſcript to be directed to himſelf, wherein Order is given, that, If any perſon have a purpoſe to joyn himſelf to the Body of the Fabricenſes, he ſhall “ either before the Governor of a Province, or the Defenſor of a City, prove himſelf “ to be altogether free, as to Birth, and other Obligations, from the Service of the “ Curiæ : otherwiſe, he ſhall be forced back, to diſcharge the Duties of his Country, “ without any Allowance to Preſcription of time. “ And, becauſe there were great Clamours in Phœnicia, againſt Lupianus, the Comes, & Magiſter Militum through the Eaſt, that the Curiales of that Country were wont to ſhelter themſelves amongſt his Officials: Command was ſent to him, that, The principal Decuriones having given notice “ to the Governors of Provinces of ſuch Fugitives, and they having made report “ thereof to him, he ſhould tranſmit them to the ſaid Governors; who, after examination “ of the matter ſhould give ſentence & ſend them back to their former Charges. “

L. 49. de Operibus publicis, Cod. Th. Dat. 5. Id. Apr.

L. 6. de Fabricenſibus. Cod. Th. & L. 4. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 15. Cal. Jun.

L. 175. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. Dat. 15. Cal. Jun. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

24. But having lately ſpoken of Illyricum, we muſt take further notice of the great Complaints which were made now alſo, in that too often harraſſed Province ; which cauſed them at Court to bethink themſelves of a new way for raiſing of ſuch Proviſions as they called Annonæ and Species Cellarienſes, due to the Civil and Military Magiſtrates, or the Governors of Provinces, and the Comites, or Magiſtri Militum. The Law and Cuſtom had been for the Procurators of the Curiæ, to take care for the leavying and payment of them in Mony ; but, it being diſcovered that more than due, was, upon this pretence, ſqueezed out of the poor Provincials ; and that whereas, for one hundred and twenty Oxegangs one Solidus was but to be paid ; the Avarice of the Governors and Officers was ſuch, that they exacted as much for the half, nay, at laſt, for the fourth part : and this was done under pretence of the Charges that theſe Procurators or Primates of Courts were at. Therefore now was it ordained, that, the Cornicularius, or he that was next to the Princeps “ of the Office of the Governor of the Province, ſhould, out of the publick Storehouſes, “ furniſh the Officers with Proviſions ; allow them Gold, as was uſual, out “ of the Tax raiſed by the Præfectus Prætorio ; and pay thoſe in Mony who ſhould “ deſire it, in lieu of the Proviſions in Specie, according as the Market bore. If “ the Office of Leontius, who, before this, had been advanced to be Præfect of Illyricum, “ ſhould fail to put this Law in Execution which is directed to him, it ſentenceth “ it to fine in fifty pounds of Gold. “ At the ſame time Anthemius was ſolicited by thoſe of his Diſtrict, againſt the Immunities and Protections which were granted to divers perſons, whereby they pretended themſelves excuſed from contributing to the neceſſary Duty of Amending of High-Ways in all the Provinces, eſpecially in Bithynia. He procured an Edict to be directed to himſelf, for rendring null and ineffectual all ſuch Reſcripts and Immunities, and to require Contribution, “ according to the quantity of the Grounds poſſeſſed near the ſaid ways, for repairing them; as alſo for other Services according to the quantity of the Lands where they were to be diſcharged. “ Now was carrying on a magnificent Work at Conſtantinople, called the Baths of Honorius, with a ſtately Porticus adjoyning. But the Work could not go on to perfection, nor that Grandeur which was intended, without taking in the Grounds belonging to private perſons. To make them Compenſation, & that ſo great an Ornament and Convenience to the City might not be ſtopped, an Edict was directed to Iſidore, the Præfect of it ; Whereby was made over to ſuch intereſſed “ perſons, a place called the old Baſilica ; to have and to hold, to them and their “ Aſſigns, by way of full Right and Title, there to build.

L. 32. de Erogatione Militaris Annon. Cod. Th. Dat. 16. Cal. Sep.

L. 5. de Itinere Muniendo, Cod. Th. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

L. 50. de Operib. publ. Cod. Th. Dat. 4. Cal. Nov. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt ut localis & temporaria.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 413. Lucio, Conſ.

Heraclianus uſurping.

Lib. 7. c. 42.

Is ſlain by his Soldiers.

The Franks take Triers.

Sigon.

25. The CCCCXIII Year of our Lord hath, in the Faſti, the name but of one Conſul, Lucius: and ſometimes, elſewhere, it is known by this mark; After the ninth Conſulſhip of Honorius, and the fifth of Theodoſius. The reaſon, for that Heraclianus, who had managed matters ſo well in Africk, againſt Attalus, was named Conſul with Lucius: but, taking into his Aſſiſtance one Sabinus, his Domeſtick; whom, being a notable cunning Man, he made his Son in Law, he ſet up for himſelf; and uſurping, his name was expunged out of the Regiſters. Oroſius writes, that he kept back the Supply of Corn, by which the City of Rome was wont to be nouriſhed; and thitherward ſailed with an incredible Fleet, which, by report, conſiſted of three thouſand and ſeven hundred Veſſels; a number, of which, neither the famous Xerxes, nor Alexander the Great, nor any other King was Maſter, that we know by Hiſtory. He landed his Men, and marched up towards Rome; but, in his paſſage, was oppoſed by Marinus, a Comes; who ſo ordered his matters againſt him, that he diſcouraged and put him to flight; ſo that glad he was to procure a Ship, wherein to ſail to Carthage; and there, after a ſhort ſpace, the Soldiers, who judge ever of Men according to Succeſs, revolted from him, and ſlew him. Some ſay, he was killed by ſome that were ſent from Honorius, in the Temple of Mercury. Sabinus got away ſafe to Conſtantinople; where having continued not long, he was fetched back, and condemned to Baniſhment. This Year, as Caſſidorus, and others obſerve, the Burgundians ſiezed on part of Gall, lying toward the Rhine. For, perceiving their own weakneſs, they had not any mind to ſtruggle with, or oppoſe Conſtantius, the Emperor's General, but deſired Peace; which he was not averſe to grant, leſt, by an ill ſucceſs againſt them, he ſhould ſtain the Glory of his former Actions. The Franks underſtanding what was done, and taking it in high diſdain, that the Burgundians, an inconſiderable People, ſhould obtain that in Gall, which they, by ſo many Invaſions, had not been able to compaſs; ſuddainly gathered together, paſſed the Rhine, and, amongſt other Towns, took Triers, which they plundered, and afterwards ſet on fire, not ſparing the Inhabitants, of whom numbers were killed, and their Bodies lay unburied, and were eaten by Fowls and Dogs; even of both Sexes.

Honorius gratifies the Provincials of Africk in matter of Sports.

L. 176. de Decurionibus, Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. Dat. 6. Cal. Feb.

Summa inſtantia revocari decernimus, &c. L. ult. de Scænicis, Cod. Th.

26. The Provincials of Africk, however harraſſed, yet were of a light and jolly humour, if the Rod was removed from their Backs but a little time. They were extraordinarily addicted to Sports and Shows; particularly, thoſe that were ſet forth by the Pagan Prieſts; who left their own Cities and Provinces, and betook themſelves to Carthage, the Metropolis, where the Paſtimes were exhibited in moſt luſtre; and deſpiſing their own Countries, both ſtaid long there, and got Houſes wherein to inhabit. Honorius would not, by any means, ſpoil the ſport of the people there, for which he had provided by ſeveral Laws: but, that the other Cities might not be deprived of their Paſtimes, by the flocking of their Prieſts to Carthage, he thought fit to give Order to Julian, the Proconſul; that, Theſe Strangers Prieſts ſhould “ depart Carthage within five days after the ſolemnizing of their Games, or before “ the firſt of November. If any that did not belong to the Court of that City ſhould “ be found therein after this term, he muſt incurr a Fine of thirty pounds of Gold. “ But, about the ſame time he received Information from the Tribunus Voluptatum (Diogenianus by name, and ſtiled Vir Clariſſimus, whoſe work it was at Carthage, to preſide over the Players, to regulate and govern both the Paſtimes, and them that made them, as other Tribunes did in other principal Cities) that the people were much offended, for that it had been ſome time ſince practiſed, by a Reſcript obtained from the Emperor, to ſet looſe and free from that Service, to which they were ordinarily obliged for life, the Mimicks that pleaſed them upon the Stage. He thought fit, ſo far to gratifie the multitude, as to write back to Diogenianus, to force and “ recall to the Service ſuch Mimæ as had been ſet at liberty by order of the Prince. “ He decrees that they be recalled with the greateſt Inſtance, that, as he ſaith, no “ wonted Ornament may be wanting to the Pleaſures of the People, and to Feſtival Days. “ We cannot ſay whether the diſpleaſure conceived by the people, for loſs of their Mimicks, contributed to the Rebellion and Uſurpation of Heraclianus: but if this Reſcript was intended to quiet their minds, it came too late, and not till that Tempeſt was over; being by it hindred from croſſing the Seas. For, though it bears date of the beginning of February this Year, it was not received at Carthage, by the Tribune, till the latter end of January following.

27. But Honorius employed his Quæſtor at this time, in matters more ſerious and profitable. By Nature he was a great Enemy to the Tricks and Subtilties of the antient Laws, and maintained a conſtant War againſt them. Particularly, as to the making of Teſtaments;he abhorred the wonted tedious Forms,and the vain and unneceſſary Phraſes and Words ; reſolving to give eaſe to the People, by Allowance of a more Compendious Way.By the old Laws,Julia and Papia,Husband and Wife,could not make each other their Heir, except they had Children betwixt them. This,ordinarily, they could not do, except they obtained a Diſpenſation or a Privilege, which they called Jus Liberorum, as we have already ſaid, which conferred on them ſuch power, as the abſolutely having Children,would have afforded them.And, this privilege was of old time obtained from the People, and afterwards by Reſcript of the Prince.But now,Honorius ordained,that,If Man and Wife lovingly,and by conſent, “ put up their Petition to the Emperor, and therein included their Teſtaments “ which they prayed might be allowed of and confirmed ; ſuch Teſtament ſhould “ be of force, provided the Petition could be proved by two Witneſſes, although “ the Prince granted out no Reſcript,if he did not expreſly deny the Suit: for, as the “ Reſcript would have been chargeable, ſo it was not convenient that the Emperor “ ſhould particularly declare his Opinion, leſt the full liberty of making Wills “ ſhould be infringed. Teſtaments thus inſinuated before the Prince in Conſiſtory, “ he would have to be underſtood valid, and of full effect ; both for the eaſe of the “ People, and aſſerting of the Imperial Authority. But yet, it ſhould not be underſtood “ that this ſhould take away the Right of any Perſon, or to prevent juſt Complaints “ or Claims of ſuch as the Roman Laws allowed, to except againſt the Teſtaments, “ in which they themſelves were paſſed by. “

Settles the making of Teſtaments betwixt Man and Wife

Vide L.ult. de Diverſis Reſcriptis.
L.ult. de Jure Liberorum.
L.6. de Inofficioſo teſtam.Cod.Th & L.19. de Teſtament. Cod. Juſt. Dat.16. Cal Mart. Rav. Johanni,P F.P.
Querela inofficioſi teſtamentii

An Act of Grace for remitting of Arrears.

28. This might well pleaſe the more wiſe and conſidering ſort of people ; but ſhortly after he paſſed an Act of Grace, which could not but give great content unto the multitude. Being ſatisfied how much ſome of the Provinces of Italy had been waſted more than others in the late Wars with the Goths, he had ſo great reſpect to their preſent condition ; that for five years Dues in all ſorts of Payments and Tributes, he ordered John the Præfectus Prætorio to exact but one, viz. from the Year CCCCX to the Year CCCCXV, remitting and pardoning all the reſt, except what belonged to the Curſus publicus, which was of ſuch conſequence, “ and at this time was in ſo ill a condition, that there was neceſſity to ſupply “ it. This plenary Indulgence he granted to Tuſcia, Picenum, Samnium, Apulia, Calabria, Brutii and Lucania.“ Which Provinces had born the Brunt in the late Invaſions, but were not joyned ſo as to make up a Dioceſs, or further concerned together than as to loſs and calamity. This Act of Grace was of greater conſequence than another Favour he granted a Month after to ſome of the Scriniarii, who ſerved in the Scrinia, or Offices ſo often mentioned. Both Valentinian the younger,and alſo Arcadius,had given to them all the privilege of entring the Secretaria of the Ordinary Judges, or ſuch as were of the Degree of Clariſſimi, as Conſulares and Preſidents, but not of theſe of the Dignity of Spectabilis, ſuch as were Proconſuls and Vicars of Præfects. But now Honorius thought fit to enlarge this privilege to thoſe of them whom they called Melloproximi, and others as far as the Exceptors ; conferring on them the Title of Clariſſimus, and giving them leave “ to enter the Secretaria of the Judges that were Spectabiles, and to ſit with them. “ The Melloproximi were, as we have ſaid, they that were to be Proximi after “ two years, while the office of Proximus laſted ſo long, which afterward was “ made Annual. “ Juſtinian in his time, or Tribonian for him, extended this privilege to all the Scriniarii indiſtinctly. Honorius his Hand now being in,to be kind to his Servants, the next day extended the favour he had given ten years before to the Agentes in Rebus, of being free from finding Tirones and other Burthens ; to the “ Palatine Officers,belonging to his two Treaſuries ; the Adjutors and Primicerii of “ the divers Offices, who had diligently and faithfully diſcharged their Duties.

L.7. de Indulgent.Debitorum, Cod.Th. Dat. 8. Id.Maii. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt. ut temporaria.
L.16.De Proximis,&c.Cod.Th. & l.5.Cod.Juſt. eod.tit. Dat. 8. Id.Junii.
L.20.de Palatinis.G L.Cod.Th. & L.10. Cod. Juſt. eod.tit. Dat. 7. Id.Jun.

Acts of ſeaſonable Severity.

29. As he found reaſon to be kind to ſuch as faithfully ſerved him, ſo he had as much to be ſevere to thoſe that abſented themſelves, and deſerted their Duty. Six days after,he was provoked to ſend out an order to Gaiſo the Comes & Magiſter Militum, requiring, that ſuch Deſertor as without leave diſcontinued, and lay “ loitering at home, or in other places ſhould, for the firſt years neglect be placed “ below ten Soldiers next under him ; for the ſecond or two years, below twenty ; “ for three years below thirty ; and if he loitered the fourth, then be caſhiered. “ The like ſeverity was practiſed in the Militia Palatina, as in the Armata ; but herein differed, that a Loiterer after four years was to ſuffer Regradation below forty ; and then if he ſtill diſcontinued, his name was to be expunged. While Honorius was thus employed in cenſuring Crimes and Defects, it could ſcarcely be, but that ſomething ſhould occurr about Africk. And indeed ſuch freſh complaints

L.16. de Deſertorib.Cod.Th.& L.ult. de Commeatu.Cod.Juſt. Dat.prid. Id. Jun.

plaints were thence lately arrived, as put the Quæſtor the ſame day upon drawing another Edict, directed to John the Præfect, for the redreſſing of a Grievance in that his troubleſome Dioceſs. The Provincials were always ſuppoſed obnoxious to the Metatus, or Quartering, as there was occaſion; but under pretence of what legally was to be demanded, too much was exacted by the Officers, both Military and Civil; the Employments of whom engaged them to be upon the Road more than ordinarily. To prevent which inconvenience, he now ordained, That ſuch Officers as ſhould have occaſion to travel, ſhould ſend no Menſor or Harbinger before them, whom, if they ſo did, it ſhould be lawful to beat or drive away, as the Country ſaw occaſion. Neither ſhould they exact any thing in way of Proviſion for Man or Horſe. If a Governour of a Province, a Surveyor, an Apparitor, or any other Officer ſhould do it, he fines him in the ſum of ten pounds of Gold, requiring, that he uſe no delay, but make as ſpeedy paſſage as poſſible; and he threatens him with puniſhment who ſhall give or contribute any thing more than ordinary to ſuch a pretender.“

L. 10. de Metatis, Cod. Th. & L. 5. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. prid. Id. Jun.

30. By this time Heraclianus the Uſurper was ſuppreſſed; and ſhortly after, in the beginning of Auguſt, came out the Proclamation or uſual Edict in ſuch caſes, directed to the Honorati and Provincials of Africk. Herein Honorius declared, That having judged him a publick Enemy, he had juſtly condemned him to be puniſhed, by cutting off his unlucky Neck; and that in the ſame manner his Satellites ſhould be proſecuted. All manner of perſons, as well private Men as Soldiers, he invited to diſcover them, or any of them, and that without fear of Envy, which uſually accompanies Informers. And he commanded, that ſuch as had any of their Goods in their Hands, to make known and produce them.“ Thus was the Eſtate of Heraclianus confiſcated, which ſcarcely amounting to the value of twenty Centenaries of Gold in Moveables, and in Immoveables of two thouſand pounds, was afterward beſtowed on Conſtantius, the Conſul of the following Year. But with this cenſure the Emperour did not think him ſufficiently puniſhed. For he having been nominated Conſul for this Year, and his Name being inſerted into Acts and Inſtruments, he commanded by another Edict directed to Hadrian the Præfectus Prætorio, that it ſhould be expunged out of all, both publick and private Writings, and his Memory utterly aboliſhed. Moreover, that what had been done by him ſhould be null and void; inſomuch, that though Leave ſhould not thereby be granted to ſuch Lords as had manumitted their Slaves, of reducing them again into bondage; yet the Act being, as his, void in it ſelf, ſhould be repeated, and the ſolemnity of Manumiſſion reiterated.“ Which was wont to be done before the Conſuls, when they entred into their Office; and indeed was the chief thing wherein they were employed, as we have ſhewed in the Polity of the Empire.

The Eſtate of Heraclianus confiſcated by an Edict.

L. 21. de Pœnis, Cod. Th. Dat. 3. Non. Aug.

His Acts, as Conſul, nulled.

L. 14. de Infirmand. his quæ ſub Tyrannis, Cod. Th. Dat. 3. Non. Aug. Abſ. a Cod. Juſt. ut temporariæ.

31. In the mean time Theodoſius in the Eaſt had no ſuch occaſion to employ his Quæſtor in ſuch Acts of neceſſary and wholſome ſeverity. On the contrary, he paſſed Acts of Grace; and being not diverted by Wars or Conſpiracies, had occaſion to honour and reward ſuch as faithfully ſerved him in time of peace, of which there were ſuch numbers, the vaſt extent of the Empire requiring it, that about the ordering and regulation of them there ſeldom wanted ſome Inducements. As perſons of Employment, and eſpecially Courtiers, are wont to be much concerned about place and precedence; ſo eſpecially when idle, and having nothing elſe to divert their thoughts: and ſo it happened at Conſtantinople at the beginning of the year, where ſeveral of the firſt Order or Rank of Comites juſtled one another. This put Theodoſius upon framing a large Conſtitution for regulating ſo high a concern, which we find directed to Priſcian the Præfect of the City, though not Priſcian the Grammarian, as hath been queſtioned, who taught in this City ſome ſixty or ſeventy years after. Therein he determined, that the Præpoſiti and Tribunes of the Scholæ (as of the Scutarii and Gentiles, formerly mentioned) who were admitted to the Emperor's Table; and had the privilege amongſt the Domeſtick Protectors and others, to adore the Purple, as alſo the Tribunus, or Comes Stabuli; and he they called Cura palatii, who overſaw the Emperor's Buildings; if together with their Charges they had obtain'd, during the exerciſing of their places to be Comites of the firſt Rank, and perhaps had not been farther promoted, when they left their Offices they ſhould be reckoned with, or made equal to the Comites or Duces of the Limit of Ægypt, and of the Dioceſs of Pontica, who, after the Comes of the Eaſt, becauſe of the importance of their Charges (the Countries under their Command being obnoxious to dangers) had more Honour“

Theodoſius regulates the Precedence of his Officers.

L. un. de Comitibus & Tribunis ſcholarum, Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 12. & L. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 12. Cal. Apr.

Honour conferred on them, than had others of their place, as in the Weſt had" the Comites Rei Militaris beyond the Seas. But if thoſe perſons had exerciſed " their Employments with the Dignity of Comes of the firſt Rank, than at their go-" ing out they ſhould have ſuch precedence, as had the Duces of the Provinces. "

32. At this time it was often practiſed that ſome expert Commanders ſhould be ſent into the Provinces upon ſpecial ſervice, as Deputies of the Illuſtrious Magiſtri Militum; and it was alſo now grown ordinary for the Emperor, when he put ſuch,or others upon Employment, to grace and dignifie them with the Comitiva of the firſt Rank, to encourage them, as ſhould ſeem, or make them more awful, though formerly ſuch rewards had been wont to be deferred, till the laying down of their places. Now Theodoſius farther determined in this ſame Conſtitution, That ſuch as by his Authority were ſent with a Command of Soldiers to protect " one or more Provinces, and ſuch as undertook to execute the Office of Magiſtri" Militum, ſhould be made equal with the Duces of the Provinces (thoſe of Ægypt and Pontica being excepted) if they had been dignified with the Comitiva of the firſt Rank, which was appropriate to thoſe that were of the Degree of Spectabilis, thoſe that were illuſtrious being ſtiled Comites, without any addition of firſt, ſecond, or third Rank; all which, as merely ſuch, were vaſtly below them. Moreover, he ordained, That the Archiatri, or Phyſicians of the Palace, if they were" innobled with the Comitiva of the firſt Rank, ſhould be equal, and take place a-" mongſt the Vicars and Duces, who had been actually in Employment, and had al-" ſo obtain'd to be Comites of that Rank, ſo as time only ſhould diſtinguiſh them. " Further, he ſaith, that he muſt not paſs over in ſilence, ſuch as having been in Civil Adminiſtration, and the Government of Provinces, had alſo obtain'd the ſame Comitiva, declaring, That they, after the quitting of their Employment, ſhall" enjoy the Privileges belonging to the Dignity of Vicars. " And he thought it as reaſonable to grant the ſame favour to ſuch Lawyers, as had been Adſeſſors to Illuſtrious Perſons in actual Employment; whether in the Provinces, as the Præfecti Prætorio; or in the Palace, as the Quæſtor, the Magiſter Officiorum, or the two great Treaſurers: that, If they were adorned with the Comitiva of the firſt Rank, " they ſhould have equal Place and Honour with Vicars of Præfects; affirming it an " abſurd thing that they ſhould be below them. " In the laſt place, he extends this privilege to ſome Artificers, Mechanicks, ſuch as had the Charge of publick Works, and even ſome who had but ſlender Employment in the Provinces. For, ſometimes it happened, and fit it was, that ſuch as theſe, for ſome important Invention, ſome extraordinary Work or Service performed, were alſo promoted to be Comites of the firſt Rank. Symmachus makes mention of one Cyriades, to whom he gives the Title of Vir Clariſſimus, and calls him Comes & Mechanicus, and Mechanicæ Profeſſor, who contended before him, then Præfect of the City, with one Auxentius, a Man of the ſame Degree, about too much Expence made upon a Baſilica and a Bridge. The Emperor allows to ſuch, after the laying down of their Employ-" ments, place amongſt the Conſulares; but leaves it in their power to refuſe it, if" they be unwilling to undergo the burthens incumbent upon that Dignity; as " the two he mentions of the Glebalis Collatio, to which they were obnoxious as Se-" nators; and of frequenting the Senate, and other Meetings, to which the Honora-" ti were obliged, there being often occaſion for their Debate and Conſultation in the Provinces.

L.3. de Comitibus rei militaris, Cod.Th. lib. 6 tit.14.& L.2 Cod. Juſt.eod. tit. Dat.12.Cal. Apr.

L.un.de Comitibus & Archiatris Sacri Palatii.Cod.Th.lib. 6.tit.16. & L. un.Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.

L.un.de Comitibus qui Provincias regunt,Cod. Th.lib.6.tit.17. & Cod.Juſt. L. un.eod.tit.

L.un.de Comitibus qui Inluſtr. Agentibus adſiderunt, Cod. Th. lib.6. tit.5. Abeſt hic tit. a Cod. Juſt.

L.un.de Comitibus ordinis primi Artium diverſarum,Cod. Th.lib.6.tit.20. Abeſt hic tit. a Cod.Juſt.

He provides for the Ornament of Conſtantinople.

33. Now was raiſing the Wall at Conſtantinople, the building whereof Writers aſcribe to the Providence and care of Anthemius, who enlarged the Pomærium of the City towards the Sea; and if we can believe them who affirm it, got the Wall finiſhed in two Months. There was neceſſity it ſhould be carried through the Grounds of private Perſons, the Rights of whom were not to be invaded; and yet, reaſonable it was, that private Intereſt ſhould give way to publick Convenience. To make recompence to ſuch Proprietors, Anthemius procured a Reſcript to be directed to him, whereby the Towers of the new Wall ſhould, when the Work was compleated, " be aſſigned to thoſe in whoſe Grounds it ſtood. Of theſe Towers they might make uſe, on condition, that they, and ſuch as into whoſe hands the Ground ſhould " come, did yearly, at their own Charge, ſee to the repairing of them: and here-" by he concludes, that the Splendor of the Work, and the Defence of the City " would be joyned with the Uſe and Benefit of private Perſons. " While Theodoſius thus provided for the Ornament and Defence of Conſtantinople, the condition of Illyricum, which had been miſerably harraſſed by Alarich and his Goths, loudly called upon him, to uſe ſome means for the Supply of its Cities and Towns with Perſons ſons fit to undergo the uſual burthen of the Curiæ. There were not wanting thoſe, who, though not obliged by their Original, or any other way, were content to ſerve their Country. But former Princes, to provide more effectually for the Service of Corporations, had made it unlawful for ſuch as imbodied themſelves once amongſt the Decuriones, to recede at pleaſure: which deterred all that were at liberty from ſubjecting themſelves unto that Yoak.

L.51. de Operibus publicis, Cod.Th.& L.18. Cod. Juſt.eod. tit.Dat.Prid. Non. Apr. Per quorum terras idem murus ſtudio ac proviſione Tuæ Magnitudinis, ex Noſtræ Serenitatis arbitrio celebratur.

He encovrages perſons to ſerve Corporations.

L. 177. de Decurionibus, Cod. Th. Dat. 16. Cal. Maii, Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

34. They about the Emperor therefore thought convenient to take off that Rigour, that ſuch as pretended kindneſs might not have too plauſible an Excuſe, that for their good Will they ſhould make Shipwrack of their former Freedom: and now a Law was made, that, When any ſuch perſon had a mind to oblige a Town or City " by diſcharging ſome particular Duty or Service, he ſhould, in preſence of the Curia, " or the major part, before the Governor of a Province, or the Defenſor of the City, pro- " miſe to undertake it; with a Proteſtation, that he would not thereby become obno- " xious, or bound: and this the Decuriones ſhould admit and engage, that he ſhould " do it without any prejudice to Liberty, Eſtate, of himſelf, or of his Heirs. " This Theodoſius did now enact in particular; and afterwards ordained in general, that, the voluntary undertaking of an Employment ſhould prejudice no man. He far- " ther, now, conferred on them the Privileges belonging to a Curialis when they had " done their work. But whereas, in the diſtreſſed Eſtate of Illyricum, when per- " ſons were wanting for Employments, ſome of the Curiales would undertake ſome " Charges which they were not bound to undergo; on condition, when they had " done their work, then to be looſed and freed from the Curiæ. He utterly diſliked " the practice, and commanded that ſuch ſhould be forced back, in this ſame Edict " directed to Leontius, the Præfect. " We have formerly heard of Complaints made againſt the Magiſtri Militum, or other Military Officers, their intermeddling with Civil Cauſes and Perſons; and the practice was ſo far condemned, that now they ran into the other Extreme; and made it a Queſtion whether, when a Soldier was ſued by a private Man (here Private is oppoſed to Military) it ſhould be in the Court of a Magiſter Militum. To clear this Doubt, Anthemius received a Reſcript, whereby it was declared for Law, that, The Magiſtri Militum might determine " matters in controverſie betwixt two ſuch Perſons; the Military Man having no o- " ther proper Judge, before whom he could be tryed, or by whom puniſhed. "

L. 6. de Juriſdict. Omnium Judicum, Cod. Juſt lib. 3. tit. 13. Dat. 5. Cal. Maii.

35. In the CCCCXIV Year of our Lord, Conſtantius was made Conſul in the Weſt, and Conſtans in the Eaſt. Honorius had his Abode ſtill at Ravenna, and Theodoſius at Conſtantinople. On Conſtantius the Honour of Conſul, and of Patrician (if not now, ſhortly after) was beſtowed, for his Service againſt the Goths, and the hope that was farther conceived of him. Some tell us, that now he came to Rome, and that, in his place was put Caſtinus, the Comes Domeſticorum; who, in his Abſence, fought ſeveral Battels againſt the Franks, with ſuch ſucceſs, that he conſtrained them to quit the Towns they had ſiezed, and once more to retire beyond the Rhine. In the mean time Ataulphus, King of the Goths, governing a Warlike and reſtleſs People, began to afford matter of Jealouſie and Anger to his Brother in Law Honorius: and, having Attalus, the late Tyrant and Mock-Emperor, with him, whom he had brought along with him out of Gall, he cauſed him now to reaſſume the Purple, and pretend to his former uſurped Power.

Ataulfe, King of the Goths, driven into Spain.

L. 7. c. 43.

Honorius ſeeing the League broken by Ataulfe, reſolved to proſecute him with War; and, for that purpoſe, procured Conſtantius to return into Gall: who, as Oroſius writes, in the fourth Year after the taking of the City, having his Quarters at Arelatum, by his great Induſtry and Expedition, drove the Goths out of Narbon, and forced them to betake themſelves into Spain; having intercepted all Intercourſe by Sea, and all Foreign Commerce. Others tell the ſtory more largely; how Conſtantius marched with his Army to the City of Narbon, and threatned to lay Siege to it if Attalus was not delivered into his hands. Ataulfe refuſed to do it. But, the other being as good as his word, when Ataulfe found the place and himſelf in great danger, he reſolved to forſake it, and paſs over with his Army into Africk. To this purpoſe he brake out of the Town, and went directly to the Sea ſide to ſhip his Men: but finding there no Veſſels, for that Conſtantius had prevented him, he reſolved for the hithermoſt Spain, which, as yet, was held by Honorius; and, taking along with him Attalus, who could not be ſafe without his Protection, he placed him at Barcino, a City of the Province of Tarraco, now Arragon. Here he made a ſhew for ſome time; but, ſhortly after, deſpiſed by the Goths, he was cunningly ſiezed, and preſented to Conſtantius; who, gladly beholding ſuch a ſight, ſent him to Honorius; by whoſe Order he was committed to Priſon, and reſerved for a Triumph after the Gothick War. This Proſper placeth at the following Year.

Honorius appoints two Commiſſioners to hear and redreſs the Grievances of Africk.

36. Now, for Grievances and Complaints thereupon, which could not but often happen in a vaſt Empire, and which give occaſion to all or moſt Laws in fixed and eſtabliſhed States (thoſe at the firſt founding of Colonies, being more Directive than Corrective) it muſt needs be, that Africk have the firſt Audience. And, at this Audience, Honorius received ſo much ſatisfaction, that, as he ſaith himſelf, Leſt, by reaſon of the Interpoſition of the Sea, the Complaints “ of the Provincials ſhould periſh, he appointed the Illuſtrious Flavianus “ and Cecilianus, who had been Præfecti Prætorio, to receive all things that ſhould “ be offered in that kind, from any perſons whatſoever. And becauſe, at this time, “ the publick Neceſſities required extraordinary Payments, and great murmuring “ there was of the Inequality of Burthens, he reſolved that they two ſhould examine “ and adjuſt ſuch matters amongſt the Provincials, and no more diſpute thereof “ be made after their Determination. “ Hereby was obviated the Rapacity of Soldiers and Officers of the Revenue, or others: which he further reſtrains by charging Hadrian, the Præfect, in this ſame Conſtitution, that, All Free Quarter, or “ Exaction of Proviſions for Man and Horſe, as alſo, of private Baths, be taken away “ in that Country. “ And, being now wearied with the continual Clamours made againſt the Rapacity and Oppreſſions uſed by the Curioſi, He commands “ them to be utterly removed out of that Dioceſs; and the Apparitors of Judges ſo “ far reſtrained, that they ſhall not exerciſe the Rapines and Deprædations they “ were wont, over the Curiales, Navicularii, or other Bodies. “

L.33.de Erogatione militaris annonæ, Cod.Th. Dat.5.Non. Mart.

L.12.de Metatis,Cod.Th.&. L.6. Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.

L.11.de Curioſis,Cod.Th.Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

37. As the diſtance of Africk ſubjected it to many Inconveniences, ſo was it not furniſhed with ſo able Lawyers as other nearer Countries. Yet was Julian Proconſul there, now, the ſecond time: But, together with the former Complaints, he conſulted the Emperor about favour to be ſhewed towards Minors and Women, in Law-matters. Honorius anſwered, that, By innumerable Authorities (Laws of Princes, or Reports and Sentences of Lawyers) it was evident that they were provided “ for in things which they had omitted, or were ignorant of. “ If they omitted the firſt and proper Judge, and immediately betook themſelves to the Superior. If they omitted to except againſt a Teſtament by the Quarela Inofficioſi. If they omitted to take poſſeſſion and the like. Again, if they were ignorant as to Law, Minors were wont to be reſtored in integrum; which Privileges this Conſtitution declares common with them to Women, though of ripe Years; which ſucceeding Princes thought, in ſeveral caſes, to be reſtrained, making a difference betwixt them. And Honorius himſelf, in this ſame Conſtitution, maketh alſo ſome difference; declaring that, A Minor cannot ſtand in Judgment, the Writ of the Interdict “ not lying againſt him, though he had the liberty to bring it, as well as other “ perſons, by the Authority and Mediation of his Guardian; againſt whom it is alſo “ to be brought. “ Further, to give all ſatisfaction imaginable, and cut off all Complaints, as much as in him lay from that reſtleſs People of Africk, a Month after he ſignified to Seleuchus, who had ſucceeded Hadrian in the Præfectſhip of Italy; that, He fully pardoned and forgave to the Navicularii of Africk, all Arrears “ that were behind, from the fourteenth Indiction, and the third Conſulſhip of Valentinian Auguſtus, together with that of Eutropius, till the fourth Indiction, or “ his own ſeventh Conſulſhip, together with the Second of Theodoſius. “ This contained the ſpace of twenty Years, from the Year CCCLXXXVII, to the Year CCCCVII; ſo that he would only have exacted the Arrears of the laſt ſeven Years. This is better known from what Honorius ſaith of the Conſulſhips, than by the Indictions; for, what he calls in this Law the fourteenth Indiction, elſewhere he himſalf terms the firſt, and others the fifteenth; and what with him is the fourth, his Nephew Theodoſius calls the fifth, and others the ſixth. This Variety hath much perplexed Learned Men, who conſidered not the reaſon of it, till learned Gothofred of late ſuggeſted it. The beginning of Indictions, in all places, was not the ſame: the Original of the Italian is to be fetched from the CCCXII Year of our Lord; that of the Oriental Parts, from the Year CCCXIII; the Carthaginian, or that of Africa Proconſularis, began, A.D. CCCXIV; and that of the Dioceſs of Africk commenced not till the CCCXV Year of our Lord.

L.ult.de Integri reſtitutione, Cod.Th.lib.2. tit.16.& L.38. Cod. Juſt. de in integrum reſtitutione, Dat. prid. Non.Mart.

L.ult. unde vi. Cod.Th.& L.ult. Cod. Juſt. qui legitimam perſonam habeant ſtandi in Judiciis, vel non.

Is indulgent to their Navicularii.

L.8. de Indulgentiis Debitorum, Cod.Th. Dat.3.Non.Apr. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.ut temporaria.

38. Honorius being ſo kind to the Navicularii, he might very well expect they ſhould do their duty. But Albinus, the Præfect of Rome, gave him to underſtand, about the middle of September, that they were wont to cheat the Publick, by withdrawing ſome of their Cargo; the quantity of Grain they brought into Port, not anſwering to the Bills of Lading. And now, at this time, the Crime was more prejudicial

Yet reſtrains their Avarice.

L.38. de Navicularìis,Cod. Th.Dat.15.Cal. Octobr.Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

prejudicial to the City than ordinarily, which filled apace; ſo as in one day was found an Acceſſion of fourteen thouſand Mouths, and Proviſions grew very ſcarce. The Emperor wrote back, that, He conceived the Officers of the Præfect “ of the City, and of the Præfectus Annonæ, were corrupted to diſſemble ſuch miſcarriages. “ To prevent this he gives him order, that although in former times the “ Præfectus Annonæ, and the Vicar of the Præfect of the City, had been wont to “ take care of theſe matters, eſpecially, the former; yet now, he himſelf (as of “ late had been practiſed) together with the ſaid Præfectus Annonæ, and three Illuſtrious “ Perſons, ſhall make Inquiſition into the thing, and that within five days “ after the coming of the Navicularius into Port; ſo that the Inquiſition be not deferred, “ though it happen on Days holy, or deſtinated to Devotion. After this, a “ Criminal convicted, ſhall be ſent, with his Proſecutor, and the matter of his “ Charge to the Præfectus Annonæ of Afriak, as his proper Judge; who ſhall cauſe “ him to make ſatisfaction. If Inquiſition and Proſecution be not made accordingly, “ the Præfect of the City, and his Office, ſhall forfeit five pounds of Gold, the “ Apparitors three, and the Præfectus Annonæ two. “

He aſſigns to pay the Scholares that commanded Soldiers.

L.34.de Erogatione militaris Annonæ,Cod.Th. & L.14. Cod. Juſt.eod. tit. Dat.17. Cal. Dec.

39. There being, in theſe times of danger, ſo great need and want of good Officers, ſeveral out of the Scholæ, as of the Gentiles and Scutarii, though not properly Soldiers, were preferred to the Command, even, of Numeri, or Regiments of Horſe. And, now it became a Queſtion, what Pay they ſhould receive; concerning which, Conſtantius, Magiſter Militum in Gall, conſulted the Emperor. He anſwered him, that, ſuch of the Scholares, to whom, out of conſideration of their “ Service, he had given the Command of Numeri, ſhould receive from the Opinators “ a Solidus a day;and,beſides,that they called Caballatio,or Allowance for Horſe,as the “ Tribunes of Horſe at this time received. “ And, if they died, and had Arrears due “ to them, they ſhould be transferred upon their Heirs, ſo much as was due to the “ time of their death; but not a whole year's Allowance, if they died within the “ year. “ He concludes the year with kindneſs to his Domeſticks and Protectors, of whom, the next ten to the Primicerius; he ſignified to Epiphanius, the Præfect of the City, his pleaſure, that, They ſhould obtain the Dignity of Senators, and “ ſucceed in order, to be one of the ten as another went out; with ſuch Privileges “ and Immunities as the Senatores Allecti had from the Senatorian Functions, or the “ Glebalis Collatio, and the Prætorſhip. It being not their Ambition, but their Merit, “ and his voluntary Determination, which thus preferred them. “

Is kind to his Domeſtick Protectors.

L.7.de Domeſticis & Protectoribus, Cod. Th. lib.6.tit.24. Dat.6. Cal.Jan.

Theodoſius rather more kind than he.

L.9. de Indulgentiis Debitorum,Cod.Th.Dat 5.Id.Apr. Abeſt. ut temporaria a Cod.Juſt.

40. Theodoſius, this year, came no whit ſhort of his Unkle in Acts of Grace and Indulgence towards ſuch as he found reaſon to be kind to. Much about the ſame time that Honorius paſſed that of Pardon to the Navicularii, of what was in Arrear for twenty years; he, as if he had a purpoſe to outdo him, publiſhed one of far larger extent, both as to time, place, and the thing forgiven: For, from the eleventh “ Indiction of Valens, till the fifth that was lately paſt; or, from the ſecond “ Conſulſhip of Valentinian and Valens, till the ſeventh Conſulſhip of his Uncle Honorius, “ and the ſecond of himſelf; that is, from the Year CGCLXVII, to “ the Year CCCCVI, incluſive, being the ſpace of forty years, he pardoned “ all Arrears in general; from whomſoever, to whomſoever of his Officers of Receit, “ and in what kind ſoever they were payable, through all the Provinces of the “ Eaſt: whether due from the Curiæ or Curiales, who were wont to be Suſceptors “ and Exactors; or from the Poſſeſſors of the Lands themſelves, which were “ obnoxious to Payments to the Prince his Patrimony, his Houſe (called Divina Domus) “ or to find Proviſions (Cellarienſes) for ſupply of Palaces, Prætoria, or Manſions: “ whether Corn or Mony, Braſs or Silver, were to be paid: whether owing “ to the Horrea, or Magazines, the Arca of the Præfect, or the two Treaſuries. “ Excepted only out of this Pardon ſuch Arrears as were owing from the Quarries “ of Docimenum (a place in Phrygia) Proconneſus (one of the Iſlands Sporades) and “ Troas (near Mount Ida, the famous place in Aſia Proconſularis) which, by reaſon “ of the great need that this luxurious Age, found of thoſe moſt noble Veins of Marble, he permitted to be exacted, as we gueſs, out of particular reſpect to Conſtantinople, to which City they were ſo near; for, in many other Provinces of the Eaſt alſo, eſpecially, in Illyricum, there were many excellent Mines and Quarries. He adds another Limitation; that, From that, or the ſixth Indiction, to the preſent, or “ twelfth, all Arrears ſhall be paid, to anſwer the publick Neceſſities. “ This Edict is directed to Anthemius; to whoſe Diſtrict of the Præfectſhip of the Eaſt, we might think it deſigned, but that at the bottom of it is expreſly ſaid, that, concerning the ſame matter, an Edict was written to the People, to Marcianus, the Comes S.

A. D. 414.

Larg. to Muſellius, the Præpoſitus Cubiculi (under whom was the Overſight of the Divina Domus) to the Governors of Provinces in General, and in particular to Governors and the People which had relation to Mines and Quarries. From this it ſeems intended for the whole Eaſtern Empire: but however, we believe they had all reaſon to thank Anthemius.

41. And, not only Debtors to the Publick, for this; but Priſoners, and ſuch as were condemned to Baniſhment, for another Law, which ſhortly followed in their behalf. When Offenders were ſentenced to Baniſhment by the Judges, their Officials were to ſee the Sentence executed, and till ſuch time the Parties were remanded to Priſon. But oftentimes it happened through the Negligence, or wilful Omiſſion of the Officials, ſometimes of the Judges themſelves; that, if a man was ſentenced to Baniſhment for a Year, they would let him continue ſo long in Priſon before they conveyed him to the appointed place. This being looked on as a great Oppreſſion, an Edict was directed to Anthemius, commanding that, "All ſuch ſhould be ſet at liberty, without any farther puniſhment, that had fulfilled the time that was appointed to Baniſhment, in Priſon. And it gives this reaſon, that it is ſufficient to have once undergone great Affliction; and that they that have been long deprived of the common Air and Light, and burthened with Irons, ſhould not, again, be compelled to undergo the pain and penalty of Exile." We cannot ſay that another Act of kindneſs was to be attributed to Anthemius, for it is directed to Monaxius, under the Title of Præfect of the City; though all other Laws, both of this and the following Years, make him Præfectus Prætorio. Hereby he made them acquainted, that, "Such as having ſerved their full time, and diſcharged their duty, had attained to be Proximi of the Scrinia, Comites Diſpoſitionum, or Magiſtri Admiſſionum, and thereby to the Degree and Dignity of Vicars, ſhall not only be free from all Functions, and the Glebalis Collatio, as his Father formerly had made them; but alſo, from the ſeven Solidi; which, not only Senators that were poor, but ſome others which were excuſed from the former Collation, were obliged to pay." If Theodoſius was ſo good natured to his Servants, and ſtudied to reward thoſe that had well deſerved of him, no wonder that he thought upon his own Siſter Pulcheria; which Lady being ſollicitous and induſtrious for the ſafety of his Perſon, and the ſecurity of his Eſtate, to a degree far above her Age: he, this year, on the fourth day before the Nones of July, advanced to the ſublime Degree and Dignity of Auguſta.

L.22. de Pænis, Cod.Th.& L.23 Cod.Juſt.eod. tit.Dat.14.Cal. Maii.

L.12.de Senatorib.Cod.Th.Dat. 6.Id.Maii.

A. D. 415.

Honorio A. 10, & Theodoſio A. 6, Coſſ.

42. In the Year CCCCXV, Honorius Auguſtus, now, the tenth time, and Theodoſius, the ſixth, received the Conſular Ornaments, and made their Abode as formerly; the one at Ravenna, and the other at Conſtantinople. According to Proſper, Attalus being carried by the Goths into Spain, was ſurprized, and delivered up into the hands of Conſtantius. Oroſius ſomething more largely ſaith, that, He took Ship, not knowing certainly how to ſteer his Courſe, was taken at Sea, delivered to Conſtantius, and then preſented to the Emperor; who commanded his hand to be cut off, but ſpared his life; a Sentence full of mildneſs toward ſuch an Uſurper. The Vandals, who had formerly invaded Spain, grudged that the Goths ſhould ſhare with them; and imagining, the Allyance betwixt the Emperor and their King conſidered, that they ſhould have them their Enemies, reſolved, if poſſible, to prevent it, by ſending to Honorius, and offering to fight againſt them. The Meſſengers adviſed him, in ſhort, to have Peace with them all, to let them fight it out amongſt themſelves. They might periſh, but he ſhould win: and, if both Nations periſhed, the advantage of the Empire would be immortal. Indeed, Procopius writes, that Honorius agreed with Gunderich, their King, that the Vandals ſhould fix in Spain, provided they abſtained from all violent and unjuſt Acts, and would not make uſe of the Preſcription of thirty years againſt the Romans. But, however, Placidia, his Siſter, took it to heart, that there ſhould be ſuch Enmity betwixt her Brother and her Husband; with whom ſhe often contended, that Attalus was to be delivered up, and a good Underſtanding to be thereby procured. This ſhe could not then obtain; but, when ſhe underſtood that Attalus was ſiezed, and delivered up, ſhe then reſolved to make advantage thereof, and purſue ſo good an opportunity. Neither, indeed, was Ataulf averſe, being ſufficiently Uxorious, but readily condeſcended to what was ſo juſtly deſired by his Wife. But it coſt him dear; for, his Goths being quite of a contrary Inclination, when they ſaw he reſolved upon a Peace, which they thought contrary to their Intereſt and Honour, they murdered him at Barcellona, and, with him, ſix Sons; as his Epitaph ſhews, which was found in that City, and exemplified by Ambroſius Moralis, in his Spaniſh Chronicle.

Attalus is delivered up.

Ataulfe murdered.

Atta-ulph Patris Auxilium. Gothis enim Atta eſt Pater. vide Gloſſarium Gothicum, in N.Teſtam. Fr. Junii in voce.

nicle. Having made an end of him, they promoted one Sigerich to be King in his ſtead.

43. At the very beginning of the year, Honorius was preſented with heavy Complaints out of the Iſlands, and all the Coaſts of Dalmatia, againſt the Curioſi of thoſe Quarters. We have ſeen how, through theſe Parts, had lyen the paſſage out of the Eaſtern, into the Weſtern Empire; and how all miſchief had here, had its entrance out of Epirus, Pannonia, and other Parts where Alarich and the Goths ſo long had raged according to the extent of their own Luſts. For this cauſe were they the more carefully looked to; and Curioſi were appointed to obſerve them, for the defence of the Provincials, that no Enemy ſhould make any Incurſion: but the Remedy proved worſe than the Diſeaſe: for, great were their Exactions, and ſo heavy and enormous their Oppreſſions, that, whereas in times of danger, when the Enemy invaded, the poor people were glad to fly for ſhelter into the Iſlands; they found there ſo ill Entertainment, that Shipwrack it ſelf would have been little leſs acceptable; and not daring to commit their Eſtates and Perſons into the hands of theſe uncertain Friends, they choſe rather to abide the Inſults of a known Enemy. This cauſed the Emperor to ſignifie to Palladius, the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, that, For the publick ſecurity theſe Officers ſhould be removed wholly from “ thoſe Parts, as he had, the year before, removed them out of Africk for the like “ reaſon. And if, for the time to come, any ſhould dare to uſurp the Name or “ Employment after warning given, he ſhould, by the care of the Judges, be ſent “ up in Chains to Court, to receive puniſhment according to the merits of his “ Cauſe. “

Honorius removes the Curioſi out of the Iſlands.

——Geticis Europa catervis Ludibrio prædæque datur, frondentis aduſque Dalmatiæ fines: omnis quà mobile Ponti Æquor, & Hadriacas tellus interjacet undas Squalet inops pecudum, &c. Claudian. 2. in Eutropium a. v. 35.

L. ult. de Curioſis Cod. Th. Dat. 6. Id. Jan. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. ut Hiſtorica.

44. About this time Palladius went out of his Office, and was ſucceeded by Seleucus, as it ſhould ſeem; to whom, toward the latter end of this Month, a Conſtitution was directed about that often attempted, and never perfected Work of filling up the Curiæ with ſufficient Members. So urgent were the reaſons for it at preſent, that they put Honorius upon a new Courſe, contrary to former Law and Cuſtom, except in ſome extraordinary Caſes. This was to oblige all that were “ born of a free Woman, and ſuch as whoſe Parents were obnoxious to the Servi- “ ces of Corporations, to follow the condition of their Anceſtors by the Mother's “ ſide, though their Fathers were no better than Slaves; though Actors, or Procu- “ rators of great Perſons. This ran expreſly croſs to the Authority of the Senatus- “ Conſultum Claudianum; whereby any Free Woman that joyned her ſelf to a “ Slave, became, by that means, the Ancilla, or Slave, of his Lord, with whom “ ſhe had ſo unequally yoaked her ſelf; and, not only ſhe, but ſuch Children as “ ſhe bore in that condition. But Honorius, though otherwiſe confirming that Se- “ natus-Conſultum, yet, now was of the opinion, that the indecent Act of the Mo- “ ther was not ſo much to be looked at, as the Original of the Son, and the Digni- “ ty of his Progenitors; thereby preferring a native and natural reſpect, before a “ merely Civil. And he argued from the very thing ordained by that Senatus-Con- “ ſultum; that if, by vertue thereof private perſons might challenge ſuch as were “ born of their Slaves, though by free Women, by reaſon of their intereſt in their “ ſaid Slaves; then might the Commonwealth, or the Court, with as much “ equity, lay claim to thoſe that were born, or proceeded from ſuch as were of “ their own Bodies. In concluſion, he will have forced back to the Courts and Col- “ leges of Towns and Cities, all Vacantes, or belonging to no Societies; all that “ had betaken themſelves to any Militia; impoſeth a Fine of five pounds of Gold “ upon any that ſhall hinder the returning of any Curialis, and no leſs than burning “ alive upon any Slave that is an Actor or Procurator. “

Takes a new courſe for filling up the Curiæ.

L. L. 178, 179. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. Dat. 13. Cal. Febr. Abſ. à Cod. Juſt.

45. Theodoſius, in the Eaſt, was alſo preſented, at the beginning of the year, with Complaints againſt the Inſolence and Violence of Officers; which was riſen to that height, as even to force Gifts, Bargains and Sales from the poor Provincials. We have ſeen how careful Princes have been to avoid this miſchief; inſomuch, that they made it unlawful for Governors of Provinces to receive any thing, or to marry therein, during their Adminiſtration. Whether the Complaint was againſt them, or occaſion was given by others who were potent by reaſon of their Factions or Eſtates, or had many Clients and Dependants (to prevent the Rapacity of whom, Honorius, as we have ſeen, would not permit ſuch to exerciſe Merchandize:) but Theodoſius now, by an Edict, declared to the people, that, All Sales, Gifts, and Tranſactions which were extorted by power, ſhould be void, and of none effect. It is no Incongruity to imagine, that the Rapacity and Violence of the Cohortales or Officers of the Judges gave eſpecial Provocation to the making of this Law.

Theodoſius provides againſt the Rapacity of Officers.

L. ult. de Contrahenda Emptione Cod. Th. & L. ult. Cod. Juſt. de his quæ vi metuſve Cauſa Dat 13. Cal. Mart.

For, this very day we find another Edict directed to Anthemius; which makes a ſhow, as if ſome of them had been turned out of their places for ſuch Enormities: It ordains, that, In caſe any Provincial Apparitor be turned out for any Crime, “ that he continue out of Employment: or, if he think and endeavour to come in “ again by petitioning the Emperor, he ſhall not be readmitted, except the Reſcript “ be firſt offered to the Prince, or his Succeſſors, and conſidered of by them. “ Which Sanction he commands him to publiſh by his Edicts, to give notice to all “ Governors of Provinces.“ When they were juſtly put out of their places for their Exceſs, they were wont, by Complaint, or ſome Clandeſtine Petition, by means of ſome Friends, to abuſe the Prince, and recover their Employments; to the great detriment of the people, and the diſparagement of thoſe that put them out. To prevent this, he will have his own Reſcript for Readmiſſion ſcanned by Anthemius; which was, indeed, as Gothofred obſerves, a great Honour to him; and a Favour, which, by his great care and vigilance for him and his Affairs, he had well deſerved. But, as the Letter of the Law doth not make it any perſonal Honour, but to belong to his Place or Seat; ſo we find, that, about this time, Anthemius got leave to take his eaſe, and lay down, if not the whole care of the State, yet, the weighty and burthenſome Office of Præfectus Prætorio; this being the laſt Edict we find directed to him under that, or any other Character.

L.26. de Cohortalibus, Cod.Th. & L.11. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

Indultum majeſtatis noſtræ Oraculum Ampliſſimæ tuæ ſedi offerat allegandum.

Anthemius layeth down.

Aurelianus ſucceeds him.

L. ult. de Crimine peculatus, Cod.Th. & L. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit hinc deſormata Dat. 3. Non. Mart.

Who procures ſome Acts of Grace and Indulgence.

L. 10. de Indulgentiis Debitorum, Cod.Th. Dat. 5. Id. Jul. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

L L. 4, 5. de Pratis, Cod. Th. & L. ult. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. Non. Septemb.

46. For, immediately after, we find Aurelianus promoted to be Præfect the ſecond time, and that, of the Eaſt, as may be gathered from the many Laws directed to him; who, to this Office of Præfect, had the Honour of Patrician ſhortly after added. The firſt Edict inſcribed to him declares a Receiver to be as bad as “ a Thief, upon occaſion of ſome Eccleſiaſticks, who received and concealed things “ due to the Treaſury. “ And, by his Circumſpection, was diſcovered, that the Provincials made not near ſo much advantage of that Act of Grace for pardoning the Arrears of forty years, as was expected. For, the Courts of ſeveral Cities pretended they had paid before hand many Summs of Mony for the Poſſeſſors of Lands (as, indeed, ſometimes they were wont to do) which they doubted not but to come upon them for, and be repayed, which, as yet, they were not; and therefore, now they ſued their pretended Debtors. Hereupon was an Edict drawn up, and directed to him, wherein the Emperor takes notice, that, That Indulgence which he had general- “ ly diſperſed throughout all Provinces and People, ſome ſeemed ſo to convert unto “ their private profit and rapine, that thoſe that were formerly publick, were now “ become private Debts. Therefore, that the Provincials may experiment his “ bounty, not in word only, but in reallity, he commands, that, under pretence “ of anticipated Payment, nothing farther be exacted by any Corporation; foraſ- “ much as they have ſufficient amends made them by the benefit they themſelves “ receive by that Indulgence, which they endeavour to violate with a Sacrilegious “ mind. “ In another matter, ſhortly after, he procured a Conſtitution to be “ drawn, partly to himſelf, and partly to the Comites and Magiſtri Militum, in behalf of poor Tenants and Poſſeſſors, whom the Soldiers oppreſſed by eating up their Graſs and Meadows. Therein is declared, that no Poſſeſſors contribute “ more to the Publick, than what the Emperor commands to be paid by diſpoſition “ of the Præfect yearly; and that the Soldiers ſhall be content with what his bounty “ allows them. The Comites and Magiſtri Militum, under whom were the Duces, “ Tribunes and Præpoſiti, he injoyns to let all concerned perſons underſtand, that the “ Soldiers muſt not eat up the Grounds of the Provincials, and that a Law was gone “ out to the Præfect for this purpoſe; to whom he gives in the Inſcription the firſt “ time, the Title of Patritian.

Patritii Dignitas ſequela alterius.

47. But, though the Direction runs thus, To Aurelian, Præfectus Prætorio and Patritian, we cannot be of Gothofred's opinion; who, in his Notes upon the Law, makes the Dignity of Patritian conſequent of the other. For, the Patritians were a ſelect number choſen by the Prince, out of ſuch of the Nobility as he pleaſed; to whom he gave the Appellation of Fathers. Neither do we find it but very ſeldom in the Inſcriptions of the Laws given to any; ſo little probability there is, that it belonged to all Præfects, or to Magiſtri Militum, as ſuch; who, at this time, were many in number; ſeveral, ſometimes, of the ſame place, in the ſame year: ſo that we are conſtrained, now and then, even to imagine that there were more than one Præfect at the ſame time, over the ſame Diſtrict. More true is that Obſervation concerning the Præfects of the Cities, that they were named, and had Precedence before the Præfecti Prætorio, as in the Senate, the City, and the Urbicarian Regions, it was fit they ſhould. For, we find another Law on the laſt day of October, inſcribed to Urſus, Præfect of the City; Aurelian, Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt; and Strategius, Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, concerning the Decuriones of the Palace. Theſe were a ſort of dignified Officers within the Court; who, being ordinarily three in number, preſided over thirty Silentiarii, of whom we have ſpoken formerly, were wont to be ſent by the Emperors, upon extraordinary occaſions, to ſuppreſs Inſurrections; and when he or the Empreſs were in their Progreſs, governed the Cavalcade, or manner of travelling. Now, Theodoſius lets theſe three great Miniſters know, When theſe perſons ſhall have ſerved their time, they ſhall have “ place amongſt the Exduces, as if they had been in that Actual Employment; have “ the privileges of adoring the Prince, ſaluting the Judges, or others belonging to “ that Honour. Moreover, in the Senate they ſhall be accounted as Allecti or Immunes from Senatorian Burthens; particularly, that of the Glebalis Collatio.

A. D. 415.

L. 1. de Decurionibus & Silentiariis, Cod. Th. Dat. prid. Cal. Nov.

L. 1. Cod. Juſt. hinc deformata eſt in diverſum plane ſenſum.

A. D. 416.

Theodoſio A. 7. & Palladio Conſ.

48. The year of our Lord, CCCCXVI, had for Conſuls, Theodoſius Auguſtus the ſeventh time, and Palladius; whom we find by many Laws of this ſame year, to have been alſo Præfectus Prætorio, as Urſus was Præfect of Conſtantinople. The Goths, in Spain, thought that Sigerich, their newly promoted King, had been a Man for their turn; but he was alſo inclined to Peace: and, for that reaſon they diſpatched him after Attaulſe, and advanced into his place one Vallia, whom ſome make the Son of Attaulſe. Vallia is ſaid to have attempted to execute the deſign of Attaulſe, of invading Africk. He got all things ready for his paſſage at the Straits of Gades, and there took Ship; but was ſiezed with ſo great a Tempeſt, that, after many Veſſels loſt, he was forced to return; and then, calling to mind the ill ſucceſs of Alarich, in his Attempt upon Sicily, he gave over the Enterprize, and betook himſelf to Conſtantius, who was entring Spain with an Army againſt him. He went to the Pyrenæan Mountains to meet him; and, before they met, ſent Meſſengers to him, by which he offered to reſtore Placidia, the Emperor's Siſter, and to give Hoſtages for his peaceable demeanour; provided he might have leave with his people, to fix in Spain; and, for his ſecurity, receive ſome of the Gallick Nobility as Hoſtages. Philoſtorgius writes, that Placidia was reſtored, and Attalus given up at the ſame time by the Goths; who, in way of recompence, received Proviſions from the Romans, and a portion of Gall to inhabit. Others indeed, write, that Attaulſe, when he was dying, commanded that Placidia ſhould be reſtored, and that ſix hundred thouſand Modii of Corn were ſent to Valia, King of the Goths; whereas a Supply had been promiſed formerly to Attaulſe, and he made the Nonpayment thereof a pretence why he did not reſtore Placidia. Great need there was indeed, that he ſhould make an excuſe for not giving up his own Wife. As for the Goths, their receiving part of Gall to inhabit; that muſt have been ſome time after.

They murder Sigerich, their King.

Vallia, his Succeſs.

Jornandes de Reb. Geticis. c. 32.

Iſidori Chron. æra 454.

Lib. 12 c. 4.

Olympiodorus apud Photium.

49. Conſtantius, no doubt, was welcome to Honorius, as well for his own ſake, as the Lady's whom he preſented: but this was not till toward the latter end of the year. At the very beginning thereof, the Emperor was put upon thoughts how to maintain thoſe Wars which he ſaw there was no probability to avoid. Beſides the ordinary Indiction of the uſual Payments, he had been forced to lay a Superindictum, or ſome Over-charge, upon the Provinces. This was no new thing, but ſometimes happened when the neceſſity of Affairs required: but, ſome there were, who being ordinarily excuſed by Privileges, from extraordinary and ſordid Payments and Services, now refuſed to contribute to this Over-charge; as being in the number, and of the nature of Extraordinaries. So it had happened in the Reign of Conſtantius; the Example of whom Honorius now was conſtrained to follow, by mollifying and taking away the harſhneſs of the word; Calling it a Superindictum, “ and a Canonical Payment: and commanding it ſhould not be looked upon as an “ Extraordinary; ſo as all Houſes ſhould be ſubject to it, and no Privileges be “ admitted; whether they belonged to his own Patrimony, were held in perpetual “ Right, or appertained to private Perſons. “ He had intelligence, ſhortly after, from Conſtantius, out of Gall; that, upon the Goths quitting that Country, there were riſen amongſt the Natives heavy Suits and Contentions. For, when the Barbarians invaded the Provinces with Fire and Sword, ſome fled their Countries; but others met together, as they could, in Companies, and lived as well as they might in Bodies, like Banditti, or Tories; falling down, as they could, into the adjacent places, and making bold with what they found for mere ſubſiſtance, although it belonged to their own Friends and Countrymen. This was practiſed upon ſuch occaſions, both in Gall and Spain; and theſe Aſſemblies were called Bagaudæ, which was a Name given from the times of Diocleſian, to ſuch Companies of poor miſe-

Honorius put to ſhifts for raiſing Mony.

L. 2. de Indictionibus, Cod. Th. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 7. Id. Jan.

Paſſes an Act of Oblivion for Gall.

rable Country People as got and united together, ſometimes driven to that extremity by the cruelty and oppreſſion of the Judges. Now Honorius taking into conſideration the late diſtreſſed condition of the Gallick Provinces, and of what force neceſſity is, when life it ſelf lies at ſtake, thought fit to make an Act of Oblivion for ſuch injuries done upon the Barbarick Depopulation, as he terms it. And he directed a Reſcript to Conſtantius with the Titles of Comes and Patritian, whereby “ all Proceſſes in ſuch caſes were ordered to be ſtopped, and no challenge to be “ made for any thing ſo taken away, except the thing ſo taken could be proved ſtill “ in being amongſt his Goods that took the Booty, or that perſon that was ſued. “

L.14. de Infirm. his quæ ſub Tyrannis, Cod. Th. Dat. Cal. Mart. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

50. The great Ambition and Avarice of Officers was now taken notice of; they were no ſooner out of a profitable Employment, but they would labour and make ſhifts to get in again. The Roman Government was ever jealous of long continued power in perſons that had juriſdiction, and not only during the Commonwealth, which would have her Officers annual; but ſince the Monarchy and perpetual Dictatorſhip. For Princes, though their own Authority was not circumſcribed with any narrower Bounds than thoſe of a natural life, yet they would not permit Provincial Magiſtrates to be long in Office. The reaſon was, leſt they ſhould have too much opportunity by acquaintance and intereſt, to make diſturbances; or by too well underſtanding their Trade, to make greater advantage of their places, than the Good and Commodity of the Provincials would bear. And yet a Magiſtrate may have too little time to be throughly acquainted with the ſtate of his Province, if it be large. It is true, the Concernments of a particular City, Town or Place may be ſoon diſcovered: but thoſe of a large Diſtrict, a Dioceſs or Juriſdiction wherein muſt be great variety of Intereſts and Humours, could not ſo quickly be diſcerned. A ſenſe of this cauſed the ancient Romans to continue a power over a Province to him, as Proconſul, the ſecond year, to whom as Conſul it had been committed the precedent. However, as they that are upon the place can ſee more than thoſe at a diſtance; and experience is not at all to be run down by arguments; the Emperors, though they might make uſe of their power to diſpenſe with the cuſtom when and where they ſaw convenient, yet kept up to the Maxim of having the term of an Adminiſtration but ſhort; and when once it was at an end, of not having it again renewed. But at this time the Rule was much broken, not only ſome perſons being by the Prince his knowledge and proviſion ſuffered to reaſſume their Offices, but others creeping in again by ſiniſter courſes. To put a ſtop to which, Honorius now declared in an Edict to Palladius, the Præfect, that if any ſhould endeavour to renew his power of Proconſul, of Vicar, Conſularis, Preſident, of Comes Diſcuſſionum, or Auditor, or of Princeps of an Office, his whole Eſtate ſhould be confiſcate. Now this is underſtood to be meant of the ſame individual Office; not that a Man might not be Proconſul, Vicar, Conſularis or the like, in another Country.

Prohibits repetition of Offices.

L. ult. ad legem Juliam de Ambitu, Cod. Th. Dat. Id. Mart. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

51. He was now more briſk than ever with ſuch Curiales as had left their ſtations; that complaint which was never wanting to diſturb his Ears; If any ſuch “ could be light on by thoſe of the Body, he gave them free leave, in caſe the Governour of the Province were not at hand, to lay hold on him, and carry him “ before the Magiſtrate, who under pain of ten pounds of Gold to be paid by him, “ and as much by his Office, was to finiſh the proceſs, and give ſentence for, or againſt him (that he was bound to the Duties of the Curia) within three Months. “ This for the time to come. And in reference to what was paſt, if any had betaken himſelf to any Militia or Office, he ſhould ſubſtitute and maintain a ſufficient Deputy in his room, otherwiſe be forced back himſelf, though he ſerved in “ the Army; for which purpoſe he gives Palladius directions, that Letters be written to the illuſtrious the Magiſtri Militum. “ At this time he alſo reſtrained the charge and trouble of unneceſſary reporting cauſes to himſelf, declaring to Palladius, that no ſuggeſtion or relation ſhould be made to him by complaint of one of the “ parties only. For this was to renounce the method and courſe of Law; and when report was to be made to the Prince, both Plaintiff and Defendant were to have Copies thereof delivered to them, and there to make their objections or additions as they ſaw convenient; an offender in this point he will therefore have condemned, as to coſts, and loſe his cauſe. This he alſo gave in charge to Palladius, and being overcome with greater clamours of the Curiæ, he farther gave him order in this ſame Conſtitution, without any condition or mention of any Subſtitute or Deputy, about four Months after the other Law, to call back to their Courts whatever “ Curialis was in the Army, amongſt the Attendants of the Præfectus Prætorio, or “ in any Palatine Offices or Services.

Wearied with clamours of the Curiæ, he calls back their Members.

L.181. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. & l.54. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc deſumpta Dat. 5. Non. Maii.

L. ult. de Relationib. Cod. Th. Dat. 5. Id. Septemb. Nunquam ad unius litigatoris querimoniam noſtris Altaribus ſuggeſtio offeratur, &c.

L.147. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

52. This may be ſaid of thoſe Imperial Laws which are now extant, that the general tendency of them is to anſwer Complaints, and remove Grievances, and not either to inhance the Revenue, or heighten the ſeverity of the Government; though had there been more ſuch, we ſhould have had them in Theodoſius his Code. Yet in abſolute Monarchies, where the Princes raiſe what Mony they pleaſe, and their bare Edicts have the force of Laws, they are wont to have few about them that plead for the poor People, and make known their Complaints; the more uſual courſe is to put them upon extravagancies; to cry out, that the People are too rich, that this will make them rebellious, and therefore they are to be not only clipped, or ſheared, but ſcraped, that ſome of the Wool may fall to their own ſhares. Yet the Body of the Civil Laws convince us of another faſhion at Court in thoſe days, though the times were otherwiſe very bad. The Emperour was now again informed, that ſuch Officers as were ſent into the Provinces to exact or raiſe Tributes, were wont to ſtay there a long time, under various pretexts, but with deſign to abuſe the People. He commads Palladius in order to prevent it, that “ what Officer ſoever, from what Magiſtrate ſoever he be ſent, to raiſe what Revenue “ ſoever, ſhall within the term of a year return with his Accounts unto the “ Judge; wherein he ſhall make known what hath been exacted by his diligence, “ how much remains in arrear, in whoſe hands, and by whoſe fault or procurement “ it is ſtill unraiſed in the Province. If after that a year be expired, this Robber “, as he calls him, ſtick ſtill in the Bowels of the Country; he ſhall be turned “ out of his place, and the chief of that Office of which he was member, ſhall fine “ in ten pounds of Gold. And if he refuſe to depart, he ſhall be ſent up in Chains “ by the Apparitors of the Provincial Judge, together with his Accuſation; and it “ ſhall not do him any ſervice to urge, that he was put upon ſome other Buſineſs or “ Employment; it being unlawful to be Exactor twice together in the ſame Province. “ By this care he took to reſtrain thoſe oppreſſions, Honorius could not but ingratiate himſelf with the Countrymen in the Provinces, and at a diſtance from Rome. But whether he did not quite loſe the favour of the Inhabitants of that City, and forfeit all that affection which his other Edicts had procured, by the laſt Law he made this year, we cannot but queſtion. How dear both the Faſhions and Perſons of the Goths and Barbarians were to the people at this time, we have already ſaid. Nothing ſo ingenious and gay as what they wore; none ſo witty and adroit as the ſervants that could be procured out of theſe Nations; a ridiculous (but uſual) ſign of impendent ſlavery from theſe Barbarians, after whom they ran a madding. Once more Honorius reſolved to attempt to ſtop the humour by a “ third Law directed to Probianus Præfect of the City, whereby he forbade long “ Hair, and Cloaths made of Skins to be worn in the City, ſo much as by Slaves. “ If a Free Man ſhould do it, he ſhould incur a Mulct, and if a Slave be condemned “ to ſome publick Drudgery. Concerning Skins we have ſeen already ſufficiently out of Claudian, that they were the Wear of the Goths. And as for long Hair, they who are any whit converſant in the Antiquities of the Franks and other Northern Nations, know it was eſteemed a great (nay, a Royal) Ornament; contrary to the opinion of the Romans.

Still labours againſt Oppreſſions.

L.9. de Exſecutorib. Cod.Th.& L.3.Cod. Juſt. eod.tit. Dat. 10. Cal.Octob.

Prohibits Gothick Faſhions.

Ipſa ſatellitibus pellitis Roma patebat, Et captiva priùs quam caperetur, erat. Rutilius, qui hoc vel proximò anno ſcribebat. L.ult.de Habitu quo uti oportet intra urbem, Cod.Th. Dat. prid.Id.Decemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.ut localis & temporaria.

53. Theodoſius at the beginning of this Year had ſome trouble given him about the Schole or Company of Agentes in rebus, which ſtood in great need of purging. For it was now made (however it came to paſs) the Aſylum and Refuge of lewd and idle perſons; culpable as to their lives, and ignoble as to their original, even ſuch as were ſprung from the very dregs of Slavery. The Year before, the matter had been under conſideration, and the Emperour had referred it to Helio, the Magiſter Officiorum to make Inquiſition after Offenders of this ſort, and remove them: but whether he thought it not then ſeaſonable, or rather too invidious a thing for him to undertake, conſidering the great power of ſome of the Agentes, and the animoſity which was ſeldom wanting to them, Theodoſius then approved of his remitting the cauſe, ſo as though the Magiſter Officiorum might viſit the Schole, yet “ none ſhould have power of turning out, or disbanding, without his own eſpecial “ order and authority. This by an Edict he then judged moſt agreeable to the Dignity “ of the Company; but now this Year being wearied out, as it ſeems, “ with Complaints, and either not willing to be troubled himſelf, or “ deſirous to make ſhort work of what he knew was not to be excuſed “, he returned back the whole power to Helio, both of viſiting the Schole, “ and examining and turning out as he ſhould think convenient; ſo as by removing “ all evil members, the Society might recover its former eſteem, and be “ filled Theodoſius vexed with the Agentes in Rebus makes various Laws about them.

L.17. de Agentibus in Rebus, Cod.Th.& l.2. Cod.Juſt. eod. tit. L.18.ejuſd. tit. Abeſt a Cod.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 416.

filled with a company of honeſt Men. This was thought the beſt courſe, and moſt ſuitable to this time; but when one of theſe Edicts being contrary to another, was afterward to be taken into Juſtinians's Code for ſtanding Law, he not ſo vexed or provoked, as now Theodoſius was, made choice of the former; not thinking fit without the Prince his ſpecial Warrant, to give any ſuch large power to the Magiſter Officiorum.

He refuſeth to be made Heir by virtue of a Nuncupative Will.

And otherwiſe.

L.5.de Teſtamentis,&c.Cod.Th.& L.20.Cod.Juſt.eod. tit. Dat.14. Id. Mart.

54. Theodoſius ſetting himſelf to reform matters belonging to other perſons, reſolved not to omit ſuch as wherein he himſelf was concerned. As there never wanted thoſe who would flatter the Emperors being poſſeſſed of ſo great power, eſpecially ſuch of them as too much indulged the cruelty and rapacity of their Natures; ſo in nothing was it more ordinary to ſhew this flattery, than in Wills or Teſtaments. Indeed Auguſtus, Tiberius, and Adrian refuſed to receive any thing from the Teſtament of an unknown perſon, though ordinarily it might be done. But Domitian ſeiſed on all Eſtates whatſoever, if any one Man would but ſtep forth, and ſay, that he heard the deceaſed ſay before his death, that he had made Cæſar his Heir; and accordingly as Princes were inclined, they either took or refuſed. Now Theodoſius conſidering how little credit was to be given to ſuch Witneſſes as would deſire to ingratiate themſelves, reſolved even to deprive himſelf and great perſons of that Benefit, which to others was allowed. For whereas ordinarily a “ Nuncupative Will was of force, if atteſted by a ſufficient number of “ Witneſſes, ſo as to null and repeal a written one; yet if he himſelf, or any of the “ Grandees were thereby made Heirs, he reſolved it ſhould not be of force to repeal “ what was written, and perfectly good in Law; becauſe perhaps the Witneſſes “ might ſay, that They heard the Party, when he was dying, name the Emperor, “ or ſome great Man his Heir. “ Pertinax the Emperor refuſed to receive any thing from the flattery or boaſting of dead perſons; and in ſuch caſes admitted the claims and complaints of the Kindred againſt theſe Teſtaments, which indeed ought to have been null in themſelves. But Theodoſius would not have even authentick Teſtaments to take place where he and the Nobility were concerned, againſt the Heirs which were named by writing: ſuch an inſtance of ſelf-denial, as his Grandfather gave in that Law, whereby he refuſed to receive any thing by Codicils and Fidei commiſſa. But Juſtinian afterward thought this opinion of Theodoſius the younger too ſcrupulous and unneceſſary; making the condition of the Emperor as not better, ſo not worſe than that of Subjects in theſe caſes. However, Theodoſius was ſo free and hearty in what he did, that he directed his Edict to the People of the City of Conſtantinople, and all Provincials.

Reforms the Houſe, as to Bread, at Conſtantinople.

L.2. de frumento urbis. Conſtantinop. Cod.Th.l.14.tit. 16.& L.1.Cod. Juſt. eod.tit.Dat. 10. Cal. Aug.

He explains his former Act of Grace.

I.11. de Indulgentiis Debitorum, Cod.Th. Dat.5. Id.Septemb. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt. ut temporaria.

55. About the ſame time he obſerved, how that Proviſion which Conſtantine the Great had made for the City of Conſtantinople, and his Grandfather had enlarged, did not reach the ends ſo fully as they deſigned it. For the People receiving it in Corn, many applyed this Corn to other uſes, poſſibly ſome idle Spendthrifts might ſell it, and their Families never fare the better for it. He reſolved therefore to alter the former courſe, and by a Law directed to Urſus the Præfect, commanded, that for the future, no Corn ſhould be given to any, no not to the “ Palatines of his own Houſe, who were wont to receive this allowance amongſt “ others. But that the whole and entire Canon ſhould be delivered into the hands of “ the publick Bakers, who, thereof ſhould make Bread to be diſtributed to the ſeveral Houſes; after which manner he ſaith, the allowance given by Conſtantine, of famous “ memory, and enlarged by Divus the Grandfather of his Piety, ought to be “ expended. “ Till about the latter end of July he continued at Conſtantinople, but then removed to Eudoxiopolis, where he continued the Month of Auguſt; and in the beginning of September extended his Progreſs to Heraclea. Here he thought fit to explain a Law; either that we mentioned which he made two years before, or ſome latter, concerning Indulgence and Pardon of what was remaining due of publick Payments. It was a queſtion whether the Arrears of the Proviſions and Neceſſaries for the Army were to be underſtood thereby, as well as other Charges, becauſe none from the payment of them were wont to be excuſed. But he declares to Monaxius, that all his Subjects whom he had indulged with a Diſcharge “ of the reſt ſhould alſo partake of this Benefit: the Miners of Docimenum, Proconneſus and Troas only excepted, as they had been before out of the general Act. “ By the end of September he returned to Conſtantinople, and there continued the remaining part of the Year.

A. D. 417.

Honorio A. 11. & Conſtantio 2. Coſſ.

56. The Conſuls of the following, or the CCCCXVII of our Lord, were Honorius Auguſtus the eleventh time, and Conſtantius the ſecond. Honorius had his his Abode at Ravenna, and Theodoſius at Conſtantinople. Conſtantius, the ſame day that he entred the Conſulſhip, by the conſent and encouragement of Honorius, married his Siſter Placidia, the Widdow of Attaulfe. And now Honorius, as ſome write, entred Rome in Triumph, for his Victory obtained over the Goths and Attalus, who was led before the Chariot with his hands bound behind him; and, the Solemnity being over, had his Right Hand cut off for his perfidious dealing; and, poſſibly, in return for what he is ſaid to have offered to the Emperor; and was confined to Liparæ. Concerning Honorius his being at Rome this year the Laws are ſilent, not one bearing date from that City; and yet, there are ſome extant, which mention no other place than Ravenna. Vallia, the King of the Goths in Spain, as well to employ and enrich his Men, as to gratifie the Roman Emperor, made War againſt the Vandals and Alans in that Country, and that with great ſucceſs, if we may believe Sidonius Apollinaris; who, ſpeaking of Ricimer, the Nephew, or Grandſon, of Vallia, recounts what his Grandfather did in the Territories of Tarteſus, againſt both theſe Nations; as alſo, in the Fields of Agrigentum: and he compares his Acts with the famous Exploits of Marcellus and Metellus. Iſidore, in his Chronicon, writes, that, being called by Conſtantius, into Spain, he made great ſlaughter of the Barbarians there, to promote the Roman Intereſt; that, in Bætica, he utterly deſtroyed thoſe called Vandali Silingi; and ſo broke and diſtreſſed the Alarii (or Alani) who domineered over the Vandals and Suevi: that Ataces, their King, being ſlain, thoſe few of them that remained, forgetting now the name of any Kingdom of their own, put themſelves under the Government of Gunderich, King of the Vandals; who had placed themſelves in Gallicia.

Conſtantius marries Placidia, the Emperor's Siſter.

Vallia his Acts in Spain.

Carm. 1. p. 280. Edit. Hanoviæ, 1617.

Æra 454.

57. Honorius not being this year diſturbed with any War, had the more leiſure to attend ſuch Complaints as were made concerning Grievances and Miſdemeanors committed in time of Peace. And whence ſhould theſe come, but out of Africk? So loud and importunate he received concerning the inequality of Taxes, and burthens lying upon Lands, that he was conſtrained to ſend away one Sebaſtius, as his general Peræquator and Inſpector, with Title of Comes of the firſt Rank; a perſon of ſuch repute for his Integrity with him, that he gives him the Commendation of “ Probatiſſimus; Forbids that any other Inſpector be ſent, to undo what he had once “ done; gives him leave, however, to remove what had been done by others be-“ fore him: and, whereas he was to examine matters relating to the Lands called “ Emphyteuticarii, which properly belonged to his own Res Privata, and ſo were “ under the Juriſdiction of that Comes, or Treaſurer, yet he will not have the Treaſurer “ meddle with them at this time; but the Poſſeſſors of them ſhall be relieved as “ others, by Sebaſtius, in purſuance to ſeveral Inſtructions given him, and now divided “ into ſeveral Laws. Theſe Inſtructions in general import that he ſhould inſpect and conſider the ſeveral Lands complained of; and make ſuch an equal diſ-“ tribution of the Charges and Impoſitions, according to the nature and quality of “ the Grounds, as might beſt provide for the publick Revenue; and alſo, give re-“ lief to the Tenants and Poſſeſſors, by due and juſt remedies. “

Honorius ſends Sebaſtius, his Peræquator, into Africk.

L. 7. de Locatione Fund. Jur. Emphit. Cod. Th.

LL. 14, 15, 16. de Cenſitoribus, Cod. Th.

L. 9. de prædiis Navicular. & L. 13. de Senatoribus, Dat. prid. Id. Maii.

His Inſtructions.

58. But, the main matter which gave this trouble was, that there were many “ Grounds in this Country ſo much harraſſed by War, that they were deſerted, as “ barren and uſeleſs, and could not pay that Cenſus which, in former times, had “ been impoſed upon them. In caſe theſe Lands were in the hands of ſuch perſons “ as had plenty of others which were rich and fertile, he was to conſider whether “ the whole Patrimony, being taken together, and the barren ones added by way “ of Epibole, to the Fertile, any thing was to be detracted from the uſual Payment, “ for all. If the unfruitful and deſerted were in the hands of poor Men, or thoſe of “ mean condition, then, to be ſure, they ſhould be relieved. But, in caſe they “ were in no Man's poſſeſſion, but wholly deſerted, then ſhould they be ſet over to “ new Owners, who ſhould thenceforth hold them without diſturbance, and without “ being obnoxious to Payments formerly due to the Soil, except within two “ months the former came in, and proved their Claim. Moreover, theſe new Poſſeſſors “ ſhould not pay any Glebalis Collatio, though formerly the Lands belonged “ unto Senators. But, if they had been ſubject to the Naval Function, as appertaining “ to the Navicularii, he will by no means have them freed from it. Nay, further, “ ſo great care he ſhews for keeping up the Duties of that Body, out of reſpect to Navigation “ and Proviſions, that ſuch Grounds as had belonged to it, and thence were “ ſubject to ſuch Services, though they had been ſold by the publick Treaſury within “ the ſpace of twenty years; yet will he have them drawn back, and reunited to “ that Charge. “ So full of equity and forecaſt was now Honorius, for the eaſe of his people, and their Supply ; while, in the mean time, either he or his Quæſtor made too bold with his Maker in the wording of the Conſtitution. For, declaring that, if any one ſhould obtain a Reſcript for himſelf for employing another Inſpector, this Reſcript ſhould be void ; he is ſo bold as to ſay, If they ſhould obtain it from his Altars, as being ſome God upon Earth. But, ſuch Sacrilegious Terms as Numen Noſtrum, and the like, being formerly uſed by Pagan Emperors, were ſtill retained or admitted by theſe Chriſtian Princes : which ſome deſervedly reckon amongſt the Crimes of this Age.

Si quis etiam Reſcriptum de noſtris Altaribus meruerit.

He makes a Law for the better Supply of Rome.

59. The end of the year Honorius cloſed by a Conſtitution, made for the better ſupply of Rome with Proviſions ; of which, ever and anon, ſome ſcarcity was alledged, ſince ſuch time as the Fruits of Egypt were diverted from it, and appropriated to the Supply of Conſtantinople. We have formerly hinted, that in the Portus, or Haven of Rome (eighteen miles diſtant from it) were Granaries, wherein the Corn was laid up till it could be conveyed to the City. And, for this Conveyance there was a Company or Body of Watermen upon Tyber, known by the name of Caudicarii ; and thoſe, called Menſores, who meaſured the Corn when it came into Port, and when it was delivered out, to be carried up to Rome ; beſides other Officers. Now, theſe ſeveral Companies had their Overſeers and Maſters, whom they called Patrons, ſeveral in number ; but ſo, as three were of more Authority than the reſt, out of whom one was choſen, who, for a certain time, had the chief Adminiſtration in his hands. This Adminiſtration Honorius now would have continue " for five years in the hands of two ſuch, as the Bodies of the Caudicarii and Menſores ſhould chuſe, in like manner as the Patrons of the Bakers and Smiths had their " power. And, whereas they were wont to cheat the Citizens by changing the " Corn, and obtruding upon the Bakers ſuch as they bought very cheap, in the " room of the good Grain which was imported ; he commands, that the Chief Patron ſend out privately his Patterns or Samplers of the Corn to his Colleagues, to " prevent the obtruſion of any ſuch unwarrantable Commodity. If ſuch Maſter, or " principal Patron, rightly and truly diſcharge his truſt ; by vertue of this Law, he " declares him, at the end of his five years, to be Comes of the third Rank, with- " out any need of procuring the Dignity by Codicils, or the Prince his Letters. On " the contrary, if he proved falſe, he condemns him to the loſs of his Eſtate, and " to ſerve in the Bake-houſe in the meaneſt capacity, or place of the greateſt drudge- " ry. But, to add more privilege than puniſhment, for the encouragement of theſe " Patrons, he exempts the three Principal of each Body from the juriſdiction of the " Præfectus Annonæ, to which they did properly belong ; and will have them only " ſubject to the Præfect of the City, in Criminal Cauſes. " Further, becauſe the Apparitors belonging to theſe two Præfects were too often wont to wrong and abuſe the Bakers, either by committing the ſame fault as the other did ; or, when they brought in good Corn, exacting ſomething of them in way of recompence : When they could be convicted of ſuch Oppreſſion, he condemns them to the perpetual " drudgery of the Bake-houſe. "

60. Theodoſius, this year, was in great Repoſe at Conſtantinople, which could be little interrupted by ſome Complaints that were made to him out of the Eaſt, againſt the Dux of that Limit, which formerly was called Commagena, and now Eufratenſis ; famous for the the three Cities thereof, old Ninive, Hierapolis and Samoſata. The Complaint was, that he burthened the Provincials, by exacting of them Wood and Materials for private Baths, contrary to a Law made ſome eleven years agone, by Arcadius ; who forbad the practice to all Tribunes, and inferior Comites, in general ; conſtraining them thereby, if the Procurator of the Emperor had not Materials for them, to betake themſelves to the publick Baines. Now, the Duces of the Limits coming under the Notion and Appellation of inferior Comites, he ſo far confirms his Father's Law, as, by an Edict directed to Monaxius, the Præfect, To condemn this Dux to reſtore double of what he had exacted, and " to abſtain from ſuch Illegal Acts, under the ſame penalty, for the time to come. " But, this was not all the fault that was found with this perſon ; he was farther accuſed for burthening the Country, in tranſmitting of Lyons to the Court. The Reader can hardly be ignorant how, ſince the time that Quintus Mutius Scævola began the ſport, in his Curule Ædility, it had been the cuſtom for the Magiſtrates and Emperors to delight the people, among others, with the baiting of wild Beaſts ; as Lyons, Leopards, and the like, in the Circus, or Amphitheatre. This being one of the greateſt inſtances of the Roman Magnificence, Princes would not permit theſe Beaſts, which were deſtinated to the publick Shows, to be hunted in the Provinces

Theodoſius reſtrains the Acting of the Dux of the Limit of Comagena, called Eufratenſis.

L.2.Ne comitib. & Tribunis Lavacra præſtent. Cod.Th.lib.7. tit.11. Dat.5. Cal.Aug. L.un. Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.exhib.& ſuper.conflata eſt.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 417.

vinces by any but the Duces of the Limits, and their Officials: and, when any Magiſtrate was to exhibit them in their Games, they could not obtain them but by the leave and munificence of the Emperor, and his Letters. Indeed, it was lawful to kill Lyons, or other ſorts of Beaſts, when the ſafety of the Provincials required it; and ſo Honorius declared three years ago, that the ſecurity of the Subject was to be preferred before his own Paſtimes. In an Edict inſcribed to Maurianus, then Comes Domeſticorum, and Vice-Agent, or Deputy of the Magiſter Militum in Africk.

L. 1. de Venatione ferarum Cod. Th. lib. 15. tit. 11.

61. For, in that Country was plenty of Lyons, Leopards and Panthers (as at this day) which it was formerly unlawful to hunt and take; though, as for Bears, it was free, in theſe times, for any one there to do it. And, in the Tracts about Euphrates and Meſopotamia they alſo abounded, to the great terror and detriment of the Inhabitants; if it had not been for the great Swarms of Flies and Gnats, which fell upon the eyes of the Lyons, allured by their ſplendor; and put them to ſuch pain, that, with their paws, they endeavoured to remove them, and thereby pulled out their own eyes, as the Reader may remember out of Ammianus. Now, out of theſe Regions the Duces of the Limits were wont to ſend up theſe Beaſts to the Court at Conſtantinople, to be baited there, as the Emperors had occaſion to make theſe Shews; and the Cities, through which they paſſed, were obliged by Law, or by Cuſtom, to defray the Charges of them, and the Officials of the Duces, who conveyed them. But, in any City they were not to continue above ſeven or eight days at the moſt: which term was indulged, becauſe often in Winter they could not conveniently travel. This ſeven or eight days, they of the Province Euphratenſis changed into three or four Months, and all the while exacted what Mony they could for finding of the Beaſts; particularly, in the City Heliopolis. This now, by another Branch of the ſame Conſtitution, Theodoſius declares to Monaxius to be contrary to the Cuſtom; and commands, that Thoſe that are ſent up to Court " by all the Duces of the Limits, ſhall ſtay in the Cities no longer than ſeven days at " fartheſt, upon pain of a Fine of five pounds of Gold, to be incurred by the Duces " and their Officers. "

L. 2. ejuſd. tit. L. un. Cod. Juſt. ex his duab. Leg. conflata eſt.

A. D. 418.

Honorio, A. 12. & Theodoſio, A. 8. Conſ.

62. The CCCCXVIII Year of Chriſt ſucceeds; wherein Honorius Auguſtus the twelfth, and Theodoſius Auguſtus the eighth time were Conſuls. The former made his abode all the year at Ravenna, and the latter at Conſtantinople. This year, on the third of July, Placidia, the Emperor's Siſter, and Wife of Conſtantius, was, at Ravenna, brought to bed of a Son, who was called Valentinian, and reigned in the Weſt after his Uncle. And, as if great Revolutions were portended to happen during his Reign, the ſame Month, the ninth day, about two of the Clock, happened a great Eclipſe of the Sun; which ſeveral Authors mention, but none deſcribe ſo accurately, as Philoſtorgius. So greatly failed the light of this Luminary, that Stars appeared in the Heavens; and ſo great a Drought followed thereupon, that it drew after it a great Mortality, both of Men and Cattel. At ſuch time as the Sun was eclipſed, there appeared a certain Brightneſs in the Sky, of a Comick form, which ſome, out of ignorance, termed a Comet, though it had neither any Tail, nor ſo much as any Rays, neither reſembled any Star; but, as a Flame ariſing from ſome Candleſtick. Beſides, its Motion was altogether different; for from the Equinoctial, it paſſed toward the Weſt by the laſt Star in the Bear's Tail: and, when it had, in that manner, compaſſed the Heavens, then diſappeared, after it had continued its Progreſs more than four Months. The Light it caſt from it ſometimes aroſe, as Flame doth, by degrees, to a great height; and ſometimes exceeding the Magnitude of a Cone, again was reduced to the bigneſs thereof: nay, it was repreſented to view in ſeveral other ſhapes, which were far different from thoſe that are commonly ſeen. It laſted well nigh, from the middle of Summer, to the end of Autumn; being a Forerunner of many Wars, and of an incredible Slaughter of Men, in the Opinion of the Relator; who, to this of the Xiphias, or Aſtrum Xiphoeides, adds the Hiſtory of another Prodigy. The year following (ſome ſay, this preſent; others, the preceding year) there were dreadful Earthquakes, accompanied with fire that fell down from Heaven, which ſeemed to cleave aſunder, and put Men out of all hope of eſcaping, although they were more ſcared than hurt. For, by the Mercy of God, a gteat Wind aroſe, which drove the Fire into the Sea; and, ſtrange it was to ſee Streams of Fire overwhelming the Countries like ſo many Waves, which preſently again were quenched in the Water. During the Earthquakes, in many places, the Roofs and Panes of Buildings opened at the top, with great noiſes and cracks, ſo that they that were within could behold the Skies; when ſuddainly, again, they would come together, and unite, as firmly as if they had Valentinian the third born.

Prodigies accompanying his Birth.

Lib. 12. c. 8. Apud Photium.

never parted aſunder. The ſame happened to Floors and Pavements: and many Granaries let down Corn upon the heads of them that dwelt below, and put them in fear of being overwhelmed; but, all on a ſuddain, the Chinks and Holes would again cloſe; ſo that ſuch as ſaw it not, would admire whence or how the Corn could come thither. After this manner Philoſtorgius related theſe Earthquakes to have happened; and from the dreadfulneſs and ſtrangeneſs thereof, concluded all Earthquakes, not to proceed from any natural Cauſe, as Water or Wind, but merely from the Will and Hand of Almighty God, for the Converſion and Amendment of Sinners.

Honorius enacts ſomething extraordinary about Teſtaments.

L.6. de Teſtam. Cod.Th.Dat.10. Cal. Jul.

L.27. de Teſtam. Cod.Juſt.

Vide Gothofr. in l.

63. As it doth not belong to us here to diſpute about Cauſes or Effects of ſuch extraordinary Phænomena of Nature, ſo, this we know, as to matter of Fact, that dreadful Wars, and great Deſtruction of Men followed, not long after theſe Prodigies. And, although we hear of no great Motions about this very time, yet, ſo grievouſly, of late, had the Weſt been waſted, and ſuch loſs of Men happened thereupon, and ſo little hope but that theſe miſchiefs might ſuddainly again be renewed, as that it put Honorius upon making a Law about Teſtaments, which ſcarcely any thing but the Iniquity of the times can make altogether excuſable. Formerly, though a Teſtament had been made ten years, or more, before the death of the Teſtator, yet notwithſtanding, it might be of full force and effect; for that it was ſuppoſed to be the laſt, after which there was no other in being; and the Man not expreſſing any alteration of his Will, it was preſumed he was ſtill of the ſame Opinion. But now, Honorius, by an Edict inſcribed to Palladius, the Præfectus Prætorio, declared, All Teſtaments made before ten years to be null and void, or “ abſolutely antiquated: and his chief reaſon alledged is, for that the death of the “ Witneſſes may, within that ſpace of time, take away all proof of them. Conſidering the extreme danger Men were continually in, there was now cauſe to have ſuch an Apprehenſion, the Lives of Mortals being now as uncertain and lubrick, as at any other are their Wills, Affections and Deſires; which, in the ſpace of ten years, may well be preſumed very various aad inconſtant. Juſtinian afterwards abrogated this Law, yet he did not quite invalidate the ſenſe and meaning of it: for, though he would not have a Teſtament therefore antiquated, becauſe it was of ten years date, yet would he have it invalid, if it could appear, though but imperfectly, that the Teſtator, after the making of it, was of a contrary opinion: So that he thought that, although in ſuch a number of years, ſuch a Will did not fall; yet, however, it did, as it were, reel and totter. Others have adjudged, that, in a latter Teſtament there is no need of any derogatory Clauſe, if ten years had already intervened from the making of the former, Oblivion of it being preſumed from the lapſe of ſo long a time. And Honorius would have a Chirographum, or Bond, to be renewed within the ſpace of ten years. But, from what he ordains concerning the Date of ten Years, we may learn, that at this time the Day and Conſul were wont to be ſet to Teſtaments, as otherwiſe it alſo appears; although, in the Reign of Gordian, it was not neceſſary.

Reſtrains the Avarice of begging Courtiers.

L.2. de Incorporatione, Cod.Th.

L.L.26.27. de Petitionib. & Cod. Th. Dat.5. Id.Octobr.Abſ.a cod. Juſt.

64. However dangerous were the Times, and the Lives of Men brittle and uncertain; the conſideration thereof procured ſo ſmall Abſtinence, and ſo little Contempt of Wealth, that now again this Emperor was conſtrained to repreſs the greedineſs of begging Courtiers, to the covetous Appetite of whom, the Affairs of Africk gave ſome Provocation. This he did by reviving and confirming a Law he had made fourteen years before, by vertue of which ſuch perſons could not enjoy any “ Eſtates or Goods ſo begged before they had been incorporated, as the word was, “ or ſiezed by the Treaſury, and relation thereof made to the Comes Rei Privatæ, “ an Inventory being had of the ſaid Goods. But, whereas that Law did alſo require, “ that, by a ſecond Petition they ſhould again be obtained by the Prince, he “ now ſo far diſpenſed with this ſecond Grant, as to make it ſuffice if a ſecond Addreſs “ was made for them, to the ſaid Comes.“ This he declared in a Conſtitution directed to Largus, the Proconſul of Africk; and thereby provided alſo for his own Revenue, as by other Branches thereof, he conſulted for the ſecurity of Poſſeſſors, againſt the Avarice of theſe gaping Courtiers, and alſo, the Treachery of Informers. Againſt the firſt he further enjoyned, that, Whether a ſimple Reſcript was only obtained “ for an Eſtate, to which the Quæſtor only ſubſcribed Quæſtor Legi, or a ſpecial Adno- “ tation, as it was termed, or Adnotatio Sacra, when the Emperor, with his own “ hand ſigned the Paper: in both caſes a ſufficient time ſhould be granted to the “ Poſſeſſor to defend himſelf, either in Perſon, or by the Intervention of his A- “ gent, Bailiff or Tenant.“

65. If the begged Goods were in any Tranſmarine Province, or in Africk an whole year, for coming to Court, and applying themſelves to, and making defence before the Comes rei privatæ; and ſix Months, if in any Neighbouring Province, that the accuſed, beſides their defence, might have ſufficient time to ſettle their other matters before their Journey. And if it ſo happened, that by the tricks or arts of the Petitioners they were hindred from proſecuting their Journeys, as it ſeems, was too ordinarily practiſed in theſe corrupt times; ſo as within the year, or ſix Months, they could not come to Court, no Preſcription ſhould be good againſt them. But in caſe the party himſelf were alive that owed the Goods, he poſitively declared, that none ſhould beg them, except, he was convicted and condemned for ſome certain crime. As for Informers, he would have them produced in Judgment by the Petitioners before the Petition had any effect. He declares, that none ſhall make himſelf Informer the ſecond time, without danger to his own perſon; and if he dare to do it the third, he ſhall be certainly puniſhed. “ How Theodoſius his Father thought fit to puniſh them with death, though their Informations were true (for he would have them heard) we have formerly ſhown. But ſo careful he was of the intereſts of private perſons, and at the ſame time neglected not the complaints of ſome whole Countries, the Grievances of which he had more opportunity to underſtand than he could do the Burthens of thoſe that lay beyond the Seas. The Province of Campania in Italy, and two Suburbicarian Regions, as he calls them, viz. Picenum and Tuſcia complained, that by reaſon of Miſchiefs ariſing from the late Wars, there were many Lands which lay deſerted, and conſequently could collate nothing to the publick Tributes. In anſwer to this, he wrote to Palladius, the Præfect, That without any difference made of Grounds, in conſideration that Campania had of old born a more heavy burthen than others, and had lately been waſted by an incurſion of the Enemies, meaning the Goths, it ſhould pay but a ninth part of ſuch payments as it was wont: and Picenum and Tuſcia ſhould pay but a ſeventh, on this condition, that all Complaints ſhould ceaſe concerning any deſerted Grounds. “

L.12. de Indulgent. Debitorum, Cod. Th. Dat.17. Cal. Decemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

66. As Honorius his Quæſtor was not much burthened this Year with penning Laws, ſo leſs was his Brother's Quæſtor at Conſtantinople. There Theodoſius was moved by complaint of the Cities to call back to the ſervices of the Curiæ, ſuch as by Codicils had obtained the Dignity of the Clariſſimatus, and being Senators: “ This Work from Corporations ſeldom failing, whatever any other did. This Dignity in an Edict directed for this purpoſe to Monaxius, Præfect of the Eaſt, (wherein he tells him, he had alſo written to the Præfect of the City) he calls an incongruous fortune for ſuch to aſpire to, though other Princes ſometimes thought otherwiſe, and various were their inclinations, as to the Honours and Functions of the Curiales, as we have ſufficiently ſeen. But as we found his Uncle very munificent and charitable in relieving the oppreſſed, and remitting part of the Tributes that were due to him this Year, though we find him employed in a contrary courſe, we cannot but think him alſo well employed; for if Princes do not receive as well as remit, all their Subjects muſt fare worſe for it. Beſides the perſons of Merchants who were ſubject to the Collatio Luſtralis, it ſeems, there were alſo certain things or Lands that were obnoxious to that payment, poſſibly granted to the Poſſeſſors under that condition, or elſe becauſe bought with Money, which was gained by Merchandiſe or Traffick. Theſe things we find in the hands of perſons of greateſt Dignity at this time; but ſuch were the occaſions of Theodoſius, that he forbade Monaxius, that any Merchant or Poſſeſſor of ſuch things whatſoever, that were obnoxious to this Collation of Gold, ſhould either out of truſt to any Patronage, or confidence, by reaſon of the higheſt Dignity, think himſelf excuſed from that Function. No, though they pertained to the Houſe of the venerable Lady and Empreſs his Siſter Pulcheria, or the other moſt Noble Siſters of his Piety. “ Pulcheria, who had formerly for her great Wiſdom and Diligence been made Auguſta, was afterward married to Marcian, and had an Houſe in Conſtantinople. The other Siſters were Arcadia and Marina; Flaccilla being thought by ſome to be dead before this Year, and older than Pulcheria. They alſo had Houſes in the City, mentioned in the old deſcription of Conſtantinople. And they had alſo the Title of Nobiliſſimæ, that of the Nobiliſſimatus being wont to be beſtowed by the Emperor's on their near Relations; but yet in another ſenſe than was that of Nobiliſſimus Cæſar. Gothofred would gather from this Law, that at this time perſons of greateſt quality practiſed the Trade of Merchandiſe in the Eaſt, though

What Theodoſius did this year at Conſtantinople.

L.183. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. Dat.15. Cal. Maii. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L.21. de. Luſtrali conlatione Cod. Th. Dat. 12. Cal. Septemb. Nec ſi ad domum Dominæ ac venerabilis Auguſtæ Pulcheriæ Germanæ noſtræ, ſeu nobiliſſimarum ſororum pietatis noſtræ pertineat.

Sect. 3. A. D. 418.

though in the Weſt Honorius had forbidden it to them: yet what it ſaith concerning thoſe of higheſt Dignity, rather ſeems applicable to Poſſeſſors of ſuch things as were obnoxious to the Collation, than to thoſe it calleth by the name of Merchants.

A. D. 419. Monaxio & Plinta Coſſ.

The Goths permitted to inhabit Gall.

67. In the Year CCCCXIX, of Honorius the XXVII, Monaxius and Plinta obtained the Dignity of Conſuls. The two Emperors made their Abode as formerly. Vallia, King of the Goths, having proſperouſly fought againſt the Vandals and other Barbarians that had invaded that Country, dealt with Conſtantius, that he and his Men might be received into Gall, and there obtain place wherein to ſettle and inhabit. And Conſtantius was ſo favourable to his requeſt, that he procured a ſatisfactory return from Honorius; ſo as this very Year, as writes Proſper, or the Year preceding, as Marcellinus hath it, they were permitted to return out of Spain, and to plant and fix themſelves in Gallia Aquitanica, from Tolouſe, as far as the Ocean, which Region was afterward known by the name of Gaſcoign. Now at this time, beſides the natural Inhabitants, three ſorts of People dwelt and domineer there. The Romans the ancient Lords, who ſtill held that part which lay from the Rhine as far as Ligeris, or the Loire, except the Cities of Armorica (now Britain) which as ſome ſay had aſſerted their own liberty. The Goths, who had now lately poſſeſſed themſelves of what lay from the Loire Southwards. And the Burgundians, who inhabited by the Rhone, though not all the Country, of which moſt of the Cities ſtill continued in their fidelity to the Romans. Conſtantius now in a manner managed all Affairs under and for Honorius; and this Year his Wife bore him a Daughter, which was called by the name of Honoria.

Theodoſius hath War with Perſia.

68. Theodoſius in the Eaſt after a long repoſe became about this time engaged in a War with Perſia: for the Perſians had broken the League, as well upon the account of Religion, as for other reſpects. Iſdigerdes, who having been appointed Tutor to the Emperor, kept a good underſtanding with him all his days, being dead, as Socrates writes, Bararanes his Son ſucceeded, who perſecuted the Chriſtians at the inſtigation of the Magi, which yet his Father had never done. They being compelled by various torments and other afflictions, betook themſelves to the Romans; and Atticus a Biſhop had ſo much compaſſion for them, as to move Theodoſius in their behalf. But this was not all the provocation. For the Perſians having lately diſcovered ſome Mines of Gold, hired certain Workmen out of the Roman Territories, on condition that they ſhould be returned back after ſuch a Work performed; but though the Work was compleated, yet would they not reſtore the Men. Beſides this, they broke their faith given to the Romans, in robbing their Merchants of their Wares. Thoſe that fled upon the account of Religion being more welcome for theſe provocations, the Perſian King preſently ſent his Ambaſſadors to demand the Fugitives. But the Romans were ſo far from ſending the miſerable people back, that to defend theirs, and the common cauſe of Chriſtian Religion, they reſolved to conteſt the quarrel by a War. And Theodoſius began, by ſending an Army under conduct of Ardabarius, who piercing into that Kingdom through Armenia, waſted the Province called Azazena. Againſt him came Narſæus, General of the Perſian Army, who adventured to fight, but was overthrown, and fled; after which to redeem the Infamy, he reſolved hy the way of Meſopotamia to invade the Roman Borders, at that time deſtitute of defence, and ſurpriſe them when they did leaſt expect it.

Lib.7.c.18.

69. The Deſign of Narſæus was ſufficiently known to the Roman General, who thereupon laid waſte Azazena, and haſted with all ſpeed into Meſopotamia. Hereby it was utterly fruſtrated, and he ſeeing himſelf ſo far prevented, having a great Army, when he was come as far as Niſibis (which, though placed in the Borders, was at this time in the Perſians Hands) he ſent to Ardaburius, and offered him Battel in a place to be agreed on; which he plainly refuſed, ſaying, that the Roman Emperors were not to wage War at his Diſcretion. However, great was the fear wherewith the City of Conſtantinople was ſeiſed; though the War being tranſlated into Meſopotamia, and the Perſian Army having there ſheltred it ſelf in Niſibis, the Romans had laid cloſe Siege to it. By this time Bararanes had received intelligence both of the waſting of Azazena, and what danger both his Army and the City was in; and to relieve them he haſted with his whole Force. But conſidering what he undertook, by reaſon of the courage and ſtrength of the Romans, he thought it ſafe to call the Saracens to his aſſiſtance, then governed by one Alamundarus, a Man of an haughty courage, who carrying with him a vaſt number ber of his Nation, thought he had reaſon to bid the Perſian King be very confident of the ſucceſs; and namely that he would not only baffle and defeat the Roman Army, but take and deliver into his hands Antioch, that noble City of Syria. His Attempts no way anſwered his Brags, nor his ſucceſs either of them; for he was ſo baffled and defeated, a diſſention riſing amongſt his own Men, that flying when there were ſcarcely any to purſue them, they took the River Euphrates, and there about an hundred thouſand are ſaid to have periſhed. But the Romans that lay at the Siege of Niſibis, hearing that the Perſian King was bringing amongſt them a great number of Elephants, out of meaſure affrighted thereat, ſet fire to all the Engines they had uſed there, and retired into their own Territories. But they were forced again to make head againſt the Enemy, for ſeveral Skirmiſhes followed. Areobindas, the Lieutenant General of the Romans, killed one of the moſt valiant Perſians in ſingle Combat: Ardaburius by an Ambuſcado cut off other ſeven of their chiefeſt Officers; and Vitianus, another Roman Captain, routed and diſperſed the reſt of the Saracen Troops. How theſe things were particularly performed, we are not of opinion with Socrates, that for fear of too long a digreſſion, he therefore ought in ſilence to paſs by.

70. However, they were all performed at Land; though by an Act of Pardon paſſed this Year by Theodoſius, it appears, that he had ſome jealouſie and apprehenſion of the Naval Power of ſome that were Enemies to the Roman Empire. As it was ever forbidden to ſuccour with Neceſſaries, and to relieve with Money and otherwiſe, the Enemies of States and Kingdoms; ſo alſo with materials for Shipping: and at length it was found convenient to prohibit the ſhewing or teaching of Barbarians how to make Ships. The Romans had ſufficiently learn'd by their own experience how great an advantage the knowing of this myſtery was, having wreſted the Dominion of the Seas from the Carthaginians, after they had once arrived at it. Yet notwithſtanding, certain perſons, as formerly in the time of Severus, ſo now, fled to the Barbarians, and taught them the way, who being afterward ſeiſed, were committed to Priſon, in order to their trial, and farther puniſhment. In their behalf, and for their pardon interceded Aſclepiades, the Bi- “ ſhop of the Cherſoneſus, with whoſe Intreaty the Emperor was ſo far moved (as “ ſeldom perſons of his Order were ſaid nay) that by an Edict he declared to Monaxius, that at his petition they ſhould be freed from Priſon, and that puniſhment that hung over their Heads; but for the time to come, it ſhould be capital to “ them, and all others, to communicate to Barbarians that skill of making Ships, “ which was unknown to them before.“ Now by Barbarians we cannot think were meant the Perſians, though at this time there were ill underſtandings betwixt the Empire and them; but ſome of the Northern and Scythian Nations beyond the Danube, upon which plyed Gallies, called Luſoriæ, of a new make or faſhion. And the naming of the Biſhop of the Cherſoneſus perſwades us to this which is rationally thought to have been no other than that of Thrace. This Law could not but be very politick and ſeaſonable in conformity with which by a decree of a publick meeting held at Lubeck in the Year MDLXIII, and in the Hanſe Towns it was prohibited, that Barbarians, and eſpecially Johannes Baſilides then the cruel Emperor or Tyrant of the Moſcovites ſhould be taught the more rare ſort of Arts, as then unknown to them; particularly ſuch as related to Ships and Guns.

L. ult. de pœnis, Cod. Th. Dat. 8. Cal. Octobr. L. penult. Cod. Juſt. ejuſd tit. hanc mutilata eſt. Propter petitionem viri reverentiſſimi Aſclepiadis Cerſoneſitanæ Epiſcopi, &c.

71. The reaſon was, they concluded, if they once arrived at the uſe of Navigation, they would not only pierce into Livonia, but alſo into Germany it ſelf; as Mons de Thou obſerves, who farther notes, that the Turks, by the commerce they had with the Genoeſes, (who by gain were allured into it) having once underſtood this myſtery, paſſed the Helleſpont, and by the aſſiſtance of the Greek Deſertors and Pyrates, with a Fleet ſet upon Conſtantinople, the Head of the Eaſtern Empire, and having taken it, preſently over-ran Macedonia, Illyricum, and all Peloponneſus. Theſe Cautions and Laws out of prudence have been ordained by Princes and States, leſt their Subjects by their art and skill ſhould furniſh and fortifie the Barbarians againſt themſelves; but now they ſeem in theſe Ages to come too late, when the whole world in a manner, by reaſon of Trade, is ſufficiently acquainted with Ships and Shipping. Yet is it ſtill the cuſtom for ſome Nations to forbid Strangers to build Veſſels in their Ports without publick conſent obtain'd, and ſuch or ſuch a ſum of Money paid for ſuch a Ship of ſuch or ſuch a Burthen; and particularly the Statutes of the City of Dantzick require it, that the benefit of Navigation may rather redound to their own Citizens than to Strangers. But to return to Theodoſius, by the laſt Conſtitution he made this Year, he commanded Ætius, Præfect of Conſtantinople, (who the year before eſcaped narrowly a ſtab, which pierced his Gown and Coat, from one that pretended to reach him a petition) that all the Lime-kills which were upon the Strand, or Sea-ſhore, betwixt the Amphitheatre and Port of S. Julian, (named by the Emperor Juſtin the Port of Sophia, after his Wife) ſhould be removed, both for the wholſomeneſs of “ the moſt ample City, and the vicinity of his own Houſes; ſo as none whoſoever “ ſhould be permitted to burn Lime in theſe places. “

Vide Joh. Loccenii de jure maritimo, lib. 1. c. 2.

A. D. 419.

L.ult.de calcis coctorib.Cod.Th. Dat.4. Non. Octobr. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

A. D. 420. Theodoſio A. 8. & Conſtantio 3. Coſſ.

72. We come now to the Year of our Lord CCCCXX, to the eight Conſulſhip of Theodoſius Auguſtus, and the third of Conſtantius; wherein Honorius, as formerly, held his Reſidence at Ravenna, and Theodoſius at Conſtantinople. This Year the Perſian War was carrying on; and beſides, what we have ſaid already concerning the Military Preparations made by Theodoſius for the Field, he thought of other ways for ſecuring the Empire againſt the crafts and violence of the Enemy, of which Conſtantinople it ſelf, and therefore much more the remote and frontier Parts, had great apprehenſion. By an Edict directed to Monaxius, he gave leave to all his Subjects inhabiting through the Provinces of Meſopotamia, Oſdroena, Euphratenſis, Syria Secunda, Phœnicia, Libanenſis, Cilicia Secunda, both the Armenia's, “ both the Cappadocia's, Pontus Polemoniacus, the Helleſpont and the reſt “ where need was, if they ſo pleaſed to fortifie and incircle their Grounds with “ Walls. “ It had formerly been free for private perſons to fortifie their Houſes, but with Reſtrictions; but now in a caſe of ſo imminent danger, he gave indefinite and general leave. So in our own Country, both before and after the Norman Conqueſt, multitudes of Caſtles were erected, and almoſt every private Man, if not with Stones, yet would fortifie his Houſe with Water, the Moats being ſtill remaining in moſt places. But as in time of danger that may be granted, which at other times may it ſelf prove dangerous, the wiſdom of after Ages thought fit to demoliſh theſe little Holds, neither will the publick ſafety permit, that every one may build Caſtles at his pleaſure, except it be in the Air. By the Conſtitutions of Spain it is forbidden either to build, or repair them, without licenſe firſt obtained from the King. But now adays there ſeems no great need of any prohibition in this matter, ſince the times that Guns and Gunpowder are found more effectual againſt Heaps of Stone, than Bows and Arrows, or any other wooden Engines. But for the Law, of which we were ſpeaking, the ſame reaſon that made Theodoſius enact it, cauſed Juſtinian afterward to retain it, and to put it into his Code.

Theodoſius gives his Subjects leave to fortifie their Houſes in the Eaſt.

L.10.Cod.Juſt. de Ædificiis privatis, lib.8. tit.10.Dat. 3. Non.Maii.

73. And the ſame happened to another Edict which Theodoſius publiſhed this ſame Year upon the ſame occaſion. Socrates writes, as we lately heard, how one cauſe of the quarrel with Perſia aroſe from their taking away the Wares or Goods of the Roman Merchants. And we cannot ſay, that the Merchants were ſo juſtly ſerved, for importing into Perſia things that had been prohibited. But on the eighteenth of September we find an Order directed to Euſtathius the Præfectus Prætorio, wherein Theodoſius ſignifies, That he had decreed, that no Counterband Goods, or any unlawful Wares ſhould be tranſported to Barbarous Nations. “ Theſe Wares were, as we have formerly ſeen, either Inſtruments, or Materials conducing to War, things whereby the Barbarians might be armed againſt the Roman Empire, or elſe Commodities that would ſuſtain and nouriſh them in any Hoſtile Actions, as Mony, Wine, Oil, and ſuch like. It is true, Commerce had not been utterly forbidden with Perſia; but it was confined to certain places, as the Reader may remember, out of which it was not lawful for Roman Subjects to traffick. Now the bettter to prevent this miſchief, ſeveral ſorts of Officers were appointed to watch at the Ports, beſides the Comites Commerciorum, who had, under the Diſpoſition of the Comes Largitionum, the chief inſpection of this Affair; ſometimes Palatines, ſometimes Protectors, and otherwiles the Officials belonging to the Duces of the Limits. Before theſe Protectors or Officials the Emperor gives “ expreſs charge, that all Mariners or Maſters of Ships make Notes in the preſence “ of the Defenſors of the places, what Goods they have aboard, and whither they “ are bound; moreover, that they have not been oppreſſed, or force to pay more than was due (as often it happened through the avarice of Officers) and of this “ Act thus made, the Original ſhall be delivered to the Maſter or Mariner, and a Copy remain in cuſtody of the Defenſor of the place.

Forbids unlawful Wares to be tranſported to Barbarous Nations.

L.ult. de Litorum & Itinerum cuſtodia, Cod.Th.Dat.14. Cal. Octob. & L.un. Cod. Juſt. eod.tit.

A. D. 421. Euſtathio & Agricola Coſſ.

74. For the CCCCXXI Year of our Lord, Euſtathius and Agricola were Conſuls. Honorius this Year made his Abode at Ravenna, and ſome alteration in

the Conſtantius made Emperor.

the direction of Laws. For now did he promote Conſtantius the Comes, Magiſter Militum, and Patritian, who had deſerved ſo well of him in the Wars againſt Uſurpers and Barbarians for the ſpace of ten years, who had married his Siſter, and been thrice Conſul, to the higheſt Title and Dignity of Emperor. He himſelf had no Children to whom he could leave his place, and finding the times very troubleſome, and to require ſome other perſon to aſſiſt, he could not pitch upon a more deſerving, no, nor fitting perſon, he having alſo a Son to continue the ſucceſſion, on whom he conferred the Dignity of Nobiliſſimus; and ſent the Picture of the new Emperor, as the cuſtom was, to Conſtantinople. Four Conſtitutions made this Year bear the name of Conſtantius, joyned with the other two Emperors; or four ſeveral Laws, as they are now divided, which made up one and the ſame Conſtitution, deſigned to check the avarice and rapacity of ſuch as gaped after the Eſtates of other perſons. For this purpoſe Honorius gave in command to Palladius, the Præfect, who exerciſed this Office for ſeven years together, that if any forfeited or eſcheated Lands or Goods had remained in the Hands of any perſons for the ſpace of five years, this ſhould be a Bar againſt any Petition or Beg- " ging, as it was wont to be againſt the Treaſury it ſelf. " Wherein he was not yet ſo exact as the old Law had been, and that which Juſtinian approved, which allowed of four years Preſcription to be ſufficient. As for the Eſtates of ſuch as were put to death for Crimes, he prohibits all begging of them, but commands " that they be confiſcated, except, by the Humanity of the Laws, they be to be " left to their Children or Parents; which Humanity is only denied to that of " Treaſon. "

Honorius diſcourages the begging of Eſtates.

L. un. de Quinquennii præſcriptione, Cod. Th. lib. 4. tit. 15. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt quia Competitiones bonorum poſtea ſublatæ fuerunt.

L. 23. de Bonis Proſcript. Dat. 8. Id. Jul. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

75. But yet, more particularly, becauſe the Importunity and Oppreſſion of theſe Beggars was intollerable, he made a diſtinction of Perſons, whoſe Eſtates were ſo begged. Some, poſſibly, were yet alive; but not ſeldom hurried to Condemnation and death, by the procurement of thoſe who thirſted after their Eſtates. Therefore he expreſly forbids, that any thing belonging to perſons alive, be begged, ex- " cept they had already undergone Deportation, which always drew after it a Pro- " ſcription of Eſtate. He had formerly ordained, that none ſhould move him for " any thing poſſeſſed by any perſon, but ſuch as were convicted and ſentenced; but " now he thought fit to extend this further Indulgence to all that were not yet ba- " niſhed into Iſlands. But yet, though the Poſſeſſions of ſuch deported perſons might " be begged, he ſtill put this Reſtraint upon Petitioners, that they ſhould make no re- " queſt for any ſuch Goods or Eſtate, till two years had paſſed after ſuch Deportati- " on. And again, he will not permit that any beg more than the Eſtate of one " ſingle perſon. Then, whereas it was often practiſed to grant away the Eſtates " of thoſe who would not appear upon Summons, he alſo forbids this practice in " Civil Actions, for this reaſon, becauſe the Intereſt of private men is only concer- " ned in them; and in Criminal Cauſes, the fame of the Parties is only hurt. Nei- " ther, if a perſon who had contracted with a publick Officer, denied the bargain, " and failed to perform it, ſhould therefore the Treaſury fall upon his Eſtate, or any " part of it. Then further, as to the Eſtates of dead Perſons; if they left no Heirs, " they might be begged, but not elſe, if any Kindred at all was remaining: Yet, if, " before their death, they were not convicted after a publick Impeachment; but " only, after their death, were ſaid to have committed ſuch Offences, he forbids " that their Eſtates be petitioned for; as the Crime, ſo the Puniſhment, ending with " the Party. And, if they were impeached before their deceaſe; yet, if their E- " ſtates were not firſt confiſcated, he commands that they be not begged. In the " laſt place, to curb the boldneſs of Informers, he ordains, that they be produced " in Judgment before the Comes Rei Privatæ, e'er any Grant of the Accuſed his " Goods be made, without any Caution or Bail to be allowed; and, if they cannot " make good their Impeachment, they ſhall be puniſhed as Calumniators. Howe- " ver, he reſolves that, after the Petition made, the Poſſeſſor of the Goods or Eſtate " ſhall have a year's time to defend himſelf, beſides what was formerly ſaid of the " Bar allowed him, in caſe he could plead five years Preſcription. "

L. L. 29, 30. de Petitionibus, &c. Cod. Th.

76. Theſe Laws, as we ſaid, bore the name of Conſtantius, as well as others; but, as Honorius thought he had power enough to prefer him to the Dignity, ſo Theodoſius, it ſeems, thought he had as much reaſon to deny it, and to reject his picture, ſent upon that occaſion, according to the Cuſtom. For, this he did, as Philoſtorgius related, and Olympiodorus wrote, that the Meſſenger who was ſent to him about the Election of Conſtantius, was neither admitted, nor received by him. Philoſtorgius affirmed, that Conſtantius, as highly concerned in ſo great an Affront, Conſtantius, his Picture being rejected by Theodoſius, dies.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 421.

prepared by War to be revenged, but died in the Preparation. Olympiodorus wrote, that by the Grief he thence contracted, he fell into a Diſeaſe, which ſo far increaſed upon him, that, when he conſulted how he might maintain that Title by force, which, in a peaceable way, he had obtained, he died of a Pleuriſie, in the ſeventh Month after his Promotion, and that in the City of Ravenna; as ſome ſay, it had been foretold him in a Dream. Theodoſius might poſſibly be the more averſe to the Promotion of Conſtantius, becauſe now, he reſolved himſelf to marry; and hoped to have Iſſue, wherewith to provide ſufficiently for Succeſſion. For, this year, he took to Wife Eudocia Attica, the Daughter of Leontius, a Philoſopher; who had educated her in the Liberal Studies, wherein ſhe was very eminent. Her firſt name, as Socrates writes, was Athenais; which Atticus, the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, at her Baptiſm, changed to Eudocia.

Theodoſius marries.

Lib.7.c.21.

A. D. 422.
Honorio, 13. Theodoſio, 10. A. A. Conſ.

77. For the Year following, or the CCCCXXII, no Subjects bore the Title of Conſuls, but the two Emperors themſelves; Honorius the thirteenth time, and Theodoſius the tenth. Honorius continued his Abode at Ravenna, and Theodoſius at Conſtantinople, as formerly. Honorius had now ſome hopes of recovering Spain to his Obedience; Experience having taught, that the Vandals might be overcome; as the Goths, before their Retreat into Gall, had, not long ſince, made apparent. He had two excellent Commanders at this time: one Caſtinus, who was Magiſter Militum; and one Boniface, a Thracian, now the Comes Domeſticorum, and of Africk: both whom he reſolved to employ in this War; that the one with Forces by Land, and the other with a Fleet from Africk, might, with equal Power and Command, carry on the deſign. And, at firſt there was an happy Underſtanding betwixt them, which produced ſuch Effects as promoted the Intereſt of him that ſent them; for, they got into their hands Maximus and Jovinus, who formerly had uſurped, and fought once or twice againſt the Vandals. But, not long it was e'er Ambition and Emulation, which moſt commonly happens amongſt thoſe of equal Command, put a bad Concluſion to ſo good a Beginning. For Caſtinus grew ſo proud, that he would not own Boniface for his Equal, and Boniface ſcorned to acknowledge him for his Superior, and departed with his Fleet; and, coming to the Port of Rome, thence ſailed into Africk, where, as in his own Province, his Authority was chief in Military Matters. The Vandals, who formerly, could not ſuſtain the ſhock of both, when conjoyned; thought they might now grapple with a ſingle perſon: from deſpairing, they became reſolved; and, renewing the War, through the imprudence of Caſtinus, gave a great Defeat to the Romans.

Honorius hath hopes to recover Spain.

The Pride and Emulation of his Captains blaſt the Deſign.

78. Whether by the deſire of Boniface, to gratifie his Province before his departure; or at the complaint of the Provincials themſelves, we know not; but, toward the latter end of February, Honorius granted a Pardon, or Indulgence of certain " Debts owing in the Proconſular Province of Africk, as alſo, in that called Byzacena; " which was larger, and contained more Ground than the other, as appears " by the Account of the Acres and Centuries of each Country. " He was as ready to reſcue poor and honeſt Men from the Rapacity of ſome Creditors, who, at this time, preyed upon them in ſo unreaſonable manner, that a large Conſtitution was, at the beginning of July, directed to John, now Præfect of Italy, for Redreſs of ſo great a Grievance. Some of them, becauſe they had not Strength and Authority enough themſelves, would transfer their Actions upon Perſons of Place and Employment, who thereby could ſtrike greater terror into miſerable Men; and make them ſubmit to unreaſonable Terms, rather than conteſt them. This he " forbids, upon pain of Creditors their loſing their Debts ſo made over " And, it having formerly been Law, and ſo declared by Claudius; as alſo, by Diocletian and Maximilian, he now inforced it; and the Law-makers of the Barbarous Nations, afterward, thought alſo fit to eſtabliſh it as ſuch to their Subjects. It was too ordinary for perſons to commit mony into the hands of Slaves, Agents and Bailiffs, for the uſe and improvement of the Lands or Poſſeſſions, as was pretended, though it was formerly, by the Prætorian Law, forbidden; which now, Honorius ſo far confirms and reinforces, as to declare all ſuch mony forfeit, except their Maſters had " given expreſs and particular Order and Inſtructions as to the borrowing of it, and " the quantity ſo borrowed, according to the ſaid Law. Indeed, if ſuch Bailiff or " Officer was not obnoxious to any Accounts belonging to his own Maſter, the Creditor might have an Action De Peculio, or againſt ſo much as ſuch Slave or Bailiff " had of his own, diſtinct from the Eſtate and Goods of his Lord.

he redreſſeth more Grievances in Africk.

L.14. de Indulgentiis debitorum, Cod.Th.Dat 10. Cal.Mart. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

L.un. de Actionib.ad potentes tranſlatis, Cod. Th.lib.2.tit.13. & L.10. Cod. Juſt. Ne liceat potentiorib.Dat. 5.Id.Jul

L.un. Quod juſſu, Cod.Th.lib.2. tit.3.

L.un.de Peculio Cod.Th. lib.2. tit.32.

L.ult. Cod.Juſt. Quod cum eo qui in aliena poteſtate & ex his duabus conflata eſt.

79. It was become a practice, that when a Suit was commenced for Mony owing, ing, the Mony ſhould be ſequeſtred into the hands of ſome third perſon, to keep and preſerve it: which practice did more promote the ends of covetous and griping Courtiers, than tended to any publick Advantage. And, now Honorius utterly declared againſt the neceſſity of ſuch Sequeſtration, as founded neither on Law nor Equity. For, the Law required that the Plaintiff ſhould firſt found and prove his Intention, and Equity would not permit that the profit of the thing ſhould be taken from him that was in Poſſeſſion; and, that in a Suit or Action, one ſhould begin with Execution; that he who was neither heard, judged nor condemned, ſhould, for a time, be ſpoiled of any Intereſt or Concern, as he was by vertue of Sequeſtration. Therefore, before the Party ſhould be convicted, or Sentence given, he would not have the Mony taken from him, as neither regularly can other Moveables before Judgment, except in certain Caſes; as where the faithfulneſs of the Poſſeſſor is ſuſpected as to keeping of the thing in Controverſie, and he refuſeth to give Caution: When the Chaſtity of a Woman is queſtioned, till the Tryal is over, and ſome few others." But farther, our Emperor was ſo great an Enemy to theſe unjuſt Vexations, that he would have no Goods or Poſſeſſions of any Man ſiezed for the Debts of another Perſon, whether publick or private." And, becauſe the Avarice of ſuch as begged Eſtates could, by no means, be obviated by any Preſcript; yet he ſufficiently repelled them, how powerful ſoever at firſt they were thought. Whereas he lately had granted to the Poſſeſſor of ſuch Eſtates a years time to defend himſelf, which expired, the Beggar might have been admitted: Now he thought fit to aſſign and prefix to ſuch Petitioner alſo a years time, within which, if he did not make good his pretenſions, he ſhould not only fail of his deſign, but be condemned in the Coſts and Expences of the Suit." This Edict was publiſhed and expoſed in the Forum of Trajan, toward the latter end of Auguſt, being directed to Proculus, the Comes Rei privatæ.

Sect. 3. A. D. 422.

L. un. de Pecuniæ ſequeſtratione prohibita, Cod. Th. lib. 2. tit. 28. & L. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 7 Id. Jul.

L. ul. de Exſecutorib. Cod. Th. & l. 4. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

L. 31. de Petitionib. &c. Cod. Th. P.P. in foro Trajani 8. Cal. Septemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

80. Some accidents happened about this time, which cauſed this Emperor to take notice of certain inconveniences, to which Women were expoſed in their Marriages. Now was obſerved, what has ever ſince been too ordinarily practiſed, that Tutors and Guardians diſpoſed of ſuch Maids as were committed to their truſt, more for their own ends than the advantage of the Virgins; and often contrary to the purpoſe of their Fathers, though they had contracted them before their death. Honorius thought this ſo unreaſonable, and tending to ſuch miſchief, that conſidering the frailty and inconſiderateneſs of young Women, how ready they are to caſt away themſelves, by a Law directed to Marinianus the Præfectus Prætorio, he expreſly commanded, that if a Father had proceeded ſo far before his death, as to betroth or contract his Daughter, this Contract ſhould hold firm and good, notwithſtanding any thing done by her Curator or Tutor to the contrary; nay, though ſhe her ſelf being adult, ſhould conſent to the reſcinding of it." This he ordained in caſe of a Contract or Deſponſation made by the Father, which is not to be extended to a ſimple deſtination, purpoſe or deſignment; for the Guardian in ſeveral caſes might recede from, or croſs the deſtination of the deceaſed Father, if the intereſt of his Pupil did require it. The Emperor was further informed, that Women were often hardly dealt with by the Heirs of their Husbands, to whom having often brought a large Dower or Portion, they were wont to defraud them of it, as belonging to the Eſtate of the deceaſed, or to his Children. Hereupon he thought fit by the ſame Conſtitution to ſettle the matter of Dower, in reſpect to the deceaſed, both of Wife and Husband. If the Husband died before the Wife, the Dos or Dower which ſhe brought with her ſhould return to her entire, ſo as the Heirs ſhould have nothing to do with it. If ſo be the Wife died before the Husband, the uſusfructus of it ſhould remain to the Husband as long as he lived, but the propriety to the Children they had betwixt them. And if the Husband had returned back the Dower of his Wife before her death, this returning it back being to be eſteemed no other than a Donation betwixt Man and Wife, which the Roman Laws expreſly forbade; her Heirs ſhould reſtore it back to the Husband with all the profits ſince the day it was returned; it being reaſonable, that he ſhould have the advantage of the Dower, who ſuſtained the charge and burthen of Matrimony. In concluſion for all this, Honorius will not have the Sons deprived of ſuch Eſtates, though made over before Marriage, as came by their Fathers." Here to avoid confuſion, muſt be known, that by Dos the Roman Laws underſtand that which the Wife bringeth to her Husband in Marriage, otherwiſe called Marriage Goods. But that which ſhe hath of her Husband after the Marriage reſolved, if ſhe outlive him, they term Donatio propter Nuptias;

Provideth that Women be not cheated before or after Marriage.

L. 7. de Sponſalibus &c. Cod. Th. & L. 4. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

L. 3. de Dotibus, Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 13. Dat. 3. Non. Non. & L. ult. Cod. Juſt. Soluto Matrimonio quemadmodum dos petatur. & L. un. Cod. Si dos conſtante matrimonio ſoluta fuerit.

L. 4. de ſecundis Nuptiis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 9.

Sect. 3. Nuptias; or a Donation in conſideration of a ſubſequent Marriage. A. D. 422.

81, From theſe matters we muſt paſs to the Coaſt of Theodoſius at Conſtantinople, and ſee how Affairs there ſtood, in reference unto War and Peace. And the War we find ſtill depending with Perſia at the beginning of this year, though to the advantage and encouragement of the Romans. We have heard from Socrates in ſhort, what the Atchievments of Areobindus were againſt the Perſians, and how the Attempts of Vitianus ſucceeded againſt the Saracens, the good proſperity of both whom, were preſently, as he ſaith, conveyed to the Emperor Theodoſius after this manner. He had one Palladius, a Man of extraordinary Endowments both in body and mind, and eſpecially of ſuch ability in Riding, that in three days time he Socr. lib. 7 c. 19. would poſt to the Borders of Perſia, and in ſo many more return to Conſtantinople; nay, he would to the other parts of the Empire paſs with that expedition, that it was ſaid of him, that the Roman Pale, which was large of it ſelf, he made ſtraight and narrow by his celerity; and as for the King of the Perſians, he was aſtoniſhed when he heard of it. However, the Roman Emperor when he received intelligence thereof, was not ſo puffed up with the Victory, but that he was willing Idem l. 7. c. 20. to embrace a Peace; and for that purpoſe, ſent away to the Borders one Helio, whom he very much eſteemed. Helio undertook what he commanded, and proceeded as far in his Journey, as the place where the Romans had intrenched themſelves, and thence he ſent Maximinus, an eminent perſon, and the Colleague of Ardaburius, as a Commiſſioner to conclude the Treaty. He, when he came to the Perſian Court, told them, he was ſent, not by the Roman Emperor, but by his Lieutenants to make a Peace; for Theodoſius was ignorant of the War, and would eſteem lightly of it, ſhould he once come to the knowledge of it. The Perſian King was ready enough to receive the Embaſſy, and good reaſon, for his Army was almoſt ſtarved in the Field; but his ten thouſand Soldiers, whom they called Immortal, adorned above all others, with golden Chains, and precious Stones, perſwaded him, that he ſhould not have thoughts of peace, till they had firſt made an Attempt upon the Romans, who were at preſent utterly unprepared to make reſiſtance.

82. The King obſerved their Directions, and preſently committed the Meſſenger into cuſtody, and ſent theſe Immortal Men to work their will againſt the Romans. They marched away, and dividing into two Parties, by this ſtratagem intended to circumvent part, at leaſt, of the Roman Forces. And they ſo far ſurpriſed them, that thinking them to be no more than what was contained in one of theſe Parties, they willingly ſuſtained their Charge, till a certain Captain being ſent by Procopius, one of the principal Officers, to make a diſcovery, by good providence from an Hill ſaw in how great danger his Friends now were, and fell upon the Backs of the Perſians, ſo as the Beſiegers were beſieged. The Romans in concluſion utterly defeated this Party, and then fell upon the other, which deſigned to lie as a Reſerve, which they alſo cut in pieces, and thereby proved thoſe Immortals to be but Mortal Men. The Perſian King, when he heard of the ſucceſs of his bold Immortals, received the Meſſage as utterly ignorant of what had paſſed; and told the Meſſenger, that he would not yield to the Romans, but yet embrace the Peace, and demanded wherein he might gratifie him whom he had found Peace made with Perſia. moſt prudent of all the Empire. By this means not only the War which had been undertaken for defence of the Chriſtians was put to an end in the thirteenth Conſulſhip of Honorius, and the tenth of Theodoſius Auguſtus; but the perſecution raiſed againſt them in Perſia utterly ceaſed. Other Writers ſpeak of a Victory obtained over the Perſians on the twelfth of September of the foregoing Year, or the Conſulſhip of Euſtathius and Agricola; and they agree, that in this Conſulſhip of the Emperors, peace was made. Socrates further adds, that for this Victory, in praiſe Lib. 7. c. 21. of the Emperor, many learnedly wrote, and publiſhed their Writings to the World. And amongſt the reſt, the Empreſs her ſelf being an ingenious perſon, wrote a Poem concerning this Argument in Heroick Verſe. But the Soldiers returning from the Expedition, and being to be quartered in Conſtantinople, a queſtion aroſe, whether thoſe perſons, to whom were aſſigned the Towers which belonged the new Wall drawn through their Grounds, and lately mentioned, were to afford Quarter in ſuch caſes as well as others; and the reaſon of the diſpute was, becauſe in the Edict made concerning that matter, they ſeemed only liable to annual Repairs. But Theodoſius now on the third of March declared, That ſuch " L. 13. de Metatis, Cod. Th. Dat. 5. Non. Mart. & L. 7. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Towers ought to be obnoxious to receiving of Soldiers, either returning from " the Expedition, or going to the Wars, on the firſt Floors, or thoſe next to the Ground; neither ought the Poſſeſſors of them to take it ill, ſeeing that private Houſes were alſo ſubject to this burthen. "

83. It concerned him to take care for Soldiers, by the care and endeavours of whom, he and all his Subjects enjoyed in quiet what they had. For this reaſon, the Roman Laws gave them privileges in many things above all other Men; particularly they in their Expeditions might make Teſtaments which ſhould be in force without the uſual and requiſite Solemnities, and though by the Laws all Fathers had their Sons as long as they lived ſo fully in their own power, that, not very much unlike ſlaves, though called Liberi, whatever by their labour and induſtry they got or acquired, they acquired it for their Fathers, who alone had the propriety of it; yet what Soldiers ſaved of their pay, or otherwiſe got as Soldiers, they had propriety in it, and peculiar to themſelves, it being called Caſtrenſe Peculium. Now though the Soldier ſeemed (eſpecially in Martial times) chiefly to deſerve this encouragement; yet afterwards when what was got by War, was found to need preſerving by Civil Ways and Methods of Peace and Laws, it was thought fit alſo to confer like privileges on ſuch Gown-men as did preſerve and govern what the Sword-men had obtained. The Girdle was firſt the Badge and Enſign of Military Men; but at length by degrees it was worn alſo by Palatine Officers, by Magiſtrates of Provinces, and Lawyers who had a Militia of their own, and were ſaid alſo Militare: laſt of all, Eccleſiaſtical Perſons aſſumed the Girdle, to whom though it ſeems now peculiar with us, yet in the Neighbour Nation it is ſtill worn by the Advocates, and the Kings Counſellors, as they are called. And as theſe perſons received the Badge, ſo alſo the Emoluments of the Militia; as the Shadow or Circumſtance, ſo alſo the Subſtance. For, in imitation of the Caſtrenſe Peculium, it was firſt granted to theſe that were Precincti; as to Governors of Provinces, Proconſuls, Preſidents, and all others, who being placed in divers Dignities and Adminiſtrations received Salaries from the Prince, to have and enjoy ſuch ſums of Money, or other advantages they had got in their places to themſelves, ſo as they might diſpoſe of them by Teſtament; and this was called Quaſi Caſtrenſe Peculium.

84. So ſtood matters before the time of Conſtantine, by the ancient Laws and Conſtitutions of Princes. Afterwards that Prince thought fit to grant the privileges of Quaſi Caſtrenſe peculium to all his Palatines. And after ſuch time as the Præfecti Prætorio came to ſuch height, that they were eſteemed in a manner Kings without Purple, the ſame privilege (as ſeveral others to thoſe about them) was granted to the Advocates that pleaded in their Courts. Theodoſius this Year finding things in this poſture, was eaſily inclined to be kind to, and confer on the " Aſſeſſors or Aſſiſtants of Governours of Provinces the ſame Prerogative." But, Auguſtus, though he firſt of all aſſigned Salaries out of the publick Revenues to Preſidents of Provinces; yet took no care for their Aſſiſtants, who were paid by the Magiſtrates out of their own Purſes, till Peſcennius Niger aſſigned them Salaries, to remove the burthen from thoſe they aſſiſted; and that for this reaſon, becauſe a Judge ought neither to take nor give. Theſe Salaries or any other profits they honeſtly made of their places, Theodoſius now thought good to aſcertain to them, " that they might have as much propriety in them, as after the death of their Fa- " thers; and that they might challenge and recover them to their own uſe, as their " own Eſtate." And further, by the ſame Conſtitution directed to Euſtathius the Præfect, he told him, that not only in his Court, but in all other Courts of Juſtice, ſuch as were of that Profeſſion, or were Advocates, and had Fathers living, ſhould after their death obtain, as a Quaſi Caſtrenſe Peculium, whatever they had got by it, or by occaſion of it. Now as by their Profeſſion they got their Fees, or Honoraries, as they were termed; ſo by occaſion of it they received Preſents from the Emperors, which, as New-years Gifts, they were wont to beſtow on deſerving perſons on certain days. But whereas this Conſtitution ſpeaks of their coming to the poſſeſſion of their Peculium, after the death of their Fathers, it hints this to us, that all that had this privilege had not power of making a Will before their Father's death, but only came to the full poſſeſſion afterward of their Peculium; ſo ſtrict and ſevere were Romans in keeping up paternal awe and reverence. But afterwards Juſtinian, to all thoſe who had the Right of Quaſi Caſtrenſe Peculium, gave this Indulgence, alſo of diſpoſing it by Teſtament before the death of their Fathers.

L. 2 de Aſſeſſor. &c. Cod. Th. l. 1. tit. 12. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 10. Cal. Apr.

Theodoſius gratifies Advocates in their Caſtrenſe Peculium.

L 3. de Poſtulando, Cod. Th. lib. 2. tit. 10. L 4. Cod. Juſt. de Advocatis diverſorum judiciorum hinc deſumpta eſt.

85. The common Concern of Learning will not ſuffer us to paſs by another Edict, and the laſt of this Year, directed by Theodoſius to Florentius the Præfect of

Sect. 3.

A. D. 422.

Conſtantinople, in conſideration of the merits of Macrobius, now the Præpoſitus Cubiculi of the Emperor. This Macrobius is rationally thought to have been no other than Aurelius Theodoſius Macrobius, the Author of the Saturnalia; for that this Author lived at this time, all generally agree, and the laſt name of all was wont to be taken in Inſcriptions for the proper name of the Party, as Macrobius is here; the times do very well agree, and in the Title, or Frontiſpiece of his Book he hath given him the Title of Inluſtris, all which do very well ſuit with the wording of this Law. Beſides, the Author of the Saturnalia confeſſeth himſelf born in another Climate than that of Latium; and that therefore the Vein of the Latine Tongue might not always poſſibly aſſiſt him, whereby may be very probably gathered, nay, preſumed that he was a Subject of the Eaſtern Empire, and naturally ſpoke and wrote Greek.' But for his ſake, as the Emperor declareth, (though he was not his Tutor, nor brought him up) did he now make the Præpoſitus Cubiculi equal with the three ſuperior Dignities of Præfectus Prætorio, Præfectus Urbis, and Magiſter Militum (as we have formerly ſaid in our Apparatus, or view " of the Polity of the Empire) though formerly he was below the Conſiſtorian Comites. Of theſe four, each ſhould take place as he was preferred, whether in ſaluting (or " adoring) the Prince of which we have formerly written, or in ſolemn Feaſts and " Meetings as theſe belonging to the Conſuls, Aſſemblies of the Provinces, or " Salutings of the Judges, whom ſome had the privilege to kiſs. But this is on con- " dition, that they be in their proper Habit, or the accuſtomed Dreſs: for to every Dignity were Habits and Ornaments appropriate, without which, whoever came to any ſolemn Aſſembly, was neither fit, nor wont to be admitted, eſpecially in the preſence of the Prince.

Lib. 1. præf. pag. 161. Edit Lugduni Batavorum.

L. un. de Præpoſitis ſacri cubiculi, Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 8.

L. 1. Cod. Juſt. hinc interpolata eſt, reſecta poſteriore parte. Dat. 8. Id. Novemb.

A. D. 423.

Aſclepiodoto & Mariniano Coſſ.

86. In the Faſti or Regiſters of the Year CCCCXXIII, Aſclepiodotus and Marinianus are found to have obtained the Dignity of Conſuls. Honorius ſtill continued his Abode at Ravenna, and Theodoſius ſtaid at Conſtantinople till the Month of Auguſt, and then removed to Eudoxiopolis for ſome time. While he continued at Conſtantinople at the beginning of the Year, he conſidered how Countrymen were obliged by the Laws to provide Proviſions for his Palatine Servants, or Money in lieu of them, which certain Officers being ſent to exact, very much oppreſſed the People. Therefore he gave order to Aſclepiodotus the Præfectus Prætorio, " as well as Conſul, that to prevent this oppreſſion, he ſhould cauſe theſe Provi- " ſions to be valued, and taxed in Money, as thoſe of the Soldiers were wont to be. " And becauſe many now adays refuſed to contribute toward the repairing of Bridges, pretending it was a ſordid Employment, or Contribution, he declared to the ſaid Aſclepiodotus, that it ſhould not be taken for ſordid, being ſuch, as to- " gether with the making of High-ways were dedicated by Inſcriptions, even of " great Princes. Therefore would he not permit that any ſort of perſons ſhould re- " fuſe to contribute to theſe Repairs, no not his own Houſes, or theſe belonging to " his Patrimony, nor the venerable Churches. And he commands the Prefect, " that to the end that High-ways be conveniently looked to, as in ancient times; " this Law ſhall be intimated to the Judges of all Provinces, without any reſpect " had to any Reverence or Dignity. " The Perſians and other Enemies were at preſent, quiet; but none could tell how long they would ſo continue; and therefore as for the publick ſecurity, it was requiſite that Bridges and Highways ſhould be kept in repair, ſo, more eſpecially that the Borders ſhould be well defended. To this end many Caſtles, as we have ſaid, were placed upon them, and the Grounds belonging to them were of ancient times aſſigned over to the Soldiers belonging to theſe Borders and Caſtles. But alſo at this time private Men, or Soldiers who did not belong to the Caſtles and Borders, by ſome means or other got theſe Lands into their poſſeſſion. To reform which Abuſe, he now declared, That ſuch perſons " found upon them ſhould both forfeit their lives, and undergo the loſs of all their " Eſtates. " And this he ſignified to Aſclepiodotus by the Title of Præfectus Prætorio, and Ordinary Conſul.

Theodoſius ſtill redreſſeth Grievances.

L. 25. de Erogatione militaris Annonæ & L. 15. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 6. Cal. Mart.

L. ult. de Itinere muniendo, Cod. Th. & L. 4. Cod. Juſt. de priv. dom. Aug. & L. 7. de ſacris Eccleſiis, Dat. 15. Cal. Mart.

Provides for the ſtrength of the Borders.

L. ult. de terris limitaneis, Cod. Th. & L 2. Cod. Juſt. de fundis limitrophis, Dat. Non. Mart. Aſclepiodoto P. F. P. & Conſ. ordinario.

87. Hereby he did Juſtice to, and obliged theſe Soldiers whom it moſt concerned him to gratifie; and by another Edict directed to the ſame perſon much about the ſame time, he could not but pleaſe the beſt and moſt ancient Military Men; making a diſtinction betwixt them and the Juniors, or ordinary ſort. For whereas of late years it had been the cuſtom for the Provincials, inſtead of Soldiers Cloaths, to pay Gold into the Emperor's Treaſury, he now orders Aſclepiodotus to pay of this whole Receit, five parts to his moſt valiant Soldiers, as he calls them, and the " ſixth to the Gynæciarii (whoſe work it was to make Cloaths) wherewith they in "

L. 5. de Militari veſte, Cod. Th. & L. ult. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 7. Id. Mart.

ſpecie

Gratifies his old Soldiers.

ſpecie ſhould furniſh thoſe he terms Juniores (Tirones) and Gregarii." This he did, becauſe he had more belief of the care and prudence of his beſt Men, than of the freſh-water and Gregarious Soldiers, who were not to be truſted with Money, being young, raw and fooliſh in ſuch caſes. Yet he had more confidence in Soldiers, than he had in ſome Civil Officers at this time, if we may call them Officers. There were, as ſeldom wanted, great complaints now againſt ſuch as attended the Governors of Provinces, and by name, againſt thoſe they called Domeſtici and Cancellarii, which grew ſo continual and importunate, that he expreſly forbade, That any Judges ſhould carry ſuch with them into their Provinces, or " receive any commended to them for that Name and Employment, under pain of " Infamy, and a Confiſcation of Eſtate. But that by care of the Primates of the " Office, the Cancellarii, or Chancellors, ſhould be choſen, (out of the Body of " the Officials) and placed with the ſaid Governours; but ſo as for three years " they ſhould not depart out of the Provinces, after their attendance expired, that " they might be expoſed to the Accuſations of the Provincials, if need ſhould be, " and to detect the faults or corruptions of the Judges, and that by being lyable to " the Queſtion or Torture."

L.3.de Aſſeſſo. rib.Domeſt. & Cancellar. Cod. Th.lib. 1.tit. 12. & L. 8. Cod.Juſt. eod. tit.Dat.prid. Cal.Jan.

88. Theſe Domeſtici were a ſort of Attendants on the Judges, even Military as the Duces, as alſo on the Principes of the Agentes in Rebus, not for the diſpatching of publick, but private Acts. And there were many things common to them with the Aſſeſſors. Both of them were forbidden to buy, or receive any thing by way of free gift, in the Province of that Magiſtrate to whom they belonged. They were both prohibited to marry any living in that Province. The Thefts or Rapines of both were to be reſtored four-fold. But they were to be choſen according to this Law, whereas the Magiſtrates themſelves might chuſe their Aſſeſſors; only the Domeſtici belonging to the Princeps Agentum in Rebus, was choſen by the Prince himſelf, and might twice execute the Office, which to the other was unlawful. The Cancellarii, or Chancellors, ſo called in this Law, were, as originally, ſo now, of mean condition or quality. It is evident from Agathias and Caſſiodorus, that they had their Name from the Cancelli, Latices, or through pierced and carved Walls and Doors, of which in the Secretaria or Courts of the Judges they had the care. For beſides the Velum or Hanging in theſe Secretoria, there were ſuch Partitions of Wood to keep off the people, through which, when occaſion was, the multitude might look, and if the caſe required it, the Velum only drawn, would intercept their view. Such was their Employment, as Caſſiodorus deſcribes it, to which other Authors ſufficiently atteſt. As they were entruſted with the Secrets of the Magiſtrates, by degrees, and in proceſs of time they were employed in greater matters, than to keep the Doors, and by little and little their Name or Title came to be given to the greateſt Officers of State, after the decay of the Weſtern Empire, who, as aſhamed of the original of the word, were willing to admit another derivation, not from the Cancelli, but a Cancellando; from cancelling what was done amiſs by Princes after they had looked over their Acts and Writings, and giving order in what was to be done. Indeed Cancelling (Cancellare) is uſed in the Art of regulating Bounds and Limits of Grounds, ſo as to delineate or draw lines oblique and tranſverſe; and ſo in cancelling or blotting out Writings, the pen is wont to be ſo carefully carried, as to make ſuch Shapes and Images of Lines as were in carved Walls or Doors, or the Cancelli. But whether ſo great Officers of State could probably receive their name from undoing, rather than doing, from obliterating rather than ordaining, let thoſe conſider who think it worth their while to amuſe themſelves in the Inquiry.

Vide Paratitlon hujus tit. & Goth. in h. l.

Var. l. 11. ep. 6.

Honorius in his laſt Year makes Acts of Grace in behalf of Provincials.

89. This was the laſt Year of Honorius, and he began it well by amplifying an Indulgence given by him to the Urbicarian Regions. He had formerly granted a pardon throughout theſe Regions for all Arrears due for ſuch Annonæ, or ſuch Proviſions as were wont to be paid (for maintenance of Soldiers, and other perſons, the ſervice of whom was neceſſary to the Common-wealth) to the Receit of the Illuſtrious, the Præfectus Prætorio. Now he thought fit to extend it to what " was payable to his two great Treaſurers themſelves, either Largitionum, or Rei " privatæ; for he would not have ſuch Lands as were holden in the way of the Em- " phyteuſis to be excepted from this Indulgence." Now take notice, that theſe Annonæ which were paid throughout all the Provinces of courſe, are by all means to be diſtinguiſhed from theſe Annonæ which were paid in for the Proviſions of the " Emperor's own Houſe, by thoſe Provinces of Italy which had the name of Annonaria, upon that occaſion. This Conſtitution is ſingular, and alone in this, that at the foot of it it is ſaid to be Regeſta on the eighth of February, being directed to Rufinus, now Comes Sacrarum Largitionum. But, thereby is no more meant than this, that it was entred or recorded in the Books of the ſaid Comes, or referred or reduced into his Geſta; which, from theſe and other References, came to be called Regiſtra or Regiſtres, as now they are; though in thoſe days, whereof we write, the Books of the great Officers as well Military as Civil, as of the Scribes of the City of Rome were called Regeſta, as they that entred the Edicts, or other matters, were thence named Regerendarii. He had, as was convenient, ſtill a regard to the maintenance of Military Men; and therefore, whereas, upon the Borders, Grounds or Lands had been, by the Emperor's Appointment, aſſigned over to Soldiers, he confirmed to them the Dominion of ſuch as they had in “ that manner obtained; and, except any of their Fellow Soldiers had been before “ them, or conſigned over the Poſſeſſion of the ſaid Grounds to other Perſons, he “ confirmed them in the Poſſeſſion. And, he concludes his Sanction with ſuch expreſſions “ as are ſcarcely Chriſtian; however, his Quæſtor found them amongſt “ his Records: that, If any, after this Definition of his Numen, ſhould ſieze upon “ ſuch Grounds as were comprehended in the preſent Form of his Oracle, he ſhould “ incurr a Mulct of twenty pounds of Gold. “

L.14.de Indulgentiis Debitorum, Cod.Th. Regeſta 6.Id. Febr. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

L.1.de Rei Vendicatione, lib.2. tit.23. Dat.5. Cal.Mart. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

And of Soldiers upon the Limits.

90. But ſuch diſputes there were about thoſe Grounds which he and his Predeceſſors had granted, and ſo ill uſe made of them for the advantage of the Government, that, at this time, he was urged much by thoſe about him to paſs an Act of Reſumption, and take them again into his own hands. He was ſo generous, as “ utterly to reject their motion, however the dangerous condition of the times “ might have perſwaded him to it: nay, he became ſo far reſolved againſt this practice, “ as to confirm to the Owners what had formerly been given and granted to “ them. But he thought it prudence, withal to ordain, that, in certain caſes, Relief “ ſhould be granted from thoſe Tenants or Poſſeſſors, when extreme neceſſity “ of Affairs, preſſed unto the State. Yet, if a perſon had not enjoyed ſuch Lands “ the ſpace of five years, he ſhould no way be forced to ſuch Contribution. If he “ had enjoyed them above five years, but not ten; then he ſhould only pay one years “ Penſion: but, if ten, and more; then only that of two years. This was thought “ an Act of great Moderation, conſidering what was wont to be practiſed in the “ like ſort. The Judge that ſhall ordain, and him that ſhall exact more than this, “ he fines at ſixty pounds of Gold. And all the Palatine Officers of Trygetius, the “ Comes Rei Privatæ, to whom he directs the Edict, he ſubjects to the ſame penalty, “ to whatſoever of his Scrinia they belonged; for he had four Scrinia, viz. Beneficiorum, “ Rationum, Securitatum and Largitionum Privatarum. And, not only “ ſubjects them to the ſame Mulct, but alſo, deprives the Primates of the ſeveral Offices “ of their Girdles: and, in concluſion, he commands, that, to cut off all fear “ from the Provincials, all the Books of Regiſters, wherein greater Summs of the “ Collation were allotted, ſhall be burnt; as alſo, ſuch perſons as ſhall dare to “ produce any Teſtimonies of ſuch Collation. “

L.4.de Collatione Donatarum, Cod.Th.P.P. in foro Trajani, 14. Cal.Jun.

Concerning the manner of proceeding in Criminal Cauſes.

91. Being now ready to leave the World, the laſt thing he did in things of this nature, was to take order, as much as in him lay, that other perſons ſhould not be forced to leave it before their time, or without a due Courſe of Juſtice. For this purpoſe he publiſhed a large Conſtitution concerning the manner of proceeding in Criminal Cauſes, and directed it to the Conſuls, Prætors, Tribuni Plebis and his Senate; to which, as an Oration, it is principally directed; and, not without reaſon; for, in the firſt place, for the ſecurity of perſons of that Order, it confirms the Law made by Gratian nigh fifty years before, concerning the Quinquevirale Judicium, or the Tryal of Senators by five perſons: to which he declares, that Theſe five perſons ſhall be choſen by lot, and not deſignedly, or picked out; both becauſe “ he thinks that none can be taken amiſs out of ſo noble an Aſſembly, which “ conſiſted of the greateſt Men, for Worth and Eſtates, of all the Empire; and eſpecially, “ that there may be no ſuſpition of partiality. “ But, for the preſervation of the Lives and Eſtates of others, he farther reinforced the ancient Laws. So as he that was accuſed ſhould not therefore be received into the number of guilty “ perſons; much leſs be condemned, or committed to cuſtody. But, that the Accuſer, “ being preſent, ſhould make the uſual Inſcription before the Judge, of ſubmitting “ to the ſame puniſhment; and, till the Tryal was over, kept in cuſtody as “ well as the perſon he accuſed: but yet, according to his Quality, the Laws making “ diſtinction herein, as to Free Cuſtody, and Confinement, as we have formerly “ ſeen. But, in the next place, he declareth, that No Credit ſhall be given to any “ “ ny one, who, being examined by Torture, and therein confeſſing, as to himſelf, “ accuſeth other perſons. This had been formerly Law in part; and, for this reaſon, “ becauſe he that already deſpaired of his own life, ſhould not bring into danger “ the lives of other Men: but this Emperor enforceth it upon this further Conſideration; “ that, in Torture, Perſons being deſperate, commonly accuſe others; “ that, by naming greater than themſelves, they may get ſome favour, and evade “ puniſhment; or to eaſe themſelves, by procuring their Enemies to partake with “ them in miſery and torment. For this reaſon he will have no faith given to ſuch “ perſons, although they produce Commonitories, or ſecret Mandates from their “ Aſſociates whom they accuſe. “

L.ult. de Juriſdict.&c.Dat.8. Id.Aug. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L.ult.d. Accuſationibus, &c. Cod.Th.& L.17. Cod.Juſt.de Accuſationibus, & L.ult.de Calumniatoribus.

Concerning the Gratitude of Freed Men toward their [illegible]

92. So much did the ancient Romans attribute to Modeſty and Gratitude, that Liberti, or who, being formerly Slaves, had been made free, through the goodneſs and bounty of their Lords, were obliged to demean themſelves thankfully, and with reſpect to them; ſo that, if they offered them any conſiderable Offence or Injury, they had an Action againſt them, called Actio Ingrati; whereby they recovered them again to their former Bondage and Slavery. Conſtantine the Great had reinforced and quickened the Law, as to Ingratitude againſt Patrons themſelves. But now Honorius farther extends the penalties of it to that againſt their Heirs; and that in ſuch terms, that theſe ſhould not only not be heard if “ they accuſed their former Lords, but be bound to ſhew the ſame reverence to the “ Heirs, as to the Manumittors themſelves; and, that the Action ſhould as well “ belong to them as to the Patrons; and if the Liberti preſumed to accuſe them, “ they ſhould be obnoxious to the ſame puniſhment, as if they had accuſed their “ Patrons, as to any Crime but that of High Treaſon. Now, as to Heirs, Honorius “ underſtood all others, as well as Sons. Valentinian the third afterward thought fit to take from them all indifferently, except the Patron, the Action of Ingrateful, and leave them to Common Law, or that of Injuries; but, as to Accuſations, he diſtinguiſhed betwixt the Children of the Patrons, and their Remote or Foreign Heirs; forbidding only that they ſhould againſt them bear Teſtimony in any matter. So, of old, by vertue of the Law, Ælia Sextia, it was only permitted to Sons, or next Heirs, to accuſe their Father's Libertus of Ingratitude, although the Libertus could not implead any remote Heir of his Patron, without an Edict firſt obtained to enable him. But, as to what is ſaid concerning Accuſations, the caſe of High Treaſon is to be excepted. In others, Liberti had been wont to be produced againſt their Patrons. “ But Honorius, by another Branch of the ſame Conſtitution, expreſly forbids that they either voluntarily impeach “ them, or be produced as Witneſſes againſt them. “

L.L.1.2. de Libertis de Eorum Liberis, Cod.Th. lib.4.tit.11.& L.3.Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.

L.ult. Ne præter crimen Majeſtatis,&c.Cod.Th. & L.12. Cod. Juſt. de Teſtib.

93. This year ſome unfortunate differences fell out betwixt him and his Siſter Placidia, which flew to that height, uncertain it is upon what occaſion, that being ſuſpected by him for inviting Enemies into the Empire, ſhe deſired leave to depart with her two Children, Valentinian and Honoria, into the Eaſt, and was kindly received by her Nephew Theodoſius, though formerly he refuſed to own Conſtantius, her Husband, for Emperor. Not long after their leaving of the Weſt, Honorius, her Brother, left this World, dying in the Autumn of a Dropſie; though, as to the day, Writers do ſomething differ; ſome aſſigning the fifteenth of Auguſt, others the twenty ſeventh: ſome ſay, he died at Rome, and was buried at St. Peters, in the one and thirtieth year of his Reign, if we reckon from the time he was made Auguſtus by his Father, whom he outlived about twenty eight years, and about ſeven months; and lived, in all, about thirty nine. His Character is various, according to the Humours and Affections of perſons. The Greek Hiſtorians, or thoſe that wrote of the Byzantine Empire eſpecially, cannot afford him one good word. Thoſe that lived in his own time commend him for his Conſtancy in the Orthodox Chriſtian Religion, and eſteem his good ſucceſs as given upon that Account. And indeed, his Succeſs was rare againſt the Barbarians and Uſurpers of his time; of whom, by his Captains, he had the better at laſt: and no Chriſtian Emperor is found to have, by his Officers, extinguiſhed more Rebellions. And, though he himſelf did not fight, yet he had ſo much courage as to oppoſe and puniſh his greateſt Captains when offending; nay, even Stilicho, his Father in Law, whom he neither ſpared, nor his Family. Yet however, his Reign was unfortunate, in that Rome was firſt of now all taken by the Goths; the Huns invaded Pannonia; the Vandals, Alans, and Suevi pierced into Spain; and the Goths, having formerly invaded that Country, fixed in Gall; where alſo, the Burgundians ſeated themſelves.

Caſſiod. in Chron.

Honorius dieth.

His Character.

94. Many Laws there are in the Code of Juſtinian, which bear his Name as well

Some Laws made in his time without Note of time.

as that of Theodoſius, but without any Characteriſtical Note of Conſuls, or day, or month. One of theſe we cannot but take notice of, as made in favour of Illuſtrious Perſons, and reſpect to their Dignity. This excuſeth them from giving in Bonds, or putting in Bail, either in a Civil or Criminal Action; but requires of them a Juratory Caution or Oath: which, if they neglect, and, contrary to the ſaid Oath, they and their Proctors be abſent; in Civil Matters the Judge ſhall proceed according to Law; that is, to put the Plaintiffs into Poſſeſſion. In Criminal Cauſes they ſhall be denied all Privileges ariſing from their Dignity, as perjured perſons, and left to what the Law ordains for other perſons in ſuch caſes. But, except the Sentence of the Judge be paſſed in Writing, they ſhall not be bound to any Appearance.“ For, the Wiſdom of theſe Times thought fit, that Sentences ſhould be read or recited out of a Writing, as thereby more ſolemn and certain, and not ſubject to the extraordinary Extravagance of a Judge. That this was made by Honorius we cannot ſay; but the Subject of another perſwades us that it was ordained for his Weſtern Part of the Empire, which ſtood moſt in need of Soldiers; and conſequently, had the greateſt reaſon to ſee that they ſhould not be defrauded of their Proviſions. In order to this the Emperors ordain, that, If their Corn and Proviſions be drawn off to ſerve the ends of others, ſuch as traffick for them, if of greater Quality, ſhall undergo Proſcription with the loſs of all their Goods; and if of meaner condition, ſhall forfeit their very Lives.“

L.17.de Dignitatibus, Cod. Juſt.lib.12.tit.1.

L.4.Quæ res venire non poſſunt. &c. Cod.Juſt. lib.4.tit.40.

SECT. IV.

The Fourth Step to the Ruin of the Empire in the Weſt.

From the Death of Honorius, and the Government of Placidia and her Son, to the Irruption of Attila and the Huns into the Empire.

Containing the ſpace of Nineteen Years.

John, the late Præfectus Prætorio, uſurps.

1. Before Honorius his death, Placidia and her Children, as we ſaid, upon ſome Miſunderſtandings, had betaken themſelves to Conſtantinople. Honorius left no Children to ſucceed him, nor deſigned any other to the Supreme Dignity before his death: which advantage ſo far encouraged one John, a Man of obſcure Original, but Præfectus Prætorio, as we have ſeen, in the foregoing year, who had formerly ſerved as Principal of the Notaries or Scribes, as to take upon him the Imperial Title. He ſent away preſently his Ambaſſadors, as he would have them accounted, to Theodoſius, to deſire that he would own and declare him Emperor. Theodoſius had, before this, received the News of his Uncles death, but, for urgent reaſons, concealed it, as Socrates relates, till he had ſent a Power of Men to Salonæ, a City of Dalmatia, to ſecure the Borders of the Eaſtern Empire, and repreſs any that ſhould uſurp or be tumultuous in any of theſe Quarters. Cedrenus writes, that, upon the report of Honorius his death, there was a Tumult at Conſtantinople, which continued ſix days together: he gives us no reaſon or occaſion of it, but we may ſuppoſe it in favour to Placidia and her Children. At firſt Theodoſius did not much regard the Uſurpation of John, as judging him a Man altogether inconſiderable. But, when he ſaw him ſo bold as to ſend to him, and conſidered the greatneſs of his Demands, he was much incenſed; and, treating his Meſſengers very roughly, ſent them away with as unpleaſing an

Lib.7.c.23.

A. D. 423.

Anſwer. John was not much concerned at the report of it, being encouraged by two notable Men for Wiſdom and Valour; by the Aſſiſtance of whom he had taken the Imperial Habit. The one of theſe was Caſtinus, not long ſince returned out of Spain, and deſigned Conſul for the following year. The other Ætius, the Son of one Gaudentius, born in Scythia; who arrived at the Dignity of Magiſter Militum, and married an Italian Lady, Noble and Rich. Caſtinus he made Magiſter Militum; and, on Ætius, who had been Hoſtage both with Alarich and the Huns, and afterward was raiſed to be Comes Domeſticorum, he conferred the Honour of Cura Palatii. Him he ſent into Pannonia, with a great Summ of Gold, to purchaſe the Favour and Aſſiſtance of the Huns, with the Commanders of whom he was familiar; with farther Inſtructions, that if the Forces of Theodoſius ſhould march for Italy, he, with his Troops raiſed out of that fierce Nation, ſhould fall upon their Rear, while he himſelf charged them in the Front.

A. D. 424. Victore, Conſ.

Iidem. Olympiodorus apud Photium.

Theodoſius ſends Placidia and Valentinian to diſpoſſeſs him.

2. For the Year of our Lord CCCCXXIV, Victor was Conſul, and Caſtinus rather deſigned than really ſuch, being the chief Miniſter of the Uſurper. Theodoſius, however he had conceived prejudice againſt Conſtantius; yet now, when a Stranger and Uſurper interpoſed, was concerned for his own Fleſh and Blood: and, having treated the Meſſengers of John in a very diſobliging manner (Socrates ſaith, by committing them to Priſon; Philoſtorgius, by baniſhing them into Propontis:) he had ſo far provoked the Tyrant, that there was no going back; and therefore, he reſolved to aſſiſt his Aunt, and Couſin Valentinian, as far as poſſible. On her he conferred the Dignity of Auguſta, and on him that of Nobiliſſimus (or rather, confirmed what had been done by his Uncle Honorius) and ſent them away to Theſſalonica, in order to proſecuting the War againſt John; which he committed to the care and conduct of Ardaburius, and Aſpar, his Son; with whom Olympiodorus joyneth Candidianus. After they were come to Theſſalonica, he ſent thither Helio, the Magiſter Officiorum; who put upon Valentinian the Robe of Cæſar, and thereby inveſted him with that Dignity when he was not now above five years of Age. Ardaburius, to diſcharge his Truſt, brought them to Salonæ: and there adviſing about the beſt Courſe that was to be taken, he himſelf reſolved, with a great part of the Forces, to go by Sea to Ravenna, and fall upon John altogether unprepared; appointing Aſpar, his Son, to be a Convoy to Placidia and Valentinian, by Land, thither. And all things, at firſt, ſeemed to proſper and encourage them. But Ardaburius was, by contrary Winds, driven upon the Coaſts of Italy, and forced to land in that place; where he was preſently taken by the Soldiers of John, and carried to his Preſence. He being a Man, as Procopius tells you, of a mild diſpoſition, inſomuch, that he put no body to death during his Uſurpation; or, as others ſay, out of deſire to come to an Amicable Compoſure, kept him in free Cuſtody, but treated him in an honourable manner; as deſigning, by his means, to procure a Peace. His Son Aſpar had better fortune; and, with his Charge, Placidia and Valentinian arrived at Aquileia; which, having ſurprized, they fortified: and, being ignorant of what had paſſed, expected to receive advantage from the Attempts of Ardaburius.

Socr. lib. 7. c. 23.

Vandal. lib. 1.

Theodoſius provides for the maintenance of the Bath of Zeuxippus.

3. Theodoſius, though he had his hands full this year, in providing for the Recovery of the Weſt, yet employed his Quæſtor in ſome things which he conceived would contribute to the welfare and advantage of his own Diſtrict. For the maintenance of that ancient Bath in Conſtantinople, called the Bath of Zeuxippus, which ſerved, not only the Citizens, but Soldiers; he ordained, that, Such Shops as were built in the Porticus, or Galleries about it, ſhould pay their Rent toward the “ maintaining of the ſaid Baths with Lights, and keeping up the Fabrick. “ Which Rent had, it ſeems, formerly been otherwiſe employed by the Curators of publick Works, or the Curators of the Commonwealth. As we find that about Churches, Books and other things relating to the Divine Worſhip, have been, and are ſtill wont to be ſold; ſo, doubtleſs, in theſe Porticus's, ſuch Materials as tended to promote waſhing or cleanſing of the Body. This Edict was directed to Severinus, Præfect of the City, on the ninth of January: and ſix days after, as if the Conſpiracy of John had made the Emperor very credulous and ſuſpitious, he ſent another to Maximinus, his Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, whereby He forbad the uſe of Purple “ Cloaths made of Silk; whether all of that Colour, or the Ground, or the Em- “ broidery only, as appertaining to him and his Family alone. And he commands, “ that whoever have ſuch in their Houſes, bring them in to the Treaſury, upon pain “ uſually undergone by Traitors. “ The Prohibition is large, All Perſons of what Sex, Dignity, Art, Profeſſion or Linage ſoever, being inhibited. Indeed, Julius Cæſar had

L. 52. de operib. publ. Cod. Th. & L. 19. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 5. Id. Jan.

L. 3. de Veſtibus Holoveris, Cod. Th. & L. 4. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 17. Cal. Feb

Holovera vox Hibrida.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 424.

Groſphe non Gemmis neque purpura venale nec auro.
—te his Afro Murice tinctæ Veſtiunt lanæ, Carm. lib. 2. od. 16.

Βασίλεια ἀπόρφυρος.

had limited the uſe of Purple (which, in thoſe days, was valued with Pearl and Gold) to Women in his time, which Nero expreſly forbad; and, though Aurelian did in part permit it, yet afterward it was again prohibited to them. Stage-players alſo ſeem to have uſurped the uſe of this Colour: and, if Horace does not mightily play the Poet, his Friend Groſphus was cloathed with Wool which had received a double Tincture from the Fiſh Murex. However, the Emperors began, by degrees, to appropriate this Dye to themſelves; in ſo much that though, if any one might have worn it, the Præfecti Prætorio might have had that privilege; yet, when the utmoſt that could be, was ſpoken of them, their Command was termed a Kingdom, or Kingly Power, without Purple.

Conſtantinople grown burthenſome to the Neighbour Countries.

l.4. de Spectaculis, Cod. Th. Dat. 10. Cal. Maii, Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut localis & temporaria.

4. Conſtantinople, by this time, was grown ſo great, that it was become a great Oppreſſion to the Neighbour Countries. This was not only in matters relating to the ſubſiſtence of the Inhabitants, but to their very Sports and Paſtimes. Of this Iſidore, the Præfect of Illyricum, ſent up a Complaint to Theodoſius; particularly, how the Curiales of the ancient and famous Delphos were undone by being bound to contribute to the finding of Shows and Paſtimes in that now Queen of the Eaſtern World. Indeed, other principal Cities had uſurped in this manner, as we have formerly ſeen in Carthage, whither the Prieſts of other Cities were wont to flock at the uſual Solemnities. But, as that practice was forbidden, ſo now Theodoſius gave in charge to Iſidore, that, "By his Precepts he ſhould give notice to all the Cities and Judges of Illyricum, that no Man ſhould be bound to contribute towards the Spectacula, or Shows of Conſtantinople (which, in imitation of Rome, the height of which ſhe emulated, he calls Urbs Æterna) but, every one be bound to diſcharge the Duties only of his own City, according to the ſtrength of his Eſtate. And this he enacts, under ſevere penalties to be undergone, not only by ſuch as ſhould exact ſuch performances, but alſo by the ordinary Governors of Provinces." Now, we may remember that the Præfectſhip of Illyricum the Eaſtern had two Dioceſſes included in it, viz. Macedonia and Dacia. In Macedonia were ſeven Provinces, in Dacia five; and, of the ſeven, Achaia was one, in which was the City Delphos; which poſſibly, took this Contribution the worſe, becauſe ſhe her ſelf had formerly had the Games Pythia celebrated in her Precincts, as Nemea were at Argos. Within a few days after, Theodoſius thought fit to reduce the Charge and Cuſtody of the leſſer Laterculum (of which formerly) to its ancient Office. It formerly had belonged to the Quæſtor, but had been, of late time, removed to the Office of Magiſter Officiorum. Now, by two ſeveral Edicts, as we at preſent find them, the Emperor ſignified his pleaſure, both to Saluſt, the Quæſtor, and Helio, the Comes and Magiſter Officiorum; that, "The Charge of the ſaid leſſer Laterculum ſhould belong to the Quæſtor, ſo as the names of all Præfects, Tribunes and the Præpoſiti Caſtrorum ſhould be ſent up from the Scrinium Memoriæ, and entred by his appointment, according to the ancient cuſtom."

He reſtores the leſſer Laterculum to the Quæſtor.

L.L. 1, 2. de Offi. Quæſtoris, Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit.

A. D. 425.

5. For the Year CCCCXXV, Theodoſius being Conſul the eleventh time, took to him Valentinian Cæſar for his Colleague. The firſt five months of the year he continued at Conſtantinople, with great deſire to hear of the good ſucceſs of his Arms in the Weſtern Countries. John, the Uſurper, had, without much difficulty, drawn them all into ſubjection, except Africk; which he alſo attempted, and ſent over an Army to get it by force into his power: but ſuch reſiſtance was made by Boniface (as the Letters betwixt him and St. Auguſtine, concerning this very matter, do teſtifie) that all his Attempts were thereby fruſtrated. But his hopes, as we ſaid, were very great, that, by Interceſſion of his Priſoner Ardaburius, the whole Affair would be compoſed, and he ſhould enjoy in Peace what he ſo eaſily had obtained. Ardaburius had no ſuch intention; but, finding him ſecure and negligent, and pleaſing himſelf with this conceit, took the opportunity, as Philoſtorgius related, to ingratiate himſelf with certain Officers he had put out of Command, and thereby diſobliged; and he ſent word to Aſpar, his Son, that, if he would come down with his Forces, there was no doubt but he might eaſily ſurprize the Tyrant, and do his buſineſs. Aſpar was not backward to make uſe of the Advantage, but came ſpeedily with his Horſe, and found the Gate of Ravenna, where John then lay, open, as if his coming had been welcome and expected; and, after a little oppoſition made, as little it muſt be in ſuch a Surprize and Conſternation, he eaſily took him, and ſent him away to Placidia and Valentinian: yet he adds, that he was betrayed by thoſe that were about him, to which the Surprize and Affright they were in, might eaſily contribute. Socrates relates, that an Angel conducted Aſpar through the Fens ſuch a way as formerly had not been known. But to ſo quick an end came this Uſurpation, which was the more welcome to Placidia and her Son, if what Olympiodorus wrote be true; that, after the taking of Ardabarius, Aſpar and they remained in great ſorrow and diſtreſs, and even deſpaired of their Fortunes at Aquileia, till Candidianus beſtirred himſelf, and took in many Towns; by whoſe Endeavours and Succeſs, a foundation was laid for that chearfulneſs which afterward followed.

John the Uſurper taken.

Is put to death

6. Placidia, though a Woman of very good Parts, yet in Government, ſhewed very much of that Sex and Conſtitution. At the ſight of John ſhe fell into a paſſion, and preſently commanded his Right Hand to be ſtricken off; and afterward, that he ſhould be beheaded. Procopius tells us, that, having his Hand cut off, he was ſet upon an Aſs, and led through the Cirque at Aquileia; where he was conſtrained to hear many things ſaid upon the Stage, and to ſuffer many Abuſes; and at laſt, was put to death: A Man, he tells you, of a mild Diſpoſition, of very good Intellectuals, one that knew how to value Vertue according to its deſert, and in his Affairs uſed Temper and Moderation. However, ſuch end have all Uſurpers as he arrived at, after he had poſſeſſed the Purple eighteen Months. As his Sorrow afforded matter of Rejoycing and Triumph to Placidia, ſo her Nephew Theodoſius could not but be well pleaſed with the occaſion of it, though the Effects of his Joy put him upon better thoughts than going to the Theatre. Indeed, he was there when the News came to him; but (Socrates is our Author) having received the Meſſage, he told the people, that it now became them to quit thoſe Sports, and go to another place. And to the Church they went, where they piouſly gave thanks to God for the Defeat of the Tyrant, which they aſcribed to his Hand. Nay, ſo much influence hath the Example of a Prince upon his Subjects, that, as he delivers the Circumſtances, they ſang Praiſes with him as they went through the Cirque, continued all the day at Church, and the whole City ſeemed to reſemble but one Temple. But, notwithſtanding this rejoycing for the death of the Tyrant, there was more work behind for any thing they could know. For, Ætius was ſtill alive, and in Arms when John was taken; and, with a ſtrong Body of ſixty thouſand Huns, after three days, came, and gave Battel to Aſpar. And violent and bloody was the Fight, till he underſtood of John's Captivity, which put him upon a reſolution to contend no farther; and, having made an Agreement with Aſpar, he removed the Huns, that they might not oppreſs Italy. When all was over, Theodoſius was reſolved to make a Progreſs into the Weſt, to conferr on Valentinian the Imperial Enſigns. And he went as far as Theſſalonica; but there falling ill, he was conſtrained to return; but ſent an Imperial Crown by Helio the Patrician, who ſet it on the head of Valentinian, being now removed to Rome by the way of Ravenna, on the three and twentieth of October.

Ætius, his Captain, ſubmits.

Socr.lib.7.c.24

Valentinian Cæſar made Emperor.

7. The new Emperor or his Miniſters, before this, had remembred well that beſt Axiom in Government, A Jove Principium. For while he was, as yet, but Cæſar, he introduced his Authority with matters concerning Religion, the deſign being to remove thoſe Advantages the Uſurper had given to Hereticks; of which we ſhall inſiſt in another place. And Theodoſius ſeems to have been as well inclined towards Charity and Equity, conſidering how, in theſe dangerous times, the Eſtates of Perſons were wont to be confiſcated. Therefore he forbad all Judges, except thoſe that were placed in the higheſt Power, though they had Authority to “ judge both concerning Life and Death (though they had Merum Imperium) to “ proſcribe any perſon without conſulting the Emperor himſelf, or to diſpoſe of his “ Patrimony. “ And now it came into his mind, or he was prompted to it, to encourage the Profeſſion of the Liberal Arts and Studies at Conſtantinople. He reſolved to make a publick School, conſiſting of ſo many Profeſſors; or what we ſince call an Academy or Univerſity. But he found many of theſe in one. He found a confuſion upon this Account; there being many Maſters that had their ſeveral Companies of Scholars, who, as ever in ſuch caſes, envying and maligning one another, there was danger that even the publick Peace ſhould be diſturbed. For, of old time, when Learning was not ſo generally encouraged, Profeſſors of Rhetorick were wont to have their ſeveral Cells, or private places to teach in, in Rome, and other places: and this was permitted generally, till Theodoſius conſidered, that it was beſt to reduce the Profeſſion of all Liberal Arts into one Body. He was informed how many taught privately, and what tricks and devices were uſed to bring Scholars to the ſeveral Pretenders. And therefore, in the firſt place, He prohibited the “ practice of theſe Corner-creepers, under pain of Infamy; yet, without taking “ away the liberty of teaching in private Families, ſo they pretended only to inſtruct “ thoſe “

Imp.Theod.A. & Valentinianus Cæſ. Georgio Proc. Africæ. poſt alia.

L.un.Ne ſine juſſu Principis, &c Cod.Th.lib.9. tit.41. L.un.Cod Juſt.hinc interpolata eſt.

Theodoſius makes an Univerſity at Conſtantinople.

L.ult.de Studiis liberalibus urb. Romæ, Cod.Th. & L.un. Cod. Juſt.eod.tit. Dat.3. Cal. Mart.

A. D. 425.

thoſe of the ſame Houſe. In the next place he declared the ſorts and numbers “ of his Profeſſors, which in all ſhould amount to one above thirty. As in this “ his Auditory, three Roman Orators, and ten Grammarians; in the Greek Tongue “ five Sophiſts, (ſo he calls them, but the ſame with Orators) and alſo ten Grammarians. “ And becauſe, as he ſaith, he would have Youth alſo to underſtand the “ more profound Learning, he joyns with them one who ſhould explain the Depths “ of Philoſophy, and two more to lay open the meaning of the Laws. And he “ further commands the Præfect of the City, to whom this Conſtitution is directed, “ that theſe Profeſſors have their ſeveral places allotted to them wherein to “ read, that neither Readers nor Hearers diſturb one another.

L. ult. de operibus publicis Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

8. Theſe places were the Exſedræ, or Juttings out of the Porticus's of the “ Capitol on the North Side thereof, which of themſelves were convenient and “ large enough, and reſembled our Chapter-Houſes in the Cloiſters of Cathedral “ Churches. On the Eaſt and Weſt Sides there was no coming in out of the “ Streets, but certain Shops adjoyning to the Porticus, formerly uſed for Traffick “ or Merchandiſe; and theſe, for the further convenience of the Profeſſors, and “ thoſe that belonged to them, he orders to be bought in at the publick charge. “ But whereas perſonal conveniences are moſt wont to affect us, he took the courſe to oblige thereby the preſent Profeſſors, and by continuing their privileges upon “ ſuch as ſhould come after, to engage them to the ſame Induſtry and attendance. Beſides the former conveniences, he thought fit to confer on ſome, who now profeſſed “ in this Univerſity, the Comitiva or degree of Comes of the firſt Rank. “ Namely, on two Greek Grammarians, Helladius and Syrianus, of whom Helladius “ was a Man very eloquent, born at Alexandria, who wrote in commendation of “ the preſent Emperor Theodoſius, and was the Maſter of Socrates the Hiſtorian. “ Beſides theſe, there was Theofilus, a Latine Grammarian; Martinus and Maximus, “ Sophiſts, or Greek Orators, and Leontius, a Lawyer. Theſe he declared, by “ virtue of his Codicils to be Comites of the firſt Rank, and to take place with ſuch “ as had been Vicars, who about this time were alſo put into the order of theſe Comites, “ and poſſibly out of reſpect to theſe Profeſſors. But not only on them, but “ ſuch as for the time to come ſhall be approved by the Senate for their good “ life, and for their eloquence and ſkill in Teaching, when they have induſtriouſly “ executed their ſeveral Charges of Profeſſors for the ſpace of twenty years, he “ confers alſo the ſame Dignity of Comes of the firſt Rank.“ Something, but like to this, had been formerly indulged to Profeſſors, as appears by Quintilian, who ſpeaks of his reſting after twenty years; juſt as a reſpect was had to the Veterane Soldiers, who had completed that number. And in France at this day there is ſomething remaining of it.

Makes Profeſſors Comites of of the firſt Rank.

L. un. de Profeſſorib. qui in urb. Conſtantinop. Cod. Th. l. 6. tit. 21. L. un. Cod. Juſt. hinc interpolata eſt.

A. D. 426.

Theodoſio A. 12, & Valentiniano A. 2, Coſſ.

9. For the following Year, the two Emperors were pleaſed to take upon them the Conſular Ornaments; Theodoſius the Twelfth Time, and Valentinian the Second, it being now the CCCCXXVI Year of our Lord. Theodoſius ſpent the beginning and end of it at Conſtantinople, and ſome of the Summer (at leaſt) at Nicomedia. Valentinian continued at Rome till the Month of March; and his Mother conſidering how Caſtinus had aſſiſted John in obtaining the Soveraign Command, ſent him into Baniſhment; but as for Ætius, ſhe not only pardoned him, but conferred on him the Dignity of Comes, becauſe he had cauſed the Huns to avoid Italy, by the ſtrength of whom it was in his power to have made great diſturbance. They being removed, much diſorder and oppreſſion removed with them; but as all Uſurpations afford matter for Accuſations, and either puniſhment, or Acts of Grace and Oblivion; ſo happened it at this time, and ſuch diſquietneſs thereupon through the clamour and importunity of Informers and others, who begged forfeited Eſtates, that the Government was obliged to take ſome care for quieting and purging theſe fermenting humours. This was by an Oration directed to the Senate in the young Emperor's name, and of Theodoſius, being ſaid on the third of January to have been read and publiſhed in that Aſſembly, by Theodoſius the Primicerius of the Notaries. By this all Informers are prohibited, and “ put to ſilence, who were wont by their Accuſations to bring innocent perſons into “ trouble. And for as much as in all ſuch Hurly-burlies, perſons of mean fortune and condition deſire to carve out for themſelves ſuch ſhares as the Changes of Affairs may preſent as poſſible to their endeavours: during this diſorder, Slaves had forſaken their Maſters, and ſet up for themſelves under protection of an Uſurpation, which is wont to give indemnity to all complying perſons.

Caſtinus baniſhed, and Ætius advanced.

An Edict publiſhed in the Senate at Rome for compoſing the troubles of Italy.

10. To give to all perſons their Dues, all Slaves are ordered to be reſtored to their Lords, againſt whom they had rebelled. And the Senatorian order which “ alſo had been much impaired by innovations in their Privileges and their Forum, “ to be reſtored to its former Dignity and Luſtre; eſpecially the Conſuls, who it “ ſeems, had been leſſened and diſreſpected by John the Uſurper, as well as the “ Churches, which were alſo reſtored to their ancient Dignity and freedom. “ And whereas upon his being created Emperor, the Senate had voted a quantity of the Gold to be preſented him, called Aurum Oblatitium: Valentinian by this Conſti- “ tution remits it in part to them, and part of it he gives to the City of Rome, “ where he now reſided; and which, as otherwiſe appears, had been in a manner “ deſolate, during the Uſurpation. “ But amongſt all the inconveniences which it ſuffered, none were more inſufferable than the inſolence of the Farmers of the Res privata, or Domain of the Prince, whom John, as the matter makes probable, incouraged to all exceſs, that they might willingly turn Tenants to himſelf. They were grown to that heighth of impudence, as to aſſume to themſelves a Girdle, or ſort of Dignity of Militia; ſo as none dared to look them in the face, or open their Mouths againſt them. When any ſuit or controverſie aroſe concerning the Lands of the Domain, they ſcorned to go to trial according to the uſual courſe of Law, and ſtile of the Courts. They were ſo bold as to intermeddle in the Suits and Controverſies of other Men, and by affording their Patronage to diſturb, the ordinary courſe of proceedings. In the execution of Sentences they would aſſiſt. And none more forward than they to inform againſt their Neighbours. The Government thought it ſelf ſo much concerned in Honour; and to be re- “ flected on by this miſcarriage of theſe Dependents, as to declare, that ſorts of “ Men ſubject to the Laws, by which the Princes themſelves were bound or ob- “ liged; and that none of theſe Farmers of the Domain carry themſelves higher “ than other Subjects, but live in common right and privilege with them; that “ none of them pretend to any Dignity or Power, but all ſue, and be ſued according “ to what was wont to be practiſed by all perſons in like caſes; neither offer any Pa- “ tronage or Protection to the diſturbance of any in poſſeſſion, meddle with the “ Executions of any Sentences; thruſt themſelves into any private or publick Af- “ fairs, nor diſturb any Families by turning troubleſome Informers. “

L. 33. de Petitionib. &c. Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut hiſtorica & horum temporum propria.

L. 14. de Senatorib. &c. Cod. Th.

Legibus ſerviant quibus tenentur & Principes, &c.

L. L. 1, 2. de Conductorib. & Hominibus domus Auguſt. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 26. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

11. The Government being returned into the true Channel; as if, during the late Uſurpation, the Laws had alſo been out of order, thoſe who ſate at the Helm were perſwaded to make ſome alteration and reformation of them alſo in certain particulars. This was attempted by another Oration directed to the Senate; in the former part of which a ſurvey is made of all the Law, and a Repurgation of Imperial Conſtitutions, ſo as to declare what Reſcripts of Princes ſhould be followed; and alſo what Anſwers of Lawyers ſhould in Courts be produced and alleaged for the deciſion of Cauſes, and be received and admitted for Law. As to Conſtitutions, it is cautioned in the firſt place, that ſuch Reſcripts as were ſent out to “ anſwer to the Relations, or Suggeſtions of Judges, of Bodies Politick, Meſſen- “ gers, Cities, Provinces or Courts, ſhould not be taken for general Laws, but “ only by thoſe whom they concerned, and to whom they were directed; in behalf “ of whom, when given out, none ſhould dare to retract them, or craftily to in- “ terpret them, under pain of Infamy; or obtain any Reſcript to revoke ſuch pri- “ viledges, or to admit ſuch revocation, or make any report back to the Prince, un- “ der colour of Ambiguity, upon pain of a Mulct of thirty pounds of Gold to be “ incurred. Now theſe Reſcripts ſhall be taken only to concern the Parties or Bo- “ dies to whom directed; but in caſe they be ſent as an Oration to the Senate to be “ confirmed, or there recorded; or if they be called by the name of Edicts, whe- “ ther they be publiſhed at the Prince his own ſpontaneous motion, or upon ſome “ Petition or Relation made; or if they be commanded to be expoſed to publick “ view, or made uſe of, and to be extended to like Cauſes; or if they be termed “ general, then ſhall they be taken and received as general Laws, and, for ſuch, “ obſerved by all perſons, as well one ſort as another for the time to come. “ To which may be added, if they were inſerted into the Body of Law, which was done ſome time after by Imperial Authority. To be ſure, we have it reſolved, “ that Reſcripts procured contrary to Law ſhall be refuſed by all Judges, except “ perchance there may be ſomething in them which without indamaging any other “ perſon, brings advantage to the Petitioner, or is in the nature of a pardon to “ him. Nay, though a Reſcript be obtain'd according to Law, yet if it be procu- “ red by a falſe ſuggeſtion, it ſhall be of no force, but the Lyar be ſeverely puniſh- “ ed by the Judge: which Ordinations were part of this Conſtitution whereof we “ ſpeak.

The Governors endeavour to regulate the Law.

L l. 2, 3. de Legibus, Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 14. Dat. 8. Id. Nov.

L. 7. de precib. Imp. offerend. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 19.

L. 5. Si contra jus, &c. Cod. Juſt. l. 1. tit. 22.

L. un. de Reſponſis Prudentum, Cod.Th.lib.1. tit. 4. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

12. In the next place it paſſeth an Imperial Judgment, concerning the Writings of ſuch great Lawyers, as were wont to be alleaged, and who had long before departed this world. And firſt of all it confirms thoſe of Papinian, Paulus, Gaius, Ulpian and Modeſtinus, ſo as they may be recited, and obtain in Judicature;“ according to what had been practiſed by former Princes, who in their deciſions were wont to follow their Advice, in matters which ſome or other humane reaſon“ muſt determine. In the next place, it ratifies the opinions of ſeveral eminent“ Lawyers, which the five forenamed do often quote and recite, which were Scævola, Sabinus, Julianus and Maxellus by name, beſides others; the Writings of whom were alſo extant at this time. But as in all ancient Writings, by reaſon of“ Tranſcription by ſeveral Copies, faults and miſtakes are wont to ariſe; therefore“ the Law ordains, that Copies be compared, and the moſt authentick be alledged;“ as in thoſe days it was the deſire of all Orthodox Chriſtians, that the Books“ of Holy Scripture might be reviſed and examined for the detection of Hereſies“ and Errors; not to mention other Writings. Now in caſe theſe Lawyers diſagreed,“ it is ordained, that the opinions of the major part ſhall carry it, ſo as the“ opinions of Lawyers ſhall not be weighed, but numbred. In caſe there be an equal“ number produced; if Papinian be of that number, his opinion ſhall prevail;“ a thing not only practiſed in Law matters, but in Divinity toward S. John“ Chryſoſthom; and in latter days, toward the Preſident or Speaker of an Aſſembly;“ but ſo great reverence did all Ages give to the vaſt perfections of Papinian, upon whoſe Works ſuch Notes as Paulus and Ulpian his Scholars had made, this“ Conſtitution alſo invalidates, as not long before had been done. If it ſhould happen,“ that the opinion of all Lawyers ſhould be of the ſame number and value, it“ is left to the Judge to prefer which ſide he in his judgment ſhall think fit.“ So great (as deſerved) was the opinion had of Papinian in this Age; and yet even in Auguſtus his time, great reverence was given to the Writings and Anſwers of famous Lawyers, but they obtained not that authority which this Conſtitution doth inveſt them with, and which they enjoyed in whole, till ſuch time as their Books were ſurveyed upon all Subjects, and ſuch parts of them taken into the Pandects as beſt ſeemed good to Juſtinian and his Compilers.

Theodoſius enacts ſomething againſt High-way-men.

L. ult. de bonis Proſcriptorum, Cod.Th.& L.10. Cod.Juſt. hinc interpolata eſt Dat.10.Cal. Feb.

13. Theodoſius at Conſtantinople in the mean time was not wanting to give orders in ſuch Affairs as required his directive or reforming power. The ways and paſſages were now ſo beſet with High-way Men and Thieves, as ſharpened him to ſomething further ſeverity, than the Conſtitutions of his Predeceſſors did require. It became a queſtion amongſt his Judges, how the Eſtates of ſuch perſons being condemned ſhould be diſpoſed of; to which he anſwered in an Edict directed to Hierius the Præfectus Prætorio, that in caſe they had children, one half ſhould“ be confiſcated, and the other go to them, and to them alone he“ aſſigns it; not to other Kindred, not to Father and Mother, though this had“ by other Laws formerly been done. But in caſe the condemned perſon was a“ Decurio, another courſe ſhould be taken. For if he had no Children, the Curia“ ſhould ſucceed him as to the whole, and take care ſome way for diſcharge of his“ Services. If he had Children, and all Sons, they ſhould ſucceed to the whole Inheritance,“ provided, they ſtood obnoxious to the ſervices of the Courts. If only“ Daughters, they ſhould take one half, and the Curiæ the other. If of both“ Sexes, the Eſtate ſhould be equally divided betwixt the Males and Females. Such“ Offender this Edict ſtiles by the name of Latro, or ſuch an one as is involved in“ profeſſed and manifeſt crimes, which hints to us, that in the Eaſtern Parts at this“ time in deſerts and ſuch places there were Rovers, which as now adays the Banditti, and in former times the Iſauri, fell down in Bodies, upon not not only Travellers, but Countries,; and poſſibly, in alluſion to this, Princes were wont to term them Latrones that had invaded the Purple, and whom they had defeated and put to death. For contrary reaſons he was inclined to extend a little more favour than had formerly been granted to ſuch as becauſe of their Birth or Original were for ever“ obnoxious to ſerve as Gynæciarii, Monetarii, Mruileguli, or the like, in Works“ which were under the Inſpection of the Comes Sacr. Largitionum. By former“ Laws they could not recede, or be free from their companies or condition. But“ now he thought fit it might be done by the grace and favour of the Prince, provided,“ another were ſubſtituted in the room of him that was freed, which“ ſhould be every way fit, and approved by the ſaid Comes; and leave his Eſtate“ and his Poſterity in that Company, Service and Employment.

In behalf of ſome conditionales.

L.16. de Murilegulis,&c.Cod. Th.& L.13.Cod. Juſt. eod tit. Dat. 7. Cal. Mart. Acacio, Com.S.L.

14. About the ſame time he grew ſenſible of ſome Incroachments made upon his

A. D. 426.

Againſt the Incroachments of his greateſt Officers.

his Imperial Prerogative, and publick liberty by ſome of his greateſt Officers. The Præfecti Prætorio not content with the privilege they enjoyed, to have the Decrees of ſuch Meſſages as were brought from Cities and Provinces to be ſent unto them, that by them they might be repreſented to the Prince, took upon them alſo to make Anſwers, whereby it came to paſs, that the Emperor himſelf knew nothing of the Grievances of his People, and the Meſſengers being never admitted to his preſence, went away as they came, having only their labour for their travel: we have ground to ſuſpect, that Hierius, now Præfect of the Eaſt, was guilty of this Miſdemeanour; for the Edict directed to him hereupon is ſharp; telling him, that he knew very well, that the Petitions and Decrees of Cities, and the “ Deſires of the People were to be anſwered by the Emperor himſelf, and that the “ Meſſengers ought to be admitted into Conſiſtory, and honoured with the ſight of “ him, and have free liberty to ſpeak and declare whatever they had in Commiſ- “ ſion from thoſe that ſent them. He alſo reprehended him for admitting perſons “ into his Office, without being firſt approved by the Prince, and having received “ Letters of Approbation from the ſacred Scrinia; charging him, that this be ob- “ ſerved for the time to come, not only in his own Officers, but in thoſe belonging “ to others under him, of the Dignity of Spectabilis, as the Proconſul of Aſia, the “ Comes of the Eaſt, Præfectus Auguſtalis, and the Vicars. Moreover, he com- “ mands, that the ſame courſe be obſerved, as to the Irenarchæ, the Actuarii and “ Cornicularii of the Fleets belonging to Conſtantinople, and alſo to the Thymela, “ and to the Curule Horſes, appertaining to the ſeveral Cities, as the cuſtom had “ formerly been. “ Thoſe Fleets muſt be no other but they that brought Corn from Ægypt, or Alexandria, to the City, or other parts of the Eaſt; of which largely before.

L.ult de Legatis, Cod.Th. Dat. Cal. Jun. Nicomediæ.

L.21 de Diverſis Officiis, Cod. Th. Dat. 10. Cal. Jul.

15. The Thymela was the Stage, or Scaffold, where Dancings and Tricks were ſhewn, which were ſo common, not only in the great Cities, but alſo throughout the Provinces, that there were Actuaries or Clerks that took an account of them, as others of the Curule Horſes that ran courſes in ſeveral places. Of the like preſumption was guilty Theofilus the Præfect of the City, in admitting Actuaries, as alſo Optiones throughout all the Regions of Conſtantinople, and Suarii; of whom theſe provided Hogs-fleſh for the Inhabitants, and the other took care for ſupplying the Soldiers that there kept Guard, with Proviſions. And with them incurred alſo reprehenſion, Acacius, the Comes Sacr. Largitionum, as to the Comites Theſaurorum, and the Theſaurenſes of the Diocefs. All thoſe he declares, the Prince himſelf ought firſt to allow off; and though he rejects not ſuch as had already been admitted by them, he threatens them with incurring his heavy diſpleaſure, if they “ offended again in the like ſort, beſides the nulling again of what they did. “ But toward the end of the Year, he caſt his eye upon his beſt deſerving Servants, and conſidering how from the third or laſt degree of Comites he had preferred ten “ years before the Proximi Scriniorum, and the Comes Diſpoſitionum to the ſecond in “ order; he now thought fit to allow them Robes, which Acacius was to give out “ to them, as others had according to their ſeveral qualities. “ And the Princeps Ducenarius, as he was termed, out of the Agentes in Rebus, as he had formerly been ranked amongſt Conſulares, as alſo the Adjutor of the Magiſter Officiorum, were now advanced to be equal in dignity with Vicars of Præfects, by two orders ſent, the one to Helio by the Title of Patritian and Magiſter Officiorum; and the other to Hierius the Præfect. Moreover, the ſame privileges that out of reſpect to Studies and Learning he had formerly conferred on the Advocates who pleaded in the “ Court of the Præfect of the Eaſt, he now extended to thoſe who attended in that “ of the Præfect of Conſtantinople. “

L.22.ejuſd.tit.

L.23. ejuſd.tit.

Indulgent to his deſerving Servants.

L.ult.de Proximis,&c.Cod Th. Dat.7.Cal.Decemb.

L.l.20,21.de Agentib. in rebus, Cod. Th. Dat. 10. Cal. Jan.

L.5.de Advocatis diverſorum Judicum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 7. tit. 7.

16. The Year that followed, or the CCCCXXVII of our Lord had two Subjects for Conſuls. The one was Hierius, who was now both Conſul and Præfectus Prætorio, and this very Year repaired or dedicated the Baths at Conſtantinople, called the Baths of Theodoſius. His Colleague in the Conſulſhip for the Weſt was Ardabures. In Italy, as we ſaid, Ætius was received into favour, and Caſtinus ſent into baniſhment, after the ſuppreſſion of the Tyranny. Caſtinus, now, ſay ſome, inraged thereat, and not caring what he did, or what became of him, ſo he could but make diſturbance, with a great power of Men invaded Africk, and thence purpoſed to drive away Boniface, who ſo well defended his ground, that the Aggreſſor himſelf was forced to retire. And Ætius, though poſſibly he hated not Caſtinus, yet he hated Boniface, whoſe good ſucceſs and fame ſtirred in him ſo much envy and emulation, that he cunningly inſinuated and perſwaded Placidia, that

A. D. 427.

Hierio & Ardabure, Coſſ.

Chron.Theod. ad H.An.

he

Sect. 4.

A. D. 427.

Placidia upon falſe ſuggeſtions of Ætius quarrels with Boniface.

Procopius Vandalum, lib. 1. Paulus Diaconus, lib. 14.

he purpoſed to revolt, and ſetting up for himſelf, to make Africk the Seat of his own Empire. There was no way therefore but to abdicate his authority there, and to recal him home; but this would not ſatisfie the deſign of Ætius. He perſwades her to recal him, but then to drive all into extremity, and raiſe an utter feud betwixt them, he writes to Boniface, and as his Friend, adviſeth him not to come, for there were deſigns againſt him, and he would indanger his Head, if he came within the reach of the preſent Governours. Boniface believed him as his faithful Friend, and following his advice, refuſed to quit his place of command and ſecurity; whereupon Placidia concluding all to be true which had been inſinuated by Ætius, reſolved to make War upon him as an Enemy. But for Ætius ſhe had other Employment; for him ſhe ſent againſt Theodorich, King of the Goths, who at that time beſieged Archilla in Gall, having been incouraged by the diſſentions of the Romans to an open Revolt. But however, he was conſtrained by the Roman Soldiers to quit the Siege, through the means of Ætius, who took into his ſociety and friendſhip Avitus, a great Man amongſt the Arverni.

The War againſt Boniface goes on.

17. But againſt Boniface a War being reſolved on (through the envy of Felix, a Magiſter Militum in Gall, as Proſper writes) three Commanders were choſen, and ſent againſt him, viz. Mavortius, Galbio and Sinox. Boniface contained himſelf in Carthage, where he reſolved to ſuſtain the ſhock; and there he was ſtraitly beſieged, till ſuch diſcord aroſe betwixt the Roman Generals, that Mavortius and Galbio were killed by the practiſes of Sinox, who now left alone, was utterly unable to grapple with Boniface; for he procured him quickly to be diſpatched; and this happened without the loſs of one Man on Boniface his ſide, if we will believe the Letters which are ſaid to have paſſed at this time betwixt him and Auguſtine, the Biſhop of Hippo, with whom hitherto he held good correſpondence, till the malice of his Enemies, and his indignation thereupon turned him into Acts which that good Father could not but diſapprove. For, Placidia hearing of the ill ſucceſs her former endeavours had had, yet reſolved to renew the War, and appointed Sigevultes, one of the Dignity of Comes to be the Proſecutor. Boniface concluding with himſelf, that he ſhould not alone be able to grapple with the power of the Emperor, reſolved to draw in others to his party. One Article of his Charge had been, that being commanded into Spain upon ſome buſineſs by the Government, he had there married a Relation of the Kings of the Vandals, and had contracted a League and Affinity with that People. Whether this was true or falſe, being as truth believed, he reſolved his Enemies ſhould have ſome true cauſe for their aſſertion, and either went himſelf back again into that Country, or as Procopius writes, ſent ſome of his moſt faithful Friends, who contracted an agreement with the two Sons of Godegiſile, who died the year before. Theſe were Gontharis, or Guntharius, and Gizerich, or Genſerich, with whom was agreed, that they three ſhould ſhare Africk amongſt them, and ſhould joyn together upon occaſion to defend each other. By virtue of this Agreement the two Brothers quitted that part of Spain which lay neareſt Africk, and in which they were ſucceeded by the Viſegoths, and with their Vandals, to whom Paulus Diaconus joyns the Alans, paſſed the Straits of Gibraltar, as now we term it, to the great miſchief of that Country, followed by great Revolutions, which continued nigh an hundred years.

He contracts an Alliance with the Vandals in Spain.

The Vandals thereupon paſs into Africk.

A. D. 428.

Felice & Tauro, Coſſ.

18. The Year CCCCXXVIII had for Conſuls Felix and Taurus. Theodoſius made his Abode at Conſtantinople, and Valentinian at Ravenna. The Præfecti Prætorio were for the Eaſt Hierius and Florentius, who ſucceeded Eudoxius; and Voluſianus in the Weſt. This Year was too memorable in regard of the miſerable waſting of Africk by Fire and Sword. For the Vandals finding therein no reſiſtance, but rather incouraged and protected by the Army of him who invited them into the Country, executed that vengeance upon the miſerable Provincials, which their many and enormous crimes, atteſted by the Writers of this Age, had pulled down upon their Heads. At this Fire and Smoak all Italy ſtood at gaze; and ſome of Boniface his Friends in Rome admired exceedingly, knowing his former Loyalty, how he ſhould be tranſported to an Act ſo far deſtructive to the Empire. And Placidia, her anger was ſo much cooled by his heat, that ſhe ordered ſome to go to Carthage, and feel him about the matter, who coming to him, found him free and open enough, inſomuch that he gave them the Letters written by Ætius, with which they returned, and ſhewed Placidia, that he had erred not through his own fault, but the treachery of another perſon. She had the temper to conceal her indignation, and diſſembled the matter with Ætius, who had an

Which they miſerably waſte with Fire and Sword.

Procopius.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 428.

an Army now at his devotion, when matters ſtood in ſo tickliſh a poſture. But to Boniface his Friends ſhe opened her grief, and exceedingly complaining of the fraud of Ætius, beſought them, that if they could they would perſwade him to paſs all over, and hinder the Barbarians from further waſting the Country. He was inclinable enough ſo to do, and by a great ſum of Money indeavoured to divert them from further ſpoiling the Country. But they having got a taſte of the ſweetneſs of it, would not now be taken off, and returned him ſcoffing language, which provoked him to blows; but in the Ingagement he was worſted, and fled to Hippo, a ſtrong Maritime City of Numidia. To the place, Genſerich, the Baſtard Son of Godegiſel laid Siege, who alone reigned over the Vandals, after the death of his Legitimate Brother Gunthar or Gunderich, who ſome ſay was extinct one way, and ſome another. But whereas Procopius writes that Placidia durſt not take notice of any thing to Ætius, becauſe he had an Army at his Devotion: to this we may add, that with that Army this Year he got a Victory over the Franks, and recovered from them a Region of Gall, lying near the Rhine. So write Caſſiodorus and Proſper; and Sidonius Apollinaris upon occaſion of Majorianus his being with Ætius at the Fight, ſpeaks of a Wedding that then happened amongſt the Franks, how they fought at a Bridge, and the Bride was taken priſoner. And he deſcribes the Garb and Faſhions of the Franks, as then they were, which in our Hiſtory of the Franks is to be obſerved.

They refuſe to be ſtopped by Boniface, who called them in.

In Panegyr. Julio Valerio Majoriano dicto: p. 294.

Theodoſius contracts the forms of Law.

19. Theodoſius at Conſtantinople was ſtill at his eaſe, as to any hoſtile oppoſitions. But being told of ſeveral things that in the State might be amended; and of his own inclination being prone to contract the Forms and Solemnities of the Law, by a large Conſtitution directed to Hierius, he now this Year attempted it in matters relating to Suits, Marriages, Portions and Joyntures, as to which he took away " the ſcrupulous Quirks and Obſervances, and ordained, that any Words and Rites honeſtly and innocently ſpoken and made, ſhould ſuffice to make them good and " effectual. " Not that theſe Words and Rites were in themſelves good or evil; but were rendred to be ſuch by the ſeveral Temperaments and Conſtitutions of times, which are a ſufficient Warrant, nay, an urgent motive for repealing of Statutes, as all Ages and all Nations have taken notice. Valentinian lately had made a Reformation, as to Laws; and this of Theodoſius was as it were a Præludium to that Diſcrimination of Conſtitutions, which ſhortly after followed. We have not of a long time given any account concerning the Curiales, or ſuch as were obliged to the ſervices of the Court, the emoluments of which, now again this Year Theodoſius indeavoured to promote. In caſe any Eſtate came from a Curialis by ſucceſſion to him, as dying inteſtate; if it conſiſted in Moveables, the Goods ſhould be ſold by conſent of the Curia, and the price laid out in purchaſe of Lands to be let to " reſponſible perſons. And if the Curialis had any Heir who was not a Curialis, either as to the whole, or part of the Inheritance, yet a fourth part thereof " ſhould be granted to the Curia, But if any Poſſeſſions of theſe Curiales had " come by lucrative cauſes, as by Legacy or Gift to any Stranger, he muſt pay the " ſixth of the profit for every parcel of Land, which was as much more as former- " ly had been required. But we ſee how the diverſity of times brought in a diverſity of Imperial Sanctions; and yet this ſhould not prejudice any Corporations, in " which, either Cuſtom, Agreement, or Neceſſity required any larger Propor- " tion. "

L.l.8.in Chronol. L. L.notatæ quas vides

Provides for the Curiæ.

L.2.de prædiis decurionum, Cod. Juſt.lib. 10.*tit.*33.

L. 1.Quando & quibus quarta pars debetur.&c: Cod.Juſt lib. 10.*tit.*34.

L.un.Cod.Th. de imponenda lucrativis deſcriptione,lib. 12.*tit.*4.

20. Three years before Theodoſius had found reaſon to deny Immunity from Quarters to all perſons of all Degrees and Dignities living in Conſtantinople, when he and his Court reſided there, their own dwelling Houſes only excepted. But he did not think then of his Archiatri and his Profeſſors he had founded in that City, to whom he had formerly confirmed the privileges granted them by former Princes, and exemption from ſervices and charges, as well Senatorian as Municipal, when they had arrived at the firſt or ſecond degree of Comes, or at higher Honours, which privileges were extended to their Wives and Children. But being put in mind of it the laſt Year, by an Edict inſcribed to Helio, the Magiſter Officiorum, he had declared them exempt from the Burthen of the ſaid Quarter and Entertainment. Moreover, having this very Year declared all of Senatorian Rank to be ſubject to the payment of the Glebalis Collatio, except ſuch perſons as he mentioned in his Conſtitution (as the Notaries, Silentiarii, Decuriones, and thoſe who from among the Agentes in Rebus had aimed at the Degree of Ducenarii) now five or ſix Months after, calling to mind, that the Archiatri or Phyſicians of his Palace, had not been exempted by name, he declared his will and pleaſure to Pre-

Vide l.ult.de Senatorib.Cod. Th.

*L.*14. *de metallis. L.l.*16.17. 18.19. de Medicis & Profeſſorio.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 428.

He gratifies his Phyſicians.

culus the Præfect of the City, that if they had arrived to be Comites of the firſt Rank, or higher, they ſhould be in an eſpecial manner diſcharged, and held free from the Glebalis Collatio, as formerly had been granted by Imperial Conſtitutions, any thing in the late Law, provided notwithſtanding.

A. D. 429. Florentio & Dionyſio Coſſ.

Genſerich goes on in waſting Africk.

Courſes taken by Placidia to obviate his Attempts.

L.35. de Annona & Tributis, Cod.Th. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.Dat. 16.Cal.Mart.

L.32. de Suſceptorib.&c. Cod. Th. & L.ult.Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.

L.34. de Annona & Tributis, Cod.Th.Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

21. The following Year is inſcribed, After the Conſulſhip of Felix and Taurus, as alſo Florentius and Dionyſius being Conſuls; being of our Lord the CCCCXXIX. Valentinian had his Abode at Ravenna, and Theodoſius at Conſtantinople. And all this Year Genſerich perſiſted in the waſting of Africk, committing all ſorts of Hoſtilities and Outrages therein, while in the mean time he was carrying on the Siege of Hippo. In theſe dangerous times to provide as well as ſhe could for the ſecurity of the Empire, Placidia preferred Felix to the honour of Patritian; and Ætius, notwithſtanding what had lately paſſed, to the Dignity and Power of Magiſter Militum. And becauſe Money is the Sinews of War, and the Provincials were backward in paying in their Tribute, an Edict was iſſued out to Voluſianus the Præfect, whereby a years time was given them for the payment of it; and if that was not obſerved, then the payment thereof, which was deſtined to no other end than the ſecurity of themſelves ſhould be exacted by the Governors of the Provinces.“ “ And as it was Juſtice at all times to repreſs the violence and rapacity of Suſceptors, or Receivers of the Tributes, ſo moſt ſeaſonable now, when there was more occaſion than ordinary for Contributions. Voluſianus therefore, to whom, as Præfect, the matter of Tribute belonged, was enjoyned to ſee, that when it was offered it ſhould be received, and that at the peril of Governors of Provinces,“ and their Officers, juſt Weights ſhould be uſed when it was received in Maſs;“ that the Suſceptors ſhould deliver to the Poſſeſſors exact and full Acquittances: and“ report ſhould be made of what came into the Treaſury, not only to the two Comites,“ or High Treaſurers, but alſo to the Præfectus Prætorio himſelf, who might“ by his own Accounts eaſily ſee what was due to be paid. In caſe any of the Palatine Officers, or thoſe belonging to the Treaſurers intruded themſelves, and would“ be medling, leave is given to the Poſſeſſor, though he be in arrear to repel“ them; and if he be not able to do it, they ſhall be puniſhed by the Treaſurers;“ and if they fail through the procurement of their Officers, then ſhall it be done“ by the Præfectus Prætorio himſelf.“ This was greater Indulgence than had been lately ſhewn to the Provincials of Africa Proconſularis, who had ſent one Bubulcus, a Comes, to complain how they were harraſſed and oppreſſed by the Compulſors and Optiones. In anſwer to whom, Celer the Proconſul was ordered to reſtrain“ theſe Men, and give the Provincials four Months to bring the Mony in themſelves,” to the Capitol or Caſtle of Carthage, which if they did not in that term, then the“ aforeſaid Officers were to be let looſe upon them.

Yet more complaints out of Africk.

Very favourable Anſwers.

A modeſt Edict.

L.ult. de Appellationib. & Conſultationib. Cod.Th. Abeſt. a Cod.Juſt.

L.185. de Decurionib.Cod. Th. & L.2. de Apochis publ.Cod.Juſt.

L.186.ejuſd. tit.

L.4.de Legib. Cod.Juſt.lib. 1. tit.14.

22. Although the Barbarous Enemy was now raging with all ſorts of Hoſtilities in that Country of Africk, yet were there Queſtions and Contentions among themſelves; and now it was doubted to whom Appeals ſhould lie from the Rationalis in cauſes relating to the Domain, or Res privata of the Prince. To ſave the Provincials labour and trouble, Celer was impowered as Proconſul to receive all ſuch Appeals,“ except they related to Penſions, which were paid out of the Emphyteutical“ or Patrimonial Lands, or to Eſtates that were begged; for theſe were matters“ which ſo nearly concerned the Office of the Comes Rei privatæ, that no other“ could properly have cognizance of them. The reaſon of this Grant of Appeals“ is very civil and modeſt. For, ſaith he, ſaving the Reverence of our Majeſty,“ we do not diſdain to have equal Law or Juſtice with private perſons.“ Another thing complained of, was, that ſuch Acquittances as had been given by former Proconſuls, were queſtioned by their Succeſſors, to the great vexation and diſquiet of“ the People; to redreſs which, Celer is commanded alſo to farbear all ſuch Diſcuſſions“ for the time to come, and with him all that ſhall ſucceed in the place of Proconſul.“ A fourth Grievance yet was urged by Bubulcus, that one Curialis in the ſame Territory of the City was conſtrained to pay Tribute for another, which“ was grown ſo intollerable, that there were ſcarce any ſufficient Men to be found.“ In anſwer to which, Celer is charged, that each perſon be only reſponſible for his“ own Ground.“ So juſt and temperate was the Government of thoſe who adviſed Valentinian and his Mother, and ſuitable to this civil Anſwer given to the Meſſengers of Africk was another Law directed to Voluſianus the Præfect, after this manner: It's a ſaying worthy the Majeſty of a Prince to profeſs himſelf bound up by the“ Laws. So much doth his Authority depend upon that of the Law. And indeed it is“ a thing greater than Empire to ſubmit the Prince his power unto Laws. And by the“

Oracle of this preſent Edict (ſo it concludes) that which we do not permit to be“ lawful to our ſelves, we declare to others.“

A. D. 430.
Theodoſio A. 13. & Valentiniano A. 3. Coſſ.

Auguſtine the Biſhop of Hippo dies during the Siege.

23. We are now arrived at the CCCCXXX Year of Chriſt, wherein Theodoſius Auguſtus the Thirteenth, and Valentinian the third time were Conſuls. The two Emperors made their Abode as formerly; the one at Ravenna, and the other at Conſtantinople. The Siege of Hippo ſtill went on, and continued for fourteen Months; and toward the middle of it Auguſtine the Biſhop died, when the whole Country of Africk, except Carthage, Cirta and Hippo were already over-run by the Vandals. The Government at this time thought fit to put a difference betwixt“ the Province called Byzacena, and that of the Proconſul; ſo as the Curiales or Præpoſiti“ might be conſtituted, the Præpoſiti or Overſeers of the Granaries, which“ in the Proconſular Province is denied, for reaſons, no doubt, reflecting upon the“ Curiales or Præpoſiti of this Province, who were not to be intruſted with ſuch a“ concern.“ We hear no more of any Employment the Quæſtor had at Ravenna this year; but his Brother at Conſtantinople was employed by the importunity of ſome Courtiers to explain and limit an Edict which the Emperor five years before had directed to Valerius the then Comes Rei privatæ. Taking into his ſerious conſideration the cuſtom of begging Eſtates forfeited, and how at this time of danger there was need of enlarging his Revenue, and aſſiſting his Treaſury by all lawful means, he thought he ſhould deal very favourably with ſuch Beggars, if he“ granted their requeſt, with this condition, that his Exchequer ſhould go an equal“ ſhare with them in all Eſtates ſo begged and granted, except in thoſe that belonged“ to Temples and Patrimonial Lands, which being already inveſted in himſelf,“ it was ſuppoſed he knew what he gave out of his own Purſe; and therefore, if“ they were granted, it muſt be ſuppoſed that he knew what he did, and they paſſed wholly to the Grantee.“

L. ult. de Suſceptorib. Cod. Th. Dat. 15. Cal. Mart. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 22. de Petitionib. Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

24. But in Lands or Eſtates ſo to be divided, he to whom they were granted“ muſt firſt deduct his Expences and Charges in ſuit, and then the Diviſion to be“ made of the Reſiduum. And all Judges were expreſly commanded to uſe all indifference“ in the Trial, and not be partial, as too often they were when the Treaſury“ was concerned, whether the Comes Rei privatæ himſelf heard the matter, or“ the ordinary Judge of the Province in places at a great diſtance. Nay, the Advocate“ of the Treaſury himſelf muſt be preſent, as commonly at ſuch trials, yet“ he is commanded to be ſilent, leſt the Judges be biaſſed by his arguments and diſcourſes.“ But if the matter was compounded before it came to the trial, yet to be“ ſure the Treaſury ſhould carry away one half of what was gained by ſuch Compoſition“ or Tranſaction. Nay, although the perſon that begged the Eſtate, obtained“ a private Reſcript for his enjoying the whole, yet ſhould ſuch Reſcript be“ void, and of none effect. Moreover the Laws formerly made concerning time“ given to the Poſſeſſor to maintain his Title, and after which he ſhould not be moleſted,“ were confirmed. But now Theodoſius thought fit to diſpenſe with this Law“ of Diviſion, when thoſe that belonged to his Bed-Chamber were concerned; ſo“ as they having diſcovered and obtained ſuch Eſtates, ſhould not be bound to part“ with half to the Treaſury. In all other things he confirms that Law, and for this favour“ extended to his Bed-Chamber Men, he gives no other reaſon than that of“ his own Clemency.“ And we may eaſily believe that to have been the chiefeſt motive. For he was ſo gracious to their Præpoſitus, as to take him into the ſecond Rank or Degree of Illuſtrious perſons, making him equal with the Præfects and the Magiſtri Militum. But theſe perſons, as other near Attendants, the Caſtrenſiani and Protectors had greater opportunity than others to inſinuate, and drive a great Trade by begging, as we have ſeen formerly out of Ammianus, yet at length it was quite ſpoiled, this being the laſt Edict of this nature extant in the Code of Theodoſius, and not inſerted into that of Juſtinian, becauſe ſuch begging was forbidden, and made unlawful by his Law.

L. ult. Cod. Th. eod. tit. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. propter petitiones ſublatas.

Theodoſius kind to thoſe of his Bed-chamber.

25. Some of his Officers were ſo unreaſonable, as, though they had Houſes of their own in Conſtantinople, yet when the Court was there they would pretend a right to take up Quarters with their Neighbours. This he thought fit to forbid by orders ſent both to the Comes S. L. and the Magiſter Officiorum, commanding“ that in caſe any ſuch would take up other Mens Houſes than their own, they ſhould“ be made liable to quarter; foraſmuch as only illuſtrious perſons had their Houſes“ excuſed from that ſervice.“ And the neceſſity of the times required, that he ſhould make a little bold with ſuch as had obtained Lands or Eſtates from him and his Predeceſſors, that out of theſe Lands Contribution ſhonld be according to the

L. 15. de Metatis, Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. Dat. 8. Cal. Mart.

UMI

Sect. 4.

A. D. 430.

Exigencies of the State. For in the days of Theodoſius the Great, Arcadius and Honorius, ſome Lands had been obtained by way of free Gift, as the Lands of particular Cities, and chiefly of Temples which were ſince the overthrow of the Pagan Superſtition, either laid to the Res privata of the Prince, aſſigned to the maintenance of Military Employments, allowed for the ſervice of Churches, or beſtowed on private perſons. There were of theſe Grounds ſome granted without any Rent charge at all, others had ſome charge (as reaſonably they might have) put upon them. Beſides, there were another ſort of Lands which being barren and deſerted, upon view of the Peræquators, had been releaſed from the ordinary Tribute; of all theſe upon extraordinary occaſions, an extraordinary Impoſition “ was laid ſix years before by a Conſtitution directed to Aſclepiodotus then Præfectus “ Pratorio, with hopes that ſome Abatement might afterwards be made. But “ now this promiſe was rather repeated than fulfilled; another Edict for regulating “ that Affair, being given out to Antiochus the preſent Præfect, whereby further “ Rates are preſcribed for laying theſe Impoſitions, and regulating theſe payments, “ hope being ſtill given of Indulgence. But ſuch was the neceſſity of the “ times, by which Theodoſius excuſeth himſelf; the Empire being now in ſo dangerous “ a condition as called for all the aſſiſtance which Juſtice and the common ſafety “ might excuſe. “

L.l.5.6.de Conlatione Donatarum,Cod. Th. Abſ. a Cod. Juſt.

Neceſſitated to require extraordinary Burthens.

A. D. 431. Baſſe & Antiocho Coſſ.

26. The following CCCCXXXI of our Saviour had Baſſus and Antiochus for Conſuls; or, as in the former Year, ſometimes is found noted at publick Acts, Theodoſius and he who ſhould be nominated, ſo in this Antiochus alone is named Conſul. The two Emperors for any thing we find held their reſidence this Year as they were wont, at Ravenna and Conſtantinople. Antiochus the Conſul is ſaid of an Eunuch to have been made a Patritian, and afterwards being accuſed to Theodoſius of ſome crimes, to have been deprived of his Eſtate, reduced to a private life, and to have taken Orders; upon which occaſion the ſame Writer reports this Emperor to have made a Law or Sanction, whereby was prohibited, that Eunuchs ſhould be numbred amongſt Patritians; which Sanction we would gladly ſee. Whether Antiochus might be in fault or not, in being careleſs to ſupply the City of Conſtantinople with proviſions; and thence might incur his Prince's diſpleaſure, is not known; but this Year a great ſcarcity of Proviſions is reported to have been in that City, by which the people was ſo inraged, as to fall into a tumult; and when the Emperor went in perſon to the publick Granaries to give ſome relief to the preſent diſtreſs, to have caſt Stones at him. The Barbarians that then quartered in the City, in an hoſtile manner went to the great Church, and endeavoured to ſet fire to the Altar, and thence could not be perſwaded to depart, till falling out they killed one another. For ſupplying the publick Granaries, we find an Edict, or a Pragmatick, as the Author himſelf terms it, bearing date of the twenty eighth of April, of this Year; but we find it inſcribed to Flavianus the Præfectus Prætorio under Valentinian. This forbids any perſon to be free, or enjoy any Immunity from either ordinary or extraordinary tributary Functions, though “ under pretence of any privilege obtained from the Prince himſelf, excepted always his own Patrimony which, he affirms, he very frequently aſſigns to the publick Neceſſities. “ And conſidering the tumults and dangers the Empire of the Weſt eſpecially was now in, we may eaſily believe him. For Genſerich by this time had taken Hippo, and made ſuch further progreſs with his Arms, as rendered the Endeavours of Boniface and other the Roman Captains very ineffectual.

L.34 de Petitionib.& l.15. de Metatis,Cod. Th.Chronol. L l. Cod.Th.

Suidas. Vide Baron. ad h.An.

A ſcarcity drives the People of Conſtantinople into mutiny.

Marcellinus, Socr.lib.7.c.33.

L.36.de Annona, & Tributis, Cod.Th. L.ult. de privilegiis domus Auguſtæ hinc interpolata.

A. D. 432. Ætio & Valerio Coſſ.

27. The CCCCXXXII of our Lord had for Conſuls Ætius and Valerius, though they at Conſtantinople had ſo ſmall intelligence out of the Weſt, by reaſon of Diſturbances and Wars, as we may eaſily gueſs, that for a conſiderable time they knew nothing of Ætius his promotion, but dated their publick Acts with the Conſulſhip of Valerius, and of him who ſhould be declared, as they had done the Year before. The Arms of Genſerich had been ſo ſucceſsful. as to make Boniface willing to comply with the invitation of Placidia, who at his return into Italy, procured him the Title of Magiſter Militum. Now being arrived at Court, his ſpirit was too big to brook his Æmulator Ætius, and he retained ſo great a ſenſe of the Injury done him, as to challenge him to a ſingle Combat. The matter was repreſented to Placidia, and ſhe was perſwaded to give way to the Duel, wherein Boniface had the advantage, and overcame his Adverſary; who, as now degraded, betook himſelf into the Country to a private life. Here one would imagine he languiſhed; yet he ſurvived the Conqueror, who in the third Month after his Victory, died; and on his Death-Bed perſwaded his Wife Pelagia to marry no other L.ult.de his qui ad Eccleſiam confugiant, Cod.Th. Dat. 5. Cal.Apr.Valerio Conſ.& qui fuerit nunciatus.

Boniface dieth.

Marcellinus.

Sect. 4. Man but Ætius. In the place of Boniface one Trigetius was ſent into Africk, who gave diverſion to Genſerich, and oppoſed him in his undertakings. We do not find the Quæſtor at Ravenna much buſied this Year; only confirming the privileges “ granted by former Princes to the Decuriones and Silentiarii.“ And he of Conſtantinople had work of little higher nature, recommended to him by the Emperor his order, and conſent of the Senate, in behalf of the Domeſticks of that Court, to whom, beſides the confirmation of their former privileges, was now granted, “ that their Primicerius after having obtained to be Tribune, ſhould be reckoned “ amongſt the Exduces; and if he died before his Year was out (this being the “ term of his Office) the remainder of his Salary ſhould go, not to the Exchequer, “ as ordinarily it did, but to his Heirs; which was a favour extended to ſome “ few others, as the Advocates of the Treaſury, the Scriniarii, the Primipilares, “ the Domeſticks and Protectors, and the Secundocerii in the Schole of the Equites.

A. D. 432.

L.3 de Decurionib. & Silentiariis, Cod. Th. Dat.9.Cal.Apr.

L. 11. de Domeſticis & Protectorib Cod. Th. Dat.3 Id.Jun.

A. D. 433. Theodoſio A: 14. & Maximo Coſſ.

28. Theodoſius for the Year following took upon himſelf the Conſular Ornaments, and had Maximus for his Colleague in that Dignity. Ætius being worſted by his Adverſary, had not the face to ſhew himſelf at Court, but keeping a little in the “ Country, went to Rome, and thence to avoid further inconvenience, into Dalmatia, and Pannonia, where he became more familiar to the Huns. By their means he raiſed himſelf to his former Reputation, and now Valentinian had need of him, by reaſon that Gundicarius, King of the Burgundians, broke the League, and paſſing out of his own Bounds, invaded Gallia Belgica, which he waſted with Fire and Sword, till ſuch time as Ætius being ſent againſt him, forced him to turn his Back, and depart home. While Gallia Belgica flamed with Hoſtile Attempts made by Gundicarius, Conſtantinople was almoſt conſumed to Aſhes by ſome cauſe or other of another nature. Socrates writes, that ſuch a Fire happened, as had ſcarcely been in former times. For a great part of the City, (Marcellinus names that toward the North) was conſumed hereby, and the moſt ſtrong Forts and Places of Reſiſtance, particularly that called Achilles, was conſumed by this Conflagration, which continued the ſpace of two days and as many nights; ſome ſay three days, in the middle of Auguſt. Theodoſius finding himſelf in a condition to do it, paſſed another general Act of Indulgence, as he had done nineteen years before. Then, as we have ſeen, he granted a general pardon for all Arrears due to him from the Year CCCLXVIII, to the Year CCCCVII incluſive, or for forty Years; and now he thought fit in an Edict directed to Taurus the Præfect of the Eaſt, to extend “ this Grace and Favour to the twenty years next following, from the Year “ CCCCVIII, to the CCCCXXVIII, or, as he expreſſeth it, from the ſixth Indiction “ to the eleventh, in as ample and full a manner.“ And becauſe the Numerarii “ and Domeſticks of the Præfects, and Governours of Provinces were ſtill too often knaviſh, and great complaints were made againſt them, he ordered Taurus by another Conſtitution to take care, that at the going out of their Employment, “ they ſhould not be preferred for three years, ſo as by any privileges to be excuſed, “ but ſo as they might be brought to puniſhment for any miſdemeanours committed, “ during their Adminiſtration. And thus he not only remitted Tributes in Arrear, “ but took care that in ſuch payments as were to be made, the Subject ſhould “ not be abuſed.“

Ætius worſteth the Burgandians.

A great Fire at Conſtantinople.

Theodoſius pardons Arrears for twenty years more.

Lib.7.c.38.

L.16. de Indulgent.Debitorum. Cod.Th.

L ult. de Numerariis, &c. Cod.Th. & l.9. de Adſeſſorib. Cod.Juſt.lib. 1. tit.5.

A. D. 434. Areovindo & Aſpare Coſſ.

29. The Year CCCCXXXIIII had for Conſuls Areovindus and Aſpar. The War ſtill went on in Africk with various and doubtful ſucceſs; but the Court of Ravenna was moſt afflicted with a thing which happened within its own Walls. For there Honoria the Siſter of Valentinian, not able to contain, or keep her Virginity, was found to have ſtoln a great Belly, by the help of Eugenius, her Procurator, or Manager of her other matters, and then plotted with him how to deprive her Brother of his Eſtate. The thing being diſcovered, ſhe was only ſent away to Theodoſius, that he might cenſure her as he thought fit, which Marcellinus placeth at this Year, though Baronius refers it to the following from more perfect Copies, as he affirms. Some ſay that ſhe firſt invited Attila, King of the Huns, to come and marry her· and that deſign failing, took her own Servant to ſatisfie her Luſt. She found Theodoſius, certainly, well ſpoken of by the People, not only in reference to the Indulgence he had granted the Year before, as to the Arrears of twenty years of all ordinary payments; but alſo as to another granted this Summer, whereby “ he remitted the Arrears of a Tax, which to ſupply occaſions, had been extraordinarily “ impoſed upon Lands that had been freely given, or relieved from Tributes, “ as the cuſtom was in ſuch caſes, by the management of Antiochus the Præfect three years ago. This he granted by an Edict iſſued out to Taurus, by the Honoria, the Siſter of Valentinian miſcarries in her Reputation.

Other gracious Acts of Theodoſius.

L.15. de Indulgentiis Debitorum, Cod.Th. Dat.12. Cal. Jul.

Titles

A. D. 434.

L.ult. de Frumento urb. Conſtp. Cod.Th. Dat. 5.Cal.Dec. & L.2. Cod. Juſt.eod.tit.

Titles of Præfect and Patrician. And as hereby he pleaſed the Provincials of the Eaſt, ſo he paſſed another Act of State, directed to Leontius, the Præfect of Conſtantinople; which muſt have been as grateful to that City, preſſed theſe years with a Scarcity of Proviſions, as Marcellinus notes. By this he ordered a ſumm of ſix “ hundred and eleven pounds of Gold to be for ever ſet apart for buying of Corn: “ which quantity exceeded much the five hundred pounds he had formerly given. “ This he forbids to be diminiſhed by any Præfect for the time to come, or applyed “ to other Uſes, under pain of forfeiting the double of the Value. “

A. D. 435.

Theodoſio A.15 & Valentiniano A. 4. Coſſ.

Proſper.

Trigetius makes a Peace with the Vandals.

30. The next Year, or the CCCCXXXV of our Lord, was honoured by the fifteenth Conſulſhip of Theodoſius, and the fourth of Valentinian, the two Emperors. It was remarkable to the Weſt in theſe reſpects; that Valentinian having happily entred the tenth of his Reign, as ſome write, went to Rome, and there celebrated his Decennalia in the uſual ſolemn manner. The joy hence conceived was no whit the leſs in that, at the beginning of February, a Peace was made by Trigetius, with Genſerich and his Vandals, by vertue of which they had aſſigned to them that part of Africk lying near Hippo to inhabit. About the ſame time Ætius had very good ſucceſs againſt the Burgundiones in Gall; who, in concluſion, were deſtroyed by the Huns. Sebaſtian, who had been Son in Law to Boniface, the late Patrician, had betaken himſelf to Conſtantinople for Refuge, whence now he privily conveyed himſelf, hoping to find ſome kind of Entertainment in Africk; but ſuch it was as he was to expect in order to his repairing to his long Home, for he was killed there not long after his Arrival. Theodoſius continued this Year at Conſtantinople; where, being free from Wars, he conſulted ſometimes with his Quæſtor; and, at the end of January publiſhed a Conſtitution in favour of the Principes, taken from amongſt the Agentes in Rebus, with whom the Offices of Magiſtrates, and Governors of Provinces were wont to be ſupplied. He permitted them to take ſuch Domeſticks as they pleaſed, whereas ſuch Attendants were wont to be choſen and admitted under the Inſpection of the Primates of the Offices; and farther, gave “ them liberty to take ſuch as had already executed the ſame Charges, which had “ been in other Caſes, formerly unlawful as well as this. “

L.ult.de Principib. Agentum in Rebus, Cod.Th. & L.4. Cod. Juſt.eod. tit. Dat.4.Cal.Febr.

31. And whereas ſome of the Agentes in Rebus, after long Service, were, by the Emperor's Codicils, promoted to be Honorary Principes in reſpect to their health. He allows of this now, if they had ſerved in the Employment five and twenty “ years, and that they enjoy the ſame privileges with thoſe who arrived at the Dignity by ſerving out the whole time, and taking it in courſe: yet ſo, as thoſe who had ob- “ tained Codicils, ſhould, in Salutations and ſitting with the Judges, give place to thoſe who had compleated their full Service, though, as to time, they might be ſuperior “ to them. This Edict is directed to Valerius, the Magiſter Officiorum; but at the bottom it is ſaid, that Copies were alſo ſent to Iſidore, Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt; to Reginus, Præfect of Illyricum; to Leontius, Præfect of the City; Theodotus, Comes of Egypt; Abthartius, Comes of the Eaſt; Cleopater, the Præfectus Auguſtalis; Heſychius, the Proconſul of Achaia; Euſtathius, Vicar of Aſia; and Nectarius, Vicar of Pontica. Now, this Marſhalling of theſe great Officers is not perfectly the ſame with that we have in the Notitia of the Empire, publiſhed about eight years before; for, therein the Proconſul of Achaia is put before the Comes of the Eaſt, and the Præfectus Auguſtalis; and the Comes of Egypt is placed after the Vicars. This ſame year it is very obſerveable, that Paulus, the Magiſter Officiorum, thought fit to reduce the Agentes in Rebus to the number of one thouſand, one hundred, and ſeventy four perſons; who ſometimes, in Reigns of ſome Princes, had been no fewer than ten thouſand. All Stragglers and Abſenters he ſummoned in thrice; and ſuch as came not, he ſtruck out of the Rolls. All this was now, by Theodoſius, confirmed; yet ſo, as theſe Deſertors ſhould not quite be caſhiered, but retained in the Schole as Vacantes or Adſcriptitii, ſo as to ſucceed into the Employment of the Agentes themſelves, as they ſhould die or be preferred: which was the Courſe obſerved, both in this and other Employments, by the Romans, to train up Men by degrees, and make them fit for Service.

The Agentes in Rebus reduced.

L.ult.de Agentibus in Rebus, Cod.Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

32. But, about this time notice was taken of ſeveral Eſtates, which, by reaſon of want of Heirs, or for Treaſon, were fallen to the publick Treaſury. Theodoſius conſidered both how often the Treaſury was defrauded of ſuch Poſſeſſions; and many Perſons injured who had real Title to ſuch pretended forfeited Eſtates; both by reaſon of the careleſs or unjuſt Proſecution of his Officers, and the tricks of ſuch as begged Eſtates ſo confiſcated. To prevent which, he granted out an Edict to Hieritocrates, his Comes Rei Privatæ; by which he enjoyned, that, Upon report “ made “ made of ſuch Eſtates, his own Officials ſhould be ſent down to enquire after “ them; but ſuch as were choſen out on purpoſe, and obliged by Oath to fair and “ honeſt dealings. Theſe Officials ſhould make a true Report hereof to the Gover- “ nor of the Province; who thereupon, the Advocate of the Treaſury being pre- “ ſent, ſhould make a full and thorough Inquiſition into the Nature and Circumſtan- “ ces of ſuch Eſtates; leave being here given to all Perſons concerned to interpoſe and “ defend ſuch Eſtates from any ſuch Imputation. Of this, the Governor of the Pro- “ vince muſt give a full Account to the Emperor himſelf, and ſend up the Acts, and “ an Inventory of the Eſtates to Court; where an Incorporation thereupon ſhould “ be made before any perſon ſhould beg them. In caſe this method be not obſerved, “ The Officers to be ſent down he deprives of one half of their Eſtates if either the “ Treaſury or private Perſons were injured; the Proconſul he threatens with his “ Indignation; and upon the Advocate of the Treaſury he impoſeth the dammage “ which either the Treaſury it ſelf, or any private Perſon concerned, ſhould wrong- “ fully ſuſtain in this Action. So great was the truſt that was impoſed on the Advocate.

A good Law about confiſcated Eſtates.

L.ult.de Bonis Vacantib.Cod. Th.& L.ult.Cod. Juſt.eod.tit. Dat.7.Id.Octob.

A. D. 435.

A. D. 436. Iſidore & Senatore Coſſ.

33. The Conſuls of the Year CCCCXXXVI were Iſidore and Senator. Where Valentinian reſided either the laſt or this year, we do not find by any dates of Laws; but we find Theodoſius at Conſtantinople till toward the end of Auguſt, and then at Apamea. The Province of Gall was now diſturbed by Theodorich, King of the Goths; who, when the former War was ſcarcely compoſed, made another upon the Roman Officers, and laid Siege to the City of Narbon, as Proſper writes: who adds, that he was thence removed by the endeavours of Litorius, a Comes of theſe times. Valentinian, upon rumour of theſe motions of the Goths, ſent away Litorius, ſome ſay, with a great Power of Huns; who finding the City ſorely ſtraitned by Famine, ſent firſt a Supply of Wheat in to the Beſieged (two Modii by every Horſe-man) and when this was known, Theodorich was more eaſily perſwaded by Avitus, a great Man amongſt the Arverni, and of good repute both with Emperor and Goth, to raiſe the Siege, and get him gone. While the endeavours of the Government of the Weſt tended to ſuccour its Subjects from the violence of Foreign Enemies, Theodoſius employed himſelf in giving relief to ſuch of his as were oppoſed by their Fellow-Subjects. Particularly, in Egypt, Gigantius a Cappadocian, and about this time Corrector of Auguſtamnica, miſerably oppreſſed the Inhabitants by ſeveral ſorts of miſchiefs; and, amongſt others, by laying on them a new and unwonted Tax, ſo grievous and burthenſome, that many were forced to run their Country. For theſe his pranks he was, by the Emperors Command, apprehended, caſt into Priſon, and puniſhed as he had deſerved, as appears from the Epiſtles of Iſidorus Peluſiota, ſo called, from his Country Peluſium, which was the Metropolis of Auguſtamnica. But, beſides the puniſhing of his Perſon, there was need to prevent ſuch Rapacity for the future. And, upon this, or other ſuch occaſions, we find, this year, a large Conſtitution directed to Iſidore, the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt.

L. 3. de Indictionibus, Cod. Th. Dat. prid. Non. Jun. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Theodoſius very kind to the Egyptians.

34. This provides for the ſecurity of the Egyptians in general; but particularly, for the intereſt of the Alexandrians. It ſignifies that the year before, the Provin- “ cials, out of ignorance, had been compelled to pay ſuch Impoſitions as afterward “ the event ſhewed to have been undue. And therefore, to prevent the like, the “ Præfect is ordered to cauſe the Indiction to be made publick in places of greateſt re- “ ſort, before the Calends or firſt of May. About this time the Indictions of Egypt, “ as well as Antioch, began; though ordinarily, in other places, in September. “ The reaſon was, becauſe Harveſt was commonly got in about this time; for, they ſowed when Nile was returned to its Channel in the beginning of November, and began to reap a little before the beginning of April, though in Paleſtine they ſcarcely got in their Corn before Whit-Sunday, or Pentecoſt. The Edict for the “ Tax he will have expoſed for two months together, or from the beginning of “ March; the Copies thereof being ſent throughout the Provinces by the Scriniarii “ belonging to the Præfect, and then publiſhed by the Officials of the Præfectus Auguſtalis, “ the Cohortales belonging to the Governors of the ſeveral Provinces, and “ the Defenſores of the Cities; who are to take care thereof at their peril. “ Prevention of miſchief is a ſort of doing good, but not ſo direct as poſitive Acts of Bounty and Goodneſs. As the Cities of Rome and Conſtantinople had Corn or Bread freely beſtowed by Princes on their Inhabitants, ſo had alſo that of Alexandria by the Munificence of Diocletian; who, after the Overthrow and Death of Achilleus, committed horrid Outrages in that Country; but yet ordained ſeveral things which highly conduced to the Settlement of the Eſtate thereof, and to the Emolument of that City. Conſtantine the Great had alſo been kind to the Poor of that Church. But now Theodoſius was ſo charitable, as to add to the former Allowance, toward the maintenance of the Common People, one hundred and ten Modii by the day; ſo as no Man ſhould be defrauded of what formerly he had enjoyed.

L.ult. de Frumento Alexandrino, Cod.Th. & L.2. Cod. Juſt.eod.tit.

35. But the Companies of the City of Alexandria were bound by ſome ancient Law or Agreement, to cleanſe thoſe Channels which were made for deriving the Water of the Nile into the ſeveral Territories and Fields of that Country. This they found ſo heavy a burthen, that, not well able to ſupport it, they made their Application to Iſidore, the Præfect; and with ſuch Succeſs, that he obtained a Reſcript to be directed to himſelf; Whereby they were freed from that Charge; “ and, in room of their free Contribution, out of the Tolls belonging to the City, “ which they called Dinummium (the ſame with a Denarius) four hundred Solidi “ ſhould be allotted to that Work; which ſhould be repayed out of the Cuſtoms “ laid upon Merchandize or Ships, a Revenue that belonged to the Prince himſelf. “ Here were Bodies or Companies, as Bakers, Suarii, Catabolenſes, Pecuarii, Suſceptores, Mancipes of the Baths, Burners of Lime, and others in this City as well as in Rome and Conſtantinople, who had ſeveral Privileges; as, not to be lyable to extraordinary Impoſitions; not to ſerve in War, except for the guarding of the Gates or Walls: but were obnoxious (for all this) to various Burthens, from one of which they now obtained a Relaxation. Thus Theodoſius conſulted for the Emolument of the Subject in general throughout Egypt, in reſpect to Tributes; and for the benefit of Alexandria, and its Bodies or Companies; nay, its Common People or Inhabitants. It's a wonder if we ſhould find nothing concerning the Curia and the Curiales, the Senate by which that great City was governed; ſo great, that it ſtood, in thoſe days, in competition with Carthage, which of the two ſhould be named firſt after the two Romes.

L.ult de Alexandrinæ Plebis Primatibus Cod. Th.& L.un.Cod. Juſt. eod tit. Dat.Prid.Non. Jun.

36. Yet, becauſe of the turbulent, light and inconſtant humour of that People, Auguſtus formerly had denied them the privilege of having a Senate; forbad alſo, that any Citizen of Alexandria ſhould be choſen into that of Rome: and indeed, for the ſame reaſon ſucceeding Princes were averſe to give leave to any to become free Members of the former City. But at length Severus indulged them ſo far, as to grant them to have a Court, and the Jus Curialium, or Bouleutarum, as they called them; whereas formerly they had lived as when under their own Kings, contented with one Judge, who was nominated by the Emperor. And Caracalla, his Son, though otherwiſe he was very ſevere unto them, permitted that, as other Subjects, they might be choſen into the Roman Senate. After this, the Court became of great fame and eſteem according to the greatneſs and importance of the place; in ſo much, that Theodoſius the Great wrote to them by the name of Senators of the City of Alexandria: and now, his Grand-ſon thought fit to grace them with farther privileges. The chief of the Court, uſually ten in number, were, as we have ſeen, called Principales, and had greater Immunities than the reſt: to which this Emperor thought fit to add this year, that, They ſhould not be forced “ to undertake a Journey, or to carry a Meſſage to Court; nor to undergo any “ publick Charge out of their City, which was intended rather for the advantage “ of the place than of them: it's Safety and Honour much depending on their Preſence, Care and Induſtry. And, this was now ſo far preſſing, that, although “ they were Advocates, and conſequently, by their Learning and Skill in the “ Laws, abler and fitter to undertake ſuch Employments, yet he will have them “ excuſed. “

Particularly to the Alexandrians.

L.189.de Decurionib Cod.Th. & I.56. Cod. Juſt eod.tit. Dat. Prid. Non. Jun.

37. But of theſe Principales, there was a Chief, or Primus, who held the firſt place in, and governed the Seſſion; who deſerving, in that reſpect, more than others, Theodoſius, by this Conſtitution, confers on him the Dignity of Comes of the firſt Rank; which drew along with it the Senatorian Dignity. But yet, we muſt confeſs, with ſome odd and unuſual Circumſtances. As firſt, That he ſhould “ enjoy this Dignity but for five years; whereas uſually, ſuch Honour was conferred for Life. Then, though he was hereby a Senator, he ſhall not be ſubject to “ any Senatorian Function. And, he will have him a Comes; yet ſo, as ſtill to “ remain and ſerve in the Curia of the City. “ But yet, ſtill, amongſt the Principales, beſides the Primus, there were five they called Primates and Summates; who were under the Primus, but were ſuperior to the other Principales. Theſe he will have “ free from Corporal Injuries, Examinations or Puniſhments by Torture; which “ Immunity others of the Curiales formerly enjoyed, but it ſeems it had been broken “ in latter times; and now Theodoſius thought fit to reſtore it to theſe perſons. And “ for “

L.190.ejuſd. tit. & L.57. Cod.Juſt.eod. tit.Dat.prid. Non.Jun.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 436.

for it he gives this reaſon ; that with free Speech they may defend the Intereſt of “ their Country, which, before this, they durſt not uſe for fear of Torture when “ they were to lay open to the ordinary Judges the Grievances under which they laboured “ ; whether of immoderate Impoſitions, of Injuries received from their “ Officials, or ſuch like ; which, in this Country of Egypt were very frequent, and at this very time under Theodorus, the Præfectus Auguſtalis, whom Iſidore taxeth for his inſolent demeanour towards all Men. To ſecure theſe Primates againſt it, the Emperor, in caſe of Miſdemeanour, ordains that they be only puniſhed by “ the Purſe, and that the Mulct be impoſed by the Præfect in the Court, before all “ the Curiales. “ For the encouragement of ſuch as had continued long and worthily in Service of the Court (poſſibly thirty years) he ordains further, That they be “ excuſed from Corporal or Perſonal Services, though not from Patrimonial or Pecuniary “ ; for theſe were often divided. “ And becauſe oftentimes it happened, that ſome Perſons not at all obliged to undertake theſe Services, would voluntarily become Curiales, either out of love to their Country, or by the motion and perſwaſion of the Principales ; particularly, the Hypomnematographus : who, being the ſecond in place, was wont to nominate perſons to publick Functions, diſtribute Offices, and keep the Records of ſuch Tranſactions : and whereas the Præfectus Auguſtalis would often interpoſe, and, ſome way or other corrupted, hinder ſuch Agreements, Theodoſius declares, that, His conſent, which he affirms, was moſt “ commonly mercenary, ſhall not be expected ; but he ſhall admit and confirm ſuch “ Agreements upon Application made to him by both the Parties, under pain of incurring “ a Fine of twenty five pounds of Gold. “

L.191.ejuſd.tit. & L.58. Cod. Juſt.eod. tit.

L.ult.de Decurionib.Cod.Th. & L.59. Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.

To the Officers of his Revenue.

38. Thus kind was the Emperor to the Courts and the Members thereof, as often his Predeceſſors to their Subjects ; but of Indulgence to their own Officers belonging to the Revenue we ſeldom hear. But, about this time ſeveral of the Suſceptors, or Gatherers of the Proviſions in kind, being in Arrear of what ſhould have been paid into the Arca of the Præfectus Prætorio ; Iſidore holding that place, ſummoned them in, and ſet them certain Summs of Mony in lieu of them. This Taxation, or Exchange ſeemed to Theodoſius very moderate ; yet, they thinking it otherwiſe, petitioned him for a milder Compoſition : and he was ſo inclinable to ſhew mercy, that he forgave them the one half of what was due before the tenth Indiction or “ the CCCCXXVII of our Lord ; commanding the reſt to be duly paid. “ Iſidore continued Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt till toward the month of September, and then was ſucceeded by Darius ; to whom we find a Conſtitution directed on the eight and twentieth of Auguſt. This was of Indulgence alſo, in reference to the Exchange of Mony for Tributes in Specie : and herein to confirm the Privileges granted by former Princes, and to put an Honor upon Cyrus, an eminent Prelate, who was Biſhop, at this time, of Afrodiſias, the Metropolis of Caria ; and had lately done good Service to the Church, in the Council of Epheſus, againſt the Heretick Neſtorius. He declares his Merits to be ſuch, that he ſhall not be prohibited “ to make uſe of a ſpecial Indulgence, contrary to this general Sanction. But “ otherwiſe, he declares, that, at the end of five years, an Eſtimation being made “ of the Profits or Revenue ; and the Fertility and Sterility being compared, the “ Poſſeſſor may pay a fifth part of the Value ; and that, according to the ordinary “ Market Rate of that Year. “ This Law is dated at Apamea, of which there were two ; one in Bithynia, and the other in Phrygia : the latter of which, called alſo Cibotos, was neareſt to Cyzicus ; whither Marcellinus reports Theodoſius to have repaired by Water this Year, and to have been very gratious to the place. It made up, with other Injunctions, a larger Conſtitution, by vertue of another part whereof Darius was enjoyned, as formerly his Predeceſſor Iſidore had been, to “ take ſpecial care, that before the beginning of the Indiction, timely notice ſhould “ be given of the quantity of the Tax ; that the Officials might not cheat the Provincials “, by pretending it greater than indeed it was. “ Adæratio.

L.ult.de Indulg. Debitorum, Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

To Cyrus, an eminent Prelate.

L.ult.de Annona & Tributis, Cod.Th.Dat.5. Cal.Septemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria & hiſtorica.

L.ult. de Indictionib. Cod.Th. & L.ult. Cod. Juſt.tod.tit.

A. D. 437.

Ætio & Sigeſvulto, Coſſ.

39. The Year CCCCXXXVII had for Conſuls, Ætius and Sigeſvultus. Theodoſius continued this Year at Conſtantinople, whither he had returned out of Aſia in October. Where Valentinian had his Abode is ſomething uncertain, though this be certain enough, that, at the latter end of the preceding, or in this he made a Journey Eaſtward, to marry Eudoxia, the Daughter of Theodoſius. Proſper, Marcellinus, the Chronicon of Caſſiodorus, and others, ſet it at this Year. But Socrates, who living at this time, and concluding his Hiſtory ſhortly after, had better reaſon to know the truth ; writes, that they were married in the Conſulſhip of Iſidore and Senator. That Theodoſius having granted his Requeſt, it was conſidered what place

Lib.7.c.43.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 437.

place would be moſt convenient to meet at, betwixt Rome and Conſtantinople, for conſummating the Marriage; and Theſſalonica was moſt approved, as in the middle way. But Valentinian, as became a briſk Lover, deſired him not to trouble himſelf, for he would come to Conſtantinople, and fetch his Bride himſelf. And accordingly, when he had placed his Affairs of the Weſt in ſafe hands, he went thither: and having conſummated the Marriage, returned ſpeedily again into his own Dominions. Some write, that he purchaſed his Wife by quitting part of Illyricum; whereas one would have expected, that he ſhould rather have received the other part in Portion with her. But, while Valentinian was thus engaged in matters of Love and Marriage, Littorius, his Officer, being diſintangled from the Tumults of the Goths, made War upon the Aremoricans; who, not long before, had revolted. He did not think the Goths would ſo ſoon return to their turbulent humour, as it happened: for, no ſooner was the Rod removed out of their ſight; no ſooner was he withdrawn, but they renewed their Hoſtilities, and fell into the Country of the Arverni; which they waſted with all ſorts of Calamities. But, upon Littorius his returning victoriouſly from Aremorica, and bringing a power of Huns to aſſiſt him, they were eaſily obliged to ceaſe their Depredations, and retire to the place from whence they came.

Valentinian marries the Daughter of Theodoſius.

ἄθις ἐπὶ τὰ ἑσπέρια μέρη ἀνέστραμεν.

40. What Portion ſoever Theodoſius gave with his Daughter, or what Contract was made about the Marriage, in a Conſtitution of this Year, and the laſt of all that his Code contains, he gives him the Title of his Lord and Son: but this he might do out of other reſpects, as well as the newly contracted Relation. Herein he confirms the Privileges he had granted to the Decuriones and Silentiarii five Years before, in contemplation of their merits. And beſides theſe, he adds others " of his own Grace and Favour. As, that they ſhall enjoy the Honour of Senators, " but be excuſed from the burthens belonging to perſons of that rank; as " the Prætorſhip, and the Glebalis Collatio. That they ſhall be excuſed from the Metatus, " whether their Houſes be in Conſtantinople, or in other Cities; ſo as not to " be bound to find Lodging for any, of what Dignity ſoever; whereas the Illuſtres " only were wont to be indulged in this kind. But he declares, that theſe Privileges " ſhall be underſtood, not to extend to any Supernumeraries, but to thirty Silentiarii, " and three Decuriones; to which number he had reduced them. And " ſuch only ſhall enjoy them as have continued and demeaned themſelves unblameable " in the Service for the ſpace of thirteen Years; or, as he expreſſeth it, conti- " nued their Watches or Attendance ſo long. " Whereby he expreſſeth the particular Duty and Service of theſe Men, who, as we have formerly ſaid, watched and warded about the Emperor's Bed-chamber, at the ſecond Velum, or Hanging, when he was in Conſiſtory, or had any buſineſs with his Council, or treated upon any Meſſages brought out of the Provinces. There they both commanded ſilence, and were in a condition to procure it, being armed, for the eaſe and ſecurity of the Prince. This Edict is not dated with the names of the Conſuls of the preſent Year, but thus: After the Conſulſhip of Iſidore and Senator, although in the middle of March, which was much, that their names ſhould not be known at that time.

The laſt Conſtitution in Theodoſius his Code in behalf of the Silentiarii.

Decurionum & Silentiariorum meritis provocati conlata in eos beneficia quæ Dominus ac Filius noſter Valentinianus ſemper Auguſtus erga eos contulit, confirmamus, &c. L. ult. Cod. Th. de Decurionibus & Silentiariis, Dat. 18. Cal. Apr.

A. D. 438. Theodoſio A. 16. & Fauſto, Coſſ.

41. For the next, or the CCCCXXXVIII of our Saviour, Theodoſius himſelf, the ſixteenth time, took the Conſular Ornaments; and with him was joyned Fauſtus in the Weſt. Nothing ſo memorable happened this Year, as the Confirmation of Theodoſius his Code, which had been compoſed in the former. As in all States and Dominions Laws are made pro re nata, and according to the Exigency of Affairs, in proceſs of time they ordinarily grow to a great number; and, as accidents and circumſtances vary, ſo become often obſolete and out of uſe, though they continue to be Hiſtorical, and to ſhew the ſtate of the times when they were ordained: So happened it at this time with the Laws of the Romans, eſpecially, the Conſtitutions of Emperors; and there was need to make ſome diſcrimination betwixt them that were indeed uſelſs, and ſuch as continued to be directive to the preſent Conduct of Affairs. Formerly ſome had taken the pains to gather into Bodies the Edicts of ſome particular Princes; but there were none that came forth entire, or conſiderable for their quantity and uſe, till thoſe called Codex Gregorianus and Hermogenianus ſaw the light, in the days of Diocletian, and about ten Years before Conſtantine the Great. They were of great moment, as appears by the uſe made of them in after times, though they be now loſt, as to us. Yet it appears not whether they were publiſhed by publick Authority or not: and its alſo uncertain who were their Authors, who this Gregorius and Hermogenes ſhould be; though ſome are ſo bold as to make conjectures. However, they both fetch'd the Original of their Collections from the Emperor Adrian; who is, by ſeveral Writers, named,

Vide Gothofr. in Prolegomenis ad Cod. Theod.

as

Sect. 4.

A. D. 438.

as a Prince who altered and reformed the Law, and perhaps chiefly upon this Account; that, in his time was framed the Edictum Perpetuum, which was to be a ſtanding Rule for Law, and an Epitome thereof; of which theſe Writings were generally Comments, which now are found in the Pandects, and the method of which was followed by Hermogenianus, in his Code; who lived, as ſeveral conjectures would perſwade us, during the Government of Conſtantine his Sons. And, probable it is, that both of them being Pagans, and finding many old Cuſtoms to be altered by Chriſtian Princes; out of zeal to the ancient Conſtitutions, that they might not be forgotten, they made thoſe Collections.

Theodoſius his Code confirmed.

42. That Chriſtians might not be behind with them herein, the Theodoſian Code was at this time compoſed; in which were collected ſuch Conſtitutions as had been made by the Emperors of our Profeſſion, from the time of Conſtantine, who, by Julian and his fellow Pagans, was railed on for an Innovator, though he took away the doubtful tricks and ambages of the old Law, and brought it down to a Conformity with the goodneſs and mercifulneſs of Chriſtianity; and eſpecially, with that morality and oppoſition to Vice, which true Chriſtians, according to the indiſpenſable Rules of their Religion, own to be neceſſary for the attainment of that happineſs which it propoſeth. But Theodoſius ſignifies in the Novel which this year, on the fifteenth of February, he publiſhed, for the confirmation of this his Code: that, The great loſs which Profeſſors of Law were at, how to regulate their Studies, “ was the great motive to this his undertaking. For, the Books of Law were “ ſo voluminous, that they knew not where to begin or fix: and that proved ſo “ great a diſcouragement, that he complains how few in his time were eminent in “ this Study. To prevent all confuſion, he commands, that, after the firſt of January, “ this Code be made uſe of in all Deciſions, as the Standard of Law. And, unwilling “ to defraud of their due praiſe thoſe who aſſiſted at the Collection, being “ Men of approved Fidelity, famous Learning, and to be compared with the Antients, “ He makes mention of Antiochus, who had been both Præfect and Conſul; “ Marcellinus, who had executed the Office of Quæſtor of the Palace; Martyrius, “ at preſent a Comes, and his Quæſtor; all three Illuſtrious in Dignity. To them he “ adds five more, and all of the Title of Spectabilis; as Sperantius, Apollodorus and “ Theodorus; all Comites of his ſacred Conſiſtory: Eugenius, his Comes, and Magiſter “ Memoriæ: and, in the laſt place, Procopius, a Comes alſo, who had been “ Magiſter Libellorum. At the cloſe of the Law he calls Florentius, the Præfectus “ Prætorio of the Eaſt, to whom he directs it, his moſt dear and moſt loving Parent; “ and orders his Illuſtrious and Magnificent Authority, to which it was a familiar “ thing to pleaſe Princes, by his publiſhed Edicts, to cauſe this Decree of his “ Imperial Majeſty to come to the knowledge of all People and Provinces. “ It bears date, as we ſaid, on the fifteenth of February; but the fifteenth Conſulſhip of Theodoſius is corruptly ſet for the ſixteenth; as many Conſtitutions do evidence in his Code, which were made after that of his fifteenth Conſulſhip, and as the Reader hath ſeen.

Theod. Novel. 1. Dat. 15. Cal. Mart. Theodoſio A. Conſ. 15. Et qui fuerit nunciatus.

43. The main thing he propounded to the Compilers was, To extricate the “ Laws from tediouſneſs and obſcurity wherein they were involved, by cutting off “ the Prefaces and other Circumſtantials; whereby, though the memories of Lawyers “ might be eaſed, yet Hiſtory could not but ſuffer in its Evidence and Perſpicuity. “ That this Code may the more obtain, he forbids any Conſtitution, for the “ time to come, made by his Son Valentinian, to be of force, except it be firſt “ intimated to himſelf; and others going out in his own name, to be Authentical, “ if not contained in his Code; except relating to the Militia, and matters “ of Expenſes belonging to the Palatine Offices. “ But of the profitableneſs of this Book let the Reader, by the uſe he ſees now made of it, judge; and how far it came to be received for Law in after times, both by the Romans, and Barbarous Nations we ſhall in due time diſcover.

The Notitia Imperii.

Now that we are ſpeaking of Books, we muſt take notice of another very uſeful one, compiled about this time, at leaſt, compleated; and that is, the Notitia of the Empire, of which we have made ſo much uſe in this Volume; which both gives ſo much light, and receives ſo much illuſtration from the Code. It's inſcribed thus, The Notitia of all the Dignities, as well Civil as Military, in the Parts of the Eaſt, and of the Weſt: and in it, indeed, is contained the Forces, Garriſons, Magiſtrates, Ornaments, and Strength; in a word, all the Greatneſs and Importance of the Empire, in admirable order and method. By reading of this Book, the ſenſe of many Laws is to be made out, and many obſcure places in Hiſtories cleared. Auguſtus, as we formerly hinted, firſt began a Work of this nature; for with his own hand he wrote a Book wherein were contained the publick Forces, what Aſſociates as well as natural Subjects were in Arms, how many Fleets were maintained, what Kingdoms were in ſubjection, what were the Tributes and Cuſtoms of the Provinces, and what the Expences were; and this he delivered to the Magiſtrates and Senators, whom he ſent for to his Houſe, when he had thoughts of reſigning the Government. This Book was kept, and the courſe obſerved by ſucceeding Princes, who added and altered as there was occaſion. It was called alſo the Laterculum from the ſhape and figure of it.

Vide Præf. Panciroli in Not.

44. But the Provinces being divided, the Magiſtrates increaſed, and new Palatine Dignities being found out, and by reaſon of new Enemies riſing up from all Quarters, more numerous Forces being raiſed, all theſe this Laterculum could not contain. And therefore a new Book was made, called the Leſſer Laterculum, and therein were ſet down and deſcribed the Præfectſhips, Tribuneſhips and Governments of Caſtles and Forts made for defence of the Limits; and this was kept in the Scrinium Memoriæ, under the Diſpoſition of the Quæſtor. Out of theſe Books was the Notitia of the Empire compiled, and, as we ſaid, about this time; for as to the very time indeed there is no certainty. Gothofred thinks it was made about ten or eleven years before the publiſhing of the Code. Pancirolus concludes it done toward the latter end of this Theodoſius his Reign, for ſeveral reaſons. Under the Dux of Ægypt it makes mention of the Ala Theodoſiana, which was inſtituted in his time, and takes notice of the Saxon Limit through Britain; which name was firſt heard of about or after the Year CCCC. He conceives no mention to be made in it of the Vicar of Illyricum, becauſe that Country was about this very time, whereof we write, miſerably waſted by the Huns. And that it could not be written after the Year CCCCLV, is evident, becauſe it mentions the Fabrick or Forge of Concordia, and the Treaſures of Aquileia, and the Money there coined; whereas both Caſſiodorus and Marcellinus write of theſe Cities being deſtroyed by Attila in that Year. In concluſion, Alciate, where-ever he had it, calls it, The Breviary of Theodoſius the Younger. In the ſame Volume, and that ſet before the Notitia, were found Deſcriptions of the Old, and of New Rome, each divided into fourteen Regions, which, though not parts of it but kept in the Offices of the Præfects of the Cities were probably ſet before it for the notableneſs of the Subject. And after it, were placed the Figures of certain Engines relating to War, and to coining, which it ſeems were taken out of the Fabricks belonging to the Magiſter Officiorum, and the Scrinia of the Comes Largitionum, and added as an Ornament to the Work; all which Learned Pancirolus by his Commentaries hath illuſtrated.

When written.

45. But with ſome Copies of this Notitia, another Work hath alſo been found joyned, and which deſerves to be mentioned as a thing of great uſe and advantage; a Treatiſe which declares the diſtance and Names of Cities, Towns, Garriſons, Manſions, Stations and Mutations of the Curſus, where the Poſts, or thoſe that made uſe of the Curſus publicus, were wont to bait and refreſh themſelves, and change their Horſes or Waggons. This Book is commonly known by the name of Antonine's Itinerary, though why ſo called, no Man can well divine. That it was not compoſed by any Emperor that bore that name, as now we find it, ſufficiently appears in that it makes mention of Conſtantinople, Conſtantia, and Maximianopolis, Cities; and the Legions called Joviæ and Herculiæ, which names are of later date by ſome hundreds of years, the Cities being founded by the perſons whoſe names they bore, and the Legions inſtituted by Diocletian and Maximian. Beſides, ſome Copies have it not Antoninus, but Antonius; Flodoardus and others aſcribe it to Æthicus, an ancient Geographer; and an old Manuſcript, as Biſhop Uſher citeth it out of Dempſter, the Author of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Scotland, unto Scotus. But as we ſaid concerning the Notitia of the Dignities of the Empire, that for the ſervice of the State, the Prince and chief Miniſters, ſuch Collections had been made as occaſion ſerved in all Ages, and changed according to accidents, and as the Laws and Cuſtoms altered; ſo doubt we not, but a Notitia, as we may call it, of the ſeveral Cities, Stations, Manſions and Mutations was alſo made, kept and preſerved to reſort to upon occaſion, for the underſtanding of Countries, and direction of Armies in their Marches, the Curſus publicus, Conveyance, of the Annona, and like uſes: and this was alſo interpolated and changed as new places aroſe, or new Names were taken by places. The greateſt Captains, as Alexander and Julius Cæſar, were very careful in their Conqueſts to make Charts

Antonine's Itinerary.

De Primordiis, Eccleſ. Brit. p. 78.

Audacter, ut ſolet, Valeſius in Ammian. Marcellin.p. 403. Coſmographia quæ tota ex Julio Oratore tranſcripta cùm ſit, non Æthici, ſive Ethici ſed Julii Honorii Oratoris Coſmographia dici debet.

See Burton's Commentary upon the Itinerary concerning Britain.

A. D. 438.

and Deſcriptions of Countries for the benefit of themſelves and poſterity. The Perſians had their Countries alſo ſurveyed. Poſſibly what Julius Cæſar, Auguſtus or others began, might receive ſome conſiderable alteration in the days of Antoninus Caracalla, or Antoninus Pius, and thence the Collection might retain his name; though afterward it received great alterations, according to the changes which time produceth. And being kept alſo in the Scrinium Memoriæ, or ſome other Office, as the Latercula were; it was thought fit for the agreeableneſs of the Subject, to be joyned and publiſhed with the Notitia of the Empire.

A. D. 439. Theodoſio A. 17. & Feſto Coſſ.

46. The Year of our Lord CCCCXXXIX had Theodoſius Auguſtus, the Emperor, Conſul now the ſeventeenth time; and with him in the Weſt was joyned Feſtus. Littorius as well as Ætius formerly fought proſperouſly in Gall againſt the Goths, and partly by the confidence of his good fortune, partly out of emulation to him, and truſting to the Aruſpices and Anſwers of Devils, he was (for he was a Pagan) ſo far tranſported, as hoping to drive them out of the Country, he laid Siege to Tolouſe, their City, and at firſt put their King Theodorich into ſuch a fright, that he ſent ſome Biſhops to offer peace. He thought himſelf ſure of ſucceſs, and rejecting the motion, gave battel to the Goths, who bought the Victory very dear, but the Victory they got, and with this addition, that the confident Pagan Captain was taken Priſoner, and carried captive into that City which he doubted not but to enter in Triumph, where at length he miſerably periſhed, pitied by his very Enemies, as Salvian writes. Valentinian receiving the News of his Defeat, and the loſs of ſuch an Army, commanded Ætius to haſte again into Gall, to repair the Breach that had been made upon the Roman Intereſt; and his very coming had ſuch operation upon the imaginations of the Goths, that they preſently deſired a peace, which was mediated by Avitus then Præfectus Prætorio of that Diſtrict.

Littorius defeated.

Proſper. Iſidorus.

47. But while Ætius was buſie in quenching the flame kindled in Gall, a greater broke out in Africk, where Genſerich raging with all imaginable liberty throughout the Country, at length could not forbear ſetting upon Carthage it ſelf, after the wealth whereof he ſorely thirſted. And the State of that City was truly ſo great and ſplendid at this very time, as might very well tempt and allure a Man of his principles to be dealing with it. Salvian, the more to aggravate the crimes, the Luxury and Debauchery as of all the Africans, ſo of the preſent Carthaginians, preſents his Reader with a proſpect of its Glory. He ſets it forth as always emulous to Rome; in old time as to Arms and Valour; afterwards as to Splendor and Dignity; as the greateſt Adverſary of the Roman City, and another Rome in the African World; what Diſcipline ſoever is wont either to procure or adminiſter the Intereſt and Greatneſs of Places was at this time in it to be found. There were all Inſtruments" of publick Offices or Employments. There were Schools of the Liberal Arts;" there were the Shops, as he terms them, or Work-Houſes, of Philoſophers; in" a word, all Accommodations for Languages and Manners.

Genſerich falls upon Carthage.

A Deſcription of that City.

48. And not only ſo, but it was furniſhed with Soldiers, and ſuch as com-" manded Military Men. There was to be ſeen the honourable Port of a Procon-" ſul, a dayly Judge and Governour, who, as to Name and Title, was indeed a" Proconſul, but a Conſul as to power and greatneſs. There were all ſorts of Offi-" cers, and differing amongſt themſelves as well in Degree as Titles, and in every" Street and Lane thoſe who in a manner governed all the members of the City" and People. This he grudges not to declare, but is aſhamed when he comes to" ſpeak how this City ſwarmed with all ſorts of Vices; how it abounded with all" kinds of Iniquities; how full it was of Tumults, but more of Turpitudes; full of" Wealth, but more of Vice; how the Inhabitants ſurmounted one another in the" naughtineſs of their Wickedneſſes; how ſome contended with others in Rapa-" city, others with their Neighbours in Impurity; ſome languiſhed by drinking" too much Wine, and others were burſten almoſt with Gluttony; ſome were" crowned with Garlands; others were moiſt with Ointments; but all ruined" with various ſorts of Luxury; almoſt all deſtroyed by one death of Errors; not" all ſotted with Drink, but all drunk in ſeveral ſorts of Sins. You would ima-" gine, ſaith he, the People not themſelves, not to be in their Wits, but ſuch as ſtumble," fall, and break their Necks, reeling by Troops after their drunken Bouts, no-" otherwiſe than as the Bacchæ."

The Vices of the Inhabitants.

49. He taxeth them with injuſtice and oppreſſion of Widows and Orphans," and eſpecially inſiſts upon their Impurity and Uncleanneſs, with which all Corn-" ers of the City ſtank." By this we might judge of a Revolution near at hand, Vice the uſual Harbinger being ſo briſk and daring. And it came not far behind,

Carthage

Genſerich his Rage and Cruelty againſt them.

Carthage being taken by Genſerich this October, ſome ſay the nineteenth, and ſome the three and twentieth day. Proſper writes, that he got into it by treachery of peace, or a pretence to friendſhip; but being got in, that he ſeiſed on all their Wealth, and turned it to his own uſe, torturing the Citizens after divers ſorts and manners. That he abſtained not from rifling of Churches, which he turned from their Religious Uſe to be the Habitations of his Men. In ſumm, he bore himſelf cruelly towards the People, but was eſpecially an Enemy to Nobility and Religion, ſo as he might ſeem to make War rather againſt God than Man. Iſidore compendiouſly relates, that violating the Religion of an Oath, he ſeiſed on Carthage, waſted Sicily, beſieged Panormus, ſpread the Plague of Arianiſm throughout Africk, expelled the Prieſts of the Church, and made many Martyrs. Others tell, how having made Captives a great part of the Senators, he made Proclamation that every one ſhould bring in their Gold, Silver, Gems or rich Moveables, on all which he ſeiſed. After this manner he divided the Provinces betwixt him and his Army, reſerving to himſelf Bizacena, Abaritana, Getulia, and part of Numidia; and diſtributing to his Men Africa Zeugitana and Proconſularis. The Biſhops and Noble Perſons he commanded to be driven away from their Poſſeſſions, and ſuch as would not depart, to be made Slaves; which was executed upon many. In particular, he cauſed Quod-vult-Deus, Biſhop of Carthage, and the greateſt part of his Clergy to be put naked and helpleſs on board ſome leaky Veſſels, who yet by the mercy of God got ſafe to Naples in Campania.

Theodoſius ſupplies the Defects of his Code by ſeveral Novel Conſtitutions.

50. The Eaſt all this Year was in reaſonable quiet, and gave Theodoſius leiſure to perfect ſuch deſigns as he had about his Laws, of which he found ſome defect already in his Code, as not anſwering all caſes which daily occurred. For now was found great inconvenience in having the Aſſeſſors of Judges to continue too long in their own Provinces, by the opportunities they had by reaſon of long acquaintance to be partial, and therefore Florentius the Præfect was commanded to ſuffer no ſuch Counſellor or Aſſiſtant to continue above four Months, as the “ Laws formerly had ordained, under pain of forfeiture of Eſtates, and incurring “ a publick crime, except they had the Emperor's or the Præfect's leave for ſo do- “ ing. For the better conveyance of Corn, and the Felix Embola, as they called “ it, he was alſo commanded this Spring, that no Ship carrying above the Burthen “ of two thouſand Modii till that was done ſhould be excuſed by any privilege or “ immunity ſoever, however procured, or pretended to, though under the Empe- “ ror's own hand, which he is required to obſerve alſo in general in all Immunities “ granted contrary to Law or the publick Utility.“ But ſuch Veſſel thus withdrawn ſhall be forfeited and ſold; and this, Florentius is commanded by his Edicts to ſignifie. Great Complaint was made alſo this Spring concerning Advocates, how the Curiales forſook their Charges, and filled the Courts of the Præfects. To “ prevent which inconveniences, Theodoſius thought fit to limit the Number of “ Advocates of the Præfects Court of the Eaſt, to that of one hundred, and that “ thoſe of inferior Judges might be duly and fitly ſerved with Pleaders, he took “ care for preſerving them from the violence of great Men, and having other Bur- “ thens impoſed upon them. And in September following, he thought fit to extend “ all Immunities granted to the Advocates of the Præfectſhip of the Eaſt, to thoſe “ that pleaded in the Court of that of Illyricum, by a Reſcript directed to Theſſalius, “ who was now Præfect of that Diſtrict.

L.10.de Adſeſſorib.&c. Cod. Juſt.l.1.tit.5. Dat.13. Cal. Febr.

L.2. de Navibus non excuſandis, Cod. Juſt.lib.11.tit. 3. Dat.9. Id. Apr. & L. Novel.15. Theodoſii de Navibus, ultra duorum, &c.

Novel.16.de Poſtulando,&c. hinc deſumpta eſt, L.6. de Advocatis, &c. Cod.Juſt.lib.2. tit.7. Dat.8. Cal.Mart.

L.7. de Advocatis,&c. ejuſd. tit.Dat.6.Id. Septemb.

51. Florentius in June acquainted his Maſter with another Miſcarriage, for which he alſo received thanks. It had been alſo an uſual practice to beg thoſe publick Lands which in the Eaſt were appointed to publick Charges; as the defence of the Borders, the maintenance of Soldiers upon the Limits, as alſo thoſe that belonged to the Patrimony of the Prince, and Paſture Grounds, ſo as the charge of thoſe Grounds exceeded the Profit or Revenue. Theodoſius acknowledges this to be very ill Husbandry, and ſo ſtrictly and ſeverely prohibits the practice of beg- “ ging thoſe Lands, or bringing them into private hands, that any ſuch Beggar, or “ any Office which ſhall admit ſuch a Petition, though backed with the Emperor's “ own order, he will have incur no leſs a Fine than of fifty pounds of Gold. “ We have formerly told the Reader how it was the cuſtom for the Emperors Houſes and Places to have Titles or Inſcriptions ſet upon them, as alſo they had Purple Banners to diſtinguiſh them; & this Honorius had made unlawful to be uſed by any Subject. When Lands were ſeiſed for his uſe, the Officers were wont to affix theſe Titles: & now it was wont to be practiſed by other private perſons, poſſibly to bring the Eſtates of thoſe they hated into trouble, and make them queſtionable by the Treaſury, Nov Th.12.c.2. & hinc deſumpta, L.13. de Fundis Patrimonialib. Cod. Juſt.lib.11. tit. 61.Dat.6.Id. Jun.

ſury, inſomuch that Theodoſius thought fit to make it no leſs than capital for any perſon of mean condition to affix any ſuch Titles or Banners to the Eſtates of private Men. And if he were a Curialis, or of higher condition he puniſheth him “ with Deportation; it being lawful for any to break or rent them ſo affixed, with- “ out being proceeded againſt for ſo doing in any Court, upon pain of three hundred- “ pounds of Gold to be incurred by any Judge, or his Office, admitting ſuch Accuſation.

l.2. ut Nemo privatus titulos, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 16. Dat. 15. Cal: Jul. ad Florentium.

52. The Office and Dignity of a Præfectus Prætorio was ſo high, that there was no appealing from him; and eſpecially if the Sentence was given for the Court, or aſſerting of his Juriſdiction. But Thalaſſus the Præfect of Illyricum was ſo honeſt, as to let the Emperor know the extravagance of this Law, or Conſtitution, and of what injuſtice it was full, that people ſometime injured by an unequal ſentence could have no remedy. Theodoſius acknowledged the ſeaſonableneſs of his advice, and though he did not grant a formal appeal, yet in caſe of ſuch oppreſſion ſuppoſed, though the ſentence had been for the Court, he gave free liberty for any to ſup- “ plicate, himſelf, for relief againſt ſuch ſentence, which if they did within two “ years, the buſineſs ſhould be heard, or elſe the ſentence remain ſettled and valid. “ He bids his illuſtrious and magnificent Authority, whom, according to the cuſtom, when a Patritian, he terms alſo Parent of the Auguſti, to take notice, that that “ Conſtitution which made it unlawful to ſupplicate againſt a ſentence paſſed for the “ Court, is utterly repealed and null, and that it ſhall be lawful to offer Petitions a- “ gainſt the Cognitional Sentences of his Bench, within two years, to be accounted af- “ ter the ſucceſſion of the Judge. “ In concluſion, that the profit ariſing from this Law be not concealed, he orders him by his Edicts to cauſe it to become known to all Men. Florentius the Præfect of the Eaſt, and Exconſul, acquainted him about the ſame time, how many of the Curiales of his Diſtrict aſpiring to the honour of Senators, by reaſon of the Burthen of Prætorſhip, were ſo exhauſted in their Fortunes, that they were not able to ſupport the Charges of the Corporations. For redreſs of this Grievance to the Country, Theodoſius wrote to the Senate of Con- “ ſtantinople, and putting them in mind how it was their Duty, under him, and by “ his direction to look to the Concernments of the State, forbade, that for the time “ to come any of theſe Men ſhould aſpire to the Senatorian Dignity, and the So- “ ciety of Clariſſimi. And for ſuch as had already obtain'd it, but as yet had not “ undergone the Prætorſhip, that they ſhould be excuſed from that Charge the “ better to enable them to perform what was incumbent on them in the Country. “

Novel Th. 6. Dat. 3. Id. Aug.

Novel. Th. 8. Dat. prid. Id. Septemb.

53. The ſame day, or the next following, by another new Conſtitution he endeavoured yet further to ſupply what was wanting in his Code. He took notice, that there was no better way to cauſe the Barbarous Nations to ſubmit to his Empire “ and Victories, than by ſecuring the advantages of peace by good and wholſome “ Laws. Meditating both night and day how this might beſt be effected, and con- “ ſidering well the ſtate of Mankind, he imagined it a matter of no mean conſe- “ quence, to aſſiſt the Dying in making their laſt Wills; that every Man might “ leave his Eſtate as he pleaſed himſelf; that he might have his Will in his own “ power: that no Man might be obliged againſt his mind, either to ſpeak or hold “ his peace. Foraſmuch as that only is a Teſtament, which contains the meer “ Will and Intention of the Teſtator; and the nature of man is ſuch, that ſome he “ loves, and others he fears; to ſome bears good will, others he ſuſpects: ſome he “ truſts, others he dare not employ; and yet dare not acknowledge what he thinks “ of each in particular. In former times they were wont to ſhew their written “ Wills to Witneſſes, and require their Teſtimonies to them. But now ſuch cau- “ tion not being uſed as in former Ages, and the Witneſſes inquiring into the Con- “ tents of what was written; it was come to that paſs, that perſons generally be- “ ing fearful to publiſh their thoughts, and not daring to commit their ſecrets unto “ Witneſſes, leſt they ſhould offend thoſe who gaped after their Eſtates, they choſe “ rather to die inteſtate, than dangerouſly to expoſe their inward ſentiments. There- “ fore to give relief in this caſe, he declared, That it ſhould be lawful for ſuch as “ made their Teſtaments in Writing, if they deſired that none ſhould know the “ Contents thereof, to produce them ſealed up, folded, bound, or covered as they “ pleaſed, written with the hands of the Teſtators themſelves, or of others, and “ offer theſe Writings to ſeven Roman Citizens in number, deſired to be Witneſſes, “ to be ſigned and ſubſcribed by them. Provided the Teſtator, in the hearing of “ them all there preſent, affirmed the Writing to be his Teſtament, and ſubſcribed “ it himſelf; if he did not write it all or part, in the other parts where he ought to ſub- “ ſcribe it, and that in their preſence. This being done, & the Witneſſes ſubſcribing & “ ſigning

Novel. Th. 9. Dat. prid. Id. Septemb.

In caſe of Teſtaments.

Et hinc deſumpta. L. 21. de Teſtamentis. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 23. Dat. tamen Idib. ipſis Sept.

ſigning one and the ſame day & time,the Teſtament ſhould be valid,& not therefore“ to be of no force, becauſe the Witneſſes were ignorant what was therein contained.“

54. In caſe the Teſtator was unlearned, or could not ſubſcribe, he might “ make uſe of an eighth perſon, the ſame Solemnities being obſerved. But in all “ Teſtaments which were dictated,either in the abſence or preſence of Witneſſes,he “ declared it ſuperfluous to require, that at one & the ſame time the Teſtator ſhould “ both have his Witneſſes ready, dictate his mind,and complete the Teſtament. But “ though it was dictated or written at another time,& afterward produced,it ſhould “ ſuffice, if at one and the ſame, no Act intervening,all the Witneſſes together,and “ not at divers times, ſubſcribed and ſigned it. For he decreed,that the Subſcriptions “ and Seals of the Witneſſes ſhould be taken to complete the Teſtament, “ whereas that which wanted them was to be accounted and taken as imperfect. “ And his pleaſure was, that the Will of the dead ſhould not hold or bind by virtue “ of an imperfect Teſtament, except in behalf of the children of the deceaſed. “ As for a Nuncupation or Teſtament made without writing, he would not “ have it of force, except ſeven Witneſſes at one and the ſame time, as aforeſaid, were gathered together, and heard the Will of the Teſtator, or him that “ made the Teſtament without Writing, and that he was reſolved to make “ his Will before them at the ſame time without Writing. In caſe any one “ made a perfect Teſtament, and afterwards happened to make another, the former “ ſhould not be nulled by the latter, except it was complete in Law, and conſummate “ : except in the former thoſe were named Heirs who could not have ſucceeded “ the party if he had died inteſtate, and in the latter ſuch were named, “ who, if he had died inteſtate, muſt have ſucceeded him. For in this caſe, “ though the latter writing may ſeem imperfect, yet the former Teſtament being “ invalidated, his ſecond Will ſhall take place, not as a Teſtament, but as a Will “ of an Inteſtate ; in which Will the Depoſitions of five Witneſſes ſhall ſuffice : “ which not obſerved, the former Teſtament ſhall be of force, though Strangers “ in it were named Heirs. And in the laſt place, whereas things that related to the “ Law of Nations, might be tranſacted in any Language, but to the Civil only in “ that of Rome, he thought fit to declare, That liberty had been given to make Teſtaments “ in the Greek Tongue, and it ſhould be lawful to leave Legacies, liberty “ to Slaves,and to aſſign Tutors in the ſame words,and to be valid and lawful as if named “ in Latine. “ Such Indulgence did the caſe of Teſtaments require at this time, whereas in other Ages the tempers of Men and other accidents exacted more ſtrict Solemnities in the making of them, as ours in our own Country now ſeem to do, it having of late ſeemed fit to the wiſdom of our Nation to reduce our liberty of making Wills, from almoſt that of Soldiers, to the ſeverity and ſtrictneſs, well nigh, of the higheſt Roman Laws, to prevent the grievous ſin of perjury.

55. All the care he took for making of wholſome Laws, and ſupplying the defects of former Conſtitutions would be to little purpoſe, if a ſpecial regard were not had to ſuch as ſhould put them in execution ; and of this he thought alſo at the latter end of this Year. Notwithſtanding all care that had been taken, yet ſome perſons crept indirectly into the Government of Provinces, of which Theodoſius having notice, probably from Florentius himſelf ; at the latter end of November he ſent him an expreſs order by way of Reſcript or Edict, That no perſons ſhould be “ admitted to ſuch Governments, as thought to attain them by ambition or reward, “ but were promoted thereto by the teſtimony of an approved life, or of him the “ Præfect. And with this circumſtance, that ſuch as ſhould be advanced to thoſe “ Honours by the choice of his Seat, or the Emperor himſelf, ſhould ſwear “ publickly, that, Neither they, nor any for them had given any thing for obtaining “ theſe Governments, nor would give for the time to come, thereby breaking both the “ Law and their Oath: no, not by any Title of Sale or Donation, or any other colour, “ or pretence of any contract whatſoever : and that for, or by reaſon of ſuch Employments “ gratuitouſly received, their Salaries or Allowances only excepted, they ſhall receive “ nothing for any favour done in the time of their Governments, either while in “ power, or when returned to a private life. And although, he adds, he ſuppoſes no “ Man ſo devoid of the fear of God, as by contemning an Oath, to prefer any “ worldly advantages before his own ſalvation ; yet that neceſſity of danger may “ be ſubjoyned to the fear of Salvation : if any ſhould dare to violate his Oath, he “ grants free liberty of accuſing both Giver and Receiver, as of a publick crime, “ whom he condemns in four-fold of the Value to be levied all manner of ways. “ That the Emperor was put upon this and ſeveral other courſes for reformation of manners,

L.ult. ad Legem Juliam Repetundarum, Cod.Juſt. lib.9. tit.27.Dat.6. Cal. Decemb. Florentio P.P.

The Oath required of every Governor entring into Office.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 439.

manners, and the eaſe of the People, with the honour of the Prince and his Government, by Florentius, we cannot but believe, becauſe of the moſt ample Teſtimony given to his publick Spirit and Generoſity, by an Act of State, dated but a very few days after, and directed to Cyrus; who, at the end of the Year, was advanced to be Præfectus. Prætorio.

Novel. 18 Th. Dat. 8. Id Dec.

The Generoſity and Piety of Florentius.

56. Let Hiſtories, ſaith he, deſerve (or obtain) belief from preſent Examples, “ and let Antiquity be freed from all Ambiguity, when it tells us of Great Men, “ who preferred the Commonwealth before their own Eſtates. We may behold “ the Illuſtrious Florentius, who, ſupported by the Adminiſtration of the Prætorian Præfectſhip, “ by the emulous vertue of an excellent mind, ſtrives, not only “ with the Merits of our Anceſtors, but with his own great Deſerts, toward the “ Commonwealth; the Reputation whereof he hath vindicated, not only by his “ Counſel and Prudence, but alſo by his Devotion and Munificence, from the blot “ and infamy of ſhameful Turpitude. For, obſerving how by the damnable craftineſs “ of Pandors, the inadvertency of the Antients was circumvented, under pretence “ of a certain Luſtral Preſtation, it being lawful to exerciſe a Commerce of “ corrupting of Chaſtity, out of a pious inclination of propagating an Univerſal “ Modeſty, he ſuggeſted to us, that it was one part of the Injury of the preſent “ times, that Pandors were permitted to be in the City, and that the Treaſury was “ furniſhed by their filthy Traffick. And, though he knew that we abominated it, “ and had no reſpect to the Tribute; yet, leſt any dammage ſhould come to our Ærarium, “ he offered us ſo much of his own Eſtate, as, out of the Revenues of which, “ as much profit would ariſe as was wont from that wretched ſort of Trade. Wherefore, “ willingly embracing his forecaſt and munificence, by this laſting Law we “ ordain, that if any hereafter ſhall attempt to proſtitute any Slaves, whether his “ own, or belonging to others; or Bodies of Perſons of Free Condition, but hired “ at a certain rate: theſe miſerable Slaves being ſet at liberty, and the Perſons of “ Free Condition being looſed from their impious Service: ſuch an one, being firſt “ grievouſly laſhed, ſhall be baniſhed out of the Limits of this City, in which he “ preſumed to exerciſe his wicked Craft; for an example to, and the amendment “ of, all other Men. Therefore, Cyrus, the moſt dear Parent of Emperors, ſee that your “ Illuſtrious Authority take order, that theſe things which we have decreed, for pre- “ ſervation of publick Honeſty, be obſerved with all due veneration. Otherwiſe, your “ Office, if it neglect our Precepts, ſhall incur a Fine of twenty pounds of Gold. “ Thus we ſee Theodoſius accepted of Florentius his Offer; and in way of recompence, gave a publick Teſtimony to his merit; which was as little as he could do.

Other things he procured the Emperor to reform.

Novel. 14. Th. & hinc deſumpta, L. un. In quibus cauſis Militantes, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 3. tit. 25.

Novel. Th. 5. & hinc deſumpta, L. 6. In quibus cauſis pignus, vel Hypotheca tacite contrahatur, Cod. Juſt. lib. 8. tit. 15.

57. For, his care extended to ſeveral other things which he urged the Emperor to reform. Courtiers and Soldiers, as alſo, Merchants, by reaſon of their Employments, ſought to evade publick Charges and Taxes, by pretending they were exempt from the Juriſdiction of the ordinary Governors of Provinces: but, by a new Law, he procured him to declare againſt, and null all ſuch pretended Preſcriptions againſt ordinary Courts of Juſtice. The Accidents of former times had provoked the Legiſlators to ſuch Severity againſt Mothers which had Children in their care after the death of their Husbands, that if they did not provide them of Tutors, nor make Inventories of their Eſtates, they ſhould be deprived of the liberty of making Teſtaments, and of power to diſpoſe of any thing they had; and, beſides that, be branded with Infamy. It's the violence and contagion of the Diſeaſe which makes the Medicine and Application violent; and when it abates of its Symptoms, the force of theſe muſt alſo abate. Women were now become ſo careful of their Fatherleſs Children, that Theodoſius thought fit to remove ſo heavy a penalty: yet, as a Father of his Country, he thought himſelf bound to provide for the ſecurity of Orphans. And that, as he ſaith, in cutting off ſuperfluous and inhu- “ mane practiſes, he might not ſeem to promiſe Impunity to Delinquents; in the “ firſt place, he will have ſuch as are to ſucceed a Child, in caſe of death, to know, “ that if, within a year after his Father's death, they do not provide him a Tutor “ according to Law, they ſhall be excluded from inheriting his Eſtate if he die be- “ fore fourteen years of Age. And the ſame thing he will have obſerved, as to “ ſuch Mothers, which having undertaken the Guardianſhip of their Children, “ contrary to their Oath, fly to ſecond Marriages, before they have cauſed other “ Tutors to be choſen, and given account of the management of their Eſtates, and “ put them in poſſeſſion of them. The ſecond Husbands of ſuch Mothers he will “ have obnoxious to the Children; and their very Eſtates obliged, as by way of “ Pledge, to anſwer for the Accounts which their Wives ought to make to the “

A. D. 439.

Guardians of Children by their former Husbands. “ In the laſt place, we ſhall only take notice, that toward the end of this year, Theodoſius again was forced to require the Laws to be put in Execution, that were made to prevent begging of Eſtates; as that, It ſhould not be within a Year after the death of the Party, or the “ Exchequer coming to have Intereſt in the Eſtate. “ This he did, as he ſaith, at the ſuggeſtion of the Illuſtrious Marcellinus, the Comes Largitionum, and then executing the place of the Comes Rei Privatæ; which is remarkable, that both theſe great Offices ſhould be managed by one perſon. But the Edict is directed to Florentius, Præfectus Prætorio, as the former; who, by his Edicts, expoſed it to view at Conſtantinople, on the nineteenth of October.

Novel.Th.44. Suggeſtionem viri Inluſtris Comitis Sacrarum Largitionum Marcellini, vicem agentis viri Inluſtris Comitis rerum privatarum admodum comprobamus, &c.

A. D. 440.

Valentiniano A.5.& Anatolio, Coſſ.

58. We are now arrived at the CCCCXL Year of our Lord; wherein the Emperor Valentinian was Conſul the ſixth time, with Anatolius, Conſul for the Eaſt, according to his name. Genſerich, King of the Vandals, after his taking of Carthage, ſtill proſecuted the War in Africk; and now came, as was ſaid, to a Partition of the Provinces he had ſubdued. To himſelf he reſerved the Provinces Bizacena, Azuritana, Getulia, and part of Numidia: and to the Army, diſtributed by way of Inheritance, Zeugitana and Africa Proconſularis. They coming, and taking poſſeſſion, every where, the poor Provincials were turned out of their Eſtates and Dwellings, and the Biſhops and Clerks thruſt out of their Churches: which put the Biſhops and Nobility upon going to the Tyrant, and petitioning him to have ſome compaſſion on them in this their great diſtreſs. But he ſent them this cruel Anſwer; that he had reſolved to leave none of their Name or Kind, and wondered that they durſt deſire ſuch matters of him That Kingdom he had thus obtained, he now ſet himſelf, by all means, to eſtabliſh: and for that purpoſe, knowing that the Citizens of Carthage were Men of Spirit, would be thoughtful and active, and not eaſily ſubmit their Necks to his Yoak, who could ſcarcely be brought to it by the Romans, he ſiezed on all they had; and drove them to ſuch Streights, that he forced the chiefeſt of them to paſs the Sea, into Italy.

The miſerable condition of the Provincials in Africk.

Victor de Perſec.& Vandalorum, lib. 1. apud Baron. ad h.An.

59. This did well pleaſe him, that he ſhould not leave ſuch Enemies at his back: for, to carry on his great deſign, he reſolved to fall upon, and, if poſſible, to bring under his obedience the Coaſts of the Iſlands, and others which, on the Mediterranean Sea, lay oppoſite to Africk. And getting a Fleet together, he paſſed over into Sicily; which he grievouſly harraſſed and diſtreſſed. What reſiſtance was particularly made againſt him we know not; but we are told by an Epiſtle written by Theodorich, King of Italy, in commendation of Caſſiodorus, his Chancellor, to the Senate of Rome; that Caſſiodorus, his Grandfather, a perſon dignified with the “ Title of Illuſtris, which could not be denied to his Family, freed Sicily and the “ Brutii, by his Arms, from the Incurſions of the Vandals; ſo as he deſerved the “ Primacy of thoſe Provinces which he defended from ſo cruel and ſudden an Enemy. “ He concludes, that the Commonwealth ought it to his Valour, that Genſerich “ did not then invade thoſe neighbouring Provinces; that Genſerich, whom “ Rome afterward found ſo bloody and cruel. “

Caſſiod.Var. lib. 1. Ep.4.

60. Theodoſius this Year further buſied his Quæſtor in compoſing ſeveral Acts of State for the publick good. One for ſhortning Tryals, and cutting off Delays in Suits ariſing from Appeals; of which he aſſigns the fatal terms and periods, whether they lay from the ordinary Judges of Provinces, from Delegates or Superior Magiſtrates. He was well pleaſed with the fidelity of Endoxius, his Comes Rei Privatæ; who acquainted him, toward the latter end of May, with a cuſtom he obſerved that ſome Men had got to work themſelves into the Poſſeſſion of his Patrimonial Lands, under pretence of ſome Contract, ſo as not to pay the Canon, or ordinary Impoſition lying upon them. By a Reſcript he takes notice of his Zeal toward the publick Service; which, if it were diligently proſecuted, would preſerve his Revenue from diminution. And, for prevention of ſuch miſchief, he declares, All “ ſuch Contracts ſhall, for the future, be null where no Canon is to be paid; that “ all the Fruits and Profits be reſtored, and no Preſcription avail any ſuch perſon. “ And, if the Palatine Officers ſuffer ſuch a Contract to be made, or a Petition to “ be preferred, they ſhall incur a Fine of fifty pounds of Gold: ſo as no Pragmatick, “ or Adnotation from the Prince himſelf ſhall be of force, either to make ſuch a bargain valid, “ or to remit the Fine to the Palatines. According to the cuſtom, he “ commands that his Illuſtrious Authority, by his Edicts, cauſe this Law to be made “ publick. “

L.2.de tempor. & Reparation. Appellationum, Cod.Juſt.lib.7. tit.63. Dat.12. Cal.Maii.

Theodoſius ſecures his Revenue.

Novel.Th.28. de Reſcindendis renditionibus Rei Privatæ, & hinc deſumpta, L.ult. de Fundis Rei Privatæ, Cod.Juſt. lib.11.tit.65. Dat. 13.Cal. Jan.

61. Cyrus, the Præfectus Prætorio, put in alſo his Complaint; that, of thoſe that wore the Girdle, the Scholares Cohortales belonging to the Curiæ, and ſuch like, ſeverally declined his Juriſdiction, though guilty of oppreſſing the people, and other Enormities. To which, by another Reſcript, Theodoſius anſwered; and ordained, that Such Criminals ſhould neither avoid his Juriſdiction, nor the ordinary “ one of Governors of ſuch Provinces where the faults were committed.“ This being publiſhed, they that were concerned, to avoid the Inconvenience, pretended the Law not to reach them: ſo that, at the end of the Year, he was forced to explain it by another; wherein he declares Scholares, Comites and Military Tribunes “ to be meant, according to the cuſtom; but not the other armed Soldiers, or Tribunes “ commanding the Numeri. “ This Cyrus, as the Emperor complements him, being now deſigned Conſul for the following Year, ſtill, by his Suggeſtions, put him in mind of ſomething which tended to the publick Utility, or was to be redreſſed; and, in particular, he moved him in behalf of ſuch who ſometimes got ſome ground by Rivers forſaking their wonted Channels, and leaving ſome Lands adjoyning to theirs, which ordinarily accrued to them by way of Allunion, as the Law term was. Now, this advantage was very uncertain; for, as it happened in one day, in another often, it was taken away, and the Poſſeſſors had nothing left to compenſate the charge and trouble about it. However, the Prince his Officers were double diligent to lay claim to ſuch adventitious Grounds, to ſieze and ſell them, or, at leaſt, to lay Impoſitions upon them, as belonging to the Treaſury. Cyrus did this good Office by his Information, as to procure a Reſcript, prohibiting any ſuch practice. And this farther, that if any perſon had drained any Fens, or, by their Coſt and “ Induſtry, recovered any Paſtures or Meadows, they ſhould for ever poſſeſs them, “ without any burthen impoſed, without being ſiezed or begged, under pain of a “ Fine of fifty pounds of Gold to be incurred by the Breakers of this Law; among “ whom, the Officers belonging to the Præfect were to be reckoned, if they promoted “ any ſuch matter, or preferred any petition in order to it. “

A. D. 440.

*Novel.Th.*14. §.2. de amota militantibus fori præſcriptione.Dat. 11.Cal. Octobr. § 3.*Dat.*4. Cal. Jan.

*Novel.Th.*10. de Alluvionibus & palludibus & paſcuis, Dat. 11. Cal.Octobr.

62. He was made ſenſible alſo, the latter end of this Year, that it was a great grievance to the people to have recourſe to himſelf in matter of Appeals: and ſo he owned it; being, as he confeſſeth, often diverted by other Affairs, wherewith he was taken up for the benefit of the World; or, as we may conclude, by other occaſions, made unfit for ſuch intricate and troubleſome buſineſs. He ordained therefore, that, In Appeals from Judges of the Degree of Spectabilis, it ſhould not be “ expected that matters ſhould come before him; But if any appealed from Proconſuls, “ the Præfectus Auguſtalis, Comes of the Eaſt, or Vicars; the Præfectus Prætorio, “ and the Quæſtors of the Palace ſhould have the hearing: as alſo, from a Dux, if “ he was alſo a Preſident, the matter ſhould be of the Præfects Cognizance. Moreover, “ if the ſtate of a Curialis or Cohortalis were in queſtion, the controverſy “ ſhould be decided by the Præfect and Magiſter Militum in caſe of an Appeal, “ though the Magiſter had delegated it to the Preſident of the Province. “ Theſe things he ordained in Edicts directed to Cyrus; who was therein moſt concerned as Judge; and about this Year gratified the City of Conſtantinople, by conveying Water from the Aquæduct of the Palace of Hadrian, to the Baths of Achilles, and thoſe called Nymphææ, which had warm Water. To keep which in order, he procured Reſcripts, forbidding any to make uſe of the Water of that Aquæduct. And, in caſe “ any perſons in his Diſtrict would obtain leave from the Prince, of deriving Water “ from any publick Aquæducts in the Provinces, they muſt intimate it to the Præfect, “ and to none other, under pain of an heavy forfeiture. “

*L.L.*32,33. *de Appellationibus, Cod.Juſt. lib.*7. *tit.*62.

*L.L.*5,6.*de Aquæductu, Cod. Juſt.lib.*11.tit. 42.

63. Though Cyrus had not had theſe Laws to have backed his Authority, yet might his Rules and Methods have been better obſerved in things of this nature, than in an other matter; the regulation of which, by another Edict, was alſo committed unto him. We have formerly ſeen how Princes have been wearied and obliged to make ſeveral Laws about Precedence; and no wonder, conſidering the natural ambition of Men themſelves, the peeviſhneſs of Women, that delight in nothing more than place; and that great variety of Humours and Accidents, which muſt have been in perſons ſo numerous as were thoſe of Quality, inhabiting ſo many ſeveral Provinces. Former Laws and Rules could not, it ſeems, anſwer all Circumſtances of a thing ſo ſubſtantial as this was. And Theodoſius was put upon it, to declare more fully, and in better Rank and Order, what the diſtinction of perſons ſhould be. He let therefore Cyrus to underſtand, that Illuſtrious Perſons, in the firſt place, he diſtinguiſhed into five ſorts. Some had actually diſcharged Offices “ whereby they were rendred Illuſtrious. Others he termed Vacantes, who being “ preſent at Court, had deſerved the Girdle of ſome Illuſtrious Dignity, though “ they did not actually then diſcharge it. The third ſort was of them who being “

A new Act of Precedence.

L. 2. *Ut Dignitatum ordo ſervetur, Cod. Juſt. lib.*12.*tit.*8.

abſent, had the ſame Girdle of Illuſtrious Vacantes ſent unto them. The fourth " of ſuch who, without Adminiſtration or Girdle, had obtained the Honorary Dignity by vertue of Codicils or Letters; and were preſent in Comitatu. And the " laſt, ſuch as being abſent, had the ſaid Codicils of Honorary, though Illuſtrious, " Dignity ſent to them. " All theſe, he declares, ſhall take place as now mentioned.

64. But ſuch as actually execute ſuch Offices, though the Comites Rei Privatæ, ſhall take place of all Vacantes, and Honorary, or Titular Perſons. But, as for the Vacantes, he doth not think fit they enjoy juſt the ſame privilege; but that they only take place of all ſuch merely Titular and Honorary as are of the ſame Rank and Quality, not all Illuſtrious whatſoever: for example, that a Præfectorian precede a Quæſtorian, but not a Quæſtorian a Præfectorian; and in like manner, a Quæſtorian a Quæſtorian; not that a vacant Comes Theſaurorum, or Comes Rei Privatæ, precede an Honorary Quæſtorian, or Magiſter Officiorum. As for thoſe in actual Employment, he farther will have it known, that for ſuch he will have taken, and eſteemed thoſe Vacantes; to whom he commits ſome Employment, Charge or Dignity; though it be not of the Rank of Illuſtrious, but perhaps, of Clariſſimatus or Perfectiſſimatus. In caſe, to ſuch perſons he had in Sacred Conſiſtory committed, or ſhould commit, any ordinary Dignity; as if, to a vacant Magiſter Militum, the Charge of War, he ſhould be reckoned amongſt the Adminiſtrantes. For, he demands what reaſon there is why Germanus, whom he calls Vir Magnificus, ſhould not go for a vacant Magiſter Militum; to whom he committed the care of the War againſt his Enemies, meaning the Vandals, againſt whom he was ſent with a great Navy. Or, why the moſt excellent Propentadius ſhould not be ſaid to have diſcharged the Præfectſhip; by all whoſe illuſtrious diſpoſitions (in the room of the Præfectus Pratorio) the Soldier, in his Expedition, hath abounded with plenty of Proviſions; which we have ſaid to have been the main Charge and Task of that great Officer.

65. But, when Summer was come, the Alarm was given to Italy, of the Preparations of Genſerich, and his great Deſign, whereſoever it would fall. We cannot ſay that this cauſed Valentinian to remove from Ravenna to Rome, that he might be in better capacity to give Relief to the Maritime Parts, which that Rover would, moſt probably, annoy: but we find him ſo much concerned, as to publiſh an Edict to the people, as the Text now hath it, which is ſaid to be dated at Rome, if Accepted or Publiſhed be not to be read, on the twenty fourth of June; and that concerning the great Affair. He begins with a ſort of excuſe for requiring a Duty from all in general, becauſe the good of all in general is concerned: neither doth he believe it will ſeem troubleſome to the Provincials; that, ſeeing it belongs to the ſecurity of themſelves, they ſhould be preſſed to the reſiſting of Pirates and Robbers. Then he declares that Genſerich, the Enemy of his Empire, is reported to have towed out of the Haven of Carthage no ſmall a Fleet; the ſudden Excurſion and Depradation of which is to be feared by all the Coaſts. Now, although he, out of his ſolicitude for the publick Safety, had placed Garriſons in divers parts; and the Army of his Father, the moſt invincible Prince Theodoſius, drew near; and that moſt excellent perſon, Ætius, his Patritian, would ſhortly arrive with a great power of Men, as he believes: moreover, the moſt Illuſtrious Sigiſundus the Magiſter Militum, watched, with a Body, both of his own Soldiers, and Confederates, for the defence of both Cities and Coaſts: yet, becauſe in the Summer Seaſon it is altogether uncertain where the Enemy may put in, by this Proclamation he admoniſheth all his Subjects, with a confidence in the Roman Power, and with ſuch Courage as becomes them, to undertake the Defence of their own Eſtates and Relations, and that with their own Men if need be (publick Diſcipline always preſerved, as alſo, the modeſty that belongs to Freedom) and to make uſe of ſuch Arms as they can; and, by a faithful Agreement, and a joynt Shield, as it were, protect his Provinces and their own Fortunes, without deſpair utterly to loſe their labour; for, every one ſhall enjoy freely whatſoever he ſhall victoriouſly take from the Enemy.

Novel. Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas, 20. *Dat.*8. Cal.Jul.

Valentinian, by a Proclamation, excites his Subjects of Italy againſt Genſerich.

66. How much this Motive, over and above their own preſervation, might work with the Provincials, we know not; but, how ever they might gain by Spoil and Plunder, they could not but be out of purſe, upon occaſion of the War. For beſides, the Country-men their ſtanding upon their Guard in caſe of Landing; if Land he ſhould, an Army was neceſſary in the Mediterranean Parts; and, for the maintenance of this Army, an anſwerable Income muſt be raiſed. For this, Order was

Sect. 4.

A. D. 440.

was taken by an Edict, which Maximus, Præfectus Prætorio now the ſecond“ time, was commanded to publiſh, ſo as it might come to the knowledge of all“ People and Provinces, whereby all ſorts of Lands were made liable to pay the“ fourth parts of the Tributes, due from the ninth Indiction, ſo as no privilege“ ſhould avail, or protect any, who by any Title were poſſeſſed of the Emperor's“ own Lands, any belonging to the Church, or any Society of Men. And he preſſeth“ it as a very idle and arrogant conceit, that any ſhould eſteem thoſe ſordid“ Services and Employments, ſuch as were repairing High-ways, the making up“ of Arms, repairing of Walls, Proviſion of the Annona, and others, whereby“ the ſplendor of the Empire is provided for; without which nothing of moment“ can be produced; by the aſſiſtance of which the Dignity of the Empire is maintained,“ and indeed no neceſſary matter can be effected. The abſurdity of this“ conceit he much endeavours to diſcover, as alſo the folly of, and Detriment ariſing“ from, that ſtudy and endeavour of rich and dignified perſons, to eaſe themſelves“ by throwing Burthens from their own Shoulders upon the Backs of mean“ and inſolvent perſons: how penny-wiſe, and pound-fooliſh ſuch perſons are.“ This Edict was publiſhed either this or the following Year; but whether of the two we cannot certainly ſay, from the obſcure date of it, as now the Text is corrupted; but that it was in relation to theſe imminent dangers which threatned Italy and the adjacent Provinces, there's little doubt.

Novel.21.Valentiniani inter Theodoſianos. Dat.10. Cal. Mart. Ravennæ. Accepta prid. Idus Mart. ubi ſup.poſt Conſulatum Valentiniano 5. & Anatolio Coſſ.

67. There was another thing which not only hindred the payment of Taxes, but alſo procured a great ſtop to Entercourſe and Traffick, without which Taxes could very badly be paid. Whether it was becauſe ſince the days of Valentinian, as the Reader may remember, the Aurei were raiſed to greater value more than at firſt was intended; and ſince that, others made of as ſmall Weight, but to be of the ſame price and eſtimate, that a grudge remained amongſt the People, or for other reaſons; but now at Rome it was become ordinary to refuſe the Aurei in payments, except undervalued, and at an under Rate. A thing of ſo dangerous conſequence to the Government, that it drew out a Proclamation to the People of that City, whom calling by their old name of Quirites, he acquaints that frequent complaint was made to him, how to the diſgrace of his Parents, the Solidi that were ſtamped with their Images, were refuſed by every Trafficker, which he could not ſuffer“ to go long unpuniſhed. Therefore all are to take notice, that it ſhall be capital“ to any Man whatſoever, who ſhall refuſe any Aureus Solidus of juſt Weight,“ either of the Lord his Father Theodoſius, any of his ſacred Relations, or of former“ Princes, or take it at a lower Rate. He expreſly commands, that a Solidus“ be not put off under ſeven thouſand Nummi, which had been received for ſeven“ thouſand two hundred; the reaſonableneſs of price being the beſt courſe to ſecure“ the advantage of the Seller, and promote Trade. And he ſignifies that in reference“ to a matter of great concern in this Affair, he had cauſed juſt and fit Standards“ of Weights to be made, the obſervance of which, as alſo of the Rule“ given about the Aurei, the Præfect of the City and Office ſhall procure under a“ penalty of ten pounds of Gold.“ We have ſeen how Valentinian took order, that the Burthens of the Soil, or Tributes belonging to the Soil ſhould be paid every where, notwithſtanding Indemnity was pretended by the Quality of the owners. But beſides the quality of perſons in general as Eccleſiaſtick, or as belonging to ſome Body or Society, ſometimes perſonal privileges were wont to be procured; with which however Princes might play at ſome times, yet generally the thing was very bad, and in ſuch days ſo full of danger, and requiring ſuch expence, it was altogether miſchievous. As ſuch, he now owns it to Maximus the Præfect by“ another Reſcript founded upon his ſuggeſtion, and commands that an equality of“ Taxes be obſerved, and all ſuch privileges granted to be of no force.“

Another for aſſerting the value of the Aurei.

Novel. 25. Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas. Dat.15.Cal. Febr. Parentes vocabant Impp.per quos Imperium acceperant.

Novel.39. Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas, Dat.8.Cal.Febr.

68. It's not to be doubted, but in all theſe Charges and Impoſitions the City of Rome, and reaſon there was, had her ſhare; yet being deſervedly look'd upon as the Head of the Empire, and procurer of all that Grandeur of which Prince and People were poſſeſſed, ſhe was wont ſtill to be courted, and could not brook any diſreſpect from the greateſt of them. But of late had riſen a great diſſatisfaction and tumult about the great concernment of Trade. For as in all great Cities where there is confluence, and eſpecially of Nobility, Strangers are wont to flock, and obtrude their own Wares, ſometimes their Native Commodities, and otherwhiles artificial Works made (they pretend, and fantaſtick People imagine) with greater invention and curioſity; ſo at this time certain Greek Tradeſmen flocked thither, ſuch as they called Pantapolæ, Sellers of all things, or, more truly, Jacks of

Sect. 4.

A. D. 440.

Stirs at Rome about the Pantapolæ.

of all Trades, than ours can be imagined. For with them the Tabernarii or Victuallers had a great quarrel, as eating their Bread out of their Mouths; and they moved ſo great indignation againſt them amongſt their Fellow Citizens, that in an height thereof the Pantapolæ were driven out of the City; though we do not find it roſe to that degree, as did the Uproar here in London on Evil May-Day. When they were driven out and gone, the heat abated, and all parties had time to cool and conſider, neither was one ſort of Trade to obſtruct by its pretended intereſt, the good and emolument of ſo many thouſands of People. We are now at a diſtance, and cannot learn what their ſeveral pretences were; but ſo much we learn, that Valentinian, or thoſe about him was perſwaded to recal theſe Tradeſmen, and that out of his great care and ſtudy for the quiet and abundant ſupply of that his City, as in an Edict directed to the people it ſelf he affirmed. Therein he tells them, that foraſmuch as the Pantapolæ are a vaſt multitude; and very diligent in buying “ and ſelling Commodities, he will not ſuffer them to be any way further ſecluded “ from the ſacred City, although the Diſſention, and eſpecially the envy of Tabernárii, “ rather than the utility of venerable Rome had removed them from trading. “ He will have all perſons therefore to underſtand, that he reſtores to the ſaid Pantapolæ “ licence and authority to return and trade in the City, that through his moſt “ vigilant care, plenty may be thereby afforded to the People; and in times ſo ſuſpected “ and dangerous, the City may be inhabited by a greater multitude; provided, “ that if any one exceed in his Dealings the ſet and allotted Rates or prices, “ he be puniſhed according to the quality of the Fact, neither an whole Body “ be excluded for the fault of one or two.

Novel. Valentiniani 40. inter Theodoſianas. Dat. 6. Non. Mart.

69 By this means he Pretends abundance would be procured to the Citizens, and their number be ſupplied; but how this would down with them we know not, without that ſweet and pleaſant draught immediately following. For, he tells them, his purpoſe is to take away all their fear and ſolicitude; ſo as all by virtue of this “ Edict may aſſure themſelves, that none of the Roman Citizens, none of the Corporati “ ſhall be compelled to go to War, but only take care, as need ſhall require, “ in ſecuring the Gates and Walls, and that by Diſpoſition of the Illuſtrious, the “ Præfect of the City, whom he orders to beſtir himſelf ſo much therein, that “ from the repairing of them none may be excuſed. In concluſion, ſeveral Lands “ he excuſeth from the payment of ſeven Solidi lately ceſſed upon every thouſand “ (Acres) provided, they undergo other Functions.“ But what liberty he allowed to the Citizens of Rome, the Provincials took, and greater to themſelves, not only in not going in perſon to the Wars, but harbouring ſuch Tirones and older Soldiers as were already liſted and entertained in the ſervice. They that were moſt blamed, were the Coloni, Poſſeſſors, or Tillers of Lands in the Country, who took them in, and harboured them, to plough and manure their Grounds; and ſome Tradeſmen in Cities alſo employed them in their ways of Drudgery. The Emperor, in the Exigency of his Affairs, commands Sigiſvald, the Comes and Magiſter utriuſque Militiæ, “ that every one concealing in ſuch manner a Deſertor, in “ way of puniſhment find three others for the Wars. That ſuch Colonus, Farmer, “ or Actor, if he be ſerviceable, be preſently preſſed; and if the thing be done “ without the knowledge of the Lord of the Soil, they ſhall ſuffer death. Yet to “ prevent all Calumniations, all perſons are enjoyned that find any ſuch Fugitives “ upon their Ground, within thirty days to have them forth-coming before the Governour “ of the Province, who is to ſee, that they be ſent to their own Standards, “ and undergo convenient puniſhment. And ſuch Judges, if they neglect to execute “ what is enjoyned, ſhall fine in ten pounds of Gold, and their Office in the “ like Sum. “ There was need he ſhould add the Clauſe againſt Calumniations; for the Palatine Officers were now ſo ever buſie in exacting what Tributes were payable to both the Treaſurers, that he was conſtrained upon information of Maximus, “ to inflict upon ſuch Offenders the penalties due to Sacrilege, and to Proſcription. “ He will have the Governours of Provinces obviate their Rapines, and “ refer to the Præfect their manner of puniſhment. But becauſe both the great “ Treaſurers were wont to find excuſes in this Affair, he will not have them meddle “ in ſentencing either the Judges, or Curiales, (which yet he revoked two years “ after ·) but make information both to the Emperor, and the Præfect, who ſhall “ take ſuch order therein, as ſhall be agreeable to the matter depending. “ But ſo did Valentinian this year employ his Sword and his Pen both in the proſecution of the ſame Deſigns.

Valentinian compoſeth them, and provides for the War.

Novel. Valentiniani 41. inter Theodoſianas, Dat. 13. Cal. April.

Novel. Valentiniani 42. inter Theodoſianas, Dat. prid. Non. Jun.

Sed huic l. quantum ad Comites S. L. & R. S. ſpectat, Sectio 2. Nervos intercidit.

A. D. 441.

Cyro Conſ.

70. The Conſul of the Year CCCCXLI was Cyrus the late Præfect, for the

A. D. 441.

the Eaſt, and he alone; why Valentinian made none in the Weſt, we know no other reaſon than the dangers which impended; for when ſuch omiſſions have happened, it hath uſually been when the Barbarians have troubled or invaded the Empire. This Cyrus, a Pagan by Religion, and by Profeſſion a Poet, wound himſelf much into the favour of Eudocia the Empreſs, a Lady much given to the Studies of that Nature. And by this means he came to riſe to ſo great preferments, being aſſiſted by his natural parts. For he was very dextrous, both in the Militia of the Camp, and of the Palace. That Year wherein Carthage was taken, he commanded an Army, as Evagrius writes; in the following arrived at the Dignity of Præfectus Prætorio, and was deſigned Conſul for this. Some obſerve alſo, that he was Præfect of the City two years before, if not miſtaken by the falſe writing of the Directions of ſome Novel Conſtitutions; however, afterwards he bore that Office in the third Conſulſhip of Ætius. All this while he was born up by the power and intereſt of the Empreſs; but afterward when the Emperor being diſpleaſed with her, ſhe left the Court, and retired to Hieruſalem, his Enemies took heart, and being circumvented by their Wiles, he was forced to caſt Anchor in Chriſtian Religion, and was made Biſhop of Cotyæum in Phrygia, where he continued till the time of Leo. This Year Theodoſius, provoked by the inſolent demeanour of Genſerich in Africk, eſpecially after he had cauſed Sebaſtian to be made away, who having been ordered by Valentinian to remove thither out of Spain, carried himſelf more like a Friend than an Enemy to him, ſent an Army againſt the Vandals. A Fleet of ſixty Ships, and an Army thereon embarked, he committed to the conduct of Areobindas, Germanus and Anaxillas, who ſailing into Sicily, there loitered and miſpent their time, and then croſſing over into Africk, carried more terror than execution along with them. Having little or nothing performed, they returned into Sicily; and the effect of their Expedition was this, that Genſerich perceiving what power Theodoſius had, which at another time might be better managed, thought it beſt to ſend to Conſtantinople, and deal about a peace. As this Expedition and the Year was barren as to any Martial Actions, whatever Shew this Fleet did make, ſo neither did it afford any Civil Acts of State, much requiring that mention ſhould be made of them. Except we remember how Theodoſius ſo well ſatisfied of the uſefulneſs of the Defenſors of the Cities, commanded that none ſhould quit " that Employment without his leave. And how he ordained, that ſuch Officers " as were called to account for Exactions and Concuſſions of the Provincials ſhould " not demur to the Juriſdiction of the Provincial Courts. "

Baronius ad h. An.

A Fleet ſent by Theodoſius againſt Genſerich miſcarries.

L. ult. de Defenſorib. civit. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 55.

L. 2. ub. quis de Curiali &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 3. tit. 23.

71. The Year CCCCXLII had for Conſuls Dioſcorus and Eudoxius, Men of no very great account of themſelves; but their Conſulſhip became too famous to poſterity. The Huns, who formerly, as we have written, mediately became Authors of ſo much miſchief to the Empire, by driving the Goths, Vandals and Alans out of their ancient Seats, and forcing them to paſs Iſter and the Rhine into the Roman Territories, now having taken their courſe in that part of Scythia, and brought under their cruel Dominion all the People of thoſe Quarters, being taught the way by the Fugitive Nations, and hearing how the Emperors were intangled in a War with the Vandals, thought their time ill ſpent, till they could pierce alſo into the Provinces, which they were too apt to think, richer than perhaps they were; but if they could do miſchief, though themſelves no good, they ſhould be ſufficiently contented. For after the death of Optar their King, the Government was devolved upon two Brothers, the Sons of Mundzuch, by name Attila and Bleda, Men who were robuſt and courageous, but ſeemed not to abound with ſo much courage, as an hatred againſt Mankind it ſelf, and a thirſt after death and deſtruction of Mortals. With a vaſt number of Huns and other ſuch like Nations they paſſed the Iſter, where the Pretenturæ, or Garriſons upon the Bank were of no force at all to withſtand them, though they were wont to ſuſtain ordinary Shocks, and ſtruck ſome awe unto the Barbarous People living over againſt them. But this Storm of the Huns bore down all before it, and fell ſo violently upon Thrace and Illyricum, as Paulus Diaconus writes, that all the Forts and Cities it overwhelmed with ſervitude and miſery, except Hadrianople and Heraclea, formerly called Perinthus. Particularly we are told, that Attila invaded Mæſia, and Bleda fell into Thrace, where they filled all places with Slaughter and Burnings; to be ſure Naiſſus and Singidunum, two Cities of Mæſia prima, ſuffered extremely by them. Theodoſius could not but be exceedingly concerned to hear of this Irruption, having been ſufficiently taught from experience of his Forefathers, what terror ſuch incurſions were wont to carry along with them; and he thought it beſt alſo to make ſome reſiſtance at the firſt, and put ſome ſtop to their motions.

A. D. 442.
Dioſcoro & Eudoxio Coſſ.

The Huns fall into the Empire.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 442.

The Captains ſent againſt them fall into diſſention.

72. For this purpoſe he ſent againſt them Arnegiſlus and John, both flouriſhing with the Title of Magiſter Militum, and furniſhed with a choice Body of Men. And to anſwer his expectations, they both engaged in very ſharp Diſputes; Arnegiſlus with Attila in Mœſia near Marciaonople, and John with Bleda in Thrace, and might have done well, had not the Fate of the Empire preſſed hard upon it, and they fallen into diſſention, which ſo far prevailed above all care of publick concernments, that John was killed by the fraud of his Æmulator. This put Theodoſius upon great Straits, and though he was not willing to hear of Genſerich his poſſeſſing any thing in Africk, yet that he might not be overpowered by two Enemies at once, but provide againſt that miſchief which was neareſt at hand, and moſt threatned him, he was perſwaded to liſten to the Overtures made by the Vandals. And had not this diſaſter of the Huns ſo preſſed him, he might poſſibly have made much better Terms than he did. For Genſerich his Affairs were in no good condition in his new Kingdom, his Subjects bearing very ill his inſolence, which he had contracted from his very good fortune, inſomuch that they conſpired againſt him. The Plot he diſcovered, and raged againſt many; which yet deterred not others from the like Attempt, who alſo miſcarrying, and his Jealouſies and Rage being vented againſt more than were really concerned; ſo great Slaughter he made of his Men, that he could not have been more weakened, had he been defeated in Battel. But he humbly begging peace, Theodoſius for the reaſons we have ſaid, thought fit to grant it, and recalled his Army out of Sicily, which he ſent under conduct of Areobindas and Aſpar againſt the Huns. They concerned themſelves ſo little for their coming, that they ſtill went on, and having waſted Thrace, paſſed into Macedonia and Greece. Theſe they harraſſed and ſpoiled with more than Barbarous Immanity, as if they deſigned by their outragious Acts to obliterate all Memory of the ferity of the Goths and Vandals. They even did what they liſted. For ſo great were their numbers, and ſtrong the reſolution of their Captains, that the Attacks made by the Roman Officers did but whet and ſharpen them to further Attempts. In the Weſt Genſerich having made his peace with Theodoſius, uſed the ſame Applications to his Son-in-law Valentinian, who being more concerned as to the Country contended for, he had reaſon to be more careful as to the conditions. But it was agreed betwixt them, that Genſerich ſhould keep in his hands the Provinces Byzacena, Abaritana, Gætulia, and part of Numidia, and his Army retain Zeugitana, or that they called the Proconſular. The reſt ſhould remain to Valentinian, to whom he ſhould pay a Tribute, and give up his Son Honorich as Hoſtage, for preſerving that faith, which he had already twice broken.

Theodoſius conſtrained to make peace with Genſerich.

Which alſo doth Valentinian.

SECT.

Sect. V.

The Fifth Step to the Ruine of the Empire in the Weſt.

From the Irruption of Attila and the Huns into the Empire, to the Invaſion of the Weſtern Provinces by that furious Nation.

Containing the ſpace of Nine Years.

Sect. 5.

A. D. 443. Maximo 2. & Paterno Coſſ.

1. Maximus the ſecond time, and Paternus were Conſuls for the Year of our Lord CCCCXLIII. Valentinian, as we have ſeen, was to receive Tribute, (if he could get it) from Genſerich; however, had the honour of an acknowledgment; whereas it fared far otherwiſe with the Reputation of Theodoſius. For, he finding of how little efficacy his Steel was againſt the Huns for curing that diſtemper which had invaded his Eaſtern Provinces, reſolved when ſuch a forcible application would not do, to try what Gold might work by way of revulſion. To Attila he ſent about a peace, and retreat, which he offered to purchaſe with ſix thouſand pounds of Gold paid down at preſent, and promiſed a thouſand pounds more yearly, if he would keep himſelf and his Men within his own Bounds. They could not refuſe the offer, but receiving their Gold, packed up, and got them gone beyond Iſter, not only inriched with this ſum, but with infinite other Treaſure and Plunder, and an hundred and twenty thouſand Captives; poor Illyricum, though frequently ſubject to ſuch calamities, yet never having ſuffered to ſuch a degree. And this added ſomething to their grief, that all things being burnt up and waſted, ſo dreadful a Snow fell this Year, as lay on the ground for ſix Months, and thereby periſhed not only great quantities of Cattel, but multitudes of Men, Women and Children, who wanted the accommodations of Habitation and Fuel, of which the ſavage Huns had deprived them. This was counted no leſs than a Prodigy; and ſo was alſo that Earthquake which happened in Italy, where many Buildings in Rome were thrown to the ground. The more prodigious they were, they ſuited the more with, and portended that great and prodigious Tempeſt, which ceaſing for ſome little time, (the Cloud retiring a little Northward) poured it ſelf ſhortly after both into the Weſtern and Eaſtern Provinces, like an Hurricane, ſo as ſcarcely any thing, of what Bulk or Materials ſoever, could ſtand before it. At Land ſcarcely any thing; the Water afforded the beſt ſecurity.

Theodoſius hires the Huns to retire.

2. However weak the Prætenturæ were to make any reſiſtance of Attila and his Multitudes; yet the Enemy being removed, Theodoſius would not have the Limits neglected, nor the Duty of the Officers that there lay encamped. But to reinforce it, he wrote to Nomus the Magiſter Officiorum his Commands, that the Duces of the “ ſaid Limits, and eſpecially of thoſe to which were Neighbours ſuch Nations as “ were moſt to be feared, ſhould abide upon the Borders, themſelves, to ſee, under “ the inſpection of the Magiſtri Militum, that the Soldiers did not ſtraggle, but “ keep to their Colours, and were conſtant in the exerciſe of their Arms: That they “ took care to have the Camp and other Neceſſaries repaired, and kept in good or- “ der. And to the Principes, the Præpoſiti of the Camp, and to them, he aſſigns “ the twelfth part of the Annonæ belonging to the Limitaneous Soldiers, to be di- “ ſtributed among them, according to the Viciſſitude of their Labours, at the “ Theodoſius reinforceth the Limits.

L. ult. de Officio Militar. Judicum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 46. Dat. 2. Id. Sept.

diſcretion of the Magiſtri Militum. He further enjoyned, that all Lands upon “ the Borders, with the Mariſhes, which, time out of mind, had been in the Occupation “ and Tillage of the Limitaneous Soldiers, and free and diſcharged of all Burthens, “ ſhould be held and poſſeſſed by them to all intents, and without any charge. “ If now in the hands of any others, they ſhould be ſurrendred, all manner of preſcription “ ceaſing in this caſe, and reſtored to the Soldiers aforeſaid without any “ burthen of Collation, under pain of Proſcription to be inflicted on any that ſhould “ oppoſe this his Ordination. Provided that, if any had bought ſuch Lands (which “ he ſhould not have dared to do) he might have competent Action againſt the Seller. “ “ Theſe are two diſtinct Laws, as now they are diſtinguiſhed under ſeveral Titles in the Code of Juſtinian, but they made up one and the ſame Conſtitution; and ſo are ſtill found among the Novels of Theodoſius. He was now in the good humour of reſtoring to every man, and to every City alſo, its own; which he had been petitioned to do in his Progreſs. For, great complaints were made in ſome places, that their publick Grounds and Houſes were detained in private hands: all which, except alienated by the Interpoſition of his Procurator, or Comes Rei Privatæ, or conſent of the Cities themſelves, he commanded now to be reſtored, if poſſeſſed within the ſpace of thirty Years. And the further diſpoſition of the Affair is left to the management of Apollonius, the Præfectus Prætorio, to whom he directs this Edict; and to his Magiſter Officiorum.

*L.ult.de Fundis Limitrophis, &c.Cod.Juſt. lib.*11.*tit.*59.

*Novel.*31.Dat. prid.Id.Septemb.

*Novel.Theod.*30.

3. In the Weſt all things were in repoſe this year, except it was the mind of Maximus the Conſul. We may know the Emperor was free from War, when he employed his time and his Quæſtor about matters concerning Dignity and Precedence. Gratian had formerly ordained by a Law, that If the Conſulſhip and Patritiate met in one perſon, he ſhould precede another who was graced only with one of theſe Honours. But now it became a diſpute, we may gueſs, at the inſtance of Maximus concerned; whether, in caſe one had been twice Conſul, he ſhould not take place of one who had been once advanced to that Dignity, although that of Patritian had been added to it. Valentinian determined it in the Affirmative by his Reſcript directed to Storacius, Præfect of the City; giving this reaſon, that That Dignity which ſeemed to confer a certain luſtre, even upon the Emperor's “ Name, being conferred the ſecond time on private perſons, though without “ the other (of Patritian) ought juſtly to excell all other Honours. “ But, though he was not now buſied in War, he was not unmindful, in a fair day, to provide for a Storm; and gave order to Quadratianus, the Præfectus Prætorio, to ſee executed to the full an Edict he had made for raiſing of Soldiers in the Suburbicarian Provinces; Requiring him to call Senators and all Poſſeſſors of Lands before him, to “ cauſe their Stewards and Tenants to produce the number that was impoſed, under “ pain of forfeiting ten pounds of Gold, beſides the finding of the Men. He affirms, “ that ſuch ſeverity ought to proſecute to a mind averſe to a deſire of common “ defence and ſecurity. And concludes, that, whoſoever ſhall be backward “ in this matter, in a ſort, confeſſeth himſelf not to be a Roman. “

*Novel.*45. *Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas, Dat.*3.Id.Mart. Rom.P.P.in foro Trajani.

Valentinian alſo provides for a Storm.

*Novel.*41.§.2. *Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas, Dat.*8.Cal. Jun.Rav.

4. He had forgot himſelf to be an Emperor, as, in a manner, he confeſſeth, had he not had ſome compaſſion on the miſerable and afflicted condition of the Africans; who, both Eccleſiaſticks and Lay, were, in the late Revolution, turned out of all they had, and forced to ſeek their Bread in ſtrange Countries. He gave order to Albinus, the Præfectus Prætorio, that, Such of them as were Scholars, and “ had deſtinated themſelves to the pleading of Cauſes, ſhould be received as “ Advocates in the Courts under his Juriſdiction, to give ſome relief to the miſeries “ they ſuſtained; it being altogether reaſonable, that ſuch ſhould be favoured and “ aſſiſted as had nothing left but what Captivity could not take from them. “ This might be a means to relieve ſome of them, and we are in charity to believe that others were found out to preſerve the illiterate ſort from periſhing. But, ſome time after, the Emperor found himſelf concerned to take another courſe, not ſo much for the relief of theſe poor Africans, as, that if they got any thing to maintain Life, it might not be taken from them e'er it could reach their mouths. Many of them were found much indebted, and their Creditors were ſo cruel as to come upon them in this their greateſt extremity; and take violent courſes, both with them, and thoſe that were bound for them, though involved in the ſame calamity. In another Writing, directed to the ſame Albinus, he inſiſts much upon the Cruelty of this practice; that thoſe who ſhould ſtarve, if not fed by other hands, who lived “ on Alms, and what they received from Charity, ſhould be conſtrained to pay “ that which had been taken from them by violence, and they had not in their “ power “

Pities the diſtreſſed Africans.

*Novel.*47. *Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas, Dat.*13.Cal. Septemb.

*Novel.*22. *Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas, Dat.*14.Cal. Nov.

A. D. 443.

power to reſtore. He urgeth, that Compaſſion is wont to be had on all Debtors “ that have any misfortune befallen them; and therefore, it is much more due to “ them that have ſuffered a Deluge of their Fortunes. Therefore he reſolves, out “ of the principles of Clemency, that none ſhall ſue any Africans, or their Sureties, “ upon any Bonds, till they have recovered their own again. Always excepted “ thoſe who have not loſt all, but have Eſtates in other Countries. Neither ſhall “ they be ſued or moleſted for any thing done within their own Province, where no “ Law now was open, till their Return and Reſtitution. Nor ſhall any Intereſt or “ Uſe-mony be demanded for ſuch Debts by any Creditor, who may well be con- “ tented, if ever, in ſo great a calamity, he arrive at his Principal. “

A. D. 444.

Theodoſio A. 18. & Albino, Coſſ.

5. Theodoſius, for the Year CCCCXLIIII, took the Conſular Ornaments the eighteenth time; and had Albinus for his Weſtern Colleague. This Year the Empire was alſo in repoſe, for any thing we can learn; though Marcellinus writes, that, at the ſame time it was invaded by the Huns, it was alſo infeſted by the Perſians, Saracens, Zanni and Iſauri. But the Empire was at Peace becauſe the Huns themſelves were in diſturbance; for the fierce and cruel humour of Attila could not be at reſt; but while, by vertue of the late Agreement, he was kept up in his own Country, being impatient of any Equal, he murdered his Brother Bleda, and conſtrained all the people of thoſe Tracts to ſubmit unto himſelf. Now grew he more arrogant than ever; and ſuffered himſelf to be tranſported to ſuch ferity, even in his Imagination, that he both thought and affirmed himſelf born for a Scourge of Mankind and Devaſtation of Nations. And to this fancy he compoſed his geſture and his way of walking, which his very ſtature and proportion of his Body ſeemed alſo to agree with and exhibit. He was low made, had a broad Breaſt, a great Head, little Eyes, a thin Beard, a flat Noſe, and a Skin ſo tawny, that it gave ſufficient Teſtimony of his Original. And now being ſole Monarch of the Huns, he little doubted but to be ſo ſhortly of the World; and indeed, he wanted neither courage, aſſiſtance of Men, nor perfidiouſneſs to break his Word, and the Peace made with Theodoſius when there ſhould be occaſion: being a Pagan, or indeed of no Religion. To one ſo diſpoſed, occaſion and opportunity could not long be wanting, as we ſhall ſee.

He murders his Brother Bleda.

6. In the mean time we cannot but take notice how kind Theodoſius was at the beginning of this Year, to ſuch Lawyers as were Aſſeſſors or Councellors to the chiefeſt Magiſtrates; as, the Præfecti Prætorio, and of the City, the Magiſtri Militum, and Magiſter Officiorum: declaring, that His kindneſs ought to extend to “ them as well as to the Judges. He tells Zoilus, the Præfect of the Eaſt, that “ whether at preſent they have executed that Function, or ſhall execute it, both “ then, and when diſcharged, they ſhall enjoy Immunity from all burthens impoſed, “ either by Civil or Military Officers; nay, not receive any Impoſitions from “ the Seat of the Præfect himſelf, under pain of fifty pounds of Gold to be forfeited “ by his Office, if it ſhould yield to any thing contrary to this Statute. The “ like indulgence he extends to the Magiſtri of his Scrinia, whom he owns, as in a “ ſenſe, Aſſeſſors to his Majeſty; as alſo, to the Proximi and Exproximi of the ſaid “ Scrinia; and that under the like penalty, to the Office of Zoilus: ſo that theſe “ two Laws, directed to one and the ſame perſon, made up but one Conſtitution. “ Nay, to all the Scriniarii, as alſo, the Exceptors belonging to Zoilus as Præfect, “ he declared alſo, ſhould belong the Right of the Caſtrenſe Peculium, and to the “ reſt that did mereri, or ſerve in his Office, in as ample manner as if they had ſerved “ the Commonwealth in the firſt Legion Adjutrix; for there were two Legions that went under the name of Adjutrix, viz. the firſt and ſecond, from helping or aſſiſting the Prince in any Emergency. “ In concluſion, as if he intended to paſs nothing but Acts of Grace, out of Contentment he received at the Peace of the Empire, or ſome other thing; at the end of the year he granted an Indulgence to ſeveral ſorts of Lands, which of late years had been burthened by extraordinary Impoſitions, ſo as never to be liable to them again.

L. 11. de Aſſeſſoribus, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 51. Dat. 5. Cal. Mart.

Theodoſius paſſes ſeveral Acts of Indulgence.

L. un. de Magiſtris Sacrorum Scriniorum. Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 9. Dat. 5. Cal. Mart.

L. ult. de Caſtrenſi peculio, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 37.

* Qui in Officio tui culminis merendi licentiam habere noſcuntur.

Novel. 33. Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas. Dat. 3. Id Dec.

7. In the Weſt Valentinian was quite of another opinion, being by Heſiodorus, his Miniſter, put in mind to provide for the neceſſities of divers things, and the publick Utility, as he words it. By the Authority of his Pragmatick Sanction, “ he thought fit to confirm that Suggeſtion he had made, ſo as, for the neceſſity of “ imminent Expences, for which the Treaſury was not ſufficient, all thoſe they called “ Illuſtrious Vacantes (of whom lately) ſhould find money for ſetting forth three “ Soldiers; as alſo, the Conſiſtorian Comites, or thoſe of the firſt Rank; as alſo, Tribunes “ and Notaries, and ſuch as in the Provinces exerciſed ordinary Juriſdiction, “ one “

Novel. 42. Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas, §. 3. Dat. prid. Id Jul.

A. D. 444.

Valentinian, on the contrary, exacts his Dues.

one apiece ; Tribunes Vacant, whether Comites of the ſecond or third Rank, and " all Clariſſimi contribute a third part ; ſo as every Tiro ſhould be rated at thirty Solidi, " the Africans excepted, who were lately driven, by an Hoſtile neceſſity, from " their native Soil. Moreover, in conſideration of their preſent Labours and " Watches, twenty Conſiſtorians, thirty Comites, and the Notaries to be excuſed. " In Auguſt ſeveral Illuſtrious perſons were ſent for, from Rome, to Court, to conſult about the publick Affairs ; to whom the Senate gave in charge, to acquaint the Emperor with a great Irregularity it had obſerved ; and to pray his Redreſs. It was grown to a great cuſtom for Widdows, after the death of their Husbands, to ſue their Sons and Heirs for ſuch Profits as had been ſpent in common in their life time, for maintenance of the Family. This Valentinian takes notice of, as he words it, acceptfully to acknowledge how much the moſt ample Senate was mindful of his Authority ; the Counſel whereof always oppoſeth unfitting things. And, attributing much to the expenſiveneſs of Women, he determines, in the firſt Edict of all his Novels that are placed by themſelves, and directed to Albinus ; that, If " a Man dies and leaves his Wife, ſhe ſhall not recover of their Sons, or the Heirs " of her Husband, any ſuch Profits or Fruits. No more ſhall an Husband from " the Sons or Heirs of his Wife, if he ſurvive her. "

Novel. 1. Valentiniani, Dat. 3. Id.Septemb.

A. D. 445.

Valentiniano A. 6. & Nomo,Coſſ.

This Year calamitous to Conſtantinople.

8. For the Year of our Lord CCCCXLV, Valentinian Auguſtus the ſixth time bore the Title of Conſul, together with Nomus. This Year, though remarkable alſo for Peace, was too much remembred at Conſtantinople for the diſaſters which befel that City. For, the people fell into a tumult in the Cirque ; and in that mad hurly burly many were killed. A great Famine raged alſo there ; which was followed by the Peſtilence : and the great Church (over and above) was conſumed with Fire, as Marcellinus hath briefly noted. This made the Town, doubtleſs, not very agreeable to Theodoſius ; who would be more at his eaſe elſewhere, though we know not of any Progreſs he took, or Expedition he made. But, toward the latter end of February, either purpoſing to make one, or to make ſufficient proviſion for his Journey when he ſhould ſo do ; to let all perſons know what they ſhould hold to, and to prevent excuſe, he publiſhed his Edict inſcribed to Taurus, the Præfectus Prætorio ; wherein he declared, that, When he undertook any ſuch " Expedition, the wonted Attendance and Services of the Provincials where ever he " paſſed, ought to be paid him. Commanding, that none be excuſed from furniſhing " out the Angariæ and Parangariæ, or Waggons, or from any other Duty ; but all " whatſoever, whether belonging to his own Houſe, to that of the Venerable Empreſs, " to the Sacroſanct Churches, or any Illuſtrious Families, without any excuſe " to be obtained by any Pragmatick or Writing procured from the Prince, ſhall " be obedient, and ſubmit to the Indictions of the Præfect at the time of ſuch his Expedition. " By this we underſtand ſomething of the nature of the Emperors purveyances, " and how he was inabled to travel ; and we ſuppoſe a ready compliance " would have been given to his pleaſure herein, though he had not uſed ſuch Phraſes and Titles as ſwell above the condition of a Mortal ; as, Numen, Divina Domus, Divina Adnotatio, and Sacrum Oraculum, applied to himſelf, according to the cuſtom which ſtill obtained ; eſpecially, when any Laws were made for maintaining the Grandeur and Authority of the Prince.

Theodoſius requires all to attend him upon an Expedition.

L. 2. de Quibus. muneribus, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 10 tit. 48. Dat. 13. Cal. Mart.

9. Valentinian this Year having nothing to do with War, ſpent ſuch time as he allowed to buſineſs with his Quæſtor, about Civil Acts. About the beginning of April, Auxentius, the Præfect of Rome, informed him of things in that City which needed Reformation : and procured a Reſcript for calling back ſuch as were Corporati, " or belonged to certain Companies, although they had procured themſelves " to be received in the number of Clerks, as far as the place of Deacon. " But about the beginning of June came Meſſengers out of Africk, from the Numidians and Mauri Sitifenſes, which was managed by Palladius, a Comes and Tribune, and one Maximian, a Man of laudable Qualities, as the Emperor commends him. They offered ſeveral things for relief of the diſtreſſed Provincials, who had been harraſſed by that publick Calamity of the Vandals ; and received ſuch Anſwer by way of Edict, directed to Albinus, the Præfectus Prætorio, as Valentinian found himſelf obliged to make. One was, that In reference to the Tributes, which they were " no way able to pay as formerly, they ſhould only pay the eighth part, both for " the private Lands, and thoſe they called Emphyteuticæ ; ſo as the Provincials of " Numidia, for all Accounts put together, ſhould pay four thouſand and two hundred " Solidi only, one thouſand and two hundred Military Annonæ, and two hundred " Capita, for Cattel. Such as held in perpetual Right Lands of the Prince his " Domain, "

Novel.Valenti. inter Theodoſianas, 26. Dat. 18. Cal.Maii, Ad diaconi locum.

Valentinian again provides for the eaſe of the Africans.

Novel. 23. Valenti. inter Theodoſianas. Dat. 11. Cal. Jul.

Sect. 5.

A. D. 445.

Domain, ſhould alſo pay a ſeventh part. And of other Incomes, as of Salt, Allom, “ and other things a fifth part, or according to the number of Men, and the “ poſſibility of the matter. All which exaction ſhall be removed from the Curiales, and be managed by the Officers of the Magiſtrates. Leſt they ſhould be forced to carry proviſions for the Army too, he permits them to exchange them for Mony at eaſie Rates. “

10. To the Mauri Sitifenſes he confirms all their privileges granted by former Princes, who ſhall pay, all Titles put together, five thouſand Solidi, and fifty “ Capita, for the Annona they were wont to find. He commands the Præfect, that “ he ſuffer no Officers by any pretence to put themſelves upon theſe Provinces, “ beſided the Dux, Conſularis and Preſident, the ordinary Magiſtrates; not ſo much “ as thoſe they called Curioſi Litorum. To the City of Conſtantina in like manner “ he confirms their privileges, and takes care for removing their Grievances. “ To ſuch Advocates as continue their Abode in Africk, ſhall not be reckoned “ that time that the Barbarians raged in the Country, ſo as to ſhorten their term “ (which was wont to be limited; till the ſcarcity of Pleaders procured them to be “ perpetual, or as long as they pleaſed) and when they have completed their term “ they ſhall enjoy the Dignity of Clariſſimi. And becauſe the Courts of the Cities “ and Places Corporate, or the number of the Curiales was brought very low, he “ allows for good ſuch Acts as ſhall be diſpatched by three Decuriones in the preſence “ of a publick Exceptor. Foraſmuch as the old way of Judicature (by the “ Cognitor Decreti) was ceaſed, Appeals ſhould be made to the Præfect of the “ City; and becauſe of the diſtance beyond the Sea, a years time ſhall be allowed “ them. No Dependants, that they may be able to withſtand the Invaſions of “ Barbarians, ſhall abſent themſelves from the Grounds of their Lords; and ſuch “ as live in Mid-land places ſhall ſpend one Month in the year upon the Borders, “ that they may not always be ſeparated from their Families. He charges the “ Dux, that no armed Men be ſuffered, but ſuch as ſhall willingly offer themſelves “ for repulſing the Enemy, and thoſe to be well looked to and governed, who ſhall “ enjoy what Booty they get from him, except ſuch Slaves as the Provincials have “ loſt. In concluſion, when Jndges have completed their term, they ſhall not depart “ out of their Province, till three Months be expired, either to receive commendations “ for their good Government, or to be anſwerable for their evil “ Deeds. “

Novel. 3. Valentiniani.

He provides againſt the pardon of Murther.

11. This Emperor had been abuſed too much at this time in pardons ſurreptitiouſly obtained in caſe of Blood. So as he found himſelf obliged to take order for ſtopping ſuch looſe Indulgence, and to diſtinguiſh betwixt Murder and caſual Homicide. The caſe of a Man's violent death he would have tried in the Province where the Fact was committed; and if it proved Murder, the Killer to be put “ to death according to the former Laws, notwithſtanding a pardon produced under “ the Prince his own Hand. None ſhould eſcape puniſhment but thoſe in the Lapſes of whom, fortune only could be blamed. And if for the future, any “ pardon ſhould be granted to willful Murderers, the Magiſter of that Scrinium “ which gave Anſwers to Petitions, ſhould fine in five pounds of Gold, and a Memorialis “ of any Scrinium, beſides the loſs of his place be baniſhed for the ſpace “ of five years. “ This is directed to Maximus as ſecond time Præfectus Prætorio and Patritian, and concludes with a Prayer, that the Divinity would keep him ſafe for many years, the moſt dear Parent of the Auguſti. It was dated on the eighth of December, and propoſed to publick view in the Forum of Trajan on the twelfth day of the ſame Month, by the Præfect his Edict, according to the cuſtom.

A. D. 446. Ætio 3. & Symmacho Coſſ.

Britain* falls off from the Empire.

12. The CCCCLVI Year of our Lord was opened with the third Conſulſhip of Ætius, and that of Symmachus; a Year we ſhall find too remarkable in diverſe reſpects. Africk, Spain and Gall were at this time, as we have ſeen, ſeiſed and poſſeſſed by ſeveral Barbarous Nations; and now the time was alſo come, that our Britain ſhould fall quite off from the Roman Empire. The Reader indeed by that ſmall intelligence he hath had of it might juſtly have concluded, that it had been alienated long ago. Well might the Poet ſing his penitus toto. So little do we hear concerning it in thoſe times, dark enough in themſelves, but diſmally dark as to it, that it might well ſeem ſeparated, and indeed another world. More than a wonder it is, that amongſt the numerous Laws we have peruſed, and mentioned in this Volume, but one ſingle Edict or Reſcript, but one bare Conſtitution is to be found concerning it, or directed to any Magiſtrate or Officer reſident upon it. What ſhall we attribute this to? to what cauſe ſhall we aſſign it? To the great diſtance? But ſome other Provinces were as diſtant as it from the Emperor's Court, eſpecially when it was in Gall, as ſometimes it was. Of Spain, of Illyricum, of Africk we hear often in Theodoſius his Code; but of Britain there is a deep ſilence. Was it becauſe there were no complaints, or nothing that was out of order, that needed the healing hand of the Quæſtor? Of that alſo we have reaſon to doubt. The moſt probable cauſe was this, that though the Romans had been long in the Iſland; yet of latter times there was but little Entercourſe betwixt them and it, little paſſing from the Southern to this Northern Climate. The Ocean was thought unpaſſable. The Britiſh Sea was always dreaded as well as the Monſters here thought to be bred in the Caledonian Wood. But ſince that the Barbarous Nations began to rove about in Boats. Since Scots, Picts, and eſpecially the Saxons became ſuch Pirates, that Officers on purpoſe were appointed to defend the Coaſts from their violence and Rapine, Boloigne and Dover did not ſeem ſo near as formerly they appeared. Danger of paſſage put an end to pleaſure in croſſing the Strait. Nothing but neceſſity could procure a Voyage. This was the cauſe why Britain grew ſtrange by degrees, and ſeemed indeed another world before ſhe was turned Barbarous: what ſometimes proves her defence (the Ditch about her) then was the Rampart againſt her Friends, and an Inlet to her Enemies. But, as great effuſion of Blood, and expence of ſpirits render an Animal more capable of Impreſſions from external violence; ſo happened it to Britain in the exhauſting of her ſtrength; which cauſed her to languiſh. This how it came to paſs we ſhall now tell in order, and all together; which will more conduce to the underſtanding of Roman Britiſh Affairs, than if we had told ſome Scraps of Stories ſcatteringly, as by chance we met them.

The reaſon we have heard ſo little of her all this while.

What of moment paſſed here ſince the end of Conſtantius his Reign.

Theodoſius.

Maximus.

13. Juſt at the end of Conſtantius his Reign, and at the entrance of Valentinian we have ſeen from Ammianus Marcellinus how the fierce Nations of the Picts, Scots, Attacots and Saxons broke the Limits, and vexed and harraſſed Britain; and how the Iſſue of it was, that Theodoſius the Elder, Father to Theodoſius the Great, was ſent hither to repreſs them, which he gallantly performed. For he brought the Iſland into ſo good poſture, that it had a lawful Governour; and from the Emperor that then reigned, got a name of Valentia. So continued it in repoſe and ſettlement till that Maximus was ſaluted Emperor here by the Britiſh Soldiers, and uſurped, who is alſo ſaid ſtrenuouſly to have repreſſed and overthrown the Picts and Scots, who then alſo made their Depredations. Gildas in his Book concerning the deſtruction of Britain, as to this Revolution writes, that a vaſt Wood of Ty-" rants, to uſe his Phraſe, ſprung up here about theſe times, and the Iſland re-" taining the Roman Name indeed (Romania) but little of the Manners or Laws," ſent into Gall Maximus, attended by many Soldiers, but ſuch as were tumultu-" ous, and over and above adorned with Imperial Enſigns, which he never de-" cently wore, but as Tyrants were wont to compaſs them. This Man by craft" rather than any valour, having brought the Neighbouring Provinces into his" Net, and by his perjury and lyes joyned them to his wicked Dominion, ſtretch-" ed one of his Wings as far as Spain, and the other into Italy, and eſtabliſhing the" Throne of his moſt wicked Empire at Triers, raved with ſo great madneſs a-" gainſt his Maſters, that of two lawful Emperors, the one at Rome, and the other" elſewhere, he bereaved of his moſt religious life. But preſently as he proceeded" in ſuch curſed and audacious practices at Aquileia, he was ſmitten on the Head" (he means ſlain) who had caſt down the honoured Heads of the whole world" from their Soveraignty."

By him Britain bereaved of her ſtrength.

Is harraſſed by the Northern Nations.

14. But, by this means became Britain bereaved of her Soldiers, and Military" Men; as alſo of her Governours, (how cruel ſoever) and in a manner of all her" Youth, which following the Tyrant into Gall, never more returned, and thereby" growing utterly unskillful in matters of War, firſt was invaded by two Transmarine and cruel Nations; the Scots from the Weſt, and the Picts from the North," under which ſhe lay ſtupified, and groaned many years " This firſt was invaded, cannot be meant of the very firſt invaſion made by theſe Nations, as we have ſeen from Ammianus, but of the firſt moſt ſignal and violent Impreſſion made by them. And why he ſhould call them tranſmarine, a reaſon is rendred by Beda, not for that they lived out of Britain, but becauſe they were remote from part of the Britains, by two interjacent Friths, whereof the one from the Eaſt, and the other from the Weſt pierceth into the Bowels of Britain, though they do not reach ſo far as to meet. But ſome conjecture, that Gildas did not mean theſe Scots called Reudæ, which had already ſeated themſelves in Albania; but the Scots that inhabited Ireland, and therefore came from the Weſt, as the Picts from the North of Britain. But Britain being thus harraſſed with their Inroads, and the direful effects thereof, ſent to Rome with tears, requiring that ſuccours might be haſtened away to her Relief, vowing, in caſe the Enemy were removed to remain conſtant in fidelity to the Empire.

Send to Rome for aid.

15. That Stilicho defended the Iſland from the Barbarous Rovers, we have ſeen abundantly from Claudian, who introduceth her ſpeaking ſo much in his behalf. And from the ſame Poet we have alſo learn'd, how when he was to engage with Alarich, amongſt other Forces, that Legion was reckoned which lay in the Prætenturæ upon the Borders againſt the Scot and Pict, whence he had ſent for it as the reſt of the Emperor's Troops into Italy. Not long after was one Gratian made Emperor by the Britains, and after four Months killed by the Soldiers. And into his place they took upon them to promote one Conſtantine, as we have diſcourſed at large, who paſſing preſently after his uſurpation into Gall, as Maximus did in like manner, took over with him the Britiſh Youth, and what ſtrength had been left in the Iſland, he utterly removed, and ſo expoſed the exhauſted Iſle more than ever to the fury of the Northern Nations. Now we are told by Zoſimus, that the Barbarians inhabiting beyond the Rhine, rebelling againſt this Conſtantine, then in Gall, reduced the Inhabitants of Britain to that condition, that they fell off from the Roman Empire, and refuſing to obey the Roman Laws, would live, as they themſelves pleaſed. The Britains therefore taking Arms, refuſed to undergo no hazards for their Country, but freed their Cities from the incurſions of the Barbarians; Honorius, the Emperor himſelf, by his Letters adviſing them to ſtand upon their Guard. But after that Rome was taken by Alarich, and Conſtantine the Tyrant ſlain, others write, that the Britiſh Army was received by Honorius, who reduced the Iſland alſo to obedience, though ſome have ſaid, that then the Romans were not able to recover it. But if thus it was, we may eaſily believe what Blondus hath written, that when Conſtantine on one ſide, and Alarich on the other, gave ſuch diverſion to the Roman Arms, the Britains being exhauſted of their own native ſtrength, and receiving no aſſiſtance from the Empire, being continually harraſſed, and tired with the Inroads of the Picts and Scots were forced to treat and make ſome agreements with them, and to fall off from their obedience to that power which could afford them no protection.

Gratian.

Conſtantine takes away all the ſtrength that remained.

Vide Uſſerii Primord. Eccleſ. Britann. p. 600.

16. Now it was about the ninth Year after the taking of Rome by the Goths, that the Romans, or they that were of Roman Blood, and left behind in the Iſland, not enduring thoſe Threatnings and Inſultations of the Nations, hid their Treaſurers in Ditches, as Fabius Ethelwerd, our Noble Engliſh Saxon Hiſtorian relates, and got them over into Gall, hoping to find them at their return, wherein yet in a great meaſure, their expectation failed them. If what he writes concerning the Threatnings of Nations, hath Relation to the Nations or People of Britain, their quarreling with the Romans, this much confirms the Revolt now made by them from the Empire; if the words be not rather to be underſtood of the Barbarous Nations, the Picts and Scots. But however, it's without doubt, that they ſhortly after returned to obedience, as was beſt for them, except they had been in better capacity to relieve themſelves, and now they obtain'd upon promiſing obedience, another Legion for their defence. For they found no faith or conſtancy in the Rovers, who under pretence of peace and a League, hoped to get the Iſland into their power. The Romans could not but take notice of their deſign, and how Britain by that means was like utterly to be loſt, if they did not preſently interpoſe; and therefore Ætius being alſo wearied with the importunity of that party which ſtill remained conſtant in their fidelity, ſent away a Legion out of Gall, which reduced the Country into an indifferent quiet, and peaceable condition. We are to underſtand, that now it was, that Gildas ſaith, that Britain vowed, if the Enemy were removed, to remain immoveable in her fidelity to the Empire. A Legion “ unmindful of the late miſchief (the murdering of the Emperor Gratian ſome interpret it) is ordered her, which having paſſed the Seas, preſently engaged the “ Rovers, and having ſlaughtered of them a great multitude, quite drove them “ out of the Country, and thereby freed the Inhabitants from cruel death, or immi-“ nent captivity. This performed, it ſet them upon making a Wall overthwart the “ Iſland, which ſhould be for a terror to their Enemies, and a defence to them-“ ſelves. But being made by the Rabble without any good Adviſer, not ſo much “ of Stones, as of Turfs and Earth, it ſtood them in no ſtead at all.

The Romans hide their Treaſures, and get them gone into Gall.

Multiplices non ferentes gentium minas.

Ætius ſendeth a Legion.

A Wall of Turfs.

17. Beda writes, that in his days the Remainders and Footſteps of this deep and broad, though uſeleſs, Rampart, were to be ſeen. And he ſaith it began two Miles diſtance from the Monaſtery of Abercurnig in the Weſt, at a place, in the Language of the Picts, called Penvahel, in the Tongue of the Engliſh Penneltun, and ended near the City Alcluith. It was drawn betwixt the two Friths of Dunbritan and Edenburgh; as Scotch Writers deſcribe it, from Kaer Eden, or Edenborough, to Kerk-Patrick, on the Bank of the River Clude, leaving Glaſgow on the South, being eighty Miles more Northerly than that made by the Romans. But the Legion which ſet them upon this Work, ſtaid not to ſee it made, being ſhortly after recalled, when the Burgundians grew turbulent; and then for all the Wall, the Barbarians returned, and miſerably waſted poor Britain with Fire and Sword, till News thereof being brought to Valentinian the Third; he diſpatched away Gallio of Ravenna with another Legion. But hear how Gildas himſelf tells the Story in his lamentable and melancholick manner. This Legion being returned with great joy and triumph, the ſame Rovers like ſo many cruel and ravenous Wolves return upon their former prey, no Shepherd appearing to protect the Sheep, and beat down and trample on all in their way, like ſtanding Corn. Now again “ are Meſſengers diſpatched with their Cloaths rent, and earth upon their Heads, “ to crave ſuccour of the Romans, like as fearful Chickens betake themſelves to the “ Wings of the Hen, beſeeching them not to ſuffer their afflicted Country utterly “ to periſh, nor the Roman name, now indeed meerly a name, to be loſt and extinguiſhed “ in the Iſland. The Romans receiving as great an impreſſion from the “ Story of this Tragedy as humane nature was capable of, made as much haſte to “ their Reſcue, as an Eagle can do in the Air, an Horſeman upon the Earth, or the “ moſt expert Mariner upon the Sea; and like as a mighty Torrent, falling from the “ Mountains, removes Heaps of Sand which lie in its paſſage, ſo did they ſweep “ and cleanſe the Country of theſe greedy Rovers.

Another Supply ſent, which again diſperſeth the Rovers.

18. They now tell plainly thoſe, for whoſe deliverance they came, that they “ muſt not for the future expect any ſuch tedious and laborious Journeys from “ them; or that the Roman Legions, or ſuch an Army was to be indangered by Sea “ and Land, for to drive away a ſort of inconſiderable ſtraggling Thieves. They bid “ them apply themſelves to the ſtudy and practice of Arms, that by their own valour “ and conduct they may be able to protect their Country, their Wives, their Children, “ and (what ſhould be more dear to them) their Lives and Liberty; to ſtretch “ out their Hands not naked and diſarmed, to be pinion'd by the Enemy, but furniſhed “ with Swords, Spears, and ſuch like Inſtruments of War, ready to aſſault, “ and make havock of theſe Nations which could not be more powerful and valiant “ than they themſelves, except their ſloth and idleneſs cauſed them to be ſo. They “ ſhewed them how to make another Wall, not according to the former model, “ but along by the Cities which probably had been built for fear of the Enemies, “ propounding couragious Exploits to a fearful People, and a Copy to ſuch as were “ not willing to write after it. Moreover, upon the Southern Shoar, where their “ own Ships lay at Anchor, and the Invaſions of the wild Beaſts were alſo feared, “ they built Watch-Towers at certain diſtances, and bade them farewel, as never to “ return any more to them.“ Beda (who had been a little more venerable, had he been ſomething more Britiſh) though he ſlightly paſſeth over all things relating to that diſtreſſed and exhauſted Nation, and cannot eſcape ſome cenſure for his partiality betwixt the old Poſſeſſors, and the Intruders, a little inlargeth this Text, and tells us, this Wall was made of firm Stone, in the ſame place where Severus had made his Rampire, or Vallum. He adds, that it being yet in his days conſpicuous, and much talked of, was eight foot broad, and twelve foot high, paſſing in a direct Line from Eaſt to Weſt, as to which he appeals to the eyes of thoſe that behold it.

Inſtructs the Natives, and bids them farewel.

19. And ſome very Learned Men are of opinion, that this Stone-Wall was raiſed in the place both where the Turf Wall ſtood, and that alſo of Severus. Of this belief was Buchanan, who placeth it within the ſame Boundaries, as that of Turfs, betwixt Abercorn and Kirk Patrick. Beſides the Footſteps of the Walls he inſtanceth in the Remains of the Towns, and of Roman Antiquities diſcovered in the Bricks, and the Inſcriptions of Funeral Monuments without controul. Others of his Nation call the place Grimeſdyke, according to the name then known to the Inhabitants, but will have the Stone Wall drawn from the Mouth of Tine croſs the Iſland, by the Suburbs of New-Caſtle, called Gateshead (where Severus they ſay alſo cauſed a Wall and a Ditch to be made oppoſite to New-Caſtle) and upon the River Eike, or Scotſwath for ſixty Miles, as far as a place not much diſtant from Carlile, Another Wall.

Sect. 5. A. D. 446.

lile, Weſtward. But let us ſee what all this labour, and the good will of the Roman Legion amounted to. It was no ſooner gone, but Multitudes of Picts and Scots again appeared upon the Shoar, and like a Swarm of Caterpillars overſpred the “ face of the earth, differing indeed in manners and cuſtoms from each other, but “ both alike greedy to ſhed Blood, having their Faces more covered with Hair, “ than their ſecret parts with Cloaths ; and they confidently ſeiſed on the Northern “ Part of the Iſland as their own, from the utmoſt Bounds thereof as far as the “ Wall. Upon the Wall the Britains ſet a Guard, but ſuch an one as was fitter to “ eat, than to fight, trembling at the ſight of an Enemy, and pining away for the “ very thought of War. The Barbarian had certain Hooks wherewith he “ would pull down to the ground the unwary and helpleſs Defendant, who in ſo “ great misfortune was in this reſpect happy, that he lived not to ſee theſe dreadful “ calamities which ſhortly after befel his Relations. In ſhort, the Guard ere “ long quitted both the Wall and Towns adjoyning ; and then followed the uſual “ flights and diſperſions of a poor ſheepiſh and miſerable people ; for to no other “ than ſuch a preying of Wolves and wild Beaſts can this thing be compared, the “ miſerable Britains running away, and when eaſily overtaken, being ſlaughtered like Sheep, with complaints and reluctancy, but no oppoſition. Thoſe that remained “ alive, felt in another manner the dreadful effects of this invaſion ; ſo ſevere “ a Famine following that Havock, which had been made of all things, that “ no Food could be obtained, but what only could be got by hunting. “

The Guard quits it.

And a miſerable devaſtation follows.

20. The miſerable Remnant of the Britiſh Nation, in this deſolate condition, “ having cauſe to apprehend another invaſion, or rather perpetually ſubject to “ them, after ſome time wrote to Ætius (ſo it ought to be written, as the Reader “ finds cauſe to believe, though ſome Copies have Ægitius, and ſome Æquitius) a Roman Officer, after this manner : To Ætius thrice Conſul the Groans of the “ Britains. Then after a few Complaints*: The* Barbarians drive us to the Sea ; and “ the Sea drives us back upon the Barbarians. Betwixt theſe two ſorts of death, “ we have either our Throats cut, or are drowned. But no ſuccour or relief could “ be obtained. In the mean time, the Famine was ſo violent, that many yielded “ up themſelves to the cruel Enemy, purchaſing a little Bread with everlaſting Slavery: “ others more valiantly got up to the Mountains, Caves and Woods, “ whence they made Sallies upon the Robbers ; and now firſt of all betaking themſelves “ to Almighty God, and truſting in him, had for many years ſucceſs againſt, “ and killed many of them, as they ranged abroad for Booty. Now the boldneſs “ of the Enemy for a little time ceaſed, but not the wickedneſs of the People ; it “ being ever, as it is now (ſaith our Author) the cuſtom of the Nation to be “ weak to repel an Enemy (to blunt his Weapons, as he expreſſeth it) but ſtrong “ enough to ſupport Civil Wars, and the heavy burthen of their Sins: infirm to “ execute the effects of peace and truth ; but able to practiſe wickedneſs and lies. “ The ravenous Iriſh (Hiberni) then return home, to come back again after a “ ſhort time. The Picts thenceforth fixed themſelves, and reſted in the utmoſt part “ of the Iſland, making ſome Incurſions and Depredations now and then.

They ſend to Ætius in vain.

Some make Sallies upon the Enemy, and receive benefit by their Prayers.

21. Now happened the great turn and alteration of the State of Britain. The Iriſh, whom Beda calls the Scots, returned home ; and the Picts remained quiet in the Northern Part of the Iſland, where we muſt look for them when we come to ſpeak particularly of them, and of their Kingdom. And from this time of Ætius his third Conſulſhip, we find reaſon to date the utter revolt of Britain from the Roman Empire. Formerly, it's true, they purpoſed to eſtabliſh themſelves in a diſtinct Body, and Authority ; but both Parties ſtill came together again ; the Authority of the Empire was owned, and Forces were ſent to repreſs the outrageous Attempts of the ſavage Nations. But now, as it were by conſent, they parted. They ſent to Ætius ; but Ætius did not anſwer them. So long as either they owning their Dependance deſired aid, or the other vindicated here their Right, and endeavoured to protect their Subjects ; we owne them as Related, and Britain ſtill a Dioceſs of the Empire. But now by the Roman Laws themſelves, a ſeparation or Alienation was made. The Romans neglecting to ſend Succors, having given the Inhabitants formerly warning to provide for themſelves, and taking leave as never to return, left her as a thing Derelict to the occupation of any one. And (if in this matter we may joyn animate with in animate things, for this our Iſland may anſwer to both) Britain now perceiving in what condition ſhe was, quite alienated her ſelf ; in her purpoſe and reſolutions took her flight from the Roman intereſt, ſine animo revertendi, without purpoſe of returning. Of this ſhe gave evident Teſtimony, when, the Year after the Conſulſhip of Ætius, ſhe compleated that Reſolution which in this Year ſhe muſt have thought of and begun, of chuſing a King to govern her; poſſibly, after his own Luſt, and not according to the Dictates of the Roman Laws; which was Vortigern as he is commonly called.

The great turn of the State of Britain.

A Digreſſion to conſider of the State of Britain.

Britain looked on by the Romans as another World.

And difficultly they kept it

22. Thus we muſt part with Britain now, as fallen quite off, and no longer a Member of the Roman Empire, of which ſince the days of Julius Cæſar it had had the Name; and ſince the days of Claudius it had (not all of it we mean) a true Title to be called. At parting, we would gladly take leave in ſuch a manner as may give the Reader further cauſe to remember her, by a fuller knowledge of her State and Condition, while Imperial. Although ſhe was but a very ſmall parcel of the Roman Empire, conſidered in its Bulk and Grandeur, ſhe was by the Romans thought fit to be termed Another World, as wholly ſevered from their Continent; and not only by their Poets, but their graver Writers; and that not for flouriſh only, but in very good earneſt: inſomuch, that, upon the apprehenſion hereof, A. Plautius his Soldiers, as Dio writes, were very unwilling to follow him out of Gall, in his Expedition hither; ſeriouſly imagining it to be ſome Service quite out of the World. And this might make them think it indeed another World, becauſe they knew no Bounds of it, till the Government of Agricola, Father in Law to Tacitus the Hiſtorian, and General of Domitian; who, overcoming the Ordevices, ſubduing the Iſle of Angliſey, overthrowing Galgacus, with the Caledonian, or moſt Northern Britains, and cauſing the Roman Fleet to coaſt about it, found Britain an Iſland indeed; and penetrated into that Sea which, by the Natives, had hitherto been eſteemed a Secret, and a Shelter. And yet, for all this Conqueſt and Diſcovery, ſuch difficult work the Romans found it to preſerve this now found out plot of Ground, that as before their Colony and Municipia had reaſon to tell them ſad ſtories of the Slaughters they underwent by the Natives: ſo, after Domitian, under Nerva and Trajan, we hear nothing of our Britains, till the time of Adrian; who ſent to curb and reſtrain them Julius Severus: but he being called away, to quiet the tumults of the Jews, they would not be kept in any order, till the Emperor himſelf was fain to croſs over into the Iſland, in the Perambulation of the Provinces, with which Florus the Poet twitted him.

Adrian ſhares with the Natives.

Lollius Urbicus more ſtraitens them.

Severus did little againſt them.

23. And he, notwithſtanding all his endeavours, and amending ſeveral things he found amiſs; yet, perceiving there was ſo little hope to keep what Agricola had acquired, or to make that which the General ſaid to his Soldiers good, that after the Defeat of Galgacus, it would be eaſier to retain them all in Peace and Obedience; that he attempted a thing more glorious to the Brittiſh Nation than to himſelf. He thought it beſt to ſhare betwixt what, as Tacitus tells us, Auguſtus and Tiberius called a prudent Deſign, and the Ambition of the latter times. They thought it wiſdom to neglect piercing further into that which Julius Cæſar had but diſcovered; but, in the time of Domitian, nothing would ſerve but the Conqueſt of the whole Iſland. He knew the Roman Glory was concerned not to quit the whole; and yet he found it would no way ſuit with the Conveniences of the Empire, to endeavour the retaining of the whole, and therefore took a middle way to part Stakes with the Iſlanders; and leaving to them the Northern parts, cauſed a Wall or Rampart to be raiſed eighty Miles in length, from the Rivers Tine and Eske, to ſecure to the Romans one ſhare of their Conqueſts at leaſt. But, whatever St. Auguſtine ſaith of Deus Terminus, his giving way to the will and pleaſure of Adrian, Adrian gave large ſcope to Terminus, drawing back the Roman Soldiers about an hundred Miles from the Poſt where Agricola had placed the firſt Prætentura, or a Caſtle furniſhed with a Garriſon betwixt Dunbritton and Edenborough Friths, the narroweſt neck of Land in all Brittain, then called Glota and Bodotria. Adrian being gone out of the Iſland, the Brittains began quickly again to be tumultuous; and, to reduce them to obedience, by Antoninus Pius, was ſent Lollius Urbicus; who indeed did him excellent Service, and drove the Northern People into a narrower ſtrait than they were before, raiſing another Wall or Rampart of Turfs betwixt the two Friths now mentioned. But, when a larger Boundary would not quiet them, it was little probable that they would be content with a narrower Confinement. They again renewed their Hoſtilities; and, though ſometimes they were ſuppreſſed, yet continued ſo long and ſo far to manifeſt their uneaſineſs and reluctancy under the Yoke, that this obliged Severus himſelf, with his two Sons, to come into Britain. He, for all the terror of his Name and Authority, found ſo hard a task of it, that, after the loſs of fifty thouſand Men, he was glad to make a League with the Natives, and by it to oblige them to retire again; but not into ſo narrow a Compaſs as Lollius would have forced them. But, he drew the Boundary back again, and raiſed a Wall of Stone on the Foundation of that formerly made by Adrian of Earth and Timber, almoſt the whole way from Sea to Sea. What reaſon he had hence to be called Britannicus we know not; as alſo, why Spartianus ſhould term the building of this Wall the greateſt Glory of his Reign. Sure it was a Monument of the reſtleſs courage and reſolution of the Brittains. But, ſo many Walls were here made by the Romans to repreſs their courage and reſolution, and this was the laſt we know of; which alſo, ordinarily and chiefly goes by the name of the Wall; except we mention one, ſaid to be raiſed by Carauſius, who uſurped, being employed here, in the Reign of Diocletian. But this is founded upon the relation of Geoffrey of Monmouth, and other ſuch like Teſtimonies. That Theodoſius the Elder, and others, endeavoured to make good this Limit we need not doubt.

The Roman Diviſions of Britain.

24. Yet uſed the Romans other means, and ſome diverſe from thoſe in other Provinces, to keep Britain in ſubjection. That ſhare of it they thought fit to call Roman they divided into ſeveral parts, for a clearer diſtinction, and better Government. Firſt into four (not to mention the general Partition into Upper and Lower) as, Maxima Cæſarienſis, Flavia Cæſarienſis, Britannia Prima and Britannia Secunda. This appears from the Breviary of Sextus Rufus, which he dedicated to Valentinian the Emperor; of which ſome imperfect Copies have but three, and leave out Flavia; one of which Copies was light on by learned Cambden, and cauſed him to miſtake in this Enumeration. This Partition moſt probably was made by Conſtantine the Great, from whoſe Prænomen was Flavia ſo named, as Maxima from the greatneſs of it. Afterwards, when Theodoſius the Elder had reſtored the Roman Force of things in Britain, and recovered a great part of the Country, loſt to Natives, he increaſed the Diviſion, by adding a fifth Province, with the name of Valentia, from his Maſter. Now, of theſe, Britannia Prima is moſt rationally thought to have been that part of the Country, lying from the Gallick Sea, to the River of Thames, and the Æſtuary of the Severne. Britannia Secunda reached from the Severne, to the Iriſh Sea. Flavia Cæſarienſis lay betwixt the Rivers Thames, Severne and Humber. Maxima Cæſarienſis, betwixt Humber and Adrian his Wall. And Valentia, having been formerly part of Maxima, betwixt the Walls of Adrian and Urbicus Lollius, or that betwixt the Friths. Here, if the reaſon for this Partition thus limited be required, the Author of it anſwers, that he had obſerved the Romans ever to call theſe Provinces the Firſt which were neareſt to Rome. For example; Germania Prima, Belgica Prima, Lugdunenſis Prima, Aquitania Prima, Pannonia Prima; all which were nearer Rome than any that had the name of Second: which were more elegantly called Inferior, as the Firſt were termed the Superior. And, whereas in the declining of the Empire, thoſe Provinces only had Conſulares which lay next to Enemies, as he obſerved out of the Notitia, not only in Gall, but in Africk: and in that Notitia, both Maxima Cæſarienſis and Valentia have ſuch Magiſtrates aſſigned them; therefore he rationally thought them to be thoſe which lay next to the Walls, and, at laſt, were moſt ſubject to the Attempts of Picts and Scots.

Camden.

25. But there is another Argument for his threefold Diviſion of Britain, as he found it in ſome corrupt copy of Sextus Rufus, wherein the Flavia Cæſarienſis is left out. He found that it had been obſerved (and that truly) how the Polity of the Church imitated that of the State; and Arch-Biſhops were founded in thoſe Cities where the Roman Preſidents were wont to reſide. Now, we read how Britain had of old three Arch-Biſhops, viz. London, York and Caer Leon upon Uske in Monmouthſhire. Therefore he concludes, that the Province belonging to London, ſince tranſlated to Canterbury, was the Britannia Prima: Wales was the Britannia Secunda: and that belonging to York, and what extends as far as the Wall, to have been the Maxima Cæſarienſis. But if he concludes that the Province lying next, or belonging to the chief City, had the name of the firſt, becauſe it appertained to that which being chief, or the Metropolis of Brittain, had the firſt Arch-Biſhop ſeated in it; there is another that will contend with London for that Title in the Roman times. For, although London hath been, as at this day, for very many Ages, the chief City in Britain, and above thirteen hundred Years ago was accounted an old Town, and ſtiled Auguſta in the days of Ammianus Marcellinus; nay, commended long before that, as of great Fame and Renown, even in the time of Tacitus, for the concourſe of Merchants, and proviſion of all things neceſſary: Yet Berterius aſſigns York as the more ancient or truer Metropolis of this Dioceſs of the Brittanies.

Pithanon, lib. 1. c. 3.

Not ſo much for that it was a Roman Colony, which London, it's concluded, was not; but alſo, becauſe the Emperor's Palace and Prætoriam were there. There is mentioned alſo the Temple of Bellona: and the Hiſtorian calls it Civitas, by way of Excellence or Preheminency. I add the Temple of Bellona, as that indeed which gave the chiefeſt occaſion to its being the Metropolis. For, when the more Southern parts of the Iſland were ſubdued, and the Northern remained refractory, and perpetually adminiſtred ſome Incentive for War, York was the place where the Governors choſe to make their abode; as neareſt, and at hand, to oppoſe the Northern Nations. Therefore (we ſuppoſe) Severus found a Palace, a Prætorium and a Temple, and did not make them: and, as he, ſo his Succeſſors, when in this Iſland, there made their uſual Reſidence: and, as he, ſo Conſtantius there died. There was the Court of the Prince, the Court of Juſtice, and thither the Dernier reſort lay; that of Merchants being left to London. That Eborius, Biſhop of York, in the Council of Arles, under Conſtantine the Great, ſubſcribed before Reſtitutus of London, it will be more convenient in another place to ſhew.

25. But ſuch was the Partition of Britain, and the Government was ſuited to it; to be ſure, after the Model of Conſtantine. Indeed, what it might be called before that time, as to Terms or Titles of the Governors, is not ſo eaſie to determine; it being a controverſie betwixt two famouſly learned Men; our Camden, and Pancirolus. The former affirms, that Britain was a Province neither Conſular nor Proconſular, but Præſidial, as belonging to Auguſtus (after that Diviſion we related to have been made by him of Provinces betwixt himſelf and the Senate) and had its own Proprætors. But the latter inſtanceth in ſeveral that governed as Conſulares, viz. A. Plautius, and Petilius Cerialis, both mentioned indeed by Tacitus, in the life of Agricola, by the Title of Conſulares. But afterwards he confeſſeth it ruled by Preſidents; particularly, by Virius Lupus, under Alexander. Now, that is commonly known that Auguſtus, as Dion Caſſius relates, did, in the Diviſion, keep to himſelf ſuch Provinces as were moſt expoſed to the Enemy; under pretence to rid the Senate of trouble, but with deſign to weaken it, and ſtrengthen himſelf, by the Conjunction of the Legions. The Hiſtorian reckons up thoſe very Provinces, but amongſt them Britain is not to be found; and it may be anſwered, that the reaſon is, becauſe Britain was by Auguſtus derelict, who thought it policy not to meddle with it: but it came in afterwards; and Dio witneſſeth, that ſuch as afterward fell in, fell in alſo to the Lot of Cæſar. But withal, the ſame Author writes, that there was in ſucceeding times, ſome alteration made from this Rule; eſpecially, out of Italy: and Tacitus his Teſtimony ſeems uncontrollable, when he ſpeaks of what was practiſed in his own time, and under his own obſervation. To be ſure, he at large declares, that many, as Legati and Procuratores, were ſent into the Iſland, after the time of Claudius.

The Government.

Conſularium primus A. Plautius præpoſitus. p.662. cum Notis Lipſii. Brevi deinde Britannia Conſularem Petilium Cerialem accepit, p.658. Lib. 53.

26. Under the Model of Conſtantine, and after his Diviſion of the Country, it is clear enough what both Title and Authority the Governors had. Being one of the Dioceſſes belonging to the Diſtrict of the Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, it had a Vicar of its own; to whom the Notitia of the Empire aſſigns the Enſigns of his Place, and the Magiſtrates and Officers ſubject to his Command. His Enſigns were a Book of Mandates ſhut, covered with Green, and marked on the Back, together with five Caſtles repreſenting ſo many Provinces, with their ſeveral names inſcribed. The Magiſtrates under his Command were two Conſulares of Maxima Cæſarienſis and Valentia; and three Preſidents of Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Flavia Cæſarienſis. For his Officium, he had his Princeps out of the Schole of the Agentes in Rebus, from the Ducenarii; a Cornicularius, two Numerarii, Comentarienſis, Abactis, Cura Epiſtolarum, Adjutor, Subadjuvæ, Exceptores, Singulares, and the reſt of the Officiales. By the Vicar, and theſe five Magiſtrates under him, was the Civil Government adminiſtred in ſuch manner as our Polity of the Empire declares. The Military was executed by three great Officers under the Magiſtri Militum of the Weſt, viz. the Comes Britanniarum, the Comes Litoris Saxonici, and the Dux Britanniarum; the ſeveral Charges of whom, and the Tracts ſubject to their Juriſdictions, may be diſcerned by the names of thoſe Towns where their under-Officers and Forces are ſaid to have had their Quarters. The Comes of Britain is concluded to have had his Command toward the Inward and Middle part of the Iſland; and this is becauſe the other two are known to have had theirs upon the Maritime and Northern Coaſts. For, the Notitia aſſigns not to him any Forces, nor mentions any place ſubject to his Command (though we know of ſeveral Legions that lay in the inward parts of Britain) becauſe, as Pancirolus thinks, at the writing of it, almoſt

A Vicar.

Subordinate Magiſtrates.

Notitia Imp. Occident. Sub diſpoſitione viri ſpectabilis Vicarii Britanniarum.

Civil.

Military.

Comes of Britain.

Sect. 5. A. D. 446.

moſt the whole Iſland was over-run by Barbarians. Indeed, it was in very ill plight; and, had he had his Forces here in Garriſon, there would have been no ſuch need for the Natives to ſend ſo often as they did, about that very time, to Rome for ſuccour. But he and his Army were, in truth, driven away; and alſo, we fear, his Officium, though theſe ſeveral Members of it be regiſtred in that Survey: as the Princeps from the Office of the Magiſter Militum Præſentalis every other Year, Commentarienſis, two Numerarii, Adjutor, Subadjuvæ, Exceptores, Singulares, and the reſt of the Officiales.

The Comes Litoris Saxonici.

27. But, if Pancirolus his reaſon be valid, why ſhould we not find the condition of the two other great Officers the ſame? Can we imagine that had the Comes Limitis Saxonici per Britanniam, or eſpecially, the Dux Britanniarum, had ſuch numerous Troops about them as the Notitia Muſters, there would have been ſuch outcries made, and tears ſpent for the obtaining of one Legion? The former hath no fewer than eight Præpoſiti mentioned under his Command, and one Tribune. Of theſe, the Præpoſitus of the Numerus, or Cohort of the Fortenſes, lived at Othona, thought to be Haſtings in Suſſex: the Præpoſitus of the Tungricani (or thoſe that were raiſed about Tongres, in Brabant) at Dubris, or Dover: the Præpoſitus of the Numerus of the Turnacenſes (or thoſe about Tournay) at Lemanis, or Lime, very anciently another Port Town in Kent: the Præpoſitus of the Numerus Branodunenſis, of the Dalmatian Horſe-men at Branodunum, or Brancaſter, in Norfolk: the Præpoſitus of the Numerus Gariannonenſis, of the Horſemen called Equites Stableſiani; who quartered at Gariannonum, or Caſtor, near Yarmouth, in the ſame County. Then follows the Tribune of the firſt Cohort of the Vetaſii (poſſibly for Vetaraſii, Inhabitants of Vetaraſia, a City of Gallia Belgica; or Vetuſii, a People of the Alpes in Italy) who had their abode at Regulbium, or Reculver, in Kent. The former Præpoſiti, Pancirolus thinks Commanders of Auxilia, and Horſe; and this Tribune as Officer alſo of a Cohort, to be ſet amongſt the Legionary Præpoſiti, below them. For, now follow three Præpoſiti of Legions; The former of whom is he that commanded the ſecond Legion, Auguſta, which kept Guard at Rutupis, or Richborough. The next is the Præpoſitus of the Numerus of the Abulci, who had his Quarter at Anderida, poſſibly, Newenden. And the laſt, the Præpoſitus of the Numerus of the Exploratores (ſo called, becauſe their duty was to make diſcovery of the State and Motions of the Enemy) who had their Station at Portus Adurni, or Ederington, in Suſſex. For his Officium, he had it thus furniſhed: The Princeps of it was out of the Office of the Magiſter Peditum Præſentalis. Then he had two Numerarii, and a Commentarienſis, both out of the aforeſaid Office; Cornicularius, Adjutor, Subadjuva, Regerendarius, Exceptores, Singulares, and the reſt of the Officiales. This Comes had, as others of his Rank, for the Enſigns of his place, a purple Book, with the like Notes; together with his Codicils, and the Images of theſe nine places where the Præpoſiti and the Tribune lay in Quarters.

Notitia Imp. Occid. Sub Diſpoſitione viri ſpectabilis Comitis Litoris Saxonici per Britanniam.

The Enſigns of his Authority.

The Dux Britanniarum.

28. In the laſt place comes the Dux Britanniarum, with the Muſter-Roll of ſuch an Army, as half of it would have affrighted the Picts and Scots in their greateſt reſolution, and cauſed them to betake themſelves to their Heels again. For, under his diſpoſition, as the term of the Notitia is, is firſt placed the Præfect of the ſixth Legion; in the next place, the Præfect of the Dalmatian Horſe, having his Quarters at Præſidium, or Patrington, in Holderneſs, near the Sea: the Præfect of the Criſpian Horſe at Danum, or Dancaſter: the Præfect of the Catafractarian Horſe at Morbium, poſſibly Morſby, in Cumberland: the Præfect of the Numerus of the Barcarii Tigritenſes at Arbeia, or Jerby, in the ſame Shire: the Præfect of that of the Nervii Dictenſis (Nervii were a People of Belgica Secunda) at Dictis, or Diganwy, in Carnarvonſhire: the Præfect of the Numerus of the Vigiles (or Scouts) at Concangii, poſſibly, in Kendal, in Weſtmerland: the Præfect of the Numerus of the Exploratores at Lavatres, near Bowes, in Staneſmore, in Richmondſhire: the Præfect of the Numerus of the Directi, at Verteræ, or Burgh upon Stanemore, in Weſtmerland: the Præfect of the Numerus of the Defenſores, at Broconiocum, or Bougham, on the edge of Weſtmerland: the Præfect of that of the Solenſes (from Solis, a Town of Cilicia) at Maglona, thought by Camden to be Machleneth, in Montgomeriſhire; where they lay to reſtrain thoſe that lived on the Mountains: the Præfect of the Numerus of the Pacenſes, who lay at Magi, Maiſeneth, or old Radnor: the Præfect of the Longonicarii, at Longonicus, or Langcheſter, in the Biſhoprick of Durham: and laſtly, the Præfect of the Numerus Derventionenſis, ſo called from Derventio, where it lay quartered; a Town upon the River Derwent, ſeven Miles from York; thought to be Aldby. All theſe Præpoſiti, fourteen in number, have expreſſed in the Notitia the places where they quartered, except the firſt, of whom thus much is only found: Præfectus Legionis Sextæ, without any other addition. And whereas this Dux hath for his Arms or Enſigns, as other Duces, a Book inſcribed, with a purple Cover; to it are added the Images of fourteen Munitions, thirteen of which have the ſame names upon them we have mentioned, as Quarters of the Præfects: only the firſt over it hath Sextæ relating, I ſuppoſe, to the Legion. Now what this Sexta ſhould mean but York it ſelf, I cannot apprehend, where the Sexta Legio Victrix lay for ſome Ages, from the time of Severus; and in Antonine's Itinerary to the wonted name is thus added, Eboracum, Legio VI, Victrix; and in a Coin of Severus hath been alſo found Col. Eboracum, Leg. VI. Victrix.

The Forces of the Limit.

29. Theſe Numeri, when put together, made a conſiderable Force; but yet beſides them, a ſtrong Watch was kept upon the Vallum, or Wall, being the Limit of the Empire in this Country, all along, or through the Line of it, as the Notitia expreſſeth it. For here lay the Tribune of the Fourth Cohort of the Lergi, at a place called Segodunnm, now Seaton, upon the Sea Coaſt of Northumberland. The Tribune of the Cohort of the Comonii, who had his Station at Pons Ælii, now called Pontland in Northumberland, the Bridge whereof was probably made by order of Ælius Adrianus the Emperor. Next to him we find the Tribune of the Ala, or Wing of the Aſtores (from Aſta, a Colony and City of the Ligures, if Pancirolus be to be believed) at Condercum, or Cheſter upon the Street, by the Saxons called Conceſter, though a few Miles diſtant from the Vallum in the Biſhoprick of Durham. After him the Tribune of the firſt Cohort of the Frixagi, who quartered at Vindobala, as the Notitia calls it; in the Itinerary, Vindomora, or the end of the Wall: For this was ſignified in the Provincial Language of the Britains, at that time by Vindomora (Finis Muri) as alſo by Vindobala (Finis Valli) beyond it no Veſtigia of the Ductus or Tract thereof appearing ever to have been there; the River Tine (it is to be thought) ſerving for a Rampire to keep off the Enemy: And in conformity with all this, the place ſtill hath the name of Walls-end in Northumberland. The next in order is the Præfect of the Ala Saviniana at Hunnum, which Cambden conjectures to have been no other than that place upon the Wall in the ſame County at this day, called Sevenſhale from Saviniana. After him the Præfect of the ſecond Ala of the Aſtori, lay at Cilurnum, which we take for Cillerford, or at leaſt Scilceſter on the Wall in the ſame Shire. Then follows the Tribune of the firſt Cohort of the Batavi, who had his Abode at Procolitia, poſſibly that called Coleceſter upon the Tine ſtill in that County.

Item per lineam valli.

30. But the Tribune of the firſt Cohort of Tungri kept his mural Watch at Borcovicus, ſtill at this day called Borwick in Northumberland. The Tribune of the fourth Cohort of the Galls at Vindolana, now Wincheſter, on the Wall, near to Walton, by Beda, called ad Murum, and a Royal Village, in which Segbert, King of the Eaſt-Saxons, was baptiſed by Paulinus. The Tribune of the firſt Cohort of the Aſtori lay at Æſica, thought now to be Netherly upon Esk in Cumberland. The Tribune of the ſecond Cohort of the Dalmatæ at Magni, probably ſome other place upon the Wall, and not Radnor, called alſo by the ſame name. As for the Dalmatæ, Pancirolus takes notice, that they were in theſe Days the very ſtrength of the Roman Empire; but that Alarich, in a manner deſtroyed them, as Zoſimus ſhews; ſo that of the Foot, this Cohort afterward inlarged did only remain; but of Horſe ſeveral ſurvived. The Tribune of the firſt Cohort Ælia of the Daci (which ſhews them to have been here planted by Adrian, as the ſame Author will have it) at Amboglanna poſſibly ſome Munition upon Camb-beck, a Rivolet upon the Wall. The Præfect of the Ala Petriana, ſo called from Petrianæ, at old Perith in Cumberland. The Præfect of the Numerus of the Mauri Aureliani brought in, it may be, by Aurelian, at Aballaba, now contractedly known by the name of Appelby in Weſtmorland. The Tribune of the ſecond Cohort of the Lergi at Congavata, near Cand-beck and Roſe Caſtle in Cumberland. The Tribune of the Cohort of the Spaniards, at Axelodunum, now probably Hexham, a famous Town in Northumberland, for being once the Seat of a Biſhop. The Tribune of the ſecond Cohort of Thracians at Gabroſentum, not three Miles off from Vindobala, now Gateſhead over againſt New-Caſtle, of which it ſeemeth a Suburb. The Tribune of the firſt Cohort, called Ælia Claſſica, at Tunnocellum, in probability ſeated where ſince ſtood Tinmouth Caſtle, at the Mouth of the River Tine, the Promontory of which the very Roman Name it ſelf doth ſignifie.

Gatter Britannice capra & Hen caput. Tunnocellum promontorinm Tunnæ vel Tinæ ſonat.

31. This Cohort, Learned Cambden thinks, from its addition of Claſſica, to have attended herein Naval Affairs; the Romans having their Luſoriæ in Rivers, both for prevention, and making of Incurſions, We have ſeen indeed largely, that the Empire had ſuch Fleets upon Rivers; but whether on Tine, we cannot ſay; neither ſeems there to have been ſuch need of them, the Wall having come near to the Mouth of that River, nay, up cloſe to it, as ſome will have it, who contend, that the place was called Pen Bal-Crag, viz. the Head of a Wall in a Rock. And yet there is a Law extant in the Pandects, wherein mention is made by Javolenus of one Seius Saturninus, who was Archigubernus of the Britiſh Fleet: and Nero, from a Claſſis, or Fleet, gave the name of Claſſica to a Legion. He that next follows, is the Tribune of the firſt Cohort of the Morini, and he attended his Charge at Glannobanta, thought to be by Camden, Bambridg in Wentſedale, where, of late years, was digged up an Image of Commodus, accoutred after the Herculean faſhion, which he affected. But afterward he changed his opinion, and placed it by the River Wentſbeck in Cumberland. The Tribune of the third Cohort of the Nervii, lay at Alione, or the place now called Whitley Caſtle in Weſtmorland. After him the Notitia mentions a Cuneus of the Armaturæ, and placeth it at Brementuracum, ſome ſtation per lineam valli, and not near Preſton in Lancaſhire, ſixty Miles diſtant from the Wall, as Camben, in the Proecdoſis of his Work would have it. Then follows the Præfect of the firſt Ala Herculea, the Seat of which was at Olenacum, poſſibly Elenborough in Cumberland, where remain many Monuments of Antiquity. And in the laſt place comes the Tribune of the ſixth Cohort of the Nervii, to whom the Notitia aſſigns a Poſt at Veroſidum thought to be Werewick upon Eden, near Carlile. Theſe were the Officers and Forces lying for the defence of the Limit to ſecure the Wall, under the Command of the Dux Britanniarum, who alſo had an Officium belonging to him, as others of his Rank, for diſpatch of buſineſs. This conſiſted of a Princeps, taken yearly out of the Offices of the Magiſtri Militum Præſentales; two Commentarienſes, Numerarii yearly out of both the Offices; an Adjutor, Subadjuva, Regerendarius, Exceptores, Singulares, and the reſt of the Officials.

Ib. S. C. ad Trebell.

32. If Pancirolus reckons right, Britain muſt have maintained at this time, of the Notitia, about nineteen thouſand and two hundred Foot, and ſeventeen hundred Horſe: yet it ſets none down, as belonging to the Juriſdiction of the Comes Britanniæ, who has only the Image of the Iſland, and a Book of Mandates for his Enſigns, without thoſe of Caſtles or Garriſons. That Commentator judgeth, it was becauſe the whole Iſland was then, in a manner, in the power of the Barbarians; but that reaſon might alſo have ſerved againſt ſetting down the Forces belonging to the other Officers; for when the Notitia was compoſed, the Britains ſent often to Rome for aid, which they needed not, if half, or a quarter of theſe Numeri had lain in Garriſon toward the Wall. The firſt Vicar we meet with, and probably the firſt of all, was Pacatianus, to whom we find one Edict directed with the Title of Vicarius Britanniarum, forbidding, that one Decurio here, ſhould be bound to pay the Tributes that were due from another. But who was the firſt Comes of the Saxon Shoar, we know not, and uncertain it is when firſt he was made; though it muſt be when the Saxons became ſo terrible for their Piracy. He is ſtiled by the Notitia, Comes Littoris Saxonici per Britanniam; and within Britain his authority is thought to have been confined, till of late a Learned Man extended it to the Coaſts beyond the Seas, lying over againſt us, as Cimbria, Batavia, Belgica and Armorica. To them he finds the name of Littus Saxonicum given, becauſe the Saxons infeſted them alſo, and made great Depredations in them by their ſudden Incurſions. And he contends, that this Comes being deſigned to reſtrain their inſolence, had power alſo in thoſe Coaſts, as well as upon the Borders of Kent; though he had his Denomination from Britain, where he ordinarily reſided. And yet, by his favour, the Notitia mentions no Forces under his Command in any other place, but only in this Iſland. And it's ſtrange, they ſhould be omitted, and that having a Command of that extent, the Images and Names of only nine Britiſh Towns or Garriſons ſhould be put into the Enſigns of his Office. As his Employment lay upon the Sea Coaſts in the Iſland; ſo that of the Dux Britanniarum toward the North of England; Danum or Dancaſter, at this day a conſiderable Town, and ſtanding ſix Miles within Yorkſhire, ſeeming to have been the moſt Southern Quarter, taken up by his Soldiers.

Vide quæ ſed ex Seldeno attulimus ſupra c. 1. Sect. 2. Paragr. 40.

L. 2. de exactionib. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 7. Dat. 12. Cal. Decemb. A.D. CCCXIX.

Selden in Mari Clauſo.

33. That Station being repreſented in the Enſigns like a Caſtle, hath ſet over it Dano in the Ablative Caſe, as the next to it is called Morbio, and many others in like manner. For ſome obſerve, that from the Age Solinus lived in (not long after Pliny) and ſo downward, it was a cuſtom to pronounce the Names of Cities in the Cities named in the Ablative Caſe.

ſixth or Ablative Caſe ; or Monoptotes. But however, the Romans might give Terminations to, and decline the names of Towns, yet they were generally of Britiſh Extraction. They gave names indeed to few places, either in Britain, or other Provinces. But ſome even here they did, as Ad Anſam, Aquæ Solis, Bovium, Cæſaromagus, Calcaria, Caſtra Exploratorum, Colonia, Ad Pontem, Pontes, Spina, Trajectus, Tripontium, Villa Fauſtini, and perhaps others to be ſeen in the Itinerary, which were given upon ſome unknown accidents, or occaſions. For communication betwixt theſe places, and for the convenience of Travel, when Armies marched, and the Governors viſited the Provinces, the Legions were, when otherwiſe idle, employed in raiſing High-ways and Cawſeys, called Viæ Militares, Conſulares, Prætoriæ, Publicæ, Stratæ, or by other names; which courſe was taken in every Province of the Empire. Now there being mentioned in the Itinerary no fewer than one hundred and fourteen Manſions and Towns, through fifteen Roads, or Journeys ; and in the Notitia forty ſix Garriſons, viz. nine on the Sea Coaſt, under the Command of the Comes of the Saxon Shoar, fourteen more inland, and three and twenty per lineam valli, all under the charge of the Dux Britanniarum; though ſome of theſe be the ſame with others mentioned in the Itinerary, many Streets or High-ways muſt have been raiſed for convenience of paſſing, according to the Roman cuſtom of Travel. And it is no way probable, that a Province ſo abounding with Stations, Camps, Fortreſſes and Cities, ſhould have ſo few as four Ways of Note in it; and yet but ſo many our ordinary Hiſtorians do reckon. Had the Notitia given us an account of the Forces and Places under the Command of the Comes Britanniæ, as well as it hath done of thoſe belonging to the other two great Officers, we might have found more Cities in the Iſland ; of which, Beda, from Gildas, tells us, there were in theſe Ages twenty and eight moſt noble ones, beſides innumerable Caſtles furniſhed and fortified with moſt firm Walls, with Towers, Gates and Locks.

Cawſeys raiſed.

Lib. 1. c. 1.

34. Yet, as we ſaid, the High-ways are commonly made but four in number, the courſes whereof are differently reported, and alſo in ſome part their very Names. But one of them is called Watling-ſtreet, ſaid to run out of the South-Eaſt to the North-Weſt; from Dover to Cardigan in Wales, at the Iriſh Sea. The ſecond is that called the Foſſe, from the South to the North, from Totneſs in Cornwal to Lincoln, and ſo to Cathneſs the utmoſt of Scotland. The third is Erming-Street, out of the Weſt-North-Weſt, to the Eaſt-South-Eaſt, from S. Davids to Southampton. And the fourth is called Iknel-Street, taking its courſe by Worceſter, and ſo by York unto Tinmouth. To endeavour certainty in all theſe, as one ſaith, were to conclude unwarrantable conjectures, and abuſe both time and the Reader with various opinions, which would amount to nothing. Beſides theſe, there are others mentioned with divers names ; as Julia Strata in Monmouthſhire, raiſed, as Cambden thinks, by Julius Frontinus, of whom Tacitus teſtifies that he ſubdued, the Nation of the Silures, having got the Maſtery, both over the Valour of the Enemy, and the difficulties of Places. There was another way called Strata Marcella, which Giraldus Cambrenſis mentions at no very far diſtance, in his Itinerary of Wales, and others would derive from Ulpius Marcellus, who was Proprætor here under Commodus, not very long after Frontinus, whoſe ſtrictneſs in Military Diſcipline Dion Caſſius ſo much commends. It ſhall ſuffice me to ſay, that if we conſider the end and deſign of raiſing theſe High-ways, they were made for convenience of paſſage, to ſuch Garriſons and Forts as were placed according to the exigency of Affairs, as they might beſt curb and reſtrain Domeſtick or Foreign Enemies, or to Manſions and Places of Abode, where the Civil Magiſtrates executed Juſtice, and decided Controverſies ; which were ſo ſituated, as the People might with beſt conveniency meet together. The Cawſeys therefore being made for the Towns, and not the Towns for the Cawſeys (though convenience of Travel, in ſuch as were built more lately, might be an inducement to ſet them on, or as near to the Road as could be) they muſt needs take various courſes, and croſs ſeveral ways, nay, often divert, and not through the neareſt cut. And if particular Counties were well ſurveyed, many Branches of the more direct and ſtraight ones would be found. I have in Lincolnſhire obſerved ſomething of this kind, and particularly how one there is derived from that High Street which runs by Stamford, Northward, which croſſing the River near Gunworth Ferry, took its courſe down by Deeping, and ſo into the very Fenny Parts of that County.

See Barton's Comment on Antonine's Itinerary through Britain.

See Doctor Plot's Book of Oxfordſhire.

35. Enough of Roman Britain conſidered within her ſelf, as to her Buildings and Inhabitants, whether Native or Adventitious. But we muſt remember, that as ſhe received Strangers in, ſo ſhe ſent out too many of her own Inhabitants; and upon this account her vigour abated, and her wonted ſtrength was exhauſted, being deprived of her Youth by the Uſurpers lately mentioned. This is to be underſtood not ſo much of Strangers lying here in Garriſon at thoſe Poſts we have mentioned, as of true natural Britains, at leaſt born here, though of Roman Parents; or of other Nations, which we ſee were numerous in the Armies. For the Romans in furniſhing their Garriſons, and defending their Provinces, thought it not wiſdom to truſt the Natives; but in raiſing their Forces, ſtill tranſplanted them, as not to be armed in their own Countries. Therefore, beſides thoſe whom the Uſurper Maximus and Conſtantine took away with them, it evidently appeareth by ancient Inſcriptions, and the Notitia of the Empire, that theſe Companies hereafter mentioned ſerved the Romans in their Wars here and there, diſperſed over the Provinces, which were from time to time ſupplyed out of Britain. We read of Ala Britannica Milliaria, Ala quarta Britonum in Ægypto, Cohors prima Ælia Britonum, Cohors tertia Britonum, Cohors ſeptima Britonum, Cohors viceſima ſexta Britonum in Armenia, Britanniciani ſub Magiſtro Peditum, Invicti Juniores Britanniciani, Excubitores Jun. Britan. (both of them amongſt the Palatine Auxilia, or Aids) Britones cum Magiſtro Equitum Galliarum, Invicti Juniores Britones intra Hiſpanias, Britones Seniores in Illyrico. No wonder then it is, that Britain dayly exhauſted with ſo many and ſo great Levies of Soldiers lay expoſed to the fury of the Barbarians; for though Natives are more to be feared, as to Inſurrections, yet they more vigorouſly defend their own Country and Intereſt than others. And hereby that ſaying of Tacitus, as Camden obſerves, is proved true, that there is no ſtrength in the Roman Armies, but what comes by Foreigners. If the Reader think fit, he may ſee both what Troops were furniſhed out of the ſeveral Provinces, and alſo to what other parts, in that uſeful Book the Notitia. We have made a long Digreſſion in behalf of Britain, though it may juſtly challenge from us more diligence than other Countries. But ſo we leave her, till ſhortly we meet with her again, upon another account, in another dreſs.

Forces ſent out of Britain.

36. We ſaid at the beginning of this Year, that it was too remarkable in divers reſpects. And this not in the leaſt, that now Attila puffed up with pride, and delighting in Blood and Cruelty, could not contain himſelf, but brake the peace with Theodoſius, pretending his Tribute was not paid him, and made an Incurſion into the Eaſtern Provinces, where he cut off at length the Magiſter Militum, which conſtrained the Emperor to do that by Gold, which his Steel would not effect, and purchaſed that peace again which was but ſuddenly to be broken. Agreeable to thoſe Civil Commotions and Ruptures in the Empire was that terrible Earthquake, which Marcellinus writes to have happened in this Conſulſhip of Ætius and Symmachus. It raged in very many places, and therein overturned very many Cities. The Wall of Conſtantinople, though but new built, it threw to the Ground with fifty ſeven Turrets: Stones of a great Bulk, lately placed in Building of the Forum of Taurus, fell down, yet did no other hurt. But many Towns being ruined, a peſtilent vapour aroſe, which cauſed a Plague, and this, joyned with a Famine, deſtroyed many thouſands of Mankind. This Earthquake we take to be the ſame with that which Evagrius writes to have happened in Theodoſius his Reign, and ſaid to have been the greateſt and moſt memorable of all others: ſuch, as by its greatneſs, rendred inconſiderable all that were before it. It afflicted, he had almoſt ſaid, the whole world. Many Towers in the Palace fell to the ground; the Wall of the Cherroneſus, called the Long, tumbled down; the Earth gaped, and ſwallowed many Villages, beſides other many, nay, innumerable other Calamities both by Sea and Land. Some Fountains were dried up, in other places water in great quantity broke out where formerly it had not been known; great Trees were torn up by the Roots; heaps of Earth were ſo ſhaken together, that they were raiſed into Mountains. The Sea caſt forth dead Fiſhes; in it many Iſlands were overwhelmed and ſunk; Ships ſailing on the Sea, by a ſudden retroceſſion of the Water, were left on dry ground. In concluſion, many places of Bithynia, the Helleſpont, and both the Phrygias were grievouſly diſtreſſed. And this Diſaſter a long time, and ſorely afflicted the world; but yet continued not in the ſame fury, but by degrees grew leſs, and languiſhed, till at length it wholly ceaſed.

Attila breaks the peace.

A terrible Earthquake.

Lib. 1. c. 17.

37. Nicephorus out of other Authors writes, that it continued ſix Months, and that in a manner without intermiſſion. That it reached Alexandria, but eſpecially afflicted Antioch, the choiceſt rarities of which it broke or ſpoiled; for beſides the Countries mentioned by Evagrius, it invaded the greateſt part of the Eaſt; and

Lib. 14. c. 46.

ſpared not many Regions of the Weſt. He adds, that the People of Conſtantinople not daring to ſtay in the City, for fear of the fall of Houſes, continued, together with the Emperor, and Proclus their Patriarch, in the Field, wholly intent upon Prayer for the Removal of ſo heavy a Judgment; which, at laſt, was ſtayed, when a Boy, being taken up into the Air, and let down again the ſame way, told them of an Hymn he had heard ſung by Angels; which they then applyed themſelves to ſing. That this Hymn was afterward conſtantly uſed in the Church, being enjoyned by an Edict to be ſung throughout the Empire: and the Greeks, in their Menology, retained the memory of the thing; beſides what is written of it by eminent perſons living at that time. But Theodoſius, when he was delivered from the danger of the Earthquake, preſently ſet himſelf to repair the Walls of Conſtantinople; and Anthemius, in the ſpace of ſixty days, did indeed, raiſe the greater part of them which ſtood upon dry Ground; and, by extending the Pomœrium, did very much enlarge the City. But Cyrus, the Præfect of it, reſtored all that was fallen, and what ever elſe had by Age been broken; and raiſing it to a ſublime height, put the City, as it were, into a new Form and Aſpect. In ſo much, that when, on a time, Theodoſius, in the Hippodrome, was beholding an Horſe-Race, the Citizens, much taken with the Structure raiſed by Cyrus, cryed out; Conſtantius built, and Cyrus reſtored. The Emperor was enraged thereat; and, under pretence that he was addicted to the Superſtition of the Greeks, deprived him of his Dignity, and put to Sale his whole Eſtate. The man, much dejected, betook himſelf to a Church, though lately of the Pagan Profeſſion; and was made the Chriſtian Biſhop of Smyrna.

Triſagion Sanctus Deus, Sanctus Fortis, Sanctus Immortalis, miſerere noſtri, vide Baron. ad h. An.

38. But Theodoſius his humour now ſtanding for the depoſing of perſons from their Dignities, was at this time hurried ſo far, by tricks of certain perſons, as Nicephorus tells the ſtory, that it reached his Siſter Pulcheria; her that had been his great Aſſiſter at the Helm, and had kept the Government upon his ſhoulders. The matter was firſt contrived by Chryſaphius the Eunuch, and great Favourite of the Emperor: who, being diſpleaſed that Flavianus was made Patriarch in the room of Proclus, lately deceaſed, and perceiving he could not remove him ſo long as ſhe was in power; firſt provoked Eudocia, his Wife, againſt her, knowing the Jealouſies and Emulations of Women: To ſet them by the ears, he perſwaded her to remove from Pulcheria the Steward of her Houſe, who managed all her matters; and ſhe tried all means with her Husband to do it, but without ſucceſs; he was, as yet, ſo ſenſible of the merits of his Siſter. But at length he prevailed that Flavianus ſhould be required to make her a Deaconneſs; it being the cuſtom, as for Great Men to be drawn by force to Biſhopricks, ſo for Eminent Ladies to be choſen no otherwiſe to that Office or Employment. The Patriarch knew not how to ſhift it off; but, promiſing to diſcharge his Duty, gave her ſecret Intelligence of it by Letter, with advice not to come to him, leſt he ſhould be forced to do that which he himſelf could not but diſlike. She hereupon, delivering her Steward to Eudocia, departed to the Hebdomus, there to live a private and quiet Life: and the Conſpirators perceiving that Flavianus had revealed their deſign, turned all their malice againſt him, and Eudocia now got the Power for a certain time. But there goes another report, of an occaſion given by Pulcheria her ſelf, to her Brother, to alienate his Affections from her; though the ſame fine ſtory, in a manner, be told of other careleſs Princes.

Pulcheria forced to retire to a private Life.

39. She obſerving how he was wont, out of lazyneſs, to ſign all Papers that were preſented to him without reading, thought to convince him of his folly, and cure him of that Diſtemper, by a Jeſt. She drew a Writing, whereby he ſhould make Sale to her of Eudocia, his Empreſs; and this being offered to him, he as readily ſubſcribed as the reſt. This done, when the Empreſs came to her ſhe kept her for ſome time, and would not let her go when he ſent for her; alleadging that ſhe had bought her, and for that produced the Emperor's Hand; who was offended with the freedom, as Princes uſually are in like Caſes; and was urged and inflamed by his Wife, who, grudging her her power, took this opportunity to put her out of his good Opinion and it both together. And ſhe was the more moved to flatter him, and ruin her, becauſe ſhe her ſelf had of late incurred his Jealouſie and Diſpleaſure. There had been preſented, you muſt know, to Theodoſius an Apple of wonderful bigneſs, as a Rarity; and this Apple, out of kindneſs, he beſtowed upon his Wife. She had a Favourite called Paulinus, with whom ſhe was familiar upon the account of Learning, and that, as was thought and ſuſpected by ſome, more than ſhe ought to be. To him ſhe gave it; and he knowing nothing whence it came, made a Preſent of it to the Emperor, as ſome means to gain his Favour; who, receiving ceiving it now, aſked his Wife, what was become of the Apple? She affirmed, ſhe had eaten it; and then, by producing it, he convicted her of Untruth and Unfaithfulneſs; and for this reaſon he was long alienated from her in his mind, and Paulinus he commanded to be put to death. But thus was Pulcheria, after that, well nigh forty Years, ſhe had ſteered the Realm with great prudence and induſtry (for this was the thirty ninth of her Brother's Reign) removed to a private Life, to the great detriment, both of Church and State.

Zonaras.

Yet he provides againſt Precipitancy in State Affairs.

40. Yet, by that care Theodoſius, this Year, took for the cautious enacting of Laws, one would have judged him more circumſpect and wary in a matter of ſuch conſequence as depoſing of his Siſter. For, being convinced, it ſeems, of the great Inconvenience which Precipitancy in him (who had the Legiſlative Power) brought to the Empire, probably, by ſome Remonſtrance, or Petition, made by the Senate, he directed back to it a Reſcript, or Oration, to give Remedy in that very Affair. We think it, ſaith he, an Humane thing, that if, for the time to come, any neceſſary “ matter ſhould happen, either in a publick or private Cauſe which may require “ a general Form (or Order) which is not inſerted in the ancient Laws, it be “ handled, or debated, before; as well by the Nobles of our Palace (Proceres) as by “ your moſt Glorious Aſſembly, Conſcript Fathers: and if it ſhall pleaſe all the “ Judges and you, then, that it be written down, and after that, in a full Aſſembly, “ it be read over; and if all conſent to it, that then it be recited in our Sacred Conſiſtory “ (Numinis noſtri) that the Conſent of all together may be eſtabliſhed by the “ Authority of our Serenity. Know ye therefore, Conſcript Fathers, that, for “ the future, no Law ſhall be promulged by our Clemency, except the aforeſaid “ Form be obſerved. For, we well know, that what ſhall be ordained with your “ Advice, will redound to the happineſs of our Empire, and to our Glory. “ This Solemnity he would have obſerved, for the more certainty in making Laws; and Juſtinian put the Conſtitution into his Code, though we know not whether always he obſerved it in the making of his numerous Edicts, ſeeing that, as he alleadges in his own behalf, for repealing any thing the Ancients had done in ſuch caſes, by the old Law, called Lex Regia, all Right, and all Power of the Roman People, was tranſlated into that of the Emperor.

L.8. de Legibus Cod Juſt. lib.1. tit.14. Dat.16. Cal.Nov.

A notable Sanction.

Cum enim lege antiqua quæ Regia nuncupabatur omne Jus omniſque Poteſtas Populi Romani in Imperatoriam tranſlata ſunt poteſtatem. L.1 de Veteri Jure enucleando Cod. Juſt. lib.1. tit.17.

41. We find no more Conſtitutions made this Year by Theodoſius, but two or three by Valentinian in the Weſt. There was ever ariſing ſome new Accident, which affoarded new Queſtions concerning Teſtaments, and eſpecially, betwixt Man and Wife; the ancient Laws having, as we have formerly ſaid, prohibited ſuch Bequeſts, for reaſons which then ſeemed very urgent. But, as Legiſlators, in making and altering Laws, muſt receive their Directions from Matters of Fact, as this Emperor expreſſeth it; a change of Cuſtoms and Manners muſt conſequently produce a change of Ordinances. And therefore, now, at the deſire of Leonius, one to whom he gives the Title of Spectabilis; and betwixt whom and his Wife Jucunda, ſo much Affection there was, that they deſired to have the Jus Liberorum; or to leave each other their Heir, as it ſhould happen; He added this to former Conſtitutions; that Married Perſons, if they had no Sons, might leave each other their “ Heirs; whether they would do it by one Inſtrument alone, or elſe mutually “ make their Wills. Provided, that if any had juſt Ground from the Law, to “ bring the Complaint of an Inofficious Teſtament, ſuch Action ſhall lie. “ And, becauſe many Accidents happened about Witneſſes of Teſtaments, and ſometimes Witneſſes could not be had; from a Petition of one Pelagia (an Illuſtrious Woman he ſtiles her) he took occaſion to ordain ſomething more in ſuch Caſes. One Micce, another Lady of the ſame Quality, deſigned to leave her her Heir: but, not having any fitly qualified to witneſs her Will, yet wrote it all with her own hand before ſhe expired, and delivered it to Cæſarius, a Tribune and Notary (Vir Spectabilis, he terms him) being her Brother's Son; one who, by reaſon of his Nobility, and nearneſs in Blood, ſhe judged would be very faithful to her. And he did not at all betray his Truſt, but publiſhed the Will with the ſame honeſt meaning he received it. But Pelagia was ſo modeſt, as, ſcrupling her Right, ſhe would not meddle as Heir, except the Emperor would approve of the Juſtice of her Cauſe. Upon conſideration of the whole matter, he now confirmed what Micce had done, who could “ not have any other Witneſſes of her Will than her Brother's Son, and her own “ Writing. He declared her therefore Heir for ſo much of the Eſtate as the preſent “ Writing did name her. “

Valentinian* ordains ſomething new about Teſtaments.

Novel. Valentiniani 4. §. 1. Dat.12.Cal. Nov.

Ejuſd.Nov. §.2. Dat.7. Cal.Jan.

42. And that he might not deny the benefit of this Statute to Mankind, he now decreed, that it ſhould remain as ſtanding Law; that If any ſhould make choice “

Sect. 5.

A. D. 446.

to write his Will with his own hand, he ſhould have free liberty to do it; for “ as much as in many caſes it happeneth, that the opportunity and number of Witneſſes “ are wanting, and cannot be had by dying perſons.“ Thus, from theſe Novel Conſtitutions we underſtand the particular occaſions for making of the ſaid Laws; whereas the Compilers of the Codes, ſtudying Brevity, cut off all ſuch Prefaces, and have left us the bare Sanctions; a thing indeed which hath prevented ſwelling of Books: but I know not whether it have ſaved the Student labour, or made him more, the Hiſtory of the Caſe laid down in ſuch Prefaces bringing extraordinary great light to the underſtanding of the Laws, as the Concluſions inform us of the manner of the Emperor's Stile, or of writing to his Miniſters. Being now inclined generally to give relief, the Report of Albinus, the Præfectus Prætorio and Patrician, found good acceptance with him in behalf of his own Office, and the Numerarii belonging to him; inſomuch, that he implicitely chides him for not making the Suggeſtion ſooner. By the Medicine, we may know the Diſeaſe; for he declares, that Although, before his full time expired, any belonging to the Office “ of the Præfect ſhall, by vertue of his Teſtimony, obtain any honeſt Miſſion, “ either out of love to quiet, or for ſome other Employment, he ſhall not for it be “ moleſted. Neither ſhall the Numerarii, who were Auditors of publick Accounts, “ be ſubject to any Diſcuſſions or Queſtions after five Years time expired; “ within which time he judges that truth, although latent, may be diſcovered; eſpecially, “ the condition of no Man being to be ſo grievious, as to have no end of “ his ſolicitude and fear. Further, he takes care for preventing the moleſting and “ ſuing of theſe Officials for Expenſes about Payment of publick Moneys, when “ the Creditors were in fault; who would put it often to other Uſes, and ought to “ be puniſhed with a forfeiture of it. This Indulgence he thinks fit to confer on “ them, for preſervation, he ſaith, of their Safety and Fortunes; and allows, that “ they have Menſores aſſigned them, for their peaceable taking up of Quarters, of “ which of late they had been deprived. Thus we ſee how the caſe alters. How “ many Laws have we formerly met with, to reſtrain the Injuſtice and Violence of Officials? Now they have need to be protected againſt thoſe they have formerly oppreſſed. And, of the reallity of this need, the Emperor was ſo far poſſeſſed, that he orders the Præfect, to whom he gives the Attribute of Parent of the Auguſti “ and Inluſtris, and Præcelſa Magnificentia tua, to publiſh this moſt juſt Law “ by his own Edicts; that it may appear to all Men, how in his time no other thing “ is to be granted but what is decent to be obtained. “

And in favour of his Officers.

Novel.46. Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas, Dat.19.Cal. Jan.

A. D. 447.

Alypio & Ardaburio Coſſ.

43. After this tedious Year, we arrive at length at the CCCCXLVII of our Lord; wherein were Conſuls Alypius, or Calypius, and Ardaburius, or Ardabures. This we find to preſent us with almoſt as little matter as that gave us occaſion to be large. For, what we then ſaid concerning the Invaſion of Attila is to be extended both to this Year, and the following; his outrageous Acts, and the buying him off having taken up conſiderable time. From the Panegyrick, written by Sidonius Apollinaris, to Anthemius, afterwards Emperor of the Weſt, it appears, that the ſaid Anthemius fell upon the Huns as they roved through Dacia; that, not far from Sardica, he drove them up into a narrow compaſs, ſeveral times worſted them; and, keeping exact Diſcipline in his Army, notwithſtanding it wanted both Meat and Drink, engaged in a bloody Battel; wherein, though his Colleague played falſe, and thereby the Fortune of the Day was endangered, yet failed he not in Courage; but, by his vehement importunity, got his flying Men to rally; and renewing the Fight; though the Enemy, after that he was put to the worſt, came up again; yet he defeated him, and granted him Peace, on condition that he killed the Traitor; who, accordingly, as he expreſſeth it, fell a Sacrifice to Juſtice, by a Foreign Sword. Now, for as much as Marcellinus writes of Aragiſlus, or Arnegiſlus, the Magiſter Militum, his being ſlain by Attila, in Dacia Ripenſis, though he fought well, and had killed many of the Enemies; Sigonius will have him to have been the Colleague of Anthemius, and the Traitor mentioned, though this Expedition fell out twenty Years before Anthemius came to be Emperor; and ſo, he muſt have been a long time in the greateſt Actions. And Marcellinus writes, that Attila, after the death of the Magiſter Militum, continued his Depredations as far as Thermopolis. If we follow Sigonius in his opinion, we muſt add, that ſome other Accident happened after the Victory got by Anthemius, which obliged the Emperor to purchaſe Peace of Attila. Jornandes making mention of him that was killed, calls him Arnegiſtus, and Magiſter Militum of Mæſia; and adds that fighting valiantly near Marcianopolis, his Horſe fell under him; and when, in that condition, he ceaſed not to fight, he was over-powered and ſlain.

Anthemius defeats the Huns.

Carm.2.p.277. Edit. Hannoviæ 1617.

De Regn. & temporum ſucceſſione.

Sect. 5.

A. D. 447.

Priſcus ſent Ambaſſador to Attila.

44. The ſame Author, in another place, cites a paſſage out of Priſcus his Hiſtory, now loſt, how the Hiſtorian himſelf was ſent on an Embaſſy, to Attila, by Theodoſius the Younger; and produceth for it his own words. Paſſing over, “ ſaith he, the great Rivers of Tyſia, Tibiſia and Dricca, we came to that place “ where Vidicula (ſome read it alſo Vidigoia) the moſt valiant of the Goths, fell by “ the Wiles of the Sarmates. Thence we paſſed to a Village not far diſtant, in “ which Attila then made his Abode; a Village, I ſay, like a moſt large City: “ where we found wooden Walls made of vaſt Boards, ſo artificially joyned toge- “ ther, that they ſeemed to be all of one piece, and could ſcarcely be diſcerned to “ be ſeveral by one that intentively beheld them. You might have ſeen the Rooms “ very large, and Porticuſſes furniſhed with all neatneſs. The Court of the Houſe “ it ſelf was hung round to a large compaſs; ſo that it reſembled a King's Palace. “ This was the Seat of King Attila, the Lord of all Barbarians; and ſuch like Lodg- “ ing he preferred before ſuch Cities as he took. He adds, that he was the Son of “ Mundzuccus, and had two Brothers, Octar and Roas, who reigned over the Huns, “ although not all, before Attila. “ Whether this Embaſſy was undertaken upon this very occaſion we cannot certainly ſay, but probably it might; though, had it not been for his preferring that Village before the Cities he had taken, we ſhould have thought, from the names of the Rivers, the place where they found him, not to have been within the Empire.

Jornandes, de Rebus Geticis, c. c. 34. 36. inter Hiſtoricos Gothicos a Grotio Collectos.

The Seat of Attila.

45. In theſe uncertainties, where we have no full direction, Sigonius makes another probable gueſs, from another paſſage he found in that Epiſtle of King Theodorich to the Senate, formerly mentioned by us; wherein he extols the Virtues of Caſſiodorus, his Chancellor: that, at this time, Valentinian, leſt he alone ſhould be expoſed to the luſt and fury of Attila, after the Peace made by his Unkle, ſent his Ambaſſadors alſo, to take up the Quarrel. For, Theodorich having told the Fathers how Caſſiodorus, the Father (not the Grandfather, as Sigonius miſtakes) of Caſſiodorus Senator his Chancellor, laudably bore the Dignity of Tribune and Notary, under Valentinian: adds, that As perſons are wont to make choice of ſuch as are “ like themſelves in diſpoſition, he was, with great dearneſs, aſſociated with Ætius, “ in Acts tending to the Aſſiſtance of the State; whoſe Advice then the Empe- “ ror (Rerum Dominus, he calls him) in conſideration of his Wiſdom and glorious “ Labours in the Commonwealth, in all his Counſels, followed. He is (and that “ not to no purpoſe) appointed, together with Carpillio, the Son of Ætius, to go “ Ambaſſador to Attila. He beheld him without trembling, whom the Empire “ feared. Being backed with Authority, he deſpiſed that terrible and threatning “ Countenance; neither did he forbear to contradict him, even in his talk; who, “ carried away with I know not what fury, ſeemed to aim at the Soveraignty of the “ World. He found the King inſolent and high, but he left him pacified; and ſo “ reſelled his ſcandalous Speeches, that he ſought to be reconciled; whoſe intereſt “ it was not to have Peace with that moſt opulent Kingdom. His Conſtancy gave “ relief to the fearing Party; and they were believed not to be weak and inconſide- “ rable, who ſeemed to be armed with ſuch Ambaſſadors. He brought back Peace, “ which was not expected; whoſe Embaſſy, what it produced, thence did appear, “ that it was as acceptably received, as it was deſired it ſhould be. As for the Am- “ baſſador, he adds, that he had preſently Honour conferred upon him, and the “ Emperor offered him, as a juſt Maſter, a Revenue for his pains. But, he being “ moſt rich in his own Native Moderation, having a Vacant Dignity in way of Re- “ ward, departed into the pleaſant Country of the Brutii. He could not deny him “ his deſired reſt, who had rendred him ſecure from a Savage Enemy; but was “ ſorrowful to diſmiſs him, whom he knew to be one of his moſt uſeful Servants. “

Caſſiodorus ſent Ambaſſador to him.

Caſſiodori, Var. lib. 1. ep. 4.

46. That Caſſiodorus was now ſent upon this Errand, all things put together, and conſidered, render moſt probable, whether we reſpect Perſons or Times. But of any Embaſſy returned by Attila, to either Emperor, we hear nothing: he was not ſo full of Courtſhip. But this we know, that, toward the latter part of the Year, Valentinian received a Meſſage from his Uncle and Father in Law, in a Miſſive directed from Theodoſius, to the Lord Valentinian, famous Conqueror and Triumpher, ever Auguſtus, his Son; and penned according to this form. After that we had “ reduced into the Body of one Code both the Conſtitutions of former Princes and “ our own, our Piety ſhortly after publiſhed another Law, which ſhould give Force “ and Authority to the Code already made; and command that, in Judicature, ſuch “ Laws ſhould not prevail as were not produced out of it. But, in caſe any Law “ was afterward made by either of us, that which was conſtituted in general “ ſhould “.

Theodoſius writes to Valentinian, for Confirmation of his Novel Conſtitutions.

Novel. Theodoſii 2.

ſhould then alſo obtain force, and be valid in the Kingdom of the other Prince, if “ it were ſent unto him by divers Writings. Therefore, for as much as for ſeveral e- “ mergent Cauſes, the neceſſity of matters ariſing hath put us, in this Interval, up- “ on making other Laws, which, by reaſon of our being diverted by perpetual bu- “ ſineſs, could not be brought to the Knowledge of thy (tuæ) Majeſty; we have “ thought it neceſſary, now at length, to tranſmit them all to thy Serenity, with “ the Subſcription (or Subnotation) of our Majeſty; that by that means they may “ be known ſolemnly to the Subjects, Provinces and People, and the force of them “ may begin to be obſerved alſo in the Weſtern Parts. And ſuch Suits or Cauſes as “ are begun, but not terminated at the time of their Publication, we will have en- “ ded, according to their Tenour. But ſuch as are already decided by definitive “ Sentence, or by Agreement made betwixt the Parties, ſhall in no wiſe be again “ revived. Therefore, Moſt Sacred Lord, Venerable Son, (Auguſtus) cauſe them “ to be divulged to all Men; and alſo, whatſoever your Serenity hath in that time “ promulgated in a general manner, to be ſent, in like manner, back, with the Ad- “ umbration of thine own hand, to be heeded and obſerved by the Provincials, and “ all the Eaſtern People. Given, the firſt of October, at Conſtantinople, Ardabures “ being Conſul, and he who ſhall be made known to be ſo. “

47. By the Date of this Letter for Confirmation of Theodoſius his Novel Conſtitutions, we may eaſily believe there was no very frequent Intercourſe betwixt Conſtantinople and Ravenna; and a wonder it is, if the Text be not corrupted, that at the beginning of October, they in the Eaſt ſhould hear nothing of Alypius being Conſul. We may take notice alſo, that though Princes ſpake in words denoting the Plural Number, as to themſelves; as Nos, Noſter, and the like: yet, though to their Equals, they uſed ſtill the old Expreſſions of Tu and Tuus. But, as they at Conſtantinople took no great notice who was Conſul in the Weſt, they at Ravenna or Rome were ſomething even with them, being as careleſs who in the Eaſt had obtained that now decrepite Honour. For we have two Conſtitutions of Valentinian, dated on the twenty fifth of April, wherein Calipius is only mentioned. He had been informed by Florianus the Præfect, or rather, Comes Largitionum, how ſeveral Merchants or Traffickers managed their Trade clandeſtinely, in Villages, holes and private places; in ſo much that they quitted the great and famous Cities, with deſign to defraud him of the uſual Impoſt, upon Merchandize, or the Auraria Functio. By a Reſcript, he ordered him to redreſs this miſchief; and to take care that ſuch as had left the Ci- “ ties, and diſpoſed themſelves through meaner Towns, Ports, and private parts of “ the Country, ſhould be apprehended, and conſtrained to pay the ſeveral Dues. “ The ſame Perſon had further let him underſtand, how the Palatines, or Officers belonging to the Largitiones, were ſo bold as, before their time expired, and without leave, to forſake the Service, to the further hindrance of his Revenue. To give ſome ſtop to this, another Reſcript was (as now we have it) directed to him, requiring him to take a courſe, that All ſuch who, before their time was out, and “ without Teſtimony, or leave obtained from the Treaſurer (whom he calls their “ Præſul) had betaken themſelves to Eccleſiaſtical Offices, or other Employments, “ or Militiæ, ſhould be deprived of the name of Clerks, and the privilege of the Supe- “ rior Girdle (ſo he words it) and returned back to the Palatine Office and Militia, “ which they had contumaciouſly deſerted, except they had been long out of that “ Service. That this ſhould be prevented for the future, and the Judges of Provin- “ ces quickened up to be more diligent, as to the levying of the ordinary Income. “

Novel. 27. Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas, Dat. 7. Cal. Maii Romæ.

Novel. Valentiniani inter Theodoſianas, 42. §. 3. Dat. 7. Cal. Maii Romæ. Nomine Clericorum & privilegio cinguli ſuperioris exutos.

48. But, about the beginning of June, the curioſity of the Romans concerning the Eaſtern Conſul, we find, was ſatisfied from another Conſtitution; in the Date of which, Ardabures is joyned with Callypius. Great Complaints were made to Valentinian of the ill uſage of Liberti, or Freed Men, by reaſon of that great Indulgence given by the Laws to the Heirs of their Lords, by whom they had been manumitted; under pretence of Ingratitude, they would reduce them again to their former ſlavery, ſometimes for ſlight Cauſes; wherein, as they abuſed that favour the Laws had given them, ſo the Liberti conceiving themſelves not ſo much obliged to them as to their own Patrons, and provoked by their ill uſage, as happens in ſuch Caſes where Offences are mutual, returned ſuch things as they accounted Affronts; and ſo the matter aroſe to a publick miſchief. Valentinian having it repreſented to him as really ſuch, ſeriouſly conſidered how to accommodate it; and at length determined the Affair in a Reſcript to Albinus, now the ſecond time Præfectus Prætorio and Patritian. The Deciſion was this, that No Liberti, if they “ were made Roman Citizens, upon occaſion of Ingratitude, conceived from ſome “ matter “

Sect. 5.

A. D. 447.

Valentinian decides the Controverſie concerning Freed Men and the Heirs of their Patrons.

Novel. Valentiniani 6. Dat 3. Non. Jun. Rome P.P. in foro Trajani, 5. Id. Jun. Antelata Edicto Albini, v.c. hic error.

matter of pretended injury, ſhould, upon that account, be again reduced into Slavery; “ but ſuch Heir, whether a Son or an Extraneus, ſhould only have the Action of “ Injury to lye againſt him. But, beſides that agreeable Demeanour which was “ due from Freed Men to their Patrons and their Heirs, the Law was alſo ſtrict in “ caſe of Succeſſion and Inheritance of their Eſtates. Which ſeeming at this time “ alſo too ſevere, Valentinian, in the ſame Reſcript, further ordered, that ſuch Libertus “ or Liberta, if he or ſhe had Son or Sons, they ſhould, if their Parent pleaſed, “ fully ſucceed them in their Eſtates. If they had no Sons, and deſired to “ make a Will, they ſhould be bound to leave one third part of their Eſtates to the “ Sons or Nephews (deſcending from Males) of their Manumiſſors; but as to ſuch “ as deſcended from Females, they ſhould be bound to nothing, except, out of “ their own good will and kindneſs to them, they would give them any thing out of “ the two parts remaining. But, in caſe a Libertus had neither Sons nor Grandſons “ of his own; but poſſibly, Father or Mother, Brother or Siſter; he might leave “ theſe Relations one half of his Eſtate, and the other Moiety might go to the Heir “ of his Patron, provided his Relations were Roman Citizens. Now, if a Libertus, “ and Roman Citizen, ſhould die in the life-time of the Manumiſſor, and make “ a Teſtament without his conſent, ſuch Teſtament ſhould be of no force, becauſe “ the Authority due to Patrons was to be encouraged. And, if a Freed Man or “ Freed Woman ſhould bear Witneſs, in any Cauſe whatſoever, againſt the Sons “ and Grandſons, ſuch Teſtimony ſhould in no wiſe be received, and the Witneſſes “ puniſhed for ſo doing.“ Theſe Laws, and another to be ſpoken of in another “ place, bear Date from Rome, though we hear nothing of Valentinian his reſiding there from other Monuments.

A. D. 448.

Zenone & Poſthumiano, Coſſ.

49. For the Year CCCCXLVIII, and the one and fortieth of Theodoſius, Zeno was named Conſul at Conſtantinople, and Rufus Prætextatus Poſthumianus had that Honour conferred on him at Rome. Thence Valentinian returned, at the beginning of this Year, to Ravenna; where we find him upon a good Account on the Nones, or ſeventh of May. For, he was ſo juſt, as, having received, in the latter end of the preceding Year, Letters from Theodoſius, deſiring him to confirm and eſtabliſh his Novel Conſtitutions in the Weſtern Parts; he now did it by an Edict directed to Albinus, with the ſame Titles as formerly, in this manner of words.

Confirms the Novels of Valentian.

Novel. Valentiniani, 13. Dat. Non. Maii.

The moſt Glorious of Princes, the Lord Theodoſius, Father of my Clemency, “ hath ſent ſome Laws to us which were made after his Code (numinis ſui) “ and ordained by repeated Conſtitutions; Albinus, moſt dear Father of the Auguſti. “ Thine Illuſtrious and very high Magnificence following the tenour of our “ Letters, ſhall cauſe the ſaid Laws, together with the aforeſaid venerable Command “ ſent with them (which will put all out of doubt) to be made known to all “ thine perſons, as well by own Edicts, as thoſe of the Provincial Judges, that as both “ the Worlds are governed by Individual Ordinances, ſo they may be ruled by the ſame Laws. Given at Ravenna, on the Nones of May.“ Of this Year we are further very ſcant of Intelligence. But we are told of the Armoricans being very mutinous, & ſpurning againſt the Roman Government. And that Ætius, being elſewhere employed, procured Eocharich, King of the Allemans, to fall upon, and chaſtize them.

ut ſicuti uterq; orbis individuis ordinationibus regitur, iiſdem quoque legibus temperetur.

A. D. 449.

Protogene & Aſterio, Coſſ.

50. And ſo we proceed to the CCCCXLIX Year of our Saviour; wherein, for the Eaſt, Protogenes; and for the Weſt, Aſterius, were named Conſuls. And we have little more to tell the Reader which happened in this Year. Yet, about this time died Galla Placidia, the Mother of Valentinian; a Lady which, however ſometimes ſhe ſhewed of what Sex ſhe was; yet, conſider her all together, ſhe was a Woman of great Prudence, toſſed to and fro in the World, and tried by various Turns of Providence. She was accompanied into another World by Marina, the Daughter of Arcadius, and younger Siſter of Theodoſius; who, together with her, thrived under the good Government of Pulcheria; with whom, it's ſaid, ſhe lived in conſtant Virginity: and elſe, we have nothing of her, except that there was an Houſe called by her Name, which poſſibly, ſhe at firſt poſſeſſed; and afterward it became one of thoſe Houſes, or Palaces, of the Emperor in Conſtantinople, (as in the Days of Juſtinian) each of which had its Procurator, to manage the Lands belonging to it. Theodoſius his Quæſtor was idle for this Year, and the reſt he lived; he, after the Confirmation of his Novels, either reſolving againſt the multiplying of Laws, or having no occaſion to add to them. But, one which he made twenty five Years before, was now much commended, and confirmed in the Weſt by his Son in Law. By it he provided for the Quiet of Mankind; which being diſturbed by nothing more than by Suits and Controverſies, he took order for the ſhortning Placidia dies.

And Marina.

Vide Allemanni Notas in Procopii Anecdota.

L. un. de Actionib. certo tempore finiendis, Cod. Th. lib. 4. tit. 14.

Sect. 5.

A. D. 449.

ſhortning of them. Againſt all ſuch Actions as were perpetual, or had no Limitation ſet them by the Laws (which, in ſeveral Caſes, provided for the extinguiſhing of them) he declared, that the Preſcription of thirty Years ſhould be good. Yet a Conſtitution ſo well intended had not ſuch effect, but that now Valentinian was forced to interpret it, to obviate the falſe Gloſſes which ſeveral put upon it; who, “to evade the Juſtice of it, found out various tricks and quirks of Law.“ The Edict of Valentinian is directed to Firminus, the Præfect of Italy; but there was no greater need of it than in Gall, where it was univerſally received with great ſatisfaction; ſo troubleſome were ſome people, notwithſtanding they had ſeveral ſorts of Foreign Enemies in the Country, to create diſturbance to their Neighbours by a Litigious War, or that of Suits. At this time, when the Edict was received, the Father of Sidonius Apollinaris was Præfect of that Diſtrict, as appears by an Epiſtle of this Writer; who therein inſiſts much in Commendation of one Nicetius, an Orator, by whom it was firſt publiſhed in that Country.

Novel. Valentin. 8. Dat. 15. Cal. Jul. Ravennæ, P.P. in foro Trajani, 13. Cal. Aug. Sub edicto Firmini.

Lib. 8. ep. 6.

Theodoſius dies.

A. D. 450. Valentiniano, A. 7 & Avieno, Coſſ.

51. The Year CCCCL, wherein Valentinian the ſeventh time, and Avienus were Conſuls, was accounted a Year of Jubily, in that it gave reſt (we hope) to Theodoſius from all his Labours; and Quiet to the Church, which now had been much diſturbed by the Hereſie of Eutyches. This, it is ſaid, he favoured: But at length he came to ſee how he was abuſed, to acknowledge his Error, and puniſh Chryſaphius, the Eunuch, who had procured this and other great Enormities. He died on the twenty ninth of July, having reigned forty two Years, and about three Months, from his Father's death; in the forty ninth Year of his Age. Some ſay, of Sickneſs; and particularly, of the Plague. Others, that, going out to hunt, he fell into the River Albus, and died the Night following. And ſome only write, that he fell from his Horſe, without mentioning the Water. As to his Character, all generally agree in his Commendation, while he was adviſed by his Siſter Pulcheria. Socrates much inſiſts upon it; who writes, that, though he was born and educated in the very Palace, yet was he not of any light or idle Behaviour; but ſo diſcreet, that, to thoſe who conferred with him he ſeemed a Man of great Experience. In the Exerciſes of Religion he was diligent with his Siſters. And, whereas the Emperor Julian, though he profeſſed the Study of Philoſophy, yet could not digeſt the Affronts of ſuch as reviled him at Antioch; but puniſhed extraordinarily one of them, whoſe Name was Theodorus: he, ſetting aſide the Subtilties and Quirks of Ariſtotle, daily both profeſſed and practiſed the true Philoſophy: For, he learned to bridle Anger, to take Grief and Sorrow patiently, and to take Revenge of none that did him any Injury. Nay, it is ſaid, there was none that ever ſaw him angry. He was averſe to the puniſhing of Malefactors, and eaſily would pardon them. He could not endure the cruel Shows of the Gladiators; and, by his diſcouraging of them, the people learnt to diſlike and abſtain from them. With Socrates, others accord and add, that his Defects were, too much eaſineſs and proneneſs to be drawn and perſwaded. As to his Activity in Wars, we find none, but that he managed them all by his Officers, as he did the Civil Government by his Siſters and his Miniſters. His Wife, as we ſaid, was Eudocia, the learned Daughter of Leontius the Philoſoper; for ſhe was an excellent Poet, and wrote ſeveral Poems (amongſt which, Homerocentron) and by her he left only Eudoxia, Wife to Valentinian, his Colleague. Eudocia, by her Emulation had procured much the Diſagreement betwixt him and his Siſter, which, after the Retirement of Pulcheria, he was ſenſible of. And thereupon, unkindneſs growing betwixt them, ſhe went her way, in his life time, to Jeruſalem; and that not without his own Appointment.

Lib. 7. c. c. 22, & 41.

52. The moſt conſiderable thing of his Reign is the compiling of his Code; and next to that, the Publication of his Novel Conſtitutions. All which put together, make up a plentiful Harveſt, as to Laws; but yet are behind ſome few Gleanings; which being looſe, and out of the Ligaments of Chronology, as being without the Notation of Conſul or Day, could not be taken in with the reſt. Of thoſe which concern the Commonwealth or Civil Government, one directed to Hormiſda, as Præfectus Prætorio, is very obſervable; which makes two Metropoles, or Mother-Cities in one and the ſame Province. For many and juſt Cauſes, ſaith he, we decree the “City of Berytus to be adorned with Metropolitan Name and Dignity, already “crowned by its Vertues. Let it therefore have alſo Metropolitan Dignity. From “Tyre let nothing be derogated of its Right: Let her be Mother of the Province by “the kindneſs of our Anceſtors, and the other by ours; and both enjoy the like Dignity. Thus were two Metropoles conſtituted in Syria Phœnice: Tyrus firſt, by the Favour of Adrian, at the Requeſt of Paulus the Tyrian Orator; and now Berytus, that that famous Univerſity for the Laws. In like manner, in Pontus are found two; viz. Amaſia and Cæſarea. And as many in Cappadocia; viz. Cæſarea and Thyana. As he concerned himſelf thus for the Dignity of Cities, ſo alſo, for that of Perſons. For, in an Oration directed to the Senate of Conſtantinople, ſtill extant, but without Date; He determined, that, Amongſt ſuch as had been Conſuls, he ſhould “ preceed who had firſt born the Honour, notwithſtanding one after him had “ twice enjoyed the Faſces. And, if ſuch an one give place to another, if he be “ both Conſul and Patritian, in caſe that elder Conſul obtain afterward the Patritiate, “ he ſhall recover his former Station. He favoured thoſe alſo of his Chamber ſo “ far as to give them Immunity from finding Carriages and Beaſts for publick Service; “ and to except their Houſes, in all Cities whatſoever, from the Burthen of “ Quarter. To the Cornicularii, Primiſcrinii and Numerarii belonging to the “ Præfectus Prætorio, he alſo granted Privileges: as alſo, to the Numerarii of the “ Magiſtri Militum.“ But, by another Law, the Date whereof is alſo loſt, it is cautioned, that no perſon of whatſoever Order or Dignity, not the Sacroſanct Church, or the Emperor's own Houſe, be excuſed from the burthen of Angariæ or Parangariæ, in the time of Expedition.

L. un. de Metropoli Beryto, Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 21.

Sect. 5.

A. D. 450.

L.1.de Conſulib. &c. Cod. Juſt. lib.12.tit.3.

L.2. de Præpoſitis Sacri Cubiculi, &c. Cod. Juſt.lib.12.tit. 5.L.ult. De Apparitor.&c. Cod Juſt.lib.12.tit. 53.L.4.de Appar. Magiſtr. Militum.tit.55 ejuſd.lib.

L.21. de Curſu Publ. Cod. Juſti lib.12.tit.51.

53. By the death of Theodoſius, the care of the Empire was again devolved upon Pulcheria. The care of it, I ſay, if not the Empire it ſelf; for, ſhe had the Title of Auguſta, not merely as had an Emperor's Wife, which ſhone in the Beams of her Husband's Majeſty; but, as we may ſay, by way of Co-ordination. However, it had not been the cuſtom, as yet, in the Empire, for Women to reign alone, either in the Eaſt or Weſt. And therefore ſhe reſolved, though now above fifty Years of Age, to make choice of ſome worthy perſon, and every way fit in years and diſcretion; and marrying him, to qualifie him for the Empire. Her Choice fell upon Martian; and ſhe procured that, by a Senatus-Conſultum, the Dignity of Emperor ſhould be conferred upon him: till which could be effected, it is ſaid, that ſhe concealed her Brother's death. This Martian was, by Birth, a Thracian, and Son to a Soldier by Profeſſion; to whoſe Trade of Life bearing an Affection, he went to Philippopolis; where he was entertained amongſt ſuch as had given up themſelves to the Study and Practice of Arms. It happened in his Journey thither, that he light upon the Body of a Man newly dead; at which ſight, being amazed, and of a ſingural good Nature, he ſo long continued with it, till he had provided all things neceſſary for a decent Burial. But ſome that had opportunity to ſee what he did, taking notice of it, made relation of the matter to the Magiſtrates of Philippopolis; who apprehended him, and charged him with the Murther. Signs and Conjectures prevailed with them more than the truth could do unknown, or the Proteſtations of Martian; who was now ready to abide the Puniſhment due to that Crime, when, on a ſudden, unlooked for, the Author of the Fact was diſcovered, confeſſed it, was executed, and he thereby eſcaped death. Being ſo wonderfully delivered, he betook himſelf to a Company of Soldiers lying not far off; and amongſt them deſired to be liſted. They had the Man in admiration; and prognoſticating by certain Gueſſes, that he would prove a great Perſon, received him willingly, and enrolled his Name: placing him not in the loweſt Rank, as a late Comer, or Freſh Water-Soldier, according to the cuſtom of Military Law; but preferring him to an Honourable place, which one lately dead, whoſe Name was Auguſtus, enjoyed before him; whom he alſo imitated in his very Name: ſo that, with his Preferment, he received the Imperial Title before he was promoted to that Sovereign Dignity, the Emperors themſelves being called Auguſti, as Evagrius informs his Græcian Country Men.

Pulcheria, by marrying Martian, procures him to be Emperor.

Who he was.

Evagrius lib. 2. c. 1.

54. Evagrius ſubjoyns the ſtory of another paſſage which portended the Imperial Dignity; and it is the ſame we find in Procopius, in his Hiſtory of the Vandalick Wars. Martian ſerved in Africk againſt that People, under the Command of Aſpar; and fought againſt Genſerich in that Battel wherein Boniface, he, and many of the Romans were defeated. Amongſt others, Martian was taken Priſoner; and, with them, ordered to be brought into a Field, where Genſerich might have the contentment to view them, and conſider on what Maſters to beſtow them. Continuing in the place, and diverting themſelves as they pleaſed, for Genſerich had given order to their Keepers, to take off their Shackles, ſome lay down to ſleep; and amongſt them that ſlept, was Martian. It was Noon time of day, and the Sun was hot; but the report went, that an Eagle hovered upon him; and ſpreading her Wings over his Head, therewith covered him, and protected him from the heat; which Genſerich took notice of, and, upon the ſight, conjectured what would befal him. He called him to him, and demanding who he was; He told him, he was the Domeſtick of Aſpar, which, when he heard, conſidering what he had ſeen the Eagle do, and how great a Man Aſpar was at Conſtantinople, he thought it fit not to kill him, which if he did, what he judged was preſaged could not come to paſs, but gave him his liberty, making him ſwear, that he would not take Arms againſt the Vandals; and though after the death of Theodoſius he was promoted to the Empire, yet ſhewing himſelf in all other reſpects an excellent Prince, he found the Affairs of Africk as he left them. Pomponius Lætus to this Relation of Procopius adds another, That being born of obſcure Parents, and having ſerved firſt in Lycia, falling into a ſickneſs, he was kindly entertained in the Houſe of Tatianus and Julius, two Brothers, where recovering of his Diſeaſe, he went out afterward with them to hunt. The heat of the day much afflicting him, they reſted for ſome time in the Shade, where Tatianus, firſt looking up, ſaw an Eagle in the Air hover over him, at which aſtoniſhed, he raiſed his Brother, and ſhewed him the ſight: when the Soldier was awake they told him the thing, and therewith foretelling his high fortune, furniſhed him with two hundred pieces of Silver at his departure. This Story which ſeems framed out of the other, poſſibly gained more belief, becauſe it is further ſaid, that when Martian came to be Emperor, he forgot not the Hoſpitality of theſe Men; but ſending for them, preferred Tatianus to the Government of Conſtantinople, and Julius, his Brother, to that of Illyricum.

Stories of things portending his Preferment.

Prætors at Conſtantinople reduced to three.

55. To be ſure Martian was now elected Emperor, and being well approved of by the People, eaſily afterward obtain'd the conſent of Valentinian, as well upon the account of his own worth, as the choice of Pulcheria. How he advanced that Tatianus and his Brother we know not; but at the end of the Year we find an Edict directed by him from Conſtantinople to one Tatianus, by the Title of Præfectus Prætorio, as the Copy now hath it; but the Subject of it indeed relates to the Prætors of that City. The Reader may remember how many Prætors were in Conſtantinople, according to the various fancies of ſeveral Princes, ſometimes four, five, eight; as in Rome in old times were eighteen. Now Martian thought fit to reduce the Number to three; and thoſe he commanded yearly to be choſen at the diſcre-" tion of the Senate, out of ſuch as lived in Town, and not in the Provinces, who" were not to be compelled, if unwilling, to do certain things, but left to a ſponta-" neous liberality." At his firſt coming to the Government he received great Complaints how thoſe that were Plaintiffs, were wont to draw the Defendants out of their own Countries, and begin their Actions, Civil, or Criminal, either before the Emperor himſelf, or his great Miniſters. To obviate this practice, he publiſhed an Edict whereby he commanded, That all perſons, except in neceſſary caſes, ſhould" be convened in the Provinces where they inhabited, according to the old cuſtom" and Axiom; and this he would have extend, as well to Military, as other Per-" ſons." About the ſame time he was put in mind by Palladius, the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, how ſeaſonable and acceptable a thing, now at the beginning of his Reign, it would be, to remit the Arrears of Tributes; the exaction of which was very grievous to the People.

L.2. de Officio Prætorum, Dat. 15. Cal. Jan. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 39.

Novel. Martiani 1. Dat. 5. Id. Octob. Actor ſequitur forum Rei.

Novel. Martiani 2.

Martian remits Arrears of Tributes by a notable Edict.

56. To this information he anſwered by a Reſcript directed to him, as alſo to Hermogenes the Comes Largitionum, Gennadius the Comes Rei privatæ, and Maximinus the Comes and Præpoſitus Cubiculi, that it was his very care to provide for" the emolument and eaſe of Mankind. That day and night he was ſolicitous ſo to" order matters, that all Men living under his Empire might by his Arms be pro-" tected againſt hoſtile violence, and in peace enjoy liberty and ſecurity." Therefore he could not but admire the laudable ſuggeſtion of his Highneſs, who amongſt ſeveral virtues, for which he was eminent, was alſo remarkable for his Humanity. He approves of his advice, and therefore from the beginning of the ſixth Indiction, to the end of the fifteenth, lately paſt; he commands the exaction of Arrears to ceaſe, whether belonging to the Patrimony, the Temples, whether of" Civil or Fiſcal Right, whether due in Gold or Silver, in Specie Metals, or any" other Title of Collations remaining in the publick Tables; whether they appertained to the Arca or Cheſt of him the Præfect, to the Treaſury, the Ærarium, the Cellaria, Res privata, or the Works of the famous City of Conſtantinople, they" ſhall all be remitted to the Collators, Curiales, or Provincials, and to others ob-" noxious to them. And this his liberality ſhall hold good notwithſtanding the matter were paſt into private Contract, or a publick Debt, ſo as the Officers ſhall exact nothing, though they had engaged for the Debtors, or pretended to have laid out Money for them. He alſo remits what was behind of the Senatorian Follis. “ Provided this Pardon and Indulgence do not extend to any Aſſignations made from the fifth to the firſt Indiction, or later times, nor to Dues ariſing from Navigation, “ or the price of Materials, given, granted, tranſlated and exchanged for “ Money, or what was due from the Arca of Conſtantinople. Or if any thing conſiſting in Gold, Species or Materials, was aſſigned to the publick Works of Cities, “ and as yet was not collected. In concluſion, he would have, as in reaſon, “ all perſons concerned in this his Munificence, ſo far to be ſenſible of it, as to “ pay their Dues for the time to come with more care and fidelity. “

our

A. D. 450.

57. In the Weſt, this Year Clouds began to ariſe, and a terrible ſtorm was gathering, which in that following, fell down with violence into the Weſtern Provinces: for now Attila prepared to invade, and Valentinian to defend them in that manner, as we ſhall afterwards declare. And to uſher in theſe miſchiefs, a great famine this Year ſeiſed upon Italy, which ſo far prevailed, as Parents ſold their Children to keep from ſtarving, of which we ſhall hear in the following year expreſly, wherein we ſhall find ſome way propoſed for their Redemption. But in Italy nothing was ſo conſiderable as Rome it ſelf, and the ſcarcity of proviſions ſeems there to have begun early, as we may gueſs from an Edict directed to Epitincanus the Præfect of it at the latter end of April. The Præfect had made known to Valentinian the inconvenience the City lay under in this reſpect, becauſe the Navicularii had forſaken their Employment, and deſerted their Charge; in anſwer to which, by his Reſcript, he gave in command to reduce all perſons obnoxious by the Laws, without admitting any privilege or excuſe, that if they died without Heirs, their Eſtates ſhould belong to ſuch as exerciſed the Function. That they ſhould not “ build any new Ship, nor repair any ſo as to reduce it within the capacity of conteining “ forty Cupæ. And beſides, he gave orders for the regulating of private “ Veſſels, and thoſe of leſſer Burthen, that the publick ſervice might be carried on.

Novel. Valentiniani, 36. inter Theodoſianas, Dat. 8. Cal. Maii Rom.

A. D. 451.

Martiano A. & Adelphio Coſſ.

58. The following Year was characterized by the Conſulſhip of the new Emperor Martian, who had Adelphius for his Colleague; and it was famous for greater things by far, than of late had happened. The firſt Month had not quite paſſed over, when Valentinian being made ſenſible of the heavy inconveniences produced by the Famine, directed his Edict to Ætius the Patritian, wherein taking notice how Parents, to ſave their lives, had been compelled to ſell their Children, he thought fit to abrogate all ſuch ſervitude, and declare ſuch Children “ according to the circumſtances of their Birth, to be free; provided, that where “ the Buyer had paid five ſolidi, for ſuch a perſon he ſhould receive ſix; twelve, if “ ten; and ſo proportionably. But if any perſon had ſold ſuch as were of free or “ ingenuous condition to Barbarous Nations, or into Tranſmarine Parts, he ſhould “ incur a Fine of ſix Ounces of Gold: of ſuch value ever was liberty, which Valentinian endeavoured to preſerve by this Edict the moſt elegant and pithy of any we now meet with. There are two others that bear date on the ſame day, whereof “ one takes off ſome inconveniences ariſing from the late Law concerning the preſcription “ of thirty years, ſo as the Coloni, or Villaines who had found tricks to “ evade any ſuch conſtraint by flying from one place and Maſter to another, might “ not thereby defraud their true owners. “ This is directed to Firminus the Præfectus Prætorio, and ſo is another, whereby Valentinian takes off the rigor of the former Laws, even againſt the Governors of Provinces. We have ſeen how during the time of their Adminiſtration, to prevent miſchiefs, which by the terror of their places and power they might procure, they could not buy nor ſell, nor receive any thing in Gift. Laws are Medicines of State, and muſt be applied according to the Diſeaſes of the Times. Former Princes found good reaſon from the practices of their Officers to lay ſuch Reſtraint upon them, and now there were emergencies of a contrary nature, which perſwaded him to mitigate their ſeverity.

Valentinian reſtores to liberty ſuch children as had been ſold.

Novel. Valentiniani 11. Dat. prid. Cal. Febr. Romæ.

Novel. Valentinian. 9.

59. And ſo he doth by this Conſtitution, whereby he makes it lawful for the “ Adminiſtrantes or Militantes (thoſe in Office, Place and Power) to purchaſe, “ exchange or, receive by way and title of Donation. Provided, that theſe be not “ procured or brought about by any fraud, terror or compulſion; and the purchaſer “ pay down his Money, ſo that the Bargain be driven on, and compleated bona “ fide, by intervention of Writings or Deeds proper to the ſeveral occaſions. If “ the Buyer fail in theſe points, he ſhall forfeit the price to the ſeller, who ſhall receive “ back again the thing or eſtate ſo fraudulently purchaſed. If the ſeller be “ troubleſome, and pretend fraud or violence where none hath been, he ſhall for- “ feit the price to the Buyer. And becauſe, in the late Wars and Diſturbances, “great Diſorders had happened, in reference to Poſſeſſions, and great ſcarcity there was of perſons skilled in the Law: ſo that, in ſome Provinces, neither Advocates nor Judges were to be had; and ſcarcely any learned man in that Profeſſion was to be found; he took care for confirming the Alienations made by the Curiales amongſt themſelves, though without the Interpoſition of a Decree; and provided that ſuch ſhould be good for the time to come, if duly entred and atteſted by their Concuriales. And, as for Advocates; that, if a Curialis have a deſire to betake himſelf to that Employment, he may do it, if he leave another in his place to diſcharge his duty toward the Corporation. “ But, ſuch was the ſcarcity of Advocates in this Age, that there was a neceſſity of having them perpetual in the Provinces, as Valentinian affirms; whereas formerly the Romans found cauſe to be ſo jealous both of them and Judges, as to ſuffer neither ſort to act but for a time. The Emperor, in this Edict, makes mention of Alarich, and derives the miſchief from his firſt Invaſion of Italy; but he had ſhortly occaſion to forget him and his Actions, being ſtruck with the Report, how Attila now was falling into the Weſtern Provinces; which he did like a Thunder-bolt: and ſo behaved himſelf, as delighting both to be, and to be called, The Scourge of God.

Perſons in place permitted to purchaſe.

Novel. Valentinian. 10.

Nam hæc neceſſitas fecit perpetuitatem dari Provincialibus Advocatis.

60. Having had no good ſucceſs in the Eaſt, he was adviſed by his beſt Friends, to leave off theſe formerly in vain attempted Conqueſts, and try others in other Countries; as in Germany, that thence he might paſs into Gall, Spain and Italy; where Valentinian reigned, and the Empire was divided, and poſſeſſed by divers Nations. They doubted not, but that, without much difficulty, he might become a Sharer in it; and he reſolved to follow their Advice, and to order his Affairs with as much Foreſight and Cunning as poſſible. With Ætius, it ſeems, he tampered; the report going, that by his encouragement it was that he caſt in his Head to ruin the Empire. Theodorich, King of the Goths in Gall, he endeavoured to get to his Party; encouraging him with hopes to ſhare the Provinces betwixt them. To Valentinian himſelf he ſent his Ambaſſadors; and offered his Service for chaſtiſing of the Goths, and reſtoring the Roman Intereſt in Gall and Spain. And, having got together a vaſt Army of ſuch Northern Nations as, by the power, or terror of his Arms, he had under Obedience, he marched out of Scythia, and came into Germany in the violence of Winter; where he reſolved to ſtay no longer than till he could draw the Nations thereof to a Confederacy with him. Some he allured by expectation of Booty; in others he excited or increaſed an Averſeneſs to the Emperor: ſome were terrified by the numbers and power of his Forces; and it was not difficult to diſſwade them all from joyning with the Romans; having lately found, that the Franks, endeavouring to hinder the Vandals from entring Gall, had been defeated by them. With him then joyned the Quadi, Suevi, Marcomanni, Heruli, Turcilingi or Rugi, Burgundiones, Thuringi, Bructeri, the Saxons, thoſe inveterate Enemies of the Galls; and ſuch Franks as ſtill retained their Abode in Germany. With them he paſſed the Rhine, and brake through the Roman Pale.

Paulus Diaconus Alii.
Vide Sabellici Ennead.8.lib.1.
Sigonium,lib. 13.
Baronium, ad h. A.

Attila pierces into Germany.

SECT.

SECT. VI.

The Sixth Step to the Ruin of the Empire in the Weſt.

From the Invaſion of the Weſtern Provinces by Attila, to the Death of Valentinian the Third.

The ſpace of four Years.

A. D. 451.

Attila with ſeven hundred thouſand Men invades the Weſtern Empire.

1. UPon a Muſter are ſaid to have been found, to the number of ſeven hundred thouſand Men, of ſuch as, either for fear of Attila, or deſire of enriching themſelves, had given their Names to this Expedition. Here was Andarich, the moſt valiant King of the Gepidæ; and Walamir, King of the Oſtrogoths, more Noble than the King he ſerved, in the Opinion of the Hiſtorian. Of the Nations but now mentioned, Sidonius Apollinaris enlargeth the Catalogue; adding the Gelonus to the Rugus, the Scot to the Burgundian, and the Bellonotus, Neurus and Baſtarna to the reſt. But though Attila, by theſe vaſt numbers, terrified the World, and put all the Parts of Gall into a pannick fear; yet there wanted not ſome anſwerable Conduct and Reſolution in thoſe that were concerned on the Roman Party: For, his Inſolence and Cruelty had animated ſuch againſt him, as had hopes ſo to order their matters, as not to be ſubject to his Malice and Anger. Ætius reſolved to oppoſe him to the utmoſt; to be revenged upon whom, ſome conjecture, that he choſe rather to invade Gall, whereas he might as eaſily have paſſed into Italy. And Theodorich, King of the Weſtern Goths, was ſo ſenſible of his Intereſt, as not to endanger what he and his Predeceſſors had already ſiezed in Gall and Spain: and therefore, though ſeveral bitter Conflicts had happened betwixt him and Ætius, and much Loſs on both ſides; yet he eaſily harkened to him, when he moved him to joyn againſt the common Enemy, or the Enemy of Mankind; and to carry on the War againſt him on equal Terms. And they ſo beſtirred themſelves, that, to the Forces of the Empire and the Viſigoths ſeveral other Nations were perſwaded to give their Aſſiſtance; as the Alani and Suevi, that had ſetled in Spain; and the Franks, that, by this time, had got good footing in the North-Eaſtern Parts of Gall.

Carm. 7. p. 318.

He rages in Gall with Fire and Sword.

2. But, in the mean time Attila took his ſcope in Gall, and raged with Fire and Sword againſt all ſorts of perſons and places; of which, not very many eſcaped his Rage. In Germania Secunda, Tungri and Cologne ſuffered much: In Belgica Prima he took and burnt the City of Metz; in Belgica Secunda, the Atrebates grievouſly ſuffered. And, from them, he proceeded into Senonia, and ſo far, till he came to Orleance; which refuſing to yield, he reſolved, with all ſorts of Warlike Attempts, to bring to ſubjection; but the Piety and Endeavours of Anianus, their Biſhop, is ſaid ſo far to have aſſiſted them, as to eſcape his Hands; for Ætius came in timely to their Relief, together with Theodorich, and Thoriſmund, his Son, who obliged Attila to raiſe his Siege, and be gone; though, from Sidonius Apollinaris, who once had thoughts of writing the Hiſtory of this War (being put upon it by Proſper, the Biſhop of this City, and Succeſſor of Anianus) it appears, that Attila brake into it, as well as beſieged it; yet proceeded not ſo far as to plunder it: But, being obliged to quit the place, he was much diſturbed in his mind thereat; and, underſtanding that there were Plains called Campi Catalaunici not far off, he marched thither; reſolving, if he could, to provoke Ætius to fight, whom he little doubted but to overcome by his Numbers. And Ætius was not backward; but, with the Italian Forces, and Confederates, ſoon preſented himſelf for a bloody Battel.

Orleance relieved.

Lib. 8. Ep. 15. Aurelianenſis urbis obſidio, oppugnatio, irruptio nec direptio, &c.

3. Attila is ſaid before the Battel to have called together his Soothſayers and Diviners to conſult them about the ſucceſs, and received in anſwer, that he ſhould loſe the Procopius, Jornandes, Paulus Diaconus, alii.

the day, but his Enemies, withal, their principal Captain; which though he did not well like, yet preſuming that Ætius would be killed, he thought he ſhould be no loſer; ſuch eſteem he had of his Conduct, and low thoughts of the other Captains. A Battel being then reſolved on, all the Morning was ſpent in ordering the Armies on both ſides, ſo great was their number. Attila ranging all the Carriages he had by the ſide of a Mountain, made a kind of Rampart, where he beſtowed the Women and Baggage, and divided his Army into three Battalions, placing himſelf with his Scythians and Huns in the middle. On his Right Hand ſtood Ardarich, King of the Gepidæ, and many others, in whom he confided,; and of the Left Wing he gave charge to Audarich, Theodomir, and Valomir, Kings of the Goths. Ætius was ſome time in ſuſpenſe what to do, becauſe he doubted of the conſtancy of Sanguibanus, King of the Alans, who had ſome thoughts of going over to Attila, upon report, that he would agree with him, and redeliver a City he had taken from him. In concluſion, he alſo made a threefold Diviſion of his Forces, in the middle of which he placed Sanguibanus, and both in the Front and Rear, the moſt valiant of the Roman Legions, that the reſt thereby might be obliged to fight, The Right Wing he committed to Theodorich and his Son, that they might grapple with the Gepidæ, a Warlike Nation, taking to himſelf the Conduct of the Left.

The memorable Battel in the Campi Catalaunici.

4. Things thus appointed, began one of the moſt cruel and bloody Battels that ever were fought, though otherwiſe remarkable for the Flower of ſo many Nations gathered into two Bodies. The beginning of the Conteſt was to gain a little Hill ſituate betwixt the Armies, which would afford a great advantage to thoſe that ſhould fight from the upper Ground. Attila had privily conveyed a party to ſeiſe on it, who were encountred by Thoriſmond, the Son of Theodorich, whom with his Goths and Spaniards, Ætius had ordered to make himſelf Maſter of it. Theſe began the Fight, and were relieved by their Friends on both ſides, who ſtood it out from Midnoon to Midnight with great Animoſity and Reſolution, few obſerving any thing but only intent upon the Slaughter of their Enemies; ſo that the particular accidents of the Battel are little known, the multitude being ſo great, that as Hiſtorians write, it was impoſſible to make out the ſeveral parties, and diſtinguiſh them. Yet ſome, they ſay, obſerved how a certain Ditch, near the place where the greateſt Slaughter was made, was filled to the Brim with Blood, which is reported alſo to have overflown the Fields in ſuch a meaſure, that the dead Bodies floated in it: an extravagant report. But the moſt moderate is, that a little Rivolet was exceedingly raiſed by the Goar that ſtrained down into it, and increaſed its current to ſuch a height, that it carried down the dead Bodies. Great indeed was the number of the ſlain; for none retired, or betook themſelves to ſudden flight: ſo that ſome reckon above two hundred thouſand; and the moſt moderate opinion allows of one hundred and eighty; ſuch indignation poſſeſſed both parties; the Barbarians, that the Romans had ſo long a time held their Dominion; and the Romans, that the Barbarians, ſo often defeated and repulſed, ſhould commit ſuch inſolence againſt the Empire.

Attila worſted.

5. Although neither Party yielded, but were parted by the inconvenience of a dark night, and the Romans loſt Theodorich, King of the Goths; yet had the Barbarians the worſt of it, whom Attila cauſed to retreat in the beſt order he could, and fortified himſelf in the Rampart he had formerly made. Ætius, now Maſter of the Field, took ſuch view as the obſcurity of the Night would ſuffer, that he might in the beſt manner he could, poſt his Men, leſt the Enemy ſhould take any advantage; for he was not certain whether in all parts he was victorious, and ſo paſſed the night in ignorance, as to the death of Theodorich. But the Day-light manifeſted his ſucceſs; and Attila, ſenſible of his loſs, contained himſelf within his Fortifications, while Ætius his Men took the plunder of the Camp. Thoriſmond perceiving his Father to be ſlain was ſo inraged, that he reſolved preſently to attacque Attila, and revenge his death, of which the Barbarian having notice, it is ſaid, heaped together a company of Saddles and upon them reſolved to burn himſelf, when the Goths ſhould endanger him, rather chuſing ſuch a reſolute death, than to conclude his power over ſo many Nations by the Cataſtrophe of an ignominious Captivity. But Ætius knowing the ambition and preſent ſtrength of the Goths, feared leſt after the utter overthrow of Attila they ſhould turn their force upon the Empire, which was but in bad caſe to defend it ſelf, and therefore he thought it Policy to let him eſcape at preſent, that by him the Goths and Franks might be awed, and diverted from all Attempts pernicious to the Roman Intereſt.

Sect. 6.

A. D. 451.

6. He adviſed Thoriſmond, as one that bore him good will, to haſten into Spain, and there take poſſeſſion of his Father's Kingdom, leſt any croſs accident ſhould intervene to the diſadvantage of his Title. He put him in mind of what danger he was in from his Neighbours, the Alani and Suevi; and that having ſecured firſt all things at home, as a prudent Man muſt neceſſarily do, he might afterward find an opportunity to ſhew his filial piety in revenging his Father's death; an affection by all means to be cheriſhed. Thoriſmond approved of his counſel, and departed with ſpeed to take poſſeſſion of his Father's Dominions, as well in Gall, as Spain; and Ætius ſuffered Attila to eſcape. Thus was accompliſhed the means which conduced to an effect quite contrary to the end deſigned by Ætius, whereby we may ſee, that Policy and Felicity are things that are often ſevered, both by reaſon of the weakneſs of Man's Intellectuals, and the viciſſitude of humane Affairs. Ætius having obtain'd ſo great a Victory (which as ſome others write, procured the death of one hundred and ſixty two thouſand Men, beſides ninety thouſand Gepidæ and Franks, who fell one upon another and periſhed the night preceding the Battel) and thereby having ſecured all that the Romans held in Gall, as alſo what Attila had invaded, and left the Franks and Burgundians quiet and peaceable, haſted to Rome, where Valentinian the Emperor now abode, expecting the event of the Battel. He entred in great triumph, and with incredible joy of the Spectators, who beheld him as their Patron and Protector from thoſe dangers wherein all Italy was very near to be overwhelmed. But within a while Valentinian began to be jealous of him, imagining he had a deſign to make himſelf Emperor, and that he held intelligence with Attila, becauſe he had not utterly deſtroyed him, as he might have done after the Battel; and the ſuggeſtion grew ſo high, that it proved the ruine of them both; as we ſhall ſee in due time. Attila being reſerved for a ſcourge, and further vengeance upon Italy, departed into Illyricum.

Eſcapes by permiſſion of Ætius.

Into Illyricum.

7. Valentinian, as by his Arms he reſcued his Subjects of Gall out of the Hands of the Barbarous Huns, ſo by his Pen took care for ſettling the matters of thoſe who in Africk had been harraſſed by the Vandals. Beſides other Acts of Grace he gave order to Firminus the Præfect, that the Lands holden of him ſhould be taken " from thoſe who had intruded into them, and beſtowed on the indigent perſons " that had moſt ſuffered in the War, particularly the Lands belonging to Bakers, " the Rights of the City of Rome always ſaved entire. " In the Eaſt the Emperor Martian took the like care for ſecuring the Eſtates of ſuch as had procured any " Fiſcal Grounds or Buildings, either by Donation of the Prince, purchaſe, or any " other way. Provided they paid the Canon, or uſual Impoſition; by an Edict " directed to Palladius, Præfect of the Eaſt, he confirmed the Poſſeſſions to them in " ſuch manner, that the Fiſcal Dues being diſcharged, they might leave them to " their Heirs, or diſpoſe of them as they thought convenient.

Novel. Valentini. inter Theodoſianas. 37. Dat. 3. Id. Julii.

Novel. Martiani 3. Dat. 15. Cal. Febr.

A. D. 452. Herculano & Sporatio Coſſ.

8. In the CCCCLII Year of our Lord, Herculanus and Sporatius had the Title and Dignity of Conſuls. Attila was retired into Pannonia; and ſome ſay, would have attempted ſomething againſt the Eaſtern Empire, if he had not been repulſed by the Arms of Martian, who managing his matters with great prudence, had made peace with Perſia, and in his Treaties ſtill got ground of that Kingdom. Pannonia was now become the Seat of the Huns, and part of it received a new name of Hungaria from them, and the Gari as Sabellicus believes, who joyned their Arms with that Nation. Attila, ſome ſay, thence returned into Scythia, his own Country, where he fretted at his laſt Defeat, and boiled with rage, that he ſhould be worſted. He reſolved to make another Attempt, and try once more his fortune, and that ſhould be for a much fairer prize. He reſolved to invade Italy, which abounded more than other Provinces with all good things; and where there were no Goths, Alans, Burgundians, nor Franks confederate with the Romans to oppoſe him; only Valentinian his power, to whom he bore no ſmall a Grudge, as having hindred him not only from ſubduing the Goths, but cauſed him to miſcarry in Gall in the late Catalaunian Battel. He raiſed an Army out of the ſame Northern Nations bigger than ever, animating them to the Expedition by hope of great Booty to be gotten. The Rumor of his intentions coming into Italy, a ſecond, but more conſiderable part of that Tragical Fear and Trembling which had happened at the Expeditions of Alarich and Radagaiſus ſeemed to be acted. For as by them they had had experience of the ſad effects of ſuch invaſions, ſo they could not but apprehend greater from this, wherein a great number of Barbarians would be employed; and a Captain more fierce and ſavage than any ever heard of, who delighted to waſte and deſtroy Mankind, as deſtinated particularly thereto by God himſelf, no otherwiſe Into Scythia.

He reſolves to invade Italy.

Which thereupon is ſeiſed with great terror.

otherwiſe than as his Scourge. Now again alſo Stories of Prodigies were multiplied, and in every Man's Mouth; particularly a Report went of three great Stones fallen from Heaven; beſides, there was a great Dearth, and that, as is uſual, followed by a vehement Peſtilence; things that carry dread enough along with them, though accompanied by no other miſchiefs.

9. The expectation was, that Attila would make his paſſage by Venetia; and therefore the Inhabitants of that Quarter were ſeiſed with the greateſt terror, as thoſe who muſt abide the firſt violence of the Storm. Seeking about for ſhelter, they retired into thoſe little Iſlands that lie in the Sea, at no great diſtance from Land, imagining that he would not take notice of them, but paſs on his way toward Rome. Theſe, after the occaſion was over, they found ſo agreeable, that what they were driven upon by neceſſity, they made choice of for convenience, and united themſelves into one City, which after the name of the Province they called Venetiæ, now Venice, which increaſing in Wealth and Reputation for many Ages, is at this day that moſt Glorious and Virgin-Commonwealth, which being the Lady and Miſtreſs of the Country adjoyning (Padua, her old Mother paſſing the time of her extreme Age in her tuition,) hath equalled the length of her Arms with thoſe of the Mediterranean, and thereby grappled with the moſt churliſh and robuſt Ruffian of her time, now and then ſoundly buffeting him, and ever keeping him at diſtance, to the grand reputation of her ſtrength, which conjoyned with her Beauty and Virginity, advanceth her above all compariſon, both in reference to paſt and preſent times, and prevents all expectation of Competition for the future. This of all other Powers and Dominions in the World, is the true Off-ſpring and Remainder of the Roman Empire: not any other is now to be found, but what was either out of the Pale of the Empire, or if erected within a Province thereof, hath proceeded and taken its original from the Northern Barbarous Nations. But the Inhabitants of Venetia were Roman Citizens, who uniting themſelves in this Common-wealth, never changed their condition, neither underwent any change of Propriety, as all others have done. But of Venice, God willing, hereafter, in the particular Hiſtory of that Common-wealth.

Thence the original of Venice to be fetched.

10. Attila, as ſoon as the Seaſon permitted, advanced into Italy with a vaſt Army, deſtroying all things that were ſubject to Fire and Sword. Valentinian was not idle in the mean time, but took what order he might for defence of the Borders and Cities, by aſſiſtance of the Gothick Nations, commanded by two Officers, called Alarich and Anthala. But Attila proceeded and ſate down before Aquileia the Metropolis of Venetia, ſeated on the point, or tongue, as Jornandes writes, of the Adriatick Sea, formerly a Latine Colony, deſigned for the protection of the Borders of Italy, from the Inſults of Barbarians. Having refuſed to yield at his imperious Demand, he begirt it round, and reſolved to carry it by ſtorm, but found ſuch vigorous reſiſtance, as both fruſtrated his expectation, and excited his Choler. The Siege of Aquileia hath been much talked of; but little can be found of the circumſtances thereof. Jornandes tells us, that the Hun having for a long time beſieged it, but to no purpoſe, the Roman Soldiers ſo valiantly defended it, when his Army was now ready to mutiny, and to pack up and be gone, walked about the Walls, muſing and conſidering with himſelf what to do; when he perceived ſome Storks which built on the tops of Houſes in the City, to bring away their young ones out of the place, and contrary to their manner to carry them out into the Country. Conſidering all circumſtances, he gave notice of it to his Men, and bade them obſerve how theſe Birds foreſeeing what was to come, and that the City would be deſtroyed, forſook it in ſuch imminent danger. Hereby he inflamed their minds with a deſire of taking it, and being once more reſolved to make trial, moved all ſorts of Engines to the Walls, in the Attempt took it, plundered, and ſo cruelly waſted it, that ſcarcely did remain any Footſteps of it to be ſeen. So writes Jornandes and ancienter Hiſtorians; but as to the deſtruction of the City, ſo as no Footſteps of it remained, Baronius gives a good reaſon why he cannot aſſent; for that the Inhabitants which had deſerted the place, came back again when the Storm was over, as appears from an Epiſtle of Leo, the Biſhop of Rome, to Niceas, or Nicetas, the Biſhop of Aquileia, wherein he anſwers certain matters, about which he conſulted him, particularly what was to be done with thoſe Women who had married other Men ſince the captivity of their Husbands, who now received their liberty, and returned home.

De Rebus Geticis, c. 42.

Takes Aquileia.

Ad h. An.

11. The Huns not ſatisfied with the deſtruction of Aquileia, raged through the other Quarters of Venetia, which terrified with that Example, made but weak reſiſtance; reſiſtance; and ſo Concordia, Altinum, Opitergium, Patavium, and Ateſte, all noble Towns, eaſily fell into the Hands of Attila, the Inhabitants withdrawing themſelves, as they could, into the Iſlands. He burnt and deſtroyed them all as much as lay in his power, and now having done his Work here, did not paſs on directly to the Padus to do the ſame by Rome, as he bragged he would; poſſibly afraid of Ætius; but turning to the Right Hand, gave occaſion to other Maritime Towns, as Tarviſium, Vicetia, Verona, Mantua, Cremona, Brixia, and Bergomum not to rejoyce above their Fellows; wholly intent on plunder, and the Deſtruction of Cities, thoſe he levelled with the Ground; and then paſſing over Abdua, entred Liguria, where he made the ſame Havock and Deſolation. Taurinum, Ticinum and Mediolanum, beſides others, felt the ſad effects of his fury, the Citizens flying, as they had opportunity, to the Mountains, and other places difficult of acceſs. Suidas tells a Story of him, how, when he was at Milan, taking notice, that the Roman Emperors were painted ſitting upon Golden Thrones, and the Scythians at their Feet, he cauſed his own Picture to be made ſitting upon a Throne, and the Emperors carrying Sacks upon their Backs, and out of them pouring down Gold at his Feet. Towards Winter he croſſed Padus, and to ſhew that he continued the ſame Man ſtill, laid waſte the Cities and Country of Æmilia, and now went to wreck Placentia, Parma and other places. All that Tract lying betwixt the Alpes and the Appennine being thus in its Aſhes, the Tyrant was afterward reſtrained, and the Leviathan had an Hook put into his Noſe by the Almighty, who had mercy on the remaining parts of Italy.

Sect. 6.

A. D. 452.

Waſtes all Italy.

Betwixt the Alpes and the Appennine.

Then retreats.

12. How this was effected there are various Reports. It's ſaid that Ætius was ready at the Borders of Æmilia to oppoſe him, with a very formidable Army, and equal in ſtrength to that of his. Others ſay (ſo doth Jornandes) that his Officers about him diſſwaded him from attempting any thing againſt Rome it ſelf, objecting to him the example of Alarich, King of the Viſegoths, who ſurvived not long the captivity of that City. That while he fluctuated in an uncertain Reſolution what to do, Leo, the Biſhop of Rome, ſent by Valentinian, the Emperor, came on an Embaſſy to him, and found him at the place where was a paſſage over the River Mincius. That preſently after quitting his rage, he returned whence he came beyond the Danube, and departed with promiſe of peace, withal denouncing and threatning, that he would more heavily afflict Italy than ever, except they would ſend to him Honoria, the Siſter of Valentinian, and Daughter of Placidia Auguſta. It was reported, that Honoria, for the Repute and Reverence of the Court, being kept up cloſe by her Brothers Command, ſent an Eunuch privily to him, and invited him to make war againſt him, that ſhe might make advantage thereof: a very foul Act to procure liberty to her Luſt by a publick miſchief, as Jornandes juſtly cenſures it. With the Relation of Jornandes agreeth that which is made by Paulus Diaconus in moſt particulars. But to that concerning Leo he adds, that the Attendants of Attila demanding the reaſon why he was ſo eaſily drawn from his purpoſe by the perſwaſion of the Biſhop, he anſwered, that he ſaw one ſtand by him in Sacerdotal Habit, of great Majeſty, and venerable Aſpect, who with a drawn Sword threatned him with death, if he did not comply with the Biſhop's Requeſts.

13. Had the Writings of Priſcus, a Rhetorician, come to our hands, we might have had good intelligence concerning the Wars of Attila; for he, as Evagrius tells us, in a peculiar Treatiſe declared at large, and with a flowing ſtyle, how he invaded both Eaſt and Weſt, how many, and how great Cities he won, and how he behaved himſelf to the end of his days, which ſome ſay was brought about by a Knife, and the Hand of a Woman, at the procurement of Ætius. But however, gone the Tyrant is back into Scythia, and we may hear more yet of him before the time of his death, though theſe Writers tell thoſe things as happening ſpeedily one after another. Now we muſt ſee what farther happened in Eaſt and Weſt in the Year of his Invaſion, of Civil Concernment. We find at Conſtantinople two Advocates or Patrons of the Treaſury or Fiſcus made inſtead of one, to whom Martian by an Edict directed to Palladius the Præfect, gives ſuch place and Honour as formerly the ſole Advocate had enjoyed; for when one Dignity is conferred on two perſons, it is to be underſtood to be conferred in ſolidum. This ſame Year he publiſhed another Law, directed to Aſporatius the Conſul, and that for Reformation of the Conſulſhip it ſelf, and reſtoring it to its priſtine Honour. But he forbids the caſting away of Money amongſt the multitude according to the old cuſtom, aſſigning that expence to the repairing of Aquaducts of the City of Conſtantinople, “

Lib. 1. c. 17.

L. 10. De Advocatis Diverſorum Judiciorum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 7. Dat. 15. Cal. Jul.

Martian reforms ſomething about the Conſulſhip.

L. 2. De Conſulibus, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 3.

Sect. 6.

A. D. 452.

to the value of an hundred pounds of Gold. This Liberty thus taken away, Juſtinian afterward reſtored to the Conſuls, but confined to a certain Sum, and to ſeven times in the year. So did Martian employ himſelf at Conſtantinople. Valentinian in the Weſt had ſufficient cauſe to be diverted from making of Laws, when the property of thoſe who were to be governed by them lay in ſo extreme hazard. Yet ſome we find of this Year; as one of Religious Concernment, and another relating to the Incouragement of the Suarii of Rome, that that City“ might be the better ſupplied with Proviſions.“

Novellæ Valentiniani 12. & 15. Dat. 17. & 3. Cal. Jul.

A. D. 453. Opilione & Vincomalo Coſſ.

14. The Year of our Lord CCCCLIII is Characteriſed by the Conſulſhip of Opilio and Vincomalus, and by little elſe that we can find of Civil Government. But we cannot but rejoyce to think how the cruel Tyrant Attila being now withdrawn, the poor Inhabitants of the ſeveral places he had harraſſed, began to peep out of their Retirements, to ſee if all was clear, and when thereof ſatisfied, to return to their former Seats, and to ſet upon the repairing of their former Houſes; it being ſeldom ſeen, that the Love of the Native Soil, though in greateſt deſolation, quitteth any. Yet ſo great was the deſolation, that ſome Towns were never repaired; but amends was made by that confluence of perſons into the Iſlands, which gave original, as we ſaid, to the City of Venice. Attila was retired into his own Country; but where-ever his Body was, his mind was not at reſt, but as repenting of that eaſe he had given the Empire, and not enduring to be out of War, he ſent to the Emperor Martian in a menacing manner, upbraiding him with not paying what formerly Theodoſius had engaged; and for being more inhumane to his Enemies than he was wont. Though he did this, yet Jornandes tells us, being crafty and deſigning, he threatned one place, and fell foul upon another, reſolving to turn the fury of his Arms againſt the Viſegoths. But he had not the ſucceſs he had formerly found againſt the Romans. Returning into Gall by other ways than he had done formerly, he reſolved to ſubdue part of the Alans, who were ſeated beyond Ligeris, or the Loire, by a change of the face of the War to appear more terrible. He moved againſt them by Dacia and Pannonia, which were then poſſeſſed by the Huns, with divers other Nations ſubject to them. But Thoriſmond, King of the Viſegoths, with no leſs ſubtilty ſmelling out his fraud, made haſte, and was with the Alans before his coming, oppoſed himſelf againſt his Attempts, and engaging in a Battel much what after the ſame method with that which had been fought in the Catalaunian Plains, prevented him of his hoped for Victory, and cauſed him to flie, without any triumph, back into his own Quarter.

Ubi prius, c. 43.

Attila in vain attacks the Alans.

A. D. 454. Studio & Ætio Coſſ.

15. The Year CCCCLIIII had for Conſuls Studius in the Eaſt, and Ætius again in the Weſt. With Ætius, Thoriſmond, King of the Goths, had a quarrel; and, as is conjectured, for that having made an agreement with Attila he had not aſſiſted him in his late diſtreſs. He broke out into Hoſtility againſt the Romans, and laid Siege to Arles, intending to ſtarve them out, whom by force he had in vain attempted to bring under. Ætius, as ſoon as he had notice, was preſently at hand with ſuch Forces as he had in readineſs, and a Fight there followed betwixt them; but he was not able to raiſe the Siege. At this time Ferreolus was Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, a perſon, for his Nobility, excellent Conduct, and ſingular Humanity, in great eſteem, as well with Goths as others. He went to Thoriſmond, invited him to Dinner, and by an Entertainment removed him from the Gates of Arles, whom Ætius could not by Battel. For ſo Sidonius Apollinaris tells him in an Epiſtle, wherein he begs his excuſe for not having related at full in ſome Work wherein he had employed his pains, the great performance of his Anceſtors and his own Actions. It ſeems this Ferreolus went afterwards into Orders; and therefore Sidonius partly engages himſelf to joyn the Hiſtory of his Life to thoſe of Biſhops, and Eccleſiaſtical Perſons: but in this Epiſtle, beſides the removing of Thoriſmond from Arles, he confeſſeth he had paſſed by how Gall had been governed by him when moſt in ſafety; how Attila, the Enemy of Rhine; Thoriſmond, the Gueſt of Rhone, and Ætius, the Reliever of Ligeris or Loire had been ſuſtain'd by the Salubrity of his Diſpoſitions, (as he words it, in his degenerated Roman Phraſe) and for his great prudence and forecaſt the Provincials, with Spontaneous Necks, and greateſt Accent of Applauſe, underwent his Chariot of Government; for he held the Reins of Gall in ſuch a manner, that the Poſſeſſor exhauſted under a Tributary Yoak, was relieved. He confeſſes farther, that he had omitted how the moſt fierce King of Gothia had by his ſweet, grave, argute and extraordinary ſpeech and converſation been made compliant. He had told him before that, intending a publick Thoriſmond, King of the Goths, beſieges Arles, and is perſwaded to remove,

Lib. 7. Ep. 12. Sidonius Ferreolo ſuo ſalutem. Non tamen inſcribit Papæ ut paſſim ſolet Epiſcopis.

Sect. 6. A. D. 454.

a publick ſalutation to him, he had conſidered not what he had been, but what he was at preſent.

16. Attila being retired home now gave up himſelf to Idleneſs and Luxury. The Hiſtory, going under the name of Paulus Diaconus, relates, that being returned into his own Country, to the many Wives he had already, he added a Virgin very beautiful, called Indicto. And at the Wedding making an extraordinary Feaſt, he drunk more Wine than ever he had done before at once, and lying upon his Back, was ſuffocated with a great effuſion of Blood out of his Noſe, to which he had been formerly ſubject. He adds, that the ſame night Martian was in a dream told from God, that the Bow of Attila was broken. Jornandes, from Priſcus the Hiſtorian calleth the Maid by the name of Ildico, adds, that ſhe was very beautiful, and that after innumerable other Wives, as the cuſtom of that Nation was, he took her alſo in Marriage. That being exceedingly merry at the Wedding, and now heavy with Wine and Sleep, as he lay upon his Back, abundance of Blood, which was wont to iſſue out of his Noſe, being hindred of paſſage, poured down it ſelf into his Throat, and choaked him. So was a King glorious for War brought to a deſpicable end by Drunkenneſs. The next morning when it grew late, and his Attendants heard nothing of him, ſuſpecting all was not well, after great noiſe they broke open the door, and found Attila dead of bleeding, without any Wound, and the Girl weeping under a Veil with a dejected countenance. Then according to the manner of their Funerals did they cut off part of their Hair, and with Gaſhes made their ugly Faces ſtill more deformed, that ſo great a Warrior might be lamented with the Blood of Man, and not with Womaniſh Complaints and Tears. Concerning Martian who was now ſolicitous concerning Attila, his being certified in a Dream that his Bow was broken. Jornandes alſo confirmeth it from Priſcus, who ſaid he affirmed it by true atteſtation. For ſo terrible was Attila to the great powers upon earth, that his Death was eſteemed as a great Gift of God.

Ubi ſupra. c. 49.

Attila dies.

17. Having acquainted us with thus much out of Priſcus, he thinks fit not to omit the Solemnity of Attila his Funeral, but give an account of many things performed at it in few words. The Body was in the middle of the Camp, placed within a Silken Tent; and then was preſented an admirable Show, ſolemnly exhibited. For out of the whole Nation of the Huns moſt choice Horſemen were employed to make their courſes after the manner of the Circenſian Exerciſes in that place; and compaſſing it about as they went, they chanted in a Funeral Song the Acts of the deceaſed after this manner: Attila the greateſt and moſt excellent King of the Huns, the Son of Mundzuch, Lord of moſt valiant Nations, “ who poſſeſſed of ſuch power as before him was not heard of, alone held the Scythian and German Kingdoms, put to a fright both the Empires of the Roman City, “ by taking their Towns; and leſt the reſt ſhould be made a prey, being appeaſed, “ received of them a yearly Tribute; who, when in a courſe of felicity he had done “ all thoſe things, died, not by the hand of an Enemy, not through treachery of “ his own Men, but merry and in jollity, his Nation at the ſame time being ſafe, “ without any ſenſe of pain. Who will therefore call that an Exit, which no Man “ accounts fit to be revenged? “ After he was bewailed with ſuch Lamentations, “ they feaſted over the Herſe in a ſolemn manner, which they called Strava, and mixing things that were contrary together, joyned joy and jollity with a Funeral Mourning; and at length by night the Body was ſecretly put into the earth. His Coffin they firſt encloſed with Gold, then with Silver, and then upon that laid Iron, thereby to ſhew, that the moſt potent King had all theſe Metals in his power: Iron, by which he conquered Nations; and Gold and Silver, for that he had obtain'd the Wealth of both the Empires. They added Arms got by ſlaughter of Enemies, Trappings and Ornaments, precious by reaſon of the luſtre of their Gems, and divers other ſorts of rarities with which Courts are wont to be adorned. And that humane curioſity might not approach theſe ſo many and ſo great Riches, by a deteſtable ſort of reward they killed ſuch as were employed in the Interment, and a ſudden death happened to the Buriers with him whom they buried.

His Funeral.

18. Such is the account we have from Jornandes, concerning the death of Attila, from whoſe Relation Marcellinus differs, in that he writes, that he was killed by a Woman: and the Story being told of the new married Woman being found with him in the Room might raiſe a ſuſpicion. But he being dead, a diſſention aroſe amongſt his numerous (ſome term them innumerous) and ambitious Sons about the Succeſſion; and while all imprudently deſired to reign, all of them

Jornandes, c. 50

miſcarried in the Attempt; for Kingdoms and Empires are wont to be diſordered more by plenty than ſcarcity of Succeſſors. They went about to divide their Father's Dominions by lot, ſo as all might ſhare, not only his Hereditary Countries, but the conquered Nations. Ardarich, King of the Gepidæ, perceiving this, and diſdaining, that ſo many Countries ſhould be ſubjected to ſuch wretched Slavery, firſt roſe up againſt the Sons of Attila, and ſhook off the Yoak from his own Neck, whoſe example was of ſuch force, that the other Nations encouraged by his ſucceſs, aſſerted and procured their former liberty. He with his Aſſociates gave Battel to the Huns, and their Subjects in Pannonia, near to the River Netad. Jornandes eſteems it a ſight to be admired, to have ſeen the furious Goth fighting with his Sword, the Gepida breaking all his Lances in the Wounds of his own Men, the Sueve to preſume upon his Feet, and the Hun upon his Arrow; the Alan to fight with heavy, and the Herulus with light Armour. After terrible Conflicts an unexpected Victory happened to the Gepidæ. For the Sword of Ardarich and his Aſſociates deſtroyed near thirty thouſand of the Huns, and their Aſſiſtants. In the Battel periſhed Ellac, the eldeſt Son of Attila, whom his Father ſo far loved more than the reſt, that he preferred him above them all in the Kingdom. But his fortune was not anſwerable to his Father's Wiſhes; yet after great Slaughter made of his Enemies, he died ſo valiantly, that if his Father had been living, he muſt have wiſhed for ſo glorious an end. The other Brothers after his death were driven towards the Shore of the Sea of Pontus, where formerly the Goths had inhabited.

His Sons driven to the Shoar of Pontus.

19. Thus did the Huns fly and retire, who lately, as was thought, would put all other Nations to flight; ſo pernicious a thing is Diſſention. The People lately ſubject to them, now lifted up their Heads with joyful expectation of freedom, and many ſending their Meſſengers to the Emperor Martian, he kindly received them, and aſſigned them places to inhabit. For the Gepidæ having by force poſſeſſed themſelves of the Seats of the Huns, as Conquerors held all the Coaſts of Daciæ, and required nothing farther of the Empire but Friendſhip, and ſuch things as were due to valiant Men: which the Emperor willingly granted, and this became a cuſtom to the days of Jornandes. The Goths perceiving that the Gepidæ had ſeiſed on the Seats of the Huns, and that the Huns were retired to the Quarter that they had formerly poſſeſſed, reſolved rather to uſe fair means, and deſire a Country from the Empire, than with danger to invade the Territories of other Nations by force, and ſo received Pannonia, extending out in a long Plain, having on the Eaſt Mæſia ſuperior; on the South Dalmatia; on the Weſt Noricum; and the Danube on the North; all this Tract extending from Sirmium to Vindibona. The Sauromatæ, or Sarmatæ, the Cemandri and ſome of the Huns ſate down in that part of Illyricum near the Caſtle Martena. The Sciri, the Satagarii, and the reſt of the Alans, with Candax their Captain received Scythia the leſs, and Mæſia inferior to inhabit. The Rugi and ſome other ſorts of People went to inhabit at Biozimetæ and Scandiopolis. Hernac, the younger Son of Attila choſe for himſelf and his Followers a place in the utmoſt of the leſſer Scythia, Emnedzar and Uzindur his Kinſmen in Dacia Ripenſis; Uto and Iſcalmus, who formerly held it, and many of the Huns falling into Romania. There were other Goths called Minores, yet a vaſt People, with their Biſhop and Primate Vulfilas, who is ſaid, to have inſtructed them in Learning, and thoſe in the days of Jornandes held that part of Mæſia called Eucopolitana. This Narration of his concerning the fixing of theſe ſeveral Nations is very much to be regarded, and which will receive illuſtration from what we ſhall ſay afterwards concerning the original of the Goths.

Their Poſſeſſions ſhared.

Jornandes, c. 51.

This year fatal to other great Perſons, as Thoriſmond.

Ætius.

20. As this Year was fatal to Attila, ſo to ſome other great Princes; for now died Thoriſmond, King of the Goths, who was killed by a Dependant, as he was letting Blood. And to theſe ſome add the death of Pulcheria Auguſta. To be ſure it was fatal to Ætius the Conſul, and conſequently to the Empire it ſelf; for ſo writes Marcellinus, that now Ætius, the Patritian, the great preſerver of the Weſtern Empire, and formerly the terror of Attila, was together with Boetius, his Friend, ſlain in the Palace by Valentinian the Emperor, and with him fell the Weſtern Empire, which hitherto, ſaith he, it hath not been poſſible to reſtore. This he tells in ſhort, of which Procopius gives a larger account, as to the occaſion and motives. There was amongſt the Senators one Maximus, a Roman, of the poſterity of that Maximus who uſurped, and was overthrown by Theodoſius the Great, the day of which Victory was kept holy in memory of it, in the time of the Hiſtorian. He had a Wife which excelled in prudence, and alſo in Beauty; and with her the Em-

Hiſt. Vandalicæ, lib. 1.

Sect. 6. peror Valentinian fell deſperately in love. Not knowing how otherwiſe to enjoy her he bethought himſelf of this wretched courſe. He ſent for Maximus to Court, and beating him at Dice, received his Ring from him as a Pawn for the Money he had loſt. This he ſends privately to his Wife, as a token that ſhe ſhould come and give a viſit to Eudoxia the Empreſs, and ſhe not doubting any thing, came in her Litter, but having entred the Palace, was ſeiſed by ſome Men that were ſet on purpoſe, and conveyed into a private Apartment, where Valentinian by force had his will of her. Home ſhe returned, and by tears and all other expreſſions of ſorrow teſtified how much ſhe reſented the injury, and curſed Maximus for giving occaſion to ſuch miſchief. With this he was inraged, and deviſed how he might procure the deſtruction of the Emperor. He dreaded Ætius, whom he knew to be ſo great a Captain, and had lately defeated Attila, and therefore thought it beſt firſt to remove him out of the way, in whom underſtanding Men placed their hope; and by aſſiſtance of the Eunuchs, who were his Friends, he perſwaded Valentinian, that Ætius had a purpoſe to uſurp. The Authority and Power of the Man procured the Emperor to admit of this Jealouſie: and therefore he commanded him to be ſlain. When the Fact was done, ſome ſay by the Emperor's own hand, ſome ſay by others, he asked a certain Roman whether he had not done well to take him out of the way. He anſwered, that whether he had done well or ill he knew not: but this he knew, that he had cut off his Right Hand with his Left.

A. D. 454.

Upon what occaſion.

21. This fatal Year was not concluded with theſe miſchiefs. For in it did the Vandals from Africk exerciſe Pyracy, and made Depredations in Sicily. Several of the Provinces of the Eaſt were alſo grievouſly harraſſed with Famine, and a Plague; particularly in both the Phrygias, in Galatia, Cappadocia and Cilicia, there was ſuch want of Rain, that Men beiug deſtitute of Neceſſaries, had recourſe to peſtiferous and deadly food, which caſt them into great Diſtempers; their Bodies ſwelled, and ſo exceſſive was their heat, that by great Inflammations they loſt their ſight, were ſeiſed with Coughs, and on the third day they died. Evagrius writes, that the Plague could no way be cured; but by the providence of God the Famine was allayed by Nouriſhment which fell out of the Air, as Manna of old did to the Iſraelites; and the year following the earth of it ſelf brought forth abundantly. He adds, that not only Paleſtine was in this manner afflicted, but other heavy Calamities raged in many and almoſt infinite other Regions. Amongſt theſe infinite other Regions are to be reckoned the Weſtern and Northern Tracts, which otherwiſe appear to have been afflicted with Famine, and particularly the Country ſince called Auſtria, with the chief City, known at this day by the name of Vienna; but then, it's ſaid, called Fabianæ.

Baron. ad h. An.

Great Famine and Peſtilence.

Lib. 2. c. 6.

22. The Year of our Lord CCCCLV being by ſome ſtiled the Year of Vengeance, or Revenge, for reaſons we ſhall ſhortly relate, was known by the eighth Conſulſhip of Valentinian, and that of Anthemius, his Colleague. Now did the Deſigns of Maximus come to a ripeneſs, in way to his purpoſed Revenge. For having removed Ætius, who alone was able to prevent, or render invalid any Attempt; he then inſinuated into the Servants and Dependants of that great Man, and perſwaded them to revenge his undeſerved death. Upon two of his Guard, known to poſterity by the name of Oſtila and Tranſila, his words had greateſt operation, who laying their Trains as would beſt accompliſh their buſineſs, fell upon him as he was making a ſpeech from the Tribunal, in the Campus Martius, when he thought neither of conſpiracy nor death; and having firſt diſpatched Heraclius, an Eunuch, who valiantly interpoſed and endeavoured to ſave his Maſter, ſlew him in the place. Thus he is ſaid to have periſhed in the thirtieth year of his Reign, and the thirty fifth of his Age, on the eighteenth day of March. During his Government, the Empire, which in the time of Honorius began much to decline, grew to be ſeiſed of a mortal Diſtemper. But this may be ſaid in his behalf, that he was not unhappy in the Conteſt he had with the greateſt Hector and Enemy of theſe times, having by his Arms ſometimes worſted Attila, and otherwhiles obliged him to pack up and be gone out of his Dominions. To be ſure he was the laſt that may ſeem to have been an Emperor indeed, in whom true Imperial Majeſty reſided. For thoſe that followed him in the Weſt were Upſtarts, Uſurpers, or like Apparitions, that ſoon appeared, and ſoon vaniſhed. Under them the Limbs of the Empire were torn in pieces one from another; and the Provinces were dayly loſt, and fell into the Hands of Barbarous Nations. And as with the Growth of the Empire good Letters had received increaſe, and were propagated; ſo they languiſhed

A. D. 455. Valentin. A. 8. & Anthemio Coſſ.

Valentinian

Sect. 6. guiſhed together with it, and ſtudy being little regarded when life it ſelf is to be preſerved, dwindled at length into Barbariſm and Ignorance. This is ſeen by that ſlender Account we have left us concerning the revolutions of the ſucceeding times. A. D. 455.

SECT. VII.

The Seventh Step to the Ruin of the Empire in the Weſt.

Containing the Pangs and Expiring of the Empire of the Weſt.

From the Death of Valentinian the Third to the depoſing of Auguſtulus.

The Space of Twenty one Years.

Maximus the Murderer uſurps.

1. V*Alentinian* being dead, Maximus, the Contriver of his Ruine, eaſily advanced himſelf into his Seat; there being none indeed that could well oppoſe him. Being ſeated, he now conſidered how he might beſt eſtabliſh himſelf. He thought it would contribute to his ſecurity, if he committed the truſt of the Army to Avitus, a perſon famous for his well diſcharged Employments, who at preſent was Præfectus Prætorio in Gall. There was no Son or Brother of the deceaſed Emperor left to call in queſtion his Title; but Eudoxia, his Wife, was ſtill alive, and he reſolved by Marriage with her (his own Wife being lately dead) to gain reputation and vigor to it. Therefore did he, as both Procopius and Evagrius write, force her to take him for an Husband; and yet was he ſo captivated by her Arts, or his own affections, that, love ariſing ſometimes it ſeems from policy, in the night, when they were in Bed, he told her all the Story of Valentinian's death, how it was contrived and brought to paſs; and endeavoured to make her believe, that it was all deſigned and contrived out of his love to her perſon. She hated him before, as Procopius tells us, and was now inraged to find how he had cauſed her Lord and Husband to be murdered, and aſcribed all the Villany to her, as the cauſe that principally moved him. No ſooner was the Morning come, and ſhe was out of Bed, but burning as much with deſire of Revenge, as he did with Love, ſhe ſent away a Meſſenger to Genſerich, then lying at Carthage, to let him underſtand, how her Husband the Emperor had been wickedly murdered, the Empire ſeiſed, and her own perſon in a manner captivated by a Traitor, and that he ſhould act like himſelf, and the Ally of Valentinian, if he would come, and by his Arms vindicate the Roman Name and Majeſty from ſo great Diſhonour. The Meſſage was very acceptable to Genſerich, who had long deſired to find out ſuch an opportunity as was now offered to him, and glad he was, that Theodoſius was dead, and ſo could not take the work out of his Hands, which he thought Martian would neglect, as having no ſuch Relation to Eudoxia.

Procopius Hiſt. Vandal. lib. 1. Evagrius lib. 2. c. 7.

2. He rigged up his Fleet, put aboard his Men, and with all alacrity purſued his Voyage, ſuch courage did the expectation of the rich Booty put into him. And he could not have come at a better time; for the Man he was to deal with, was as much now down in his ſpirits, as he himſelf was joyful and frolick. He had formerly lived at his eaſe, and in great affluence of all both conveniences and pleaſures. Maximus had run through all ſorts of Honours and Preferments below the Purple, and his Senatorian Dignity, his great Eſtate accompanied with a good conſcience and reputation, made his Nights poſſibly no leſs eaſie and pleaſant than his days. But now his eaſe was diſturbed by continual cares and perplexities about ſecuring his ill gotten Dominion; his Counſellors, his Guards and Soldiers diſtracted him, and in vain he ſought by night for that ſleep and reſt which ſhould give ſome intermiſſion to his anxieties. This is affirmed by Sidonius Apollinaris, in his anſwer to the Epiſtle of his Friend Serranus, wherein he had much extolled the felicity of this Petronius Maximus his Patron. In that anſwer he affirms, that he had heard one Fulgentius, a perſon of Queſtorian Dignity, relate, how he had often declared to him by his own Mouth how much he abhorred that Burthen of the Empire, which he had ſo ambitiouſly pulled upon his Shoulders, and how happy he eſteemed the condition of Damocles, who had born the neceſſity of a Royal Eſtate, only during the length of one Dinner. Of this Damocles the Story is obvious, how being familiar with Dionyſius, the Tyrant of Syracuſe, he exceſſively and ignorantly was wont to extol the felicity at which his Friend and Patron had arrived. Dionyſius asked him if he would ſit down to Meat at his Table, and thereat in a plentiful Entertainment make an experiment both of the conveniences and inconveniences, which he ſo ſplendidly enjoyed. He conſented, and joyfully ſate down, accoutred in Regalibus; with coſtly and delicious Fare was he entertained, and ſerved as a King in all reſpects, like ſome Sardanapalus; ſo rich was the Furniture of his Table, ſo great was the value of his Veſſels he drank in, ſet out with Gems and Pearls, and ſo numerous and well habited his Attendance. But when he began to fall to his Victuals, his Stomach was quickly turned by a ſight he beheld over his Head. There hung from the Roof of the Room a naked Sword in no ſtronger a bond than the Hair of an Horſe, which put him in continual danger of having that Throat cut which ſhould ſwallow the Meat, and procuring a falſe and uneaſie paſſage for his delicate Viands. Now like another Tantalus he deſired to remove from thoſe pleaſant things he could not enjoy; and by his prayers mixed with tears and ſighs hardly obtained a diſmiſſion from his Royal Delights, from which his Heels carried him with greater celerity and eaſe than they brought him thither. This Story Sidonius relates and philoſophiſeth in more apt words and expreſſions than uſual upon that ticklish and uncertain, though ſpecious condition of thoſe Men who chuſe to feed on Blood, before the Feaſt of a good conſcience, and forſake their eaſe and quiet to attain the ſhort and anxious pleaſures of Uſurpation.

And is diſquieted in his mind.

Sidonius Apollinarius, lib. 2. ep. 13.

3. In this plight was Maximus found, when Genſerich with three hundred thouſand, (as ſome write improbably) of Vandals and Moors landed upon the Coaſt of Rome. His ſudden and unexpected coming contributed to the conſternation of the Uſurper, and conſequently to his own ſucceſs, and the expedition of his Buſineſs. The City was abſolutely ſurpriſed, the Inhabitants thereof being quite put out of all other methods of conſultation, than how beſt every Man to ſhift for himſelf, into Mountains or other places difficult of acceſs, or hard to be diſcovered. And Maximus himſelf would not be one Furlong behind them. He fled as well as the reſt, deſtitute of all his Friends, whom ſome Senators, his Enemies, ſeeing to be alone, and without defence, were ſo bold as to take the advantage, and ſtone him; then being dragged all torn and bruiſed as he was, they ſent his Body by one Urſus, a Roman Soldier, to be caſt into Tiber. This happened about the twelfth of June, and ſome three days after Genſerich entred the City, now fully expoſed to his luſt and appetite. He had promiſed Eudoxia very fair things, in reference to moderation, and abſtinence from all rapine and plunder. Leo the Biſhop alſo with ſome of the Nobility met him at the Gate, and the better to move him, put him in mind how even Attila, a Pagan, had been perſwaded to own the reſpect that was due to the Miſtreſs of the World. But he was deaf to all charmings of this nature, and contrary to his faith given to Eudoxia, not only rifled the Imperial Treaſure, but all that was excellent beſides. The Statues and Tiles of Jupiter Capitolinus he made bold with, and he took away the Veſſels of the Temple of Jeruſalem, which Titus formerly had brought to Rome; and afterwards when Africk was recovered, were by Beliſarius ſent to Conſtantinople, and returned back to Jeruſalem by order of Juſtinian. Evagrius writes, that the Barbarian being of inconſtant behaviour, and little fidelity, ſet the City on fire. Others ſpeak only of the burning of ſuch things as were made for ſhew and pleaſure; ſome, that Leo meeting him in his way, perſwaded him to abſtain from Blood and Fire; yet he took away all the Wealth, except that of the three principal Churches, and led away many thouſands of Priſoners into Africk.

He is killed.

And Genſerich rifleth Rome.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 455.

4. It's affirmed by others, that the plundering of Rome continued fourteen days; and ſeveral write, that moſt of the plunder was loſt at Sea; though Procopius mentions it as a report that only that Ship which carried the Statues was ſunk, and the other Veſſels arrived ſafe with the Vandals in the Port of Carthage. But amongſt other Priſoners, notwithſtanding the faith given to her, he carried away Eudoxia the Empreſs, and her two Daughters Eudocia and Placidia, whereof Eudocia he married to his eldeſt Son Honorich; and Placidia became afterwards the Wife of Olybrius, a Noble Roman Senator, being by Genſerich ſent away with her Mother to Conſtantinople, at the deſire of Leo, who ſucceeded Martian in the Eaſt. So Procopius; but Evagrius writes, that he ſent Placidia the younger Daughter together with her Mother, and that with Royal Equipage to Martian himſelf, hoping thereby to mitigate his diſpleaſure; for he was highly offended with the burning of Rome, and the ill uſage of Valentinian his Daughters: and that afterwards Martian gave Placidia in Marriage to Olybrius, a Noble Man, and Senator of Rome, who, when the City was taken, had fled to Conſtantinople, and to whom, ſome ſay, ſhe had been formerly contracted. After the death of Maximus followed an Inter-regnum in the Weſt for twenty eight days; and then was Avitus acclaimed Emperor in Gall, who having been by Valentinian preferred to the Dignity of Præfectus Prætorio of that Diſtrict, was alſo lately by Maximus made Magiſter Militum, and at this time diſcharged the Office of an Ambaſſador in a Negotiation of Peace to Theodorich, King of the Goths, who, ſome write, having ſlain his Brother Thoriſmond, had ſeiſed on his Kingdom. By the aſſiſtance of the Goths, and eſpecial procurement of Theodorich, he was promoted to the Purple. Avitus was a Man of excellent Qualifications, both as to War and Civil Matters; of great Nobility, an excellent Orator, as excellent a Lawyer, not unaccuſtomed to the Travels and Incommodities of a Soldier. Being againſt his will, advanced to the ſupreme Honour, to the great joy of the Provincials of Gall, who promiſed themſelves all good things from the Government of ſo brave a perſon, he applied himſelf to ſuch Councils as might beſt conduce to the ſafety of the State. Particularly took order for defending the Quarters lying beyond the River Ligeris, againſt the Incurſions of the Franks, and thoſe on the South ſide of the ſaid River, or neareſt to Italy, from the violence of the Goths. And by virtue of the League and Friendſhip contracted betwixt him and Theodorich, he committed that portion of Spain which as yet acknowledged obedience to the Empire; to be defended by him againſt the Attempts of Riccar, King of the Suevi. And ſo we quit this Year without any other obſervations, but that on the tenth of July, the ſame day that Avitus was inaugurated, happened ſo great an Earthquake in Pannonia, that therewith all the City Sabaria was overwhelmed.

Who carries away priſoners Eudoxia and her two Daughters.

Avitus made Emperor in Gall.

A. D. 456.

Johanne & Varane Coſſ.

5. That follows which was the CCCCLVI of our Lord; and as the Chronicles of Caſſiodorus and Marcellinus do mark it, had for Conſuls one John and Varanes, or Varares. But that Avitus the Emperor himſelf aſſumed this Title, we are ſufficiently informed from the Panegyrick made to him by Sidonius Apollinaris in Verſe, on New-years-day, and that in the very way of celebrating his Conſulſhip. And Baronius puts himſelf out of doubt by producing an ancient Inſcription, extant at Rome in the Church of S. Agnes in the Numentane Street. But ſo it might happen, that together with the Purple Avitus might alſo quit the Conſulſhip. For Caſſiodorus notes, that this Year he laid down the Imperial Dignity at Placentia, and that he ceaſed to be Emperor is no doubt at all; but as to the occaſion of it there are various Reports. Evagrius, in ſhort, ſaith he died of the Plague; Nicephorus by Famine; but Gregory of Tours writes it for truth, that living luxurioully, he was caſt out by the Senators, and at Placentia was ordained Biſhop of that City. That for all his depoſing, having found that the Senate, ſtill angry with him, deſigned to take away his life, he reſolved with many rich offerings to take Sanctuary in the Church of S. Julian, a Martyr of the Arverni (whoſe Countryman that he was, Gregory ſaith, was moſt manifeſt) and dying in the way, was buried in the Town he calls Brivatenſis Vicus at the Feet of the ſaid Martyr. Now ſome there are that fetch the Story a little higher. They tell us how Avitus having ſettled his Affairs in Gall, reſolved to paſs into Italy, and take poſſeſſion of the Government of that Country to which he had a juſt Title, as well as to the other Members of the Weſtern Empire. With the aſſiſtance of the Goths he paſſed the Alpes, went to Rome, and there finding no oppoſition, applied himſelf to State Affairs, which he managed in ſuch tranquility, that as being altogether ſecure from Plots and Conſpiracies, he diſmiſſed his Goths, truſting to the fidelity of the Romans.

Principis anterior jam Conſulis iſte coruſcat Annus & emerita trabeis Diademata creſtunt.

His Coſſ. Placentiæ depoſuit Avitus imperium.

Τȣ́τȣ δὲ τ̃ βίον λιμῷ μεταλλάξαντος.

Lays down the Purple.

The Senate perceiving how expoſed he now was, and hating him, either for his luxurious life, or in obedience to ſome inſtructions receiv'd from the Emperor Martian, laid their Trains, and eaſily drove him out of the City. Being in this diſtreſs, and not knowing how to recover his Station, he reſolved for Æmilia, and with a ſlender Company came to Placentia. At that time Ricimer, a Sueve, who had been by Valentinian made Magiſter Militum, in the room of Ætius, in a manner ſuſtained all the Burthen of Italy. He hearing of Avitus his coming to Placentia, went thither, as he pretended, to wait on him; but in compliance with Martian his orders, raiſed a Mutiny, and compelled him to diveſt himſelf of the Purple; and in the tumult Meſſianus, the Patritian of Avitus was killed, while he couragiouſly endeavoured to defend the Dignity of his Prince, who on the ſeventeenth of May ſuffered this Degradation, which he had not deſerved. But probable it is, that out of hatred to Maximus, who had made him his Magiſter Militum, and who had been the cauſe of the burning and plundering of the City, the Romans would not own him for Emperor, abominating all things and perſons that had any relation to that Man. Some reckon ten Months and eight Days to his Government; but Evagrius only allows him eight Months. A .D. 456.

6. In the mean time, Theodorich (or as Iſidore calls him Teuderich) King of the Goths, who with the Galls had aſſiſted Avitus in obtaining the Empire, with a numerous Army quitted Aquitain, and with his leave and conſent invaded Spain. There he was oppoſed by Rectiar, King of the Suevi, and twelve miles off from the City called Urbs Aſturigenſis, by the River Urbicus he gave him Battel; but the Victory fell to the Goths, and the Suevi being ſlaughtered in great numbers, ſome of them taken, and many running away, their King was wounded, and ſeiſed in his flight, and being preſented to Theodorich, was put to death. After this, many that had eſcaped the Battel yielded themſelves, and ſome being puniſhed in the ſame manner, the Kingdom of the Suevi was in a manner extinct. Theodorich now waſted Gallicia and Luſitania (now Portugal) but his abſence in Spain fell out well for Childerich, King of the Franks, who had not long before ſucceeded Merouee, the Succeſſor of Clodio, as he of Pharamond. Who this Pharamond was, doth not appear from Gregory of Tours, and who preceded him in that Dignity is alſo obſcure; but that this moſt valiant Nation had Kings before, is evident both from Ammianus and others. The Goths being diverted thus in Spain, and the Roman Army having followed Avitus into Italy, the Franks had the opportunity they often had ſought in vain, in ſettling their Kingdom in that noble Country of Gall. Long and often before had they invaded it, but were repulſed, as in the time of Aurelian, and during the Reign of Julian, beſides many Incurſions ſuddenly made upon occaſion. In the time of Valentinian the Third they joyned with the Burgundians, and piercing further into the Roman Pale, were, as we have formerly ſhewn, repulſed by Ætius and Majorianus. At length by occaſion of Attila his Invaſion, they got into the middle of Gall, and there from this time eſtabliſhed their Kingdom at Paris, under Childerich, concerning whom we ſhall ſpeak at large in the particular Hiſtory of that Nation, as alſo the original of theſe Franks. But thus was another Principality cut out of the Body of the Weſtern Empire.

Iſidorus ad Æram, 491. Editione Grotiana.

Theodorich victorious in Spain.

The Franks erect a Kingdom in Gall.

7. The Year of our Lord CCCCLVII, is characteriſed with the Conſulſhip of Conſtantine and Rufus. The Inter-regnum in the Weſt ſtill continued, Sidonius Apollinaris having proved but a bad Prophet in his Panegyrick to Avitus, when he feigned how the Parcæ ſpun an happy time for his Government, and Golden Ages ſhould be uſhered in by his Conſulſhip. So lucky was this Age, that Genſerich, the Vandal, having broken the League made with the Romans by the violence offered to the City, reſolve to purſue what he had unjuſtly begun, and give ſtamp to one miſchief by another. For now did he ſeiſe upon that part of Africk, which in the partition of that Country was left to Valentinian, and driving away the Roman Officers, added it to his own Dominion; and ſo fell off alſo that noble Province from the Empire, and continued in the hands of the Vandals till afterward it was happily recovered by Juſtinian. As Rome was now in the condition of Widow-hood, wanting an Head and Governour, ſo the ſame thing ſhortly happened alſo to Conſtantinople, which in the beginning of this Year underwent the like change. For before the beginning of March, (ſome ſay, on the twenty ſixth of January, others, on the twenty fourth of February) the Emperor Martian departed this life, at ſuch time as being highly ſenſible of the Indignities and Injuries put upon the Empire by Genſerich, he prepared by his Arms to revenge the Affronts which the Majeſty of Rome had received. To his Reign Chronologers aſſign ſix Years,

A. D. 457. Conſtantino & Rufo Coſſ.

——Fœlix tempus nevere ſorores Imperiis Auguſte tuis & Conſulis Anno, Fulva volubilibus duxerunt ſæcula penſis.

Africk alſo falls off.

Martian dies.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 457.

Years, ſix Months, and two days. And though we hear little of him, yet is he much commended by ſome Writers for his Wiſdom and Felicity in Government. Indeed quiet and repoſe is the end of good Government, and when we hear little of Action, Stirs or Commotions, we may hope, that where there is no Attempt for Reformation, there is no need of it; where there is no application of Remedies or Preſervatives, there are no conſiderable Indications. The danger is, when the Diſeaſe is palliated, when the peccant matter is rather tempered for a while than fully altered; when the lazyneſs or negligence of the Phyſician conſulting only his own eaſe, contributes to the turgency of the humours. This we muſt ſay, that in the time of Martian the Barbarians gave little or no diſturbance on his ſide of the World; and this we do not find he purchaſed with Money or Gifts; if he palliated the ſore, we ſhall find it break out again with greater violence. He is praiſed for his Bounty to the Poor; and his prudence is further taken notice of in this, that the Army he left ſubject to the directions of the Senate, and the Senate it ſelf ſo modeſt and unanimous, that though he left no Heir to the Imperial Title, and many members there were of it, who by reaſon of Birth and Intereſt might have had incouragement to ſet up for themſelves, yet in the election of a Succeſſor, there were no ſuch ambitious practiſes. Of his Religion, for which he is much revered, we are to ſpeak in another place; but in this of an Edict made by him concerning the Marriage of Senators, which having omitted in its proper Year (for it bears date in the Conſulſhip of Ætius and Studius) it will be here convenient enough to ſpeak of, as that which will not give any ill ſavour to the Aſhes of the dead, or caſt any blot upon his memory.

His Commendation.

Martiani Novel. 4. De Matrimoniis Senatorum. Dat prid. Non. April. Conſtantinop. Ætio & Studio Coſſ.

8. It was occaſioned by a Conſultation of Palladius the Præfectus Prætorio, who deſired an explanation of a Law made formerly by Conſtantine upon this Subject. He had ordained, that no Senator, Perfectiſſimus, Duumvir, Municipal Flamen, or Prieſt of a Province, ſhould take to Wife any Slave, the Daughter of a Slave, a Freed Woman, the Daughter of a Freed Woman; any one made a Roman Citizen, or Latine, a Stage-player; or the Daughter of a Stage-player; a Tabernaria, or Victualler, the Daughter of ſuch; of a Leno, or Brothel-Houſe-keeper, of an Arenarius, or Fencer; or ſuch a Woman that publickly kept any baſe Trade; and to theſe forbidden perſons added this, neither a mean nor abject perſon. Now it begate a great Diſpute in Courts of Judicature, whether by a mean and abject perſon any poor and obſcure Woman might be meant, however of free and ingenuous condition, and ſo the Law exclude ſuch from marrying with Senators. To remove the doubt, Martian declares it very abſurd to imagine, that honeſt poverty ſhould tend to any ones diſgrace; for as much as oftentimes ſlender fortunes have procured to very many perſons much Glory, and narrow eſtates have been “ the teſtimony of moderation. And who can, ſaith he, imagine that Conſtantine “ of famous memory, when he prohibited the Beds of Senators to be defiled with the “ filth of polluted Women, did prefer the gifts of fortune before the good things “ conferred by Nature: and put Ingenuity (or the ſtate of freedom) below Riches, “ which the variety of accidents may, as well take away as give; whereas that “ cannot be taken away if born with one. No, he who was the greateſt lover of “ what was decent, and a moſt ſacred Cenſor of manners, did judge theſe to be “ mean perſons, and unworthy of the Matrimony of Senators, whom, either the “ ugly blot of their Birth, or a life dedicated to ſome diſgraceful Trade, polluteth “ with ſordid marks, and, as it were, gives them a ſtain, either by reaſon of the “ filthineſs of their original, or the obſcenity of their profeſſion.

His interpretation of a Law of Conſtantine, concerning the Marriage of Senators.

9. Therefore to take away all doubts wherewith the minds of ſome perſons “ may be poſſeſſed: all theſe things remaining fixed and eſtabliſhed, which the “ Conſtitution of Conſtantine (divæ memoriæ) doth ordain, we judge and determine, “ that by a mean or inconſiderable woman, ſhall in no wiſe be underſtood one “ that is poor, yet born of Parents of free condition. But we ordain, that it may “ be lawful to Senators and others, enjoying the moſt ample Dignities to take in “ Wedlock ſuch as are born of ingenuous Parentage; although they be poor, and “ that wealth make no diſtance betwixt thoſe of free condition. And thoſe we eſteem “ to be mean and abject perſons only, which being reckoned up, and particularly “ expreſſed, the ſaid Law prohibits to be joyned to Senators, that is to ſay, a “ Slave, the Daughter of a Slave, one made free, and the Daughter of ſuch; one “ made a Roman or Latine Citizen; a Player, or the Daughter of a Player, a Tabernaria, “ or the Daughter of a Tabernarius, of a Leno, or Brothel-houſe-keeper, “ of an Arenarius, or one publickly profeſſing ſome ſordid employment. And this “ we believe was the meaning of Conſtantine in the Sanction which he publiſhed; “

Sect. 7.

A. D. 457.

and that he therefore inhibited theſe Marriages, leſt Senators ſhould be joyned “ not ſo much in Wedlock as in Vices with theſe Women. Moreover, what “ hath been ordained in Sacred Conſtitutions either by Conſtantine (of famous memory) “ or by other Divi Principes, concerning Natural Sons and their Mothers, “ of Concubines alſo of ingenuous condition, and concerning thoſe Women that “ were married after the death of the Wife, we command to be obſerved inviolably, “ yet ſo, as thoſe which were made later ſhall be of greater authority than the “ former, and whatſoever is behind in time ſhall be more valid in its Sanction. “ Therefore Palladius the Præfect, moſt dear to the Auguſti, thine illuſtrious and “ magnificent Authority, ſhall by thine Edicts expoſed to view, according to cuſtom, “ cauſe this Law of our Serenity, as that which ſhall be perpetually of “ force, to come to the knowledge of all Men. “

Leo choſen Emperor in the Eaſt.

Procopius.

10. Martian being dead, when a Conſultation was held about a new Emperor, Aſpar, by ſome ſaid to have compaſſed his end, endeavoured to prefer himſelf, but was rejected becauſe an Arian. He then being Magiſter Militum improved his intereſt in behalf of Leo a Tribune, a Thracian by birth, of the City Beſſica; or after his preferment pretended to have done ſo. For Leo was elected by the univerſal conſent of the Senate, and then crowned by Anatolius the Patriarch, being of the age of fifty three, or thereabout, as ſome pretend to gather from the twelfth Chapter of the ſecond Book of Evagrius. After his promotion he managed his matters very circumſpectly, and gained ſo great reputation, the Patrimony of a Prince, that neither Africk, Aſia, nor Perſia dared to diſturb him. And to keep Europe quiet, he thought it high time there ſhould be ſome worthy perſon advanced to be Emperor in the Weſt, and to this Dignity he reſolved to promote Majorianus, a Man of great Virtue and Wiſdom, whom having created on the laſt of February Magiſter Militum, he diſpatched away ſpeedily into Italy to take upon him the Empire, with his Letters Commendatory, and a Noble Train. Majorianus arrived in Italy above a Month after, and going to Ravenna, on the firſt day of April in a place called Ad Columellas, ſix Miles diſtant from the City, was by conſent of Emperor and Senate advanced to the Dignity of Auguſtus. Removing back to the City, he ſet himſelf ſeriouſly to order the Affairs of the Empire, and for that purpoſe made choice of the ableſt Miniſters the time afforded. To Ricimer he committed the Conduct of the Army, with the uſual Title of Magiſter Militum, for whom ſudden and unexpected work was ſhortly after cut out. For Genſerich could not yet be quiet in Africk, but rigged up a Fleet, and put to Sea with adventure to fall upon ſuch Coaſts as beſt convenience ſhould caſt it. Upon Campania he fell, and waſted it at his pleaſure. Majorianus, the better to match him upon both Elements, repaired the Imperial Navy, and got together as many Ships as he could, but as it were for another year. But to the Coaſts he ſent a ſtrong Body of Men, who were placed in ambuſh ſo as they might beſt repulſe the Rovers, and ſecure the Country People. The Moors landed, and leaving the Vandals on Board, ſet upon the Husbandmen at their Work, when the Romans riſing up fell on them, and eaſily put them to flight, and forced them to Mountains and other places of Refuge. The Vandals ſeeing this, were obliged in honour to relieve their Friends, and landing both Horſe and Foot, engaged with the Romans; but they were ſo warmly received, that they thought it beſt to retreat, and get them to their Ships again. This Victory was the more ſeaſonable and welcome, in that it was accompanied by another obtained by Burto againſt the Allemans. He being created Magiſter Militum by Majorianus, fell upon them as they were waſting Rhætia, and forced them alſo into their own Quarters.

Majorianus in the Weſt.

A. D. 458.
Leone & Majoriano A. A. Coſſ.

11. That which followed, or the CCCCLVIII Year of our Lord was ſignalized by the joint Conſulſhip of the two Emperors, Leo and Majorianus. On the firſt of January, or the Calends, Majorianus aſſumed the Title, and on the Ides, or the thirteenth, he directed an Oration, or a Letter, ot the Senate from Ravenna, which is ſtill extant among his other Novels, joyned to thoſe of Theodoſius, being placed the third in order, though it was the firſt in time. And the Title of it is, Concerning the manner or Rite of the Government of Divus Majorianus. Acknowledge, ſaith he, Conſcript Fathers, me now made Emperor by the pleaſure of your Election, and the Ordination of the moſt valiant Army. To the Ordination of all, may God be propitious, who increaſe the ſucceſſes of our “ Reign, for your and the publick utility; for I came to the Government not by “ mine own will, but by the obſequiouſneſs of publick Devotion; that I might “ not live to my ſelf alone, or for refuſal be judged ingrateful to the Common-wealth,

His Letter to the Senate.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 458.

His Letter to the Senate.

for which I was born. On the Calends dedicated to Janus we erected the Faſces of our happily aſſumed Conſulſhip, that the preſent year receiving the“ growths of our new born Empire, may be alſo ſignalized by our Name. Favour“ now the Prince you your ſelves have made, and partake with us in managing“ publick Affairs, that the Empire which was given me by your endeavours“ may be augmented through our common Conduct. Conclude you that“ Juſtice will flouriſh in our days, and Virtues may make a progreſs under the merit“ of Innocence. Let no Man ſtand in fear of Informers, whom, when private,“ we condemned, and now ſpecially do oppoſe. Let none be apprehenſive of Calumnies,“ but ſuch as are of his own raiſing. Watchful and diligent in Military“ Matters will we be, together with our Parent and Patritian Ricimer. Under“ God we will preſerve in ſafety the State of the Roman World, which by our“ common watchfulneſs we have freed both from a Common Enemy, and Domeſtick“ Miſchief. I think you ſufficiently know my Breeding, as in love to you,“ and formerly a companion in life and dangers, I eaſily promiſe my ſelf you do;“ but I ſhall ſtill indeavour in all publick matters, if God ſo pleaſe, by the authority“ of a Prince, and with the aſſiſtance of my Colleague, that of the choice“ you have made you ſhall have no cauſe to repent. We wiſh that in all happineſs“ you may continue moſt flouriſhing for many years. Farewel, Conſcript Fathers,“ of the moſt Sacred Order.

12. By this civil and obliging Letter he could not but pleaſe the Senate, but Words without Deeds will not long preſerve Reputation. He employed therefore his Quæſtor in other matters for reformation of Grievances, and the eaſe of the People, ſufficiently harraſſed in theſe troubleſome times, wherein the Provinces were ſtill afflicted either by Foreign Enemies, or Domeſtick: notwithſtanding it pleaſed God to raiſe up Deliverers now and then. The Provinces were very empty, and the Cities exhauſted by reaſon of Wars and other Diſorders, and the poor Provincials diſcouraged enough other ways, were ſo troubled with Compulſors about the payment of Tributes, that many forſook their Dwellings, and betook themſelves into ſolitary places. He conſidered, that to give redreſs to ſuch inconveniences, it would be requiſite to reinforce the cuſtom of chuſing the Defenſores plebis throughout the Cities, that by them he might be acquainted with their Grievances, without putting poor people to the charge and pain of coming up to Court. For this purpoſe he publiſhed an Edict, bearing date on the eighth“ of March, and directed to all Governors of Provinces, requiring them to cauſe“ ſuch Defenſors to be choſen in all the Cities of their ſeveral Juriſdictions. He“ commands them, that to this end they ſummon the wonted Aſſemblies of the“ Municipes, Honorati and Plebs, or common ſort, that in them may be fit Solicitors“ made of honeſt and deſerving Men, without any ſeeking or canvaſſing for“ the Imployment.“ One of the greateſt Grievances mentioned in this Edict, as motives to the publiſhing of it, is the violence and injuſtice of the Compulſors; and the authority of the Defenſors he thought might put ſome reſtraint upon them. But upon further conſideration he reſolved to take clear away their Imployment. And for this end the very next day he directed another Conſtitution to Palladius the Præfectus Prætorio, which contained a full and general Pardon and Remiſſion of“ all Dues whatſoever that were behind, belonging either to the Receit of him“ the ſaid Præfect, or either of the Treaſurers, from the beginning of the world“ to the beginning of this preſent eleventh Indiction. And becauſe the Poſſeſſors“ were terrified and frighted out of their Goods by the inſolence and power of“ Compulſors, he further ordain'd, that the Tributes, for the time to come, from“ the beginning of the twelfth Indiction, ſhould not be gathered by any Palatine,“ or any Miniſter of armed power, as he words it, but by the Officers of Governours“ of Provinces themſelves. In the laſt place, as he deſigns to give relief to“ the oppreſſed; ſo that the Revenue may not be impaired by the inſolence and“ contumacy of ſuch as are able to pay, or the Agents or Factors of great men, ſheltring“ themſelves under the greatneſs and protection of their Lords, he requires all“ ſuch Agents and Factors, as alſo them belonging to his own Domain, to make their“ appearance before the Governors of Provinces when they go their Circuits. In“ caſe of failure, if they bring not in their dues within the year, they ſhall be impriſoned,“ and pay the double of what they were behind.“

An Act of Grace.

Novel. Majoriani 5.

Novel. Majoriani, 4. Dat. 7. Id. Mart.

The Suarii of Rome excepted out of it.

13. The only perſons excepted out of this Act of Grace and Pardon were the Suarii of Rome, and that for this reaſon, that nothing might be diminiſhed of the plenty belonging to the venerable City. As he eſteem'd her venerable, he was put in mind this Summer of a matter,which, if ſuffered to proceed,would have much taken off from her Veneration. After ſuch time as ſhe had been waſted by the Goths, it had become a cuſtom to fetch Stones and other materials as were neceſſary for repairing of the publick Buildings from her ancient Works; and after the late Diſaſter which happened from the Vandals ſome private perſons made bold to apply them to their own uſes. Out of his Deteſtation of ſuch practiſes, tending ſo much to the defacing of the Beauty of the Place, in an Edict inſcribed to Æmilianus the Præfectus Prætorio, dated alſo at Ravenna on the tenth of July, he for-“ bade that Temples or other Monuments which had been raiſed by the Ancients“ for publick uſe or pleaſure, ſhould be touched in ſuch manner, inflicting upon any Judge that ſhould give ſuch order a Mulct of fifty pounds of Gold; and Stripes, “ with the loſs of Hands upon ſuch Apparitors or Numerarii as ſhould obey ſuch Or-“ ders, and not withſtand them by a ſeaſonable ſuggeſtion. All ſuch begged Ma-“ terials he will have reſtored. And in caſe any old Monument be paſt repairing, “ and it be convenient to employ the Stones, Timber or the like, upon ſome other “ Fabrick; this he will not have done till the matter be firſt ſignified to the Senate,“ and if the Senate approve of it, then communicated to himſelf. For further ſet-“ tlement of Civil Matters this Year, he publiſhed another Edict directed to“ Baſilius the Præfectus Prætorio concerning Curiales, and agnation or alienation of“ Lands, and diverſe other Affairs. For calling back the Curiales to their Charges, “ he allows it, provided it be within thirty years. As for the Collegiati, he confirms“ what had been ordained concerning them in a Conſtitution contained in the Body“ of Theodoſius his Code. This is ſet the firſt Novel of Majorianus, as we have“ them joyned to the ſaid Code; but bears Date of the ſixth of November.

Novel Majoriani, 6. Dat. 6. Id. Jul.

Old Works in Rome prohibited to be demoliſhed.

14. Majorianus providing thus as well as he could for reformation of Civil Matters, thought he ſhould not approve himſelf as a complete Prince and Governor, except he employed his Sword as well as his Pen. He thought it would make a great acceſſion to his Glory, if he could but recover Africk out of the Hands of the Vandals, who as yet ſeemed not well warm in their Seats. His deſire this way ſo far tranſported him,that having put on Board of a good Fleet,as conſiderable an Army; that he might diſcover the ſtate of that Country, and how the Inhabitants ſtood affected to the Roman Intereſt, he is ſaid to have diſguiſed himſelf, and pretending to be ſent as Ambaſſador from the Emperor, in order to a peace, he went to Genſerich,was well received by him,and when he had had the ſatiſfaction of ſeeing his Treaſure and Magazine, he returned to his Army, and with it went and laid Siege to Carthage. He omitted nothing he thought would conduce to the taking of it, but fell ſick during the Siege, which therefore proving ineffectual, and without ſucceſs, he was glad to carry back his Army: notwithſtanding all the fine words of Sidonius Apollinaris, at the concluſion of his Panegyrick, who ominates him Victory from all Quarters of the World, particularly that the Moor might grow white or pale with fear, Suſa might tremble, and the Bactrians being firſt diſarmed, might attend his Judgment-Seat. However the Emperor ſucceeded, the Poet failed not of ſucceſs. For he was honoured with two Crowns or Garlands, and with a Statue in the Forum of Trajan, as he himſelf witneſſeth in an Epiſtle to Firminus. Indeed he was a very good Poet conſidering the Age he lived in, and ſought to imitate Claudian, but non paſſibus æquis. He married the Daughter of Avitus the Emperor, and was of great Nobility himſelf, being a Gall of that part of the Country called now Auvergne, which the Arverni of old inhabited, a moſt powerful Nation amongſt the Celtæ, to the whole community of whom it was wont to give Kings, and with its Confederates, to ſend out againſt the Romans ſometimes two hundred thouſand, otherwhiles four hundred thouſand Men. His Father had been Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, as he could remember, though then a Youth.

Majorianus in vain beſiegeth Carthage.

——Maurusque timore, Albus eat ſic Suſa tremant, &c.

Lib. 9. ep. 16. Vide Philibertum Monetum in Geographia Galliæ. p. 206.

15. In the Eaſt this Year we hear little of Leo, but what relates to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; yet though he had no preſent uſe for his Soldiers, he thought fit they ſhould be in readineſs upon any Exigent. But he took notice how many of them, though they received publick pay, betook themſelves to other Imployments, which drew forth an Act of State, dated on the ſixth of July, to Aſpar, the Magiſter Militum, wherein he declares, that Soldiers who are armed and maintained by the Commonwealth ought to be occupied only in things relating to the publick utility; neither“ travel in the tillage of Land, keeping of Cattel, or in Traffick, but labour in the“ Imployments belonging to their Warfare. He charges him, that for the future“ he ſuffer no Soldier to be concerned in ſuch matters, but be frequent at their Colours, Leo commands Soldiers to attend Military Affairs alone.

L. 15. de Re Militari, Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 36.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 458.

lours, by the dayly exerciſe of their Arms to prepare themſelves for War. If any “ of the Military Judges ſhould depute any of them to ſerve in publick Houſes, “ or Lands contrary to this Imperial Order, or in other ſervices, as well ſuch Offendor “ as he that receives the man ſhall for every Soldier forfeit a pound of Gold, “ and that preſently to be levied. “ This Law bears date this Year, as we ſaid, and the next that follows in order in the Code is much to the ſame purpoſe, though it hath no date of either day or year; but it is ſaid to be of Leo's making, and directed to Dioſcorus. It alſo prohibits Military Men to take upon them Civil “ Cares; or if they have ſo done, they ſhall be deprived preſently of the Military “ Service, and all Privileges, and incur the Emperor's Diſpleaſure.

L. 16. ejuſd. tit.

A terrible Earthquake at Antioch.

16. But another thing happened this Year, which the Citizens of Antioch had ſad cauſe to remember. Evagrius writes, that in the ſecond Year of the Reign of Leo a great Earthquake fell out at that City. That before it began, ſome of the Inhabitants were ſeiſed with extraordinary madneſs, ſuch as ſeemed to exceed all Ferity of wild Beaſts, and to be the Prelude to that Calamity which followed on the fourth day of the Month Gorpiæus, which the Romans called September, about the fourth hour of the Night, and the fifty ſixth year of the life of Leo. It overturned almoſt all the Buildings of the new City, which was well peopled, and none of it forſaken or empty, being curiouſly built by the Magnificence of Emperors, who ſtrove to exceed each others in the adornment of it. The firſt and ſecond Fabricks alſo in the Palace were caſt down, the reſt ſtanding, together with a Bath, which having formerly been neglected, now when by the Earthquake the reſt were choaked up, ſtood the Citizens in very good ſtead. The Porticus's before the Palace were alſo overturned, the Palace called Tetraphylon, the Turrets of the Cirque near the Gates, together with certain Porticus's which led from them, and ſome part of the Baths of Trajan, Severus and Adrian; ſome of the Neighbourhood called Oſtracina, together with the Porticus's and the Nymphæum; the particulars of which were related by one John a Rhetorician. This Writer farther delivered, how the Emperor being troubled with a ſenſe of the Calamity, forgave the City in Tributes to the value of a thouſand Talents of Gold, as alſo to the Inhabitants their Tolls; and how alſo he took care of the rebuilding of the publick places. Thus much Evagrius probably tells us concerning the manner and time of the Earthquake, which he aſſigns to the ſecond of the Reign, and the fifty ſixth of this preſent Emperor. But whereas he placeth it in the five hundred and ſixth after the name given to the City, and at the three hundred and forty ſeventh after the Earthquake, which happened in the days of Trajan; let others conſider of his Chronology.

A. D. 459.

Ricimere & Patritio Coſſ.

17. We are more certain that now we arrive at the ordinary CCCCLIX Year of our Lord, and yet ſome have erred, as to the Conſulſhip. For Sigonius makes Ricimer the Patritian to have been Conſul alone; but the Faſti and other Books have it Ricimer and Patritius. The miſtake lay in taking Patritius for an addition of that Honour, and not for the proper name of a Man, and the Conjunction Copulative being wanting, ſuch an error might eaſily be committed by one that did not conſult ſeveral Copies. But that which puts us out of doubt, is the Date of a Law made this Year by Leo, concerning the Inſinuation or regiſtring of Donations. It bears date on the third of March from Conſtantinople, Patricius and Ricimer being Conſuls: it's directed to Conſtantine the Præfect, and imports that “ in Conſtantinople all ingroſſed Donations of things whereſoever they lie ſhall be re“giſtred by the Magiſter Cenſus. In other Cities, whether the Governor of the “ Province be preſent or abſent, whether the City have Magiſtrates or not, and “ there be only a Defenſor; the Donor ſhall have free power to publiſh the Donati“ons of his Goods or Eſtates whereſoever lying, either in the Court of the Govern“or of the Province, in the Office of the Magiſtrates, or of the Defenſor of each “ City, as he himſelf ſhall pleaſe. As the Donation it ſelf is founded upon the “ meer will of the Donor; ſo it is declared lawful for him to intimate his Donation “ where he ſhall pleaſe in the forenamed places: and ſuch Donations ſo publiſhed “ and inſinuated in divers Provinces and Cities ſhall be of firm and perpetual “ ſtrength and value. “ The latter part of this Conſtitution was afterward abrogated by Anaſtaſius, who would have all Donations to be regiſtred by the Magiſtri Cenſus only; for their more certainty.

Leo publiſheth a Law for the Regiſtring of Donations.

L. 30. De Donationibus, Cod. Juſt. lib. 8. tit. 54.

D. 32. ejuſd. tit.

A. D. 460.

Magno & Apollonio Coſſ.

18. The CCCCLX Year of our Lord ſucceeds, known by the Conſulſhip of Magnus and Apollonius, and for very little elſe, except it be another Law made this Year by Leo, concerning the number and Sons of Advocates, what perſons they ſhould

Sect. 7.

A. D. 460.

Concerning the Number of Advocates.

L. 11. De Advocatis diverſorum Judiciorum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 7.

ſhould be, and how created. It bears date on the Calends of February, and is directed to Vinian the Præfectus Prætorio, whoſe Court being furniſhed with one hundred and fifty Advocates, it prohibits him to add any more to them under pretence of taking in Aſſeſſors. And for the time to come, when there ſhall be occaſion “ to make any new ones, it ſhall not be done except firſt in the examination “ of the Governour of the Province, it be recorded in what Province he was born, “ and that it appear that he is not obnoxious to the ſtate and condition of a Cohortalis. “ If the Governor of the Province be not to be come at, it ſhall be done before “ the Defenſor of the Town. Beſides the Profeſſors of Law ſhall ſwear upon Record, “ that theſe their Scholars, whom they would have preferred, are furniſh'd with “ ſufficient knowledge of the Law. The Sons of Advocates ſhall be preferred “ before other Supernumeraries. And in concluſion, ſuch as ſhall be found to be above “ the number of an hundred and fifty, in this Court may be allowed to plead “ before the Proconſul, the Præfectus Auguſtalis, the Comes of the Eaſt, the Vicars, “ or before the Governors of Provinces. “

A. D. 461.

Severino & Dagalaipho Coſſ.

19. In the next, or the CCCCLXI of our Saviour, Severinus and Dagalaiphus were Conſuls. It's too memorable in this one thing, that Majorianus the Emperor was now murdered at Dertona. He had the Year before thoughts of renewing the War againſt the Vandals: which, that he might do with more ſucceſs, he procured the Goths to joyn with him by virtue of the League contracted with them, which ſtruck Genſerich with ſuch apprehenſion, that he deſired peace. Majorianus having no work now in the South, turned himſelf Northward, and went into Gall to ſettle matters in that Province. Here from Sidonius Apollinaris we learn that he celebrated the Circenſian Games at Arles, and made a magnificent Entertainment to his great Officers, at which, the Relator himſelf was one of the Gueſts. On the left Side, or Horn, as he calls it, lay Severinus the Ordinary Conſul, a Man, he ſaith, amongſt the great Stirs and Commotions of Princes, and in the unequal ſtate of the Common-wealth, ever of equal Grace and Favour. Next to him Magnus, formerly Expræfect, now Exconſul, a perſon equalling his doubled Honors. Camillus, his Brother's Son, lay behind him, who by paſſing thorow two Dignities himſelf, had added luſtre to the Proconſulſhip of his Father, and the Conſulſhip of his Uncle. Pæonius was placed next to him, and after him Athenius, a Man of Law, exerciſed in the variety of times: Gratianenſis was the next, who, though in Dignity he came below Severinus, yet preceded him in Favour. And below all lay Sidonius, then Comes, the Title the Emperor gave him in their merry Diſcourſe, which, though he relates, it is not pertinent for us therein to follow him, though thus much, to take notice of the perſons in favour at this time, and their manner of eating, ſtill the ſame with the ancient Roman, of lying upon Beds. But there wanted other perſons, which, had they been at this Entertainment, Majorianus might have had cauſe to be more merry. For while he was abſent, compoſing the Affairs of Gall, a Conſpiracy was hatched againſt him by Ricimer and Severus, both Patritians, who agreed, that Ricimer ſhould deprive him of his life, and Severus ſeiſe upon his Empire; for the Barbarian, as ſome believe, had not the confidence to aſſume the Purple himſelf. In the mean time Majorianus, that he might not be idle, indeavoured to drive the Alans out of Gall, being nothing ſo ſtrong either as the Franks or Burgundians, but they to divert him, invaded Italy, which he was then obliged to relieve. This gave advantage to the Conſpirators; for when the Emperor was come to Dertona, Ricimer either ſent for, or without orders, there met him with the Forces under his command, and compelling him firſt to put off the Purple, in concluſion murdered him at the River Hyra, to the utter Ruine of the Weſtern Empire. The Empire indeed had long been in a dying condition; but ſo great were the Abilities and Induſtry of Majorianus, that ſhe gave hope of Recovery under his Hand, though he being removed, it proved but a lightſomeneſs before her death. The Feat being done, Ricimer returned to Ravenna, and there the Soldiers, being prepared before hand, created Severus Emperor, without any Orders received from Conſtantinople.

Majorianus ſettles Matters in Gall.

Lib. 1. ep. 11. ad Montium.

Murdered by Ricimer.

Severus Emperor.

A. D. 462.

Leone A. 2. & Severo Coſſ.

20. The Year following, Severus invaded the Conſulſhip, as he had done the Empire, and bore the Title, together with Leo, who now took it the ſecond time, in the CCCCLXII Year of our Lord. And little elſe beſide their Conſulſhip this Year is notable; or if any thing of great moment happened, it is buried in oblivion for want of ſome faithful Hiſtorian to tranſmit the Records. Yet we are told, that now Genſerich renewed his Hoſtility againſt the Iſlands of the Empire, and raged according to his wonted Luſt and Pleaſure; and that Ricimer op-

UMI

Sect. 7.

A. D. 462.

poſed him as he found, or thought convenient. Theodorich, King of the Goths, on the other ſide was impatient of the Repoſe he had lately enjoyed from War, and to work he went with Ravennius, a great Officer of Severus in thoſe parts, whom he ſo wrought upon, that he betrayed into his hands the noble and wealthy City of Narbone. And about this matter a great War is reported to have followed in Gall, and a meer inarticulate Report there is of it, nothing certain as to particular Councils or Accidents, being known. A ſuitable Story we have of the Country Men of Theodorich, being Goths of the Eaſt, or Oſtrogoths, who had their Seat at preſent in Pannonia. Their Kings had covenanted with Martian the late Emperor for a certain ſum of Money to content themſelves, and ſit down without any farther Attempts, for mending their fortunes; but this Money, Leo, who now reigend at Conſtantinople, forgot, or to be ſure omitted to pay them. Yet were they ſo good natured, and ſo obedient to the Law of Nations, though ſtill accounted Barbarians, that they would not make War before they had denounced it, nor denounce it till they had firſt complained, and demanded juſt ſatisfaction. They ſent their Ambaſſadors to Leo, who coming to Court, found not that Reception they expected; but on the contrary they found one of their Nation of the Goths, Theodorich, the Son of Triarius, flouriſhing there in great favour and ſplendor, with a noble Train, and ſuitable allowance. They returned with indignation, and communicated it with the report of their Embaſſy to theſe that ſent them, who took it in diſdain, that they ſhould be thought inferior to him as to Dignity. Acted by the heat of this paſſion, they invaded Illyricum, and put thoſe Territories of the Eaſtern Empire into ſuch Diſtreſs, that Leo, fearful whither their animoſity might proceed, made them amends, and quieted their minds by Ambaſſadors of his own, by paying the Arrears of their Penſion, and ingaging for the future to do it; by which courſe the peace was renewed, and for an Hoſtage thereof he received from them another Theodorich, the Son of Theodomir; who ſo improved his time in the knowledge both of Peace and War, that hereafter we ſhall hear abundantly of this Improvement.

The Oſtrogoths tumultuous.

A. D. 463. Vibiano & Baſilio Coſſ.

Baſilius now Conſul.

21. The Year CCCCLXIII is ſomewhat enobled by the Conſulſhip of Vibian and Baſilius. For this is that Cecina Baſilius to whom Sidonius Apollinaris gives ſo large an Encomium in one of his Epiſtles written to his Heronius. He compares him with one Avienus, who alſo bore this Dignity, and both of them flouriſhed in great favour at Court, when he was employed thither upon publick buſineſs by his Country-men the Arverni. He ſhews how his firſt application was to Paulus a Præfectorian (or one who had been Præfect) by whoſe direction he was to make choice of ſome more powerful Miniſter to manage his Affair. The deliberation was to be ſhort, there being but few out of whom he could make it. Indeed of the Senate at that time moſt of the Members were conſiderable for wealth, high in Birth, grave for Age, in their Conſultations uſeful, and men of greateſt preferments; but theſe two Conſulares were moſt eminent viz. Gennadius Avienus and Cecina Baſilius, who of all Gowned Men were of greateſt authority, next to the Prince. Theſe were men of extraordinary parts, yet various in their humors, and like to each other rather in their Genius, than their Ingenuity. Avienus arrived at the Conſulſhip by his Felicity; and Baſilius by his Virtue, inſomuch that the haſte made to Honors by the former was merrily talked of; and they diſcourſed of the number of Imployments paſſed thorow, and the many years paſſed over by the later. Both of them when they went abroad were attended by numerous Clients, but of ſuch Attendants the hopes and ſpirit was much different. Avienus employed his whole intereſt in promoting his Sons, Sons in Law, and his Brethren, and being always accompanied with Domeſtick Candidates, was not able to gratifie Strangers; but what Avienus did for his own Relations, that Baſilius did for thoſe to whom he had no Relation. The mind of Avienus was open to all, and that at the firſt ſight, but to little or no purpoſe: the heart of Baſilius to few, and long it was before, but with more advantage. Neither of them was difficult of acceſs, or uſed ſtate; but if you were to make uſe of them you ſhould find more eaſie familiarity in Avienus, and more ready aſſiſtance in Baſilius. Thus much, and more, about his own Buſineſs, Sidonius wrote ſometime after, concerning our Conſul, then a Conſularis, in whom being Superior, in thoſe good qualities, to Avienus, the Family of the Corvini, he ſaith, was preferred before that of the Decii.

Lib. 1. ep. 9.

His Encomium.

Sed inter hos quoque quanquam ſtupendi, tamen varii mores & genii potiùs quam ingenii ſimilitudo.

He was alſo Præfect this Year.

22. But as Baſilius bore the Office of Conſul this Year, ſo that he executed that of Præfect, as he had done formerly, and to it had joyned the Honour of Patritian appears

Sect. 7.

A. D. 463.

He was alſo Præfect this Year.

Novel. Severi 1.

Leo makes Zeno his Vicegerent.

appears from a Law of Severus directed to him on the tenth before the Calends of March with theſe Titles. This was for repealing ſome thing ordained four years before by Majorianus concerning Widdows, and leaving them to the direction of former Laws, ſo as after the Death of their Husbands they ſhould " only have the Uſusfructus of what was ſettled upon them, and of that diſpoſe as " they pleaſed, but not of the main ſtock, nor to this or that Child, as they " thought fit: yet ſhould they not be bound to give ſecurity to their Children, this " ſeeming grievous and unreaſonable; for it ſufficed, that if they married again, " their Husbands Eſtates became engaged, if not what they poſſeſſed otherwiſe " was obnoxious in caſe of imbezelment, as by this and former Ordinances was provided." In the Eaſt, Leo, it's ſaid, made Zeno, his Son-in-law, his Deputy, as it were, or Vicegerent. And little elſe of Civil Concernment we find tranſacted at Conſtantinople, except it be an Edict directed to Euſebius, the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, dated on the ſame day as the other of Severus. This gives him the choice of the Fiſcal Advocate, who now ſhould continue for two years, and " not be annual as lately had been practiſed: and it confirms to rhe Body of Advocates all privileges granted to them by former Princes.

A. D. 464. Ruſtico & Olybrio Coſſ.

Ricimer deſpiſeth Severus.

23. The following Year is characteriſed by the Conſulſhip of Ruſticus and Olybrius, being the CCCCLXIV of the Ordinary Æra of our Saviour. Italy had been the former Year in repoſe; but in Gall the Barbarous Nations made great diſturbance. For Theodorich, King of the Goths managed his matters with ſuch induſtry, that it provoked Beorgor, King of the Alans, who then inhabited alſo part of that Country to ſuch emulation, or fear, that gathering conſiderable Forces together, he paſſed over the Alpes this Winter, and invading Liguria, left nothing untouched, which the power of his Arms could reach. This gave ſuch Allarm to the Southern parts, that Ricimer was ordered with what Force he could make, to oppoſe the Growth of this Calamity. And he did it to ſuch purpoſe, that we are told, that no Expedition had better ſucceeded to the Roman Intereſt a long time before. For attacking the Barbarians at Bergomum, on the ſixth of February, he not only defeated their Army, but killed their King in Battel. But whether this happened well or ill for the Empire cannot well be ſaid; for the Emperor it did not. For, the General having formerly taken audaciouſly upon him to unmake and make Princes at his pleaſure, now more puffed up with pride upon his ſucceſs, began to deſpiſe Severus, as one of his own ſetting up.

A dreadful Fire at Conſtantinople.

A. D. 465. Baſiliſco & Herminerico Coſſ.

Lib. 2. *c.*13.

24. The next following, or the CCCCLXV is more, or rather too much conſiderable both for the effect of the pride of Ricimer, and another very ſad calamity which now happened. For this Year in the Conſulſhip of Baſiliſcus and Herminerich ſo great a Fire there was at Conſtantinople, as never was exceeded except by that which happened here lately at London. This Calamity, if Evagrius be judge, was far more grievous than the former Earthquake. It began in that part of the City lying near the Sea, and called the Ox-ſtreet. He tells us of a report, how a wicked and malicious Devil in the form of a Woman, or a certain poor Woman at the inſtigation of the Devil, in the Twilight, going to the Market with a Candle in her Hand to buy Fiſh, left it on the Stall, and went her way. That the flame of the Candle taking hold on Flax, kindled ſo exceeding great a Fire, that in a moment it conſumed the Buildings in the Market Place, and catched hold of the Houſes adjoyning, not only ſuch as might eaſily be ſet on fire, but the Structures alſo raiſed of Stone, and conſumed them to Aſhes. The Conflagration by ſome is reported to have laſted four days, by others ſix, and none being able to put a ſtop to it, it brake through the middle of the City, conſumed from the Northern to the Southern Quarter all Buildings, for five Furlongs in length, and fourteen in breadth, left no Houſes, either publick or private, Pillars, Arches of Stone, or Vaults unburnt to the very Foundations, piercing Flint and the hardeſt Mettals as eaſily, as if they had been Stubble or Straw. On the North Side towards the Haven, a lamentable Deſolation was to be ſeen from the Ox-ſtreet to the Old Temple of Apollo; on the South from the Haven of Julian to the Temple of Concord; in the middle of the City from the Forum of Conſtantine to that of Taurus: a moſt dreadful ſight. The goodly Edifices that had ſtood ſtately to behold, the coſtly carved Timber heretofore very Majeſtical to the eye, were now, if any thing remained, become like craggy Hills and Rocks; ſo that no paſſage could be found for heaps of deformed Rubbiſh; neither could the owners themſelves diſcern the Bounds of their Poſſeſſions; nor ſay, that this is that which ſtood thus or thus before the Fire cauſed this diſmal alteration.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 465.

Other prodigious Calamities.

25. About the ſame time (this Writer continuing the ſeries of Calamities adds) when that Scythian War raged, which was moved againſt ſuch Romans as inhabited the Eaſtern Parts of the Empire, Thrace, the Helleſpont, and Ionia were wonderfully ſhaken with Earthquakes. And no leſs diſtreſſed were the Cyclades, as alſo the Iſlands Cnidus and Coos, wherein many Buildings were overturned. More[a]over Priſcus wrote, that at Conſtantinople, and in Bithynia there fell ſuch Storms of Rain, that for the ſpace of three or four days it poured down like whole Streams or Floods, the violence whereof beat down and levelled Mountains, the Villages were reduced near to ruine, and in the Lake Boane, not far from Nicomedia, by reaſon of the Dirt and Filth thither by the Waters conveyed, there appeared Iſlands. But theſe things came to paſs afterward. Yet as ill accidents either in morality or otherwiſe, ordinarily give occaſion to wholſome Laws, Leo was ſo concerned at this dreadful Fire, as he publiſhed a Conſtitution concerning Buildings at Conſtantinople, to prevent the like. This Conſtitution is not now extant, neither could we have certainly known what it was, but that Zeno his Succeſſor ſome years after, finding the Building of the City to go ſlowly on, by reaſon of controverſies ariſing about the interpretation of ſome part of it, was forced to publiſh a new Edict, directed to Adamantius the then Præfect, which being penned in Greek, inſtead of interpretation,received rather obſcurity from ſeveral who attempted the publication in ſeveral Editions of the Code, till it was undertaken by the Learned Contius.

[a] Idem cap. 14.

Leo publiſheth a Conſtitution for rebuilding of Conſtantinople.

26. Adamantius having made report of the Inconveniences ariſing from the ambiguity of that aforeſaid Conſtitution, received anſwer, that ſince ſuch time as the Emperor had enjoyed peace, being deſirous every way to ſecure his Subjects, as well from internal as external Quarrels, he had applied his mind to the making “ of various Laws, amongſt which he would alſo have this received, which ſhould “ clearly and plainly demonſtrate, both what his Magnificence had ſuggeſted, and “ define moſt cautiouſly all ambiguities. That he had not much receded from “ words of civil ſignification, but uſed the more known amongſt the vulgar, ſo “ that whoever ſhould light upon it needed not the help of an Interpreter. That “ from the Relation of his Greatneſs, he had underſtood how the Divine Law of his “ Father Leo of immortal memory, which he had made in relation to thoſe that would build in that glorious City, was ambiguous in ſome of its parts by reaſon of the naughty opinions of Interpreters. With this Preface he introduceth the Law it ſelf which declares.

L. 12. de Ædificiis privatis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 8. tit. 10.

Interpreted afterward by Zeno.

27. In the firſt place that ſuch as would rebuild their Houſes ſhall not ex- “ ceed the ancient form (neither any ſhall build upon new Foundations) “ neither take away light or proſpect from their Neighbours contrary to what “ of late had been ordained. But in caſe of any ſtipulation or agreement whereby “ leave is obtained to do either, or both, it ſhall be lawful to ſuch perſons to “ make uſe freely of ſuch Agreement. But whereas the former Con- “ ſtitution, where it required that the diſtance of twelve Feet ſhould be obſerved “ by Builders betwixt one Houſe and another, adding theſe words More or Leſs, “ and ſo by a doubt ſeemed to take away an Ambiguity; to remove all ſuch doubt “ and ambiguity both, he expreſly requires, that twelve Feet be left, to be meaſured “ from the Foundations, and the ſame diſtance to be obſerved, as to the reſt of the “ Building to the very top. Any one obſerving this Rule, may build as high as he “ pleaſeth, and make what Windows he thinks fit, either for light or proſpect. “ Provided, that no man ſhall have liberty to intercept the direct proſpect of his “ Neighbour to the Sea, which his Houſe formerly afforded him, ſitting or ſtand- “ ing. And as for Gardens and Trees, he reſolves to add nothing to what formerly “ had been Law. If ſo be, that the Ground was ſuch, that the Houſes could not be built at twelve Feet diſtance, then ſhould not the Buildings be at all raiſed high- “ er than formerly, except at leaſt a diſtance of ten Feet were left; neither ſhould “ any proſpective Windows be made, except they had been formerly in uſe. But “ Windows for light might be made at ſix foot diſtance, without any falſe pave- “ ment,or ſlight uſed for inlarging them more than they ought to be.

28. As in the former Conſtitution was enacted, he gives leave for Houſes that “ were to be rebuilt, to be raiſed an hundred foot high, though they do intercept “ the proſpect of the Neighbours into the Sea. And farther declares, that if a “ ſpace of an hundred Feet be left between, it ſhall be lawful to build either upon “ old, or new Foundations to an height that may take away ſuch proſpect. And “ from Kitchins and other places of conveniency and paſſages it may be free to take “ away ſuch proſpect, though the Buildings be raiſed within an hundred Feet, ſo as “ the ſpace of twelve be preſerved, and within the ſpace of twelve too, if it be done “ by agreement of the Parties. For Bow Windows or Lattices made to receive “ Light, called Solaria, and Balconies, called Mæniana ; he forbids the former to be “ built of Wood and Boards alone, but after the manner of thoſe called Romanenſia. Commands that ten Feet be left betwixt thoſe that ſtand one againſt another, or “ oppoſite ; and if this cannot be by reaſon of the ſtraitneſs of places, that then “ they be not built oppoſite, but tranſverſe one to another : o if the paſſage it “ ſelf betwixt exceed not ten Feet, then ſhall no Solaria, or Mæniana at all be “ raiſed. Moreover ſuch as ſhall be built according to due form ſhall be fifteen “ foot raiſed from the Ground, and their Pillars, whether of Wood or Stone ſhall “ not riſe perpendicular, neither their Walls, leſt the Air or High Ways be ſtopped. “ For prevention of Fire he prohibits Stairs to be raiſed from the ground of “ narrow places to mount up to them. If ſuch forbidden Works be done, they ſhall “ not only be demoliſhed ; but the owners of them ſhall incur a Fine of ten pounds “ of Gold, and the Architect or Undertaker ten, and if poor, ſhall be baniſhed “ the City.

29. In the the next place he prohibits, that the places betwixt the Pillars in “ the ſtanding Rows in the Porticus's and Stations, betwixt the Milium and Capitol, “ be choaked up with Buildings, ſolid Boards, or other things. That the Edifices “ permitted to be there, in breadth exceed ſix Feet, the Wall toward the “ Street being therein compriſed, and in heighth ſeven. To be ſure, he will “ have free paſſage lie through the four Ranks of Pillars from the Porticus's to the “ Streets, and the Shops there built to be adorned at leaſt on the outſide with Marble, “ ſo as may conduce to the Beauty of the City, and delight of Paſſengers. In “ other Regions he leaves it free for Shops to be raiſed betwixt the Pillars, as ſhall “ ſeem profitable to the City, and convenient to the Præfect, all equality being obſerved, “ ſo as what is permitted to one be not prohibited to another. This he “ would have practiſed to prevent Machinations and Deſigns of Calumniators againſt honeſt and well-meaning men. For he cannot but take notice how many are ſued “ out of envy and contention, rather than for any real injury done, and forced to “ leave off their Building, and ſpend their Money at Law which had been laid aſide “ for that purpoſe, and though they had obtain'd a ſentence, yet ſtill to be hindered “ from proceeding, by force of an Appeal, and expectation of the fatal Days, “ to no other purpoſe than that their Adverſaries may take pleaſure in their Diſappointments.

30. To prevent ſuch miſchief, he declares, that in ſuch caſes where Appeal lies, as ſoon as the cauſe is tranſmitted in Writing to the Judge, it ſhall be lawful “ for either party, without obſerving the ordinary time of introducing Appeals, “ either with his Adverſary, or alone, to repair to the Court of him the Præfect, “ and the Adverſary being called, if abſent, to put an end to the controverſie without “ delay, leſt Winter coming on, by expectation of an endto be put to long continued “ Appeals, intolerable Damages be ſuſtained. But in caſe any will appeal from “ ſentence of the Præfect, a Conſultation, as they call it, ſhall inſtantly be made, “ (viz. a ſort of Appeal.) for a more accurate conſideration of the ſentence ; and “ that with ſpeed in the Emperor's Palace. And he will have all ſuch as give any “ hinderance to Builders to know, that if they fail in their cauſe, they ſhall both “ make other juſt reparation for the loſs, and pay the value of ſuch materials as “ have been ſpoiled by delay of the ſuit. In like manner, ſuch as have preſumed unjuſtly to build, if they be caſt, ſhall make reparation to thoſe that prohibited “ their Attempt. “

Παρηνῆμα τὴν καλȣμένην Conſultatiora γίνεϑαι.

31. All Controverſies hence ariſing he will have determined before the Præfect “ alone (in ordinary courſe) neither ſhall any of the Illuſtrious Magiſtrates hear “ any of theſe Cauſes, nor any perſon concerned be permitted by preſcription of “ Militia or Forum, to evade the Judgment given, or to eſcape the Condemnation, “ as to Coſts and Damages, made by award of the moſt glorious Præfect of the “ City, or a Cognitor deputed by him. He gives it in charge to his Magnificence, “ that no Undertaker, Carpenter, or other Artificer leave any work imperfect “ that he hath once begun, but that, receiving his juſt pay, he be conſtrained to “ bring it to perfection ; or elſe make full ſatisfaction for all Damages to the party “ concerned in the Building. And if he be ſo poor as not to be able to go through “ with it, he ſhall be beaten with Rods, and baniſhed the City. “

32. But if any perſon will perfect what hath been begun by another, he ſhall “

A. D. 465.

in no wiſe be hindered from ſo doing, as hath been practiſed heretofore by cer-“ tain Artificers and Uundertakers, who would neither make an end of what they “ had begun themſelves, nor ſuffer others to do it, to the intolerable loſs of thoſe “ who were concerned to have their Houſes built. In the laſt place, if any refuſe “ to perfect a Work meerly upon this Account, becauſe another had begun it, he “ ſhall incur the ſame penalty as he that quitted it imperfect.“ This is the Conſtitution of Zeno made to explain that of Leo, and remove thoſe Rubs that lay in the way, and hindered the Rebuilding of Conſtantinople, the prudence and ſeaſonableneſs whereof were better to be diſcerned at that time when the motives were better known and diſcerned. But it was thought ſo proper and fit afterwards by Juſtinian, that when objection was made, that it was local and appropriate to the City of Conſtantinople, by a Reſcript directed to John the Præfect, he declared it to be of force alſo in the Provinces, and that it ſhould be obſerved for Law “ by the reſpective Governors.“ And after his time, as by the Baſilica appears, it continued to be of the ſame force, what concerns the proſpect to the Sea excepted, which only held at Conſtantinople, and the places adjoyning. This is chiefly to be obſerved, that according to this manner of Building, for prevention of Fires the Houſes were Inſular, as it was termed, and if poſſible, diſtant twelve Feet one from another.

The Law declared univerſal by Juſtinian.

L.13.ejuſd. tit. Dal.Cal.Septem. poſt Conſul. Lampadii & Oreſtis. A. D. 531.

33. This Conflagration at Conſtantinople was very great and terrible, but a miſchief greater than it raged in the Weſt, which brought ruine and deſolation both to many Countries and Cities. This was that impudent and ſawcy boldneſs of the great Officers, particularly now of Ricimer, who took upon him to make and unmake Emperors at his pleaſure, which being frequently done; the Enemies of the Empire took heart and occaſion to exerciſe their Hoſtilities; for if a Man of Courage and Reſolution arrived at the ſupreme power they concluded his Reign would be but ſhort, and the obſtacle ere long removed. Ricimer, as we ſaid, had begun to deſpiſe Severus, as one of his own ſetting up; and now reſolved to remove him; yet ſomething there was, either a ſenſe of his crime, or ſome other thing, which hindered him from doing it in a publick manner. For, it's ſaid, the Feat was done by poiſon, though by the contrivance and deceit of Ricimer; and toward the latter end of the year it was, though we know not the certain time; for that he was alive on the twenty fourth of September we are well enough perſwaded from the Date of an Edict he gave out to Baſilius, on that day, with the Titles of Præfect and Patritian. The ſubject of it is of ſmaller importance than the Date, as to our knowledge; though then of ſuch conſequence as to be publiſhed by reaſon of a publick complaint made by the Mouth of Auſonius, a perſon of illuſtrious condition. Of more publick concernment ſeems another publiſhed by Leo on the ninth of November following, for incouragement of ſuch as would generouſly and of their own accord take upon them Offices and Imployments in the places where they lived, without any obligation, by reaſon of their Birth and Condition ſo to do. It, in juſtice, declares them and their Children free from the Nexus, or ſort of Bondage to which others were obnoxious, being only anſwerable for ſuch profits of the Corporations as they receive; and further, as incouragement, that if they diſcharge all the Functions of the Curiales, they ſhall, if they think fit, for their kindneſs and liberality have the Stile and Title of Fathers of theſe Cities or Places wherein they became voluntary Municipes.

Severus is poiſoned by Ricimer.

Novel. 2. Severi De Corporatis, Dat. 7. Cal. Octobr.

A Law of Leo for incouragement of voluntary Curiales.

L.3. de his qui ſponte, &c. Cod. Juſt.lib.10. tit. 43.

Quaſi Pater Patinæ, vide quæ munera ſint in Notis ad H. L.

A. D. 466.

Leone A. 3. Coſſ.

34. The Year following is as it were maimed and imperfect in its Characters, having but one Emperor and one Conſul. Leo in the Eaſt bore the Title of both joyntly, taking upon him the Conſulſhip now the third time, without any Colleague, the Inter-regnum continuing in the Weſt all this Year, which was the CCCCLXVI of the ordinary Æra of our Saviour. And it procured very heavy hearts to the poor Italians, to whom it was ſomething uncouth to have no Prince in that Country which had given original to the Empire, and beſides that, they were, notwithſtanding the reſiſtance made by Ricimer (who took all upon him) continually in Allarms, by reaſon of the reſtleſs ſpirit of Genſerich, concerning whom that we ſhould make ſome particular Inquiry what he did ſince we had ſo much occaſion to ſpeak of him, the Hiſtory of this time is not in any thing more concerned. And here Procopius helps us otherwiſe at a dead liſt, He informs us, that after his ſacking of Rome, and carrying away the Empreſs with her Daughters, he ceaſed not to attempt many other things. For beſides Carthage, he made naked all the other Cities of Africk, by depriving them of their Walls, that if the Natives ſhould ſide with the Romans, they might have no incouragement from fenced

An Inter-regnum in the Weſt.

Hiſt. Vandal. lib. 1.

The Actions of Genſerich about this time.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 466.

fenced places to make diſturbance; neither if the Emperor ſhould ſend over an Army, his Soldiers ſhould find harbour to manage thence a War againſt the Vandals. And this at preſent he was thought to do with great prudence and forecaſt; but in the following Age when theſe naked Cities were without any trouble or expence taken by Beliſarius, then he was laugh'd at for his policy, and his wiſdom accounted folly: ſo various are the opinions of Men, and regulated by event, concerning the deſigns of other perſons.

35. But this being done to the Cities and fortified places, all men that were conſiderable for Reputation or Wealth, Genſerich delivered into the hands of his Sons Honorich and Genzo to be treated no better than Slaves; for Theodorus his youngeſt was already dead without iſſue left of either Sex. From others of the Africans he took the moſt and richeſt Grounds, which became afterwards known by the name of the Portion of the Vandals, the true and ancient owners being permitted to go whither they would in a free, indeed, but beggarly condition. But what Grounds he beſtowed either on his Sons, or other Vandals, he made free from Burthens, which he laid ſo heavy upon the more barren, which were left to their former Lords, that nothing did they gain from their former poſſeſſions. Hence came it to paſs, that many fled their Country, and as many were put to death under pretence of various crimes, whereof the principal was, that they were ſaid to hide their Money. But ſo lay Africk groaning under moſt heavy Calamities. For he not only placed his Vandals, but Alans alſo in Garriſon, in convenient places under no fewer than eighty Officers, who bore the name of Chiliarchs, or Commanders of a thouſand Men; for though his Army of both Nations conſiſted really of no more than fifty, yet he would have it bear the reputation of eighty thouſand. But the number of his Soldiers increaſed with time, as the Vandals increaſed in their progeny, and other Nations were taken in, all which (the Alans as well as others) the Moors excepted, united, and grew into the common name of Vandals. And by the aſſiſtance of the Moors having increaſed his ſtrength, after the death of Valentinian, every Spring he infeſted Sicily or Italy it ſelf, ſome Towns ſubjecting to Slavery, demoliſhing others, and exhauſting all by his Rapines, ſo long, till being driven thence by that deſolation and want which he himſelf had brought along with him, he turned his Face toward the Quarters ſubject to the Emperor of the Eaſt, waſting all Illyricum, Peloponneſus, the adjacent Iſlands and other parts of Greece, or which bore the name thereof. Thence he returned back to Italy and Sicily, and took away what he found, if any thing he had left. It was reported, that being put to Sea out of the Haven of Carthage, when he was asked by his Pilot where he intended to make War, he anſwered, againſt thoſe with whom God was angry. So did he run upon all in an hoſtile manner, without any cauſe or provocation. And ſo much Procopius concerning his Depredations, who adds, that the Emperor of Conſtantinople, out of indignation, rigged a great Fleet againſt him. But this was afterward.

36. However, we may eaſily believe them that write his Depredations to have continued, and poſſibly with greater rigour, during this Inter-regnum in the Weſt, which not only might imbolden the Enemies of the Empire to infeſt Italy, and the Iſlands, but alſo other Provinces which ſtill continued to be languiſhing Members of it. The Senate now every day at Rome bore more heavily their Condition, and the death of Severus, who had given them good hopes of making head againſt, and giving a check to the inſolence of the Pyrate. They did, as ſoon as convenience would permit, give notice of it to Leo, in whom alone at preſent the Majeſty of the Roman Name reſided, praying him, that in theſe times of ſo great hazard he would procure them a Prince like to Majorianus, or elſe in a ſhort ſpace the Empire of the Weſt would be quite extinguiſhed. The caſe ſeemed difficult, and it's ſaid, that Leo ſpent all this Year in deliberation. There was then with him at Conſtantinople, Anthemius, the Son of Procopius, and Nephew of that Anthemius who had born the Office of Conſul, together with Stilicho, and was the Son-in-law of the late Emperor Martian. This Anthemius bearing the Dignity of Magiſter utriuſque Militiæ and Patritian, had waged War with good advantage againſt the Huns, and for his Wealth was otherwiſe very conſiderable. To theſe Qualifications the favour which Leo bore him, added ſo much weight, that in conſideration of his Nobility, and other Deſerts, he thought him the fitteſt perſon he could chuſe, and reſolved to make him his Colleague in the Weſtern Empire.

Sigon.

Leo pitcheth upon Anthemius.

A. D. 467.

37. The Year being over which had neither Conſul nor Emperor in the Weſt, the CCCCLXVII of our Lord ſucceeds, which according to the cuſtom was opened Puſao & Johanne Coſſ.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 467.

*Lib.*2.*c.*16.

Hic eſt o proceres petiit quem Romula virtus, Et quem veſter amor, &c.

Adjice prætereà privatum ad publica fœdus Sit ſocer Auguſtus genero Ricimere beatus Nobilitate micans eſt vobis regia virgo, &c.

Anthemius Auguſtus.

opened by the Conſulſhip of two Flavii, Puſæus and John, and was further ſignalized by the Legitimate Creation of a new Roman Emperor. That this was Anthemius, we may eaſily gueſs from what we have already ſaid concerning the purpoſe of Leo, who was ſolicited, as Evagrius writes, by an Embaſſy ſent from the Romans. And not only Evagrius, but Sidonius Apollinaris, though in a Panegyrick to this Anthemius, writes of his being ſought for, and deſired by the Senate; for the Members of it we ſuppoſe him to call by the name of Proceres, to whom in it he directs his ſpeech. And from him it alſo appears, that there was ſome private agreement betwixt Ricimer and Anthemius, if not the Emperor himſelf; that Ricimer ſhould marry Anthemius his Daughter; for after the Poetical way of Claudian, whom he imitates, he makes Rome at the deſire of Italy to take a Journey into the Eaſt, and to deſire of Conſtantinople, that in recompenſe for all the loſſes he had ſuſtained by her, ſhe would grant her Anthemius, who by his Daughter ſhould make himſelf happy in having Ricimer for his Son-in-law, and hereby a private alliance be added to the publick. Anthemius was not ſlack to take the opportunity, but came to Rome on the twelfth of April, where he was received with univerſal applauſe, and owned for Auguſtus. And according to agreement he delayed not for his own ſecurity, as well as truth, to give his Daughter in Marriage to Ricimer. And the Nuptials were celebrated with all ſolemnity poſſible, and with exceſs of Jollity, as Sidonius Apollinaris ſets it out, who terms it Occupatiſſima Vacatio, or a moſt buſie idle time wherein all ſerious matters were ſilent, except the Wedding it ſelf, which muſt needs be ſuch, ſeeing, as he ſaith, Perennis, the Daughter of the Emperor, was coupled with Ricimer the Patritian in, or for hope, of the publick ſecurity. This Sidonius was preſent at himſelf, coming then to Rome on his Meſſage from his Arverni, being kindly entertained, as he writes to his Horonius, in a ſecond Letter, in the Houſe of Paul, a perſon of Præfectorian Rank, venerable, he ſaith, for Learning and Sanctity. No man, he adds, was more excellent than he in all kinds of Arts. He falls into a rapture in conſideration of his Abilities, and concludes his ſhort Character with this full expreſſion, that he had this excellency above all his Studies, that He had a Conſcience ſuperior to that Eminent Knowledge. To ſtrengthen the Empire fully, if poſſible, by alliances, Leo the Emperor is reported alſo to have given Leontia, his Daughter, in Marriage to Martian, the Son of Anthemius.

*Lib.*1. *Ep.*1.

Lib. 1. ep. 9.

A. D. 468.

Anthemio A. 2. Coſſ.

Conſul the ſecond time alone.

37. For the Year CCCCLXVIII, Anthemius the Emperor was Conſul alone the ſecond time, thirteen Years having now intervened ſince, with Valentinian, he was firſt graced with this Dignity. Sidonius Apollinaris being ſtill in Town, Baſilius, his great Friend he ſo much admires, perſwaded him to ſtir up his Muſe, recollect his Fancy, and write a Panegyrick in honour of the new Emperor and Conſul, which he did with commendation enough, though it breaks off ſomething abruptly; and for a reward, at the inſtance of Baſilius he was honoured with the Præfectſhip, though whether it was a real and Active one, or Titular, and by way of Codicils, we may at leaſt queſtion. Were it Active, it muſt be of Gall, his Country; but there Arvandus now executed that Office, though not long he continued in it. For while Sidonius ſtill reſided at Rome, he was ſo vehemently accuſed of high miſdemeanours by ſeveral illuſtrious perſons, that he was called up to anſwer his heavy charge of Treaſon they laid againſt him. Hereof, and of his Trial Sidonius hath left us a pithy Deſcription in an Epiſtle written to his Friend Vincentius, which containing a form of the ancient Judicature, it is very proper here to be inſerted, and it ſhews the Generoſity of the Deſcriber. For, he begins with a Declaration, That he was really vexed at what had befallen him, and troubled at his Condition; this being over and above the heaps of Praiſe, due to the preſent “ Emperor, that it was free for one openly to make profeſſion or demonſtration “ of Love, even to ſuch as were condemned to capital puniſhment. For he was “ the Friend of Arvandus, even more than the fickleneſs and variety of his hu- “ mour would bear; which was ſufficiently atteſted by the ill will he had contract- “ ed in his behalf, whereof the flame had ſindged him, being a little unwary. “ But that he continued in his friendſhip he ſaith he ought to himſelf. As for Ar- “ vandus, he would complain freely, but not inſultingly, that he uſed no diligence “ to perſevere, becauſe deſpiſing the advice of his faithful Friends in all things he “ became the flouting ſtock of fortune. But in concluſion, as to this point, he “ admires not ſo much that he fell, as that he ſtood ſo long. O how often, ſaith “ he, did he complain of adverſe Fortune, when we lamented, that one time or o- “ ther his temerity would give him ſome heavy cauſe ſo to do, concluding not himſelf “

Arvandus Præfect of Gall.

*Lib.*1.*ep.*7.

Sect. 7. to be happy, who was judged to be ſo rather frequently than always. Then“ A. D.
he declares the manner of his Government, which he doth with a Salvo to the“ 468.
Reverence due to Faithfulneſs and Sincerity, which is ever owing to a Friend in“ Affliction.“

How ill he managed his Office. 39. His firſt Præfectſhip he managed with great Popularity, and the ſecond (to“ expreſs his playing with the words) with great Depopulation. Being burthened“ with Debts, for fear of his Creditors, he grudged the Noblemen that were to ſucceed“ him: he would laugh at all their Diſcourſe, be inquiſitive into their Deſigns,“ deſpiſe their kind offers, be ſuſpicious when they ſeldom came to him, and“ when they did often attend him, would diſdain their Company, till being ſurrounded“ with publick hatred, and girt about with a Watch before ungirt from his“ power, he was laid hold on, and brought away to Rome. In his Voyage he was“ puffed up with a conceit, becauſe he had proſperouſly ſailed by the boiſterous“ Coaſts of Tuſcia, that the Elements favoured, and, as it were, waited on his Innocence.“
In the Capitol he was lodged with Flavius Aſellus, the Comes Sacr.“ Largitionum, who bore reſpect to the Dignity of the Præfectſhip, as yet half“ ſmoaking in him. In the mean time the Meſſengers of the Province of Gall, Tonantius“ Ferreolus, a Præfectorian, and the Nephew of Syagrius the Conſul, by“ his Daughter, Thaumaſtus and Petronius, men of great Abilities both in knowing“ and ſpeaking, and to be reckoned among the prime Ornaments of their Country,“ arrive with their Commiſſion, and inſtructions to accuſe him in the name of“ all the Galls. Amongſt other things given them in truſt by the Provincials, they“ brought a Letter intercepted, which was ſaid by Arvandus his Secretary, upon“ his apprehenſion, to be dictated by his Maſter, whereby he diſſwaded the King“ of the Goths, to whom it was directed, from making peace with the Greek Emperor;“
laboured to convince him, that the Britains inhabiting above the Loire“ were to be fallen upon; that Gall by the Law of Nations ought to be divided“ with the Burgundians, with other mad ſtuff which would inrage a furious King,“ and diſtaſte one of a mild diſpoſition.

40. This Letter the Lawyers with heat interpreted to contain High Treaſon.“
Of it Sidonius and Auxantus, a moſt excellent perſon, were not ignorant, who“ accounted it a perfidious, lazy and barbarous thing to forſake their Friend Arvandus,“ now laid at, and in adverſity. To him who feared no ſuch matter they laid“ open the whole deſign, which his inflamed Enemies laboured to conceal, till the“ time of Judgment, that they might involve him, being unwary, and having refuſed“ the advice of his Acquaintance, in a confeſſion by a ſudden anſwer. They“ told him what they and his moſt ſecret Friends thought moſt ſafe to be done. They“ perſwaded him not to confeſs the leaſt matter; for though his Enemies pretended“ it was ſmall, he would find their diſſimulation very troubleſome. Hearing“ this, he flung away, and falling into ſudden reproaches, bid them be gone, as degenerate“ men, and unworthy of Præfectorian Fathers, and becauſe they underſtood“ nothing, to let him alone with the buſineſs: to Arvandus his Conſcience“ ſufficed, and he would hardly condeſcend that Advocates ſhould plead for him in“ the Cauſes of Bribery and Oppreſſion. They went away ſad, and in confuſion,“ as well with grief, as with the affront. For what Phyſician would be moved“ reaſonably when madneſs ſeiſes on a deſperate Man? But ſee! the accuſed perſon“ runs about the Capitol in White Cloaths, ſometimes is pleaſed with crafty ſalutes,“ and with the babbles of flattery; ſometimes turns over the Silks, Gems,“ and other coſtly Commodities, views them, as if he would barter for them, and“ in doing ſo complains much of the Laws, of the times, of the Senators, and of the“ Prince, becauſe they would puniſh him before they heard him. A few days paſs“ over, and a full Senate meets (as Sidonius found afterward, for then he was abſent)“ and to the Court Arvandus goes trimmed and ſmooth-faced, when his“ Accuſers in the mean time half in Mourning, expected Meſſengers from the Decemviri,“ and by their ſqualid habit took away due commiſeration from the accuſed“ Party.“

41. Thoſe that were ſummoned are let in; the parties according to the cuſtom“
Is tryed. ſtand over againſt one another, and the right of ſitting, before the beginning of“ the Proceſs, is offered to thoſe of Præfectorian Rank. Arvandus now by an unhappy“ impudence haſtes and places himſelf almoſt in the Laps of the Judges. But“ Ferreolus, with his Colleagues, ſate them down quietly and modeſtly at the upper“ end of the loweſt Benches, and this he did remembring himſelf as well a Meſſenger as a Senator, and was afterward the more commended and honoured for it.“

In the mean time ſuch Members as were abſent arrive: the parties riſe up and the Meſſengers propound. After the Provincial Mandate, the letter, of which mention was made, is produced, and when it is ſlowly reading, Arvandus with- “ out asking, proclaimes that he did dictate it. The Meſſengers anſwer that it “ very wickedly appears that he had dictated it. He in a rage, ignorant of his ruine, “ by a ſecond and threefold confeſſion ſtabbes himſelf; the Accuſers acclaim and “ the Judges conclaim that he confeſſed himſelf guilty of high Treaſon, and “ he is now deſtroyed by a thouſand rules of Law, which make it ſuch. After “ all his toyl he appears pale and too late to repent of his Loqacity, and alſo “ too late to underſtand that a Man may be pronounced guilty of high Treaſon, “ though he do not aſpire to the Purple. He is preſently deveſted of the privi- “ leges of his double Prefectſhip, which he had in courſe exerciſed five years, “ and, not as added, but as reſtored to a plebeian Family, adjudged to the publick “ Priſon. Such as beheld it thought it a very ſad thing that he who had late- “ ly thruſt himſelf in ſo polite and Compte a Garbe amongſt the Judges under the “ accuſation of men in mourning habit, ſhould a little after be led away, caſt, “ a miſerable Man and yet without commiſeration. For who would regard “ his Condition, whom perfumed and in accurate Clothes he ſaw led away un- “ to the common Gaole. His Sentence being hardly reſpited for a fortnight, was “ capital, and he was caſt into the Iland of the Serpent of Epidaurus, where to the “ grief of his very Enemies he was made ſordid and deſpicable, and as it were ſpued “ out of the World by the Vomit of nauſeating Fortune. Now by virtue of the “ old Senatuſconſultum Tiberianum he draws his breath for thirty days, think- “ ing with horror on the Vncus, Gemoniæ, and the halter of the rugged Hang-man “ hourely. We, he concludes, as much as we may, preſent and abſent, wiſh “ and double our Prayers and Supplications, that ſuſpending the ſtroake of “ the Sword already drawn, the goodneſs of the Emperor would baniſh him “ already half dead, though with the loſs of his Eſtate. Whether this was granted or no, appears not from Sidonius. But in Caſſiodorus his Chronicon, the following year we find that Ardaburius attempting the Empire, was by command of Anthemius ſent into baniſhment. In which place Baronius well conjectures that inſtead of Ardaburius or Arebundus as ſome Copies have it, Arvandus is to be read.

Is baniſhed

41. How miſerable was the condition of the Provincials of Gall at this time, who having forrein Enemies of ſeveral ſorts in the Bowels of their Country, were as much afflicted by their own Governours, who ſuffered as much from thoſe from whom they expected protection as from the violence of the inſulting Barbarians? Had Sidonius ſucceded Arvandus, doubtleſs they had found relief, but we find no ſuch matter, his power was all included in his Codicils, for that he was any more than a condicillar Præfect we cannot well imagine, and that of the City, from what he ſpeaks concerning that Honour beſtowed on him, which of old governed the Rights of the Fathers and of the common People; And that he executed the Office actually of Præfect when Arvandus was condemned, as one who hath written his Life tells us, we cannot find; but rather that he there made a ſtay after his being ſent for by Anthemius as ſome ſay he was, or rather after his Meſſage from the Arverni. Who ſucceded Arvandus is alſo obſcure; but from Sidonius we find that not long after this, when he was again in his own Country amongſt his Arverni, the Country was governed by full as good and innocent a Præfect as Arvandus was. His name was Seronatus of whom Sidonius ſadly complains, though in a ſomewhat jeſting manner to his Friend Hectitius, whoſe preſence he requires to put ſome ſtop to the Carier of his Extravagancies.

Accepi capiens honorem cui patrum ac plebis ſimul unus olim Jura gubernat. lib.9.ep. ult. in carm.

42. Thy Arverni, ſaith he now grone under two miſchiefs; the preſence of “ Seronatus and thine abſence. Of Seronatus I ſay, of whoſe Name that I may “ firſt ſpeak, fortune ſeemeth to me as præſcious of what was to come ſo to “ have ſported, as on the contrary our Anceſtors did when they called “ Battles, than which nothing is more ugly, by the Name of Bella or hand- “ ſome, and by the ſame contrariety when they called thoſe Fates Parcæ which “ do not ſpare. Catiline himſelf of our Age, is lately returned from Aturres, that “ all the Blood and Fortunes of miſerable People of which he there did but “ taſte, here he might ſwallow. Know for certain that dayly he diſcovers the “ Spirit of his long diſſembled Madneſs. He openly envies, pittifully diſſem- “ bles, is ſervily proude, commands as a Lord, exacts as a Tyrant, condemns “ as a Judge, calumniates as a Barbarian, all the day being armed by fear, hun- “ gry

Lib.2. ep. 1.

Seronatus his Succeſſor as bad as he.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 468.

gry by Avarice, terrible by his ambitious Deſires, cruel by his Vanity; he ceaſeth not to puniſh and openly to commit Theft together, and calling to him ſuch as cannot forbear laughing, he belches out Contentions amongſt the Citizens, and Letters amongſt the Barbarians. Being not ſufficiently initiated in the Rudiments or A. B. C. he publickly dictates Epiſtles, moved by his boaſting Humour, and by his impudence corrects; in a manner he gets all he covets, neither doth he give any price contemning, nor doth he receive ſecurities deſpairing; in Council he Commands, in adviſing is ſilent, jeſts in the Church, preaches at Meals, condemns in his Bed-chamber, ſleeps at a Tryal, daily fills woods with them that fly away, Towns with Enemies, Altars with Criminals, Priſons with Clerks, exulting, or rejoycing, with Goths, inſulting upon Romans, jeering Præfects, and ſporting with Numerarii; treading under his Feet the Laws of Theodoſius and propounding thoſe of Theodorich; ſearching out old Faults, and new ſorts of Tributes. Shake off, I pray, all delay, and break through that which hinders. The dying liberty of thy panting Citizens expect thee. They are reſolved that whatever is to be hoped for, or to be deſpaired of, nothing ſhall be done without thy guidance and direction. If the Commonwealth have no Force nor Refuge; if, as the report is, Anthemius the Emperor hath no Strength; the Nobility is reſolved, if thou ſpeakeſt the word, to free their Country or loſe their Heads. So he ends this Letter; but from another written to Græcus a Biſhop it appears, that they ſtood to their Reſolution; for, in that, reckoning up the ſufferings and merits of his Arverni, he relates how for their love to the Commonwealth they feared not to deliver up to the Laws Seronatus who was delivering up the Provinces to the Barbarians, and whom being Convicted, the State, afterwards, hardly preſumed to put to death.

Lib. 7. cap. 7:

Is put to death.

43. So weak we ſee was the Roman Intereſt in Gall, and daily it decayed, while in Africk it was almoſt quite extinct or in a manner without hope of Recovery, Genſerich domineering at his pleaſure and making his Inroads into ſuch other places as his ambitious luſt did incline him. Amongſt theſe, we lately heard from Procopius that Illyricum and Peloponneſus were infeſted by him, which belonging to the Eaſtern Empire, Leo the Emperor of thoſe Parts took it in very high Diſdain, and reſolved with all his might to chaſtize his fury. An Army he raiſed of an hundred thouſand men, as was reported, and ſuch a Fleet he gathered together as all the Eaſtern Sea could afford. He was very open handed both to Mariners and Soldiers, that no hinderance to his Deſign might happen by their want of incouragement; an hundred and thirty thouſand Pounds of Gold were reported to be laid out. But the time of the Ruine of the Vandals not being yet come, he made Baſiliſcus the brother of his Wife Verina the Admiral of his Fleet, one who was wonderfully greedy of the Imperial Power, and who promiſed himſelf ſucceſs in his Deſign from the friendſhip of Aſpar. Now Aſpar was an Arian in his opinion, from which he would no way be removed, and for that reaſon could not compaſs the Soveraignty for himſelf, but could yet advance another to it; and was begun to be ſuſpected by Leo as hatching dangerous Deſigns. The Report went that Aſpar fearing that upon good ſucceſs Leo would grow bold and exert his power, adviſed Baſiliſcus, that he ſhould ſpare Genſerich and the Vandals.

Leo makes great preparations againſt Genſerich.

44. Leo that he might have greater aſſiſtance againſt them, had procured Anthemius, a man very Eminent for his Nobility and Wealth, to be Emperor of the Weſt. Genſerich had uſed all his Endeavours to have Olybrius preferred, for the Alliance he had with him, contracted by his marrying of Placidia the Daughter of Valentinian; and being fruſtrated in his hope was now inflamed with anger, and infeſted all things belonging to the Empire more cruelly than ever. At this time there lived in Dalmatia one Marcellianus, a man of an honeſt diſpoſition, and formerly a friend to Ætius: Who when Ætius was killed, revolted from the Emperor and drew others by his example into the Revolt, and none adventuring to come againſt him held Dalmatia in his own power. But Leo ſweetning him all ways poſſible drew him off and ſent him into Sardinia, now Subject to the Vandals, and he ſo ſucceeded as to drive them out and make himſelf Maſter of the Iſland. Neither did matters worſe ſucceed in the hands of Heraclius who being ſent from Conſtantinople to Tripolis, overthrew in Battel the Vandals of thoſe Quarters, took the Towns without any difficulty and there leaving his Ships, led his Army by Land to Carthage. Such proſperous beginnings had Sect. 7. the War. Baſiliſcus with all his Fleet arrived at a Town diſtant from Carthage an hundred and eighty furlongs; which had the Name of Mercury from an old Temple dedicated to that Pagan Deity. And had he not on purpoſe loitered, but gone ſtreight to Carthage, he might eaſily have taken it by force and brought the Vandals under the yoak; ſo great a fear of Leo, as invincible, had ſeized on Genſerich when after the Report of the loſs of Tripolis and Sardinia the Fleet of Baſiliſcus appeared, as great as ever the Romans had had any. But the General ſuffered this opportunity to ſlip out of his Hands. A. D. 468.

45. But Genſerich failed not to make his Advantage of his Neglect. As many men as he could procure and truſt he got together and filled his Ships with them; and had other Veſſels in readineſs which had no men in them but were ſwift in ſayling. Then ſent he to Baſiliſcus to beg a Ceſſation of Arms for five days, to have ſome time for conſultation how he might beſt be reconciled to the Emperor; and ſome gave out that he ſent him money to purchaſe a Truce. This point he gained thereby, that as he had deſigned, he had the wind favourable for his purpoſe. For Baſiliſcus either in obedience to Aſpar, corrupted with money, or judging he did beſt, yielded to what he deſired, kept his Army idle and ſtaid for that time that might be convenient for the Enemy. Now as ſoon as this was come, and that the wind blew from the right quarter, the Vandals having what they expected, hoiſed up Sails, towed out their Ships, and ſuch of them as were empty they haled againſt the Enemy, whom when they approached they ſet them on fire, and with full Sails let them drive upon the Roman Navy, wherein being contained a multitude of Veſſels it eaſily took hold. And ſpreading it ſelf wide, a great terror, as in ſuch caſes, followed in the Roman Fleet, and a grievous cry, while the wind and flame made a terrible Noiſe, and the Soldiers and Mariners contended amongſt themſelves what ſhould be done, and with their Poles endeavoured to keep off the flaming Veſſels and thruſt off their own without any reaſon or moderation. His Fleet burnt.

46. But the Vandals omitted not to attend them and plied them with their weapons. Some they drowned and if any fled they took them and their Arms as booty, yet in ſuch a diſtreſs there wanted not ſome that were mindful of the antient valour of the Romans, amongſt whom John was moſt Eminent the Lieutenant of Baſiliſcus, yet not concerned in his Treachery. When his Ship was now ſurrounded with Enemies, turning himſelf into all quarters of the Veſſel, he laid about him and did them much miſchief, and when he ſaw it was in vain, and that his Ship muſt be taken, from the Prowe thereof he caſt himſelf armed into the Sea, and when Genzo the Son of Genſerich earneſtly intreated him to ſpare his life, promiſing him ſafety, he would not do it but drowned himſelf ſaying only this, that John ſhould not be in the power of Dogs. This was the End of that War, and Heraclius returned home. Marcellianus miſcarried by the treachery of one of his Officers. Baſiliſcus when he came to Conſtantinople took ſanctuary in the Church of Chriſt, the great God, which the Inhabitants called Sophia or Wiſdom, thinking that Name moſt worthy of God. And he eſcaped danger, through the Interceſſion of Verina the Empereſs, but at this time he could not obtain to be Emperor, out of hope of which he had left nothing undone. For, Leo not long after killed Aſpar and Ardaburius in the Palace, ſuſpecting that they lay in wait for his life. Thus much Procopius from whom it appears that by procurement of Aſpar this Treaſon happened, who being an Arian might bear good will to Genſerick, a man of his own perſwaſion, upon that Account as well as hatred to Leo: As for the Fleet thus loſt ſome write ſtrange things indeed; as that it ſhould conſiſt of eleven hundred Ships: That when the Fleets were ready to joyn Baſiliſcus tacked about and fled, which the reſt ſeeing him do followed his Ship: That after this Flight the Navy lying without care or watch was ſet on fire by the Enemy. And that the Fleet being loſt the Land Army alſo miſcarried, the Officers thereof, when they might have taken Carthage, being diſcouraged. By procurement of Aſpar.

47. Thus miſcarried ſo great an Enterprize under the managment of Hereticks, while, as ſome obſerve, another War committed to that of an Orthodox General, did well ſucceed againſt Denſices King of the Hunns and Son of Attila, than whom he began to be more Fierce and Ambitious; if it were poſſible. His Army was defeated and he himſelf ſlain in Battel. His Head was put upon a Pole and carried in Triumph up and down Conſtantinople to the great Joy of the Citizens; which paſſage Marcellinus placeth under theſe Conſuls, and if Denſices the ſon of Attila defeated and ſlain.

duly,

Sect 7.

A. D. 468.

duly, then, what is written by the Gothick Hiſtorian and lately mentioned, concerning the Diſſipation of the Hunns, and the Diſſention and Ruine of the Sons of Attila, is to be accounted of by way of Anticipation. Leo having thus his Hands full, and put to ſuch a vaſt Expence, had reaſon to be careful of his Revenue that what was duly impoſed ſhould not be diminiſhed, and to ſee that the “ Magiſtrates of the Title of Spectabilis ſhould take eſpecial care thereof, as Pro- “ Conſuls, Vicars, the Comes of the Eaſt and the Præfectus Aguſtalis, beſides the “ ordinary Governours of Provinces and their Officials, with the Curiales, in “ caſe of Diminution a Fine ſhould be incurred of twenty Pounds of Gold.” That he might not be defrauded by Purchaſers, he publiſhed a large Conſtitution dated on the firſt of September, which declared that if either his own Houſe or any other of whatſoever Dignity or Fortune, ſhould get poſſeſſion of Lands not “ belonging to the Metrocomia or Mother of Villages, not by way of Patronage, “ but by Purchaſe or any other lawful Title, and not acknowledge to the Commonwealth the Functions, owned and diſcharged by the former owner, ſuch “ Poſſeſſions ſhould be ſeized and aſſigned to the Curia of that City to which they “ belonged, that ſo proviſion might be made for the publick advantage out of “ the Tributary Functions.

Leo takes care of his Revenue.

L. l. 3. 4. *Do canone largitionalium titulorum Cod. Juſt.lib.*10. tit. 23. dat Kal. Julii.

L. 8. *de Exactoribus tributorum Cod. Juſt. lib.*10. tit. 19.

48. In theſe that they called Metrocomiæ he will not allow any ſtranger to obtain any Poſſeſſions, but if any of the Townſmen will alienate their Lands, it “ ſhall be only to a fellow-Townſman or Inhabitant of the ſame Metrocomia, all “ Contracts made with Strangers being hereby declared null and void. Now a “ Metrocomia was the ſame amongſt Towns or Villages as a Metropolis amongſt Cities, or the Mother of Villages, and as Cities were free from the Capitatio ſo were the Metrocomiæ, but not the other Villages. But whereas to defraud the Tributary Function, many were wont to betake themſelves to the Patronage of grea- “ ter men, he further declares that after this Sanction all ſuch Agreements made “ either under pretence of Gift, Sale or Hire, ſhall be of no Validity; the “ Tabelliones that draw the Inſtruments of Conveyance ſhall forfeit their Eſtates, “ and the Villages that ſhall do it, ſhall be confiſcated; ſuch as receive them into “ ſuch Patronage, if wealthy, ſhall forfeit an hundred Pounds of Gold, and if “ poor ſhall loſe what Eſtates they have, with which loſs they ſhall alſo be pun- “ iſhed who give any aid or aſſiſtance to ſuch Bargains. Nay this Rule he will have “ of Force from the time conteined in a Conſtitution of Martian; or in the Dio- “ ceſe of Thrace for thirty years from the ſecond Conſulſhip of Ælius and that “ of Sigisbaldus in the Eaſtern; in that of Ægypt Pontus and Aſia, twenty ſix years “ or from the Conſulſhip of Cyrus. Theſe three Laws made up one Conſtitution directed to Nicoſtratus the Prefectus Prætorio. His Brother in the Præfectſhip of Illyricum, and ſomething like in Name as well as Office, was this year Calliſtratus, to whom another Edict we find directed bearing date this very day, where- “ by is declared that Fathers marrying ſecond Wives, ſhall not loſe their uſuſ- “ fructus of what belongs to their Sons by the firſt, as deſcending to them from “ their Mothers.

L.un. non licere habitatoribus metrocomiæ, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 55.

Metrocomia what and how Free.

L. 1. ut nemo ad ſuum patrocinium, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 53.

L. ult. de bonis maternis, &c. Cod Juſt. lib. 16. tit. 60.

49. Anthemius was buſie this year in aſſiſting the Deſign of Leo againſt Genſerich; but he alſo imployed his Queſtor in making Edicts. He was Petition- “ ed by a certain Woman called Julia, in favour of a Marriage ſhe had contract- “ ed with one who had been her Slave, but had been alſo made free for the “ eminency of his Manners, as ſhe alleaged. Now, Conſtantine had made a con- “ ſtitution againſt women marrying their Slaves, and this ſhe was afraid “ would take hold of her. In this caſe he thought fit to be kind to Julia and “ others in her condition, and yet to provide againſt ſuch marriages as brought “ Infamy and other great Inconveniencies to women of free and oftentimes of “ noble Parentage. In honour of his ſecond Conſulſhip he declares all ſuch mar- “ riages contracted by women with their Liberti or freed men to be good and “ valid till this preſent year. But ſeverely prohibits them for the future, under “ pain of the marriages being utterly null and void, the parties undergoing loſs “ of Eſtates and perpetual Deportation, beſides that the Children born in ſuch “ a State ſhould be ſeized as Slaves by the Treaſury. and as for the Conjunction “ of women with Slaves, as alſo of men with Libertæ and ſhe Slaves, he leaves “ them to the ſaid Conſtitution of Conſtantine and the Law as it ſtood in force “ before his time. This is directed to Luperciarius on the ninteenth of February, who ſhortly after certified him that he had received from the Emperor Leo certain Laws to obtain his Confirmation in his World, as he words it. By an Novel Anthemii 1. Dat. 10. Kal. Mart.

Anthemius anſwers the Petition of Julia as to the marriage of her Freed man.

Anthemii novel. 2. circa regendum utrumque orbem.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 468.

Actum ſub die eodem.

Edict bearing date on the ninteenth of April, he impowers him to publiſh “ them for Laws accordingly; which was done the very ſame day.

Leo the Emperor of the Eaſt directs an Edict to Lupercianus in the Weſt.

50. And the ſame day he publiſhed another Edict, which is ſingular, the like not being to be found in any Code that we can remember. It's a Conſtitution of Leo the Eaſtern Emperor, and yet directed to Lupercianus and ſaid to be dated at Rome. Now that the Eaſtern Emperor ſhould direct an Edict to a Weſtern Præfect, or the Emperor of the Weſt to a Præfect of the Eaſtern Empire is not to be found, except it be in the Minority of Valentinian the ſecond. But amongſt other things ſaid by way of Preface, he declares that he to whom Providence had committed the Regiment of the whole World, would have Law and Equity obſerved. That his Son Anthemius, (to him he gives the Attributes of Pius and Triumphator ſemper Auguſtus) though the Divine Majeſty and his Creation had committed full power of Empire, to him, yet out of his prudent and cautious equity in which he excelled, thought him (Leo) to be conſulted by his Sacred Addreſſes, affirming that in the parts of Italy many Controverſies were riſen about Donations of other mens Eſtates, made by Princes contrary to the prudence of the Laws. A Suit betwixt one Domnina and Fortunatus, gave the occaſion to this determination, and before the Judges a conſtitution out of the Code of Theodoſius was alleged, whereby Conſtantine ordained that though one ſhould prove the thing given away by the Prince to be his own, yet ſuch Plaintiff ſhould not receive it back, but be conſidered ſome other way by the Emperor. This he thinks fit ſo to limit and reſtrain, as to declare valid the gift of the “ Prince, yet to leave all at liberty by due courſe of Law to recover their own. “ Therefore he decrees that the thing in controverſy called Ceſiana Maſſa be re- “ ſtored to Domnina: for, ſaith he, nothing is ſo advantagious to the Imperial Ma- “ jeſty, in which equity ought to inhere, and juſtice to be vigorous, as to reſerve “ all common Right to Subjects, and nothing is more lawful or permitted to good “ Princes, than to private men, who ought to pretend to ſuch liberty as is war- “ ranted by the Laws and Equity, that no man may take pleaſure in another mans “ Goods or things unlawful, and no man may lament that he is deprived of his “ own Eſtate.

To what purpoſe.

Therein takes upon him.

51. This ſingular Edict is the laſt of the three that bears the name of Anthemius and the laſt of all theſe Novels that are bound up with the Code of Theodoſius. It ſeems miſplaced; for the ſecond of Anthemius confirms it as well as the other Laws of Leo. But Leo takes a little upon him in the Application of the Duty of Emperors and the Juſtice and Equity which ought to be inherent in Imperial Power. He knew probably the Circumſtances of his own time, but not thoſe of his Predeceſſor; and he intended a mitigation indeed of what concerned Bona Caduca; whereas the Conſtitution of Conſtantine he mentions had reſpect to other things. That Conſtitution is the third De Bonis vacantibus in the Code of Theodoſius, and dated at Rome in the Palace at ſuch time as the Difference betwixt him and the Senate, fell out about Religion, and his parting thence and founding Conſtantinople. He had confiſcated the Lands belonging to the Pagan Temples, and as conveniency inclined, had aſſigned ſome of them to private Perſons, and as might conduce to the advancement of Chriſtian Religion; chiefly to the Biſhop and Church of Rome. Theſe Aſſignments being made, he found it not fit to revoke them, though poſſibly ſome private Perſons might receive ſome leſſer Inconvenience, but rather choſe to make them ſatisfaction ſome other way. To be ſure it was no way agreeable in other things and at other times, to his humour, to ſuffer any man to go away with the loſs, but on the Contrary he favoured ſuch as had loſt their Eſtates, and as Sozomen writes, made ſome other way amends to the Donees and Purchaſers after reſtitution to the right Owners. But in ſome extraordinary caſes it hath been the Rule, that rather a miſcheif ſhould fall to ſome particular men, than a great inconveniance to the publick. Private Perſons have been conſtrained to part with their Grounds for rebuilding and conveniences of a City; and what reaſon to the contrary, when ſome other way ſatisfaction is made?

Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 8.

Vide comment. Gothofred.

Lib. 1. c. 8.

Zeno and Marcian Conſuls.

A. D. 469.

Zenone & Martiano Coſſ.

52. The year CCCCLXIX had for Conſuls Zeno the Son-in-law of Leo and Marcian. Leo ſufficiently underſtood the deſigns of his late Arian Officers and how by their Intelligence with Genſerich ſo hopeful an Expedition had miſcaried. Yet he concealed his Indignation, and to ſuch a degree as to make great Courtſhip to Aſpar whom he knew to be the grand ſupporter of the Faction. He proceeded ſo far in the art of Diſſimulation, which it ſeems he ſaw very neceſſary

Sect. 7.

A. D. 469.

ſary as to promote the Son of Aſpar to be Cæſar which ſome ſay was agreed on when Aſpar promoted him to be Emperor. Some write that this was Ardaburius the Patritian by Dignity. Others that it was another Son whoſe name was Patritius or Patritiolus, and that to him he betrothed his Daughter. It's reported that Aſpar was ſo earneſt to have the Emperor perform his promiſe, that he took hold of his Robe and told him, that It was not lawful for one to lye that wore that Purple, to which Leo anſwered that It became an Emperor alſo to yield to no man ; to be ſubject to none, eſpecially when to be ſo would be to the detriment of the State. How bold ſoever Aſpar was at this time out of greedineſs after having the Soveraign Power in his Family, he is alſo reported to have renounced the Arian Hereſie as well as did his Son who was promoted to be Cæſar ; for ſuch commotions happened at Conſtantinople upon the Nomination of an Arian to that Dignity, that he was forced if not to renounce, to diſſemble that Opinion.

Vide Baron. ad ii. A. & quæ citat ex Actis Marcelli.

53. Leo began this year by an Edict gratefull to ſuch as were of a quiet Diſpoſition and averſe to Law Suites. For whereas formerly in Stipulations or Contracts made by word of mouth it was neceſſary to uſe certain ſolemn words, Phraſes or forms of Speech, he now ordained that all Stipulations, though not “ made with ſolemn or direct words but in any whatſoever, if it was with the “ conſent of the Contracters and they were familiar to the Laws, ſhould be of “ force and valid. From ſome eminent occaſion he was concerned towards the Month of July to take notice how women made no conſcience of promiſing Marriage, and afterwards flying back diſappointed their Suitors, to their great detriment often as well as vexation. By a conſtitution directed to Erythius the Præfect a little to diſcourage them he ordained, That any woman who upon ſuch “ promiſe of contract received Arræ or Preſents, ſhould if ſhe flew back, and if “ of Age reſtore double, if under Age ſingle, or juſt ſo much as ſhe had re- “ ceived, as the Law, alſo in ſuch caſes, was againſt a man if he ſtood not to his “ promiſe. This bears Date on the Kalends or fifth of July of this year, and is directed to Erythius ; and ſo are more Edicts concerning this ſubject of Marriage which having no Date at all, probably with this made up one and the ſame Conſtitution. For urgent reaſons the Law prohibited Tutors and Curators their marrying their Pupils or Minors or giving them in Marriage to their Sons. But this though founded upon ſo good reaſon as is obvious enough without declaring, gave occaſion to ill founded ſcruples againſt Deputy-Tutors, or ſuch as but tranſacted the buſineſſes of ſuch young women, as if they were to be apprehended as dangerous, as the other. This cauſed Leo to declare that the Prohibition belonging to Tu- “ tors and Curators ſhould not extend to them, for elſe by degrees all that were but “ any way obnoxious to give Account, ſhould be prohibited from marrying to himſelf “ or his ſon, her to whom he was, though little, ingaged. He further wrote to the ſaid “ Erythius to prevent the injuring of Children by Father or Mother through their “ betaking themſelves to ſecond, or other Marriages. It was further obſerved that becauſe women out of favour to their Sexes were indulged and reſtored in integrum if by reaſon of ignorance of the Law (which otherwiſe did not excuſe) they were overreached in Contracts concerning their Inheritance or Eſtates, they thence took occaſion to retract all Contracts whatſoever in ſuch things as they omitted or were ignorant of. To prevent this he commanded the ſame Erythius that the former “ Laws ſhould be ſtrictly obſerved, which relieved them only in caſe they did any “ thing through ignorance of the Law when they were under Age, or not five “ and twenty.

Leo makes ſeveral Laws relating to marriage.

The unreaſonableneſs of women reſtrained in claiming privileges.

Vide Juſt. Inſtit. de verborum obligatione Spondes? ſpondeo. Promittis? promitto. Fidejubes? fidejubeo. Dabis? dabo. Facies? faciam. L. 10. de contrahenda & committenda Stipulatione. Cod. Juſt. lib. 8. tit. 38.

L. 8. de ſponſalibus. & Arris & 2. Cod. Juſt. ib. 5. tit. 1.

L. ult. de Interdicto matrimonio, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 6.

L. 6. de ſecundis nuptiis Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 9.

L. ult. de juris & facti ignorantia Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit 18.

A. D. 470.

Severo & Jordano. Coſſ.

54. We are come to the CCCCLXX Year of our Lord, which had for Conſuls Severus and Jordanus. Some Copies have Severianus; and of each Name two very Eminent Men lived in the Eaſt at this time. Now did Leo put in Execution what he deſigned againſt Aſpar, cauſing him and his two Sons Ardaburius and Patritius to be killed by the hands of the Eunuches in the Palace. Nicephorus relates this ſtory told by Marcellinus with this circumſtance, that the Citizens of Conſtantinople bore Aſpar and his Sons very evil will upon report that they entertained deſigns againſt the Emperor, but were inraged above meaſure when they ſaw an Arian created Cæſar, being ſhortly to ſucceed an old Man in the Imperial Seat. They fell out into all opprobrious language in the Cirque and treated them with words in ſuch a manner as ſhewed that blows would follow in a little time, of which they being ſenſible fled to Chalcedon and took Sanctuary in the Church of Euphemia the Martyr, all the Army following after. The Emperor ſent the Patriarch promiſing them ſecurity if they would come forth, but they refuſed to comply Aſpar and his ſons killed.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 470.

ply except he himſelf would come to them. Leo went and by indirect means got them out. He took them to his Table, and promiſed them to forget all Injuries, and other matters: but he gave orders to Zeno an Iſaurian whom he eſteemed faithful to him, to cut off their Heads as they ſhould come to make uſe of the Baths of the Palace. When they came, he firſt cut off the Head of Ardaburius. At the ſight Aſpar grieved, but cried out; That being old, and now gray-headed, he ſuffered as he had deſerved, who had boaſted in vain and would never obey his Admonition. For he had often told him that they ſhould devoure Leo before he could make a meal of them. Having ſaid this, he alſo was ſlain. But his Son Patritius who was divorced from Ariadna the Emperors Daughter, was ſent into Baniſhment, and ſhe was given in Mariage to Zeno who had thus cut off the Conſpirators. Thus much Nicephorus, from whom other Writers diſſent as to Patritius, relating all the Sons of Aſpar to have been ſlain. If Zeno was the man and Ariadna was formerly contracted to Patritius, Baronius rightly inferreth that the marriage of him with Ariadna fell not out till this year, and that ſuch as aſſigned it to a more early time, were miſtaken.

A. D. 471. Leone A. & Probiano Coſſ.

55. For the Year CCCCLXXI Leo Auguſtus (who from the killing of Aſpar and his Sons got the Nick-name of Maceles) took the Conſular Title the fourth time, and had Probianus for his Colleague. He was now well at eaſe, being rid of his ambitious Competitors; but ſo was not his Brother Anthemius who fared the worſe for his good Fortune. The two Emperors excepted, the greateſt men in theſe times were of the Arian perſwaſion, and ſuch were they who preferred them to their Soveraign Titles, for little more than Titles they really injoyed while theſe Arian Miniſters bore all the ſway. Ricimer a Goth and one of that Opinion, was diſpleaſed at the death of his Friends and Countreymen at Conſtantinople, and being angry with Leo began to be diſſatisfied with him whom he had recommended to the Weſtern Empire, though his Father-in-law. And what could not he promiſe himſelf, who upon the account of his Religion and Original had two great Potentates his Friends, viz. Euarich King of the Goths in Spain and Gall, and Genſerich the Vandal the Terror both of Eaſt and Weſt, two great Perſecutors upon account of that Hereſie? He offered ſeveral Affronts to Anthemius, who taking it in diſdain to be ſo uſed, and knowing ſufficiently his Inſolence, would not receive them without expreſſing his Reſentment, and thoſe Coles of Diſſention being blown by the familiar Friends of both, it aroſe to that height that the Plots and Deſigns of Ricimer being diſcovered, he was glad to provide for himſelf by flight, and got him to Milan. The Nobility of thoſe parts were very much concerned at this Breach as apprehending new miſchiefs into which Italy would be plunged, and uſed all the means they could to perſwade him to reconcile himſelf to the Emperor, and recommended to him as a Perſon moſt fit to be ſent on that Errand, Epiphanius Biſhop of Ticinum, or Pavia, a Perſon of very great eminency for his ſanctity and abilities. Ricimer willingly enough complied with their Deſires, as the beſt means to conceal his farther deſigned Treachery; and Epiphanius was ſent upon the Errand. Anthemius was not forward to entertain him under that Character, profeſſing Ricimer was a man not to be truſted, becauſe of his Ambition, and fickle and treacherous Humour. But its ſaid the religious diſcourſe of the Biſhop joyned with the reverence due to his Perſon overcame him, and he durſt not deny that Peace, which he concluded in his own thoughts would not be laſting. However a Peace, or rather a counterfeit Reconciliation was made.

Acta Epiphanii apud Baron ad h. A.

A. D. 472. Feſto & Marciano Coſſ.

Ricimer breaks out into Rebellion.

56. The next year that followed, or the CCCCLXXII of our Saviour had Feſtus Conſul for the Weſt, and Marcian for the Eaſt. Ricimer for ſome time continued a Correſpondence with the Emperor, but nouriſhing ſtill his reſtleſs and ambitious Thoughts, and preſuming he ſhould be able either by force or cunning to deſtroy him, at length he broke out into open Rebellion, and with a great Force of men went to Rome, and in order to a Siege incamped at the Bridge of Anienis. This procured no ſmall diſturbance in the City, the people, though harraſed with Tumults and Diſſentions, ſiding with each party as inclined. But of whatſoever party they were, they were all oppreſſed with Famine, the Siege being drawn out in length, and a Plague the uſual Companion of both, raged amongſt them. The only hope they had was in the Goths inhabiting Gall whom they long expected to relieve them. And they wanted not will to do it, for Bilimer was ſent with a good Army to raiſe the Siege, but when he attempted it, Ricimer turned head, gave him Battel, defeated, and ſlew him near the Bridge

Vide Sigon ad h. A.

of

Sect. 7.

A. D. 473.

Breaks into Rome and murder's Anthemius.

Olybrius Emperor for a while, of Adrian. Upon this, more elevated and reſolute he reinforced his Siege, and on the eleventh of July broke into the City, which he treated as Alarich and Genſerich had done before him. No regard being had o f*Anthemius* either as Emperor or Father-in-Law he put him to death; and permitted his Soldiers to plunder the Citizens, ſparing only the two Regions where he had his quarter. This being done he promoted Olybrius, who not long ſince was come from Conſtantinople, to be Emperor, and not long after, Caſſiodorus ſaith fourty days, being ſeized by a Diſeaſe, in great pains of his Body if not of his mind, he went to give an Account of his Actions in another world on the eighteenth of the ſame month, having domineered like another Stilicho from the death of Velentinian. Neither did his lately promoted Emperor long injoy his Purple, for ſome ſay he followed after on the three and twentieth of October, though others refer his death to the following year, and with better reaſon, Caſſiodorus ſaying that he died in his ſeventh month. There is little ſaid of what he did the ſmall time he had the Power, but that to be gratefull to Ricimer he made Gundibarius his Nephew a Patritian in his place.

A. D. 473.

Leone A. Conſ.

And Glycerius.

Jornandes de rebus Geticis c. 56.

57. The year CCCCLXXIII had Leo Auguſtus Conſul the fifth time and him alone, they that were moſt concerned in the Weſt having ſomething elſe to think of than of making Conſuls. Leo having notice of the late Revolutions at Rome reſented them as was convenient he ſhould, eſpecially the death of Anthemius and thinking whom he might ſend to ſucceed him in the Weſt, made choice of Julius Nepos the Son of Nepotianus, to whom he married his Niece and deſigned him Cæſar. But for all this, four months paſſed over and there was no face of Majeſty, none that wore the Purple at Rome, and this incouraged Gundibarius to take up the trade of Ricimer his Grandfather. On the fifth of March he procured the Soldiers to nominate Emperor Glycerius, who bore the Office of Comes Domeſticorum, and him they adorned with the Imperial Enſigns at Ravenna. Thus after the death of Anthemius followed two, whom we may rather call Uſurpers than Emperors; who had not any conſent of Leo, nor were created after due manner, and therefore no account was had of them by thoſe Princes that followed. Of ſuch Tragedies as had been thus acted in Italy, Genſerich the next Neighbour could not but be Spectator. And his Ambition excited him to make ſuch uſe of them as his Intereſt with the Arian Princes of this time could procure. He not only did what miſchief he could with his own Power in Africk; but he ſtirred up the Oſtrogoths to invade both the Eaſtern and Weſtern Empire, alluring them by the greatneſs of the Booty. And to the Booty at this time they had great appetite, if what their Countryman writes be true, that the prey they were wont to make of the neighbour Nations failing, their Meat and Clothes likewiſe failed; for they had been maintained by War, and now peace became very irkſome to them.

The Oſtrogoths make Incurſions into both Weſtern and Eaſtern Empire.

Places aſſigned them to inhabit.

58. With open-mouths they all betook themſelves to Theodomir their King, and deſired to be led out to what quarter ſoever he pleaſed. He ſent for his Brother and caſting lots perſwaded him to invade Italy where Glycerius now Reigned, while he in the mean time ſhould ſet with a ſtronger Army upon the ſtronger or Eaſtern Empire. The thing was done, Widemir invaded Italy; but preſently after died and left Widemir his Son for his Succeſſor. Him did Glycerius labour with gentle language to mollifie, and by preſents moved him to quit Italy and go into Gall where he told him his own kinſman then Reigned. He accepted of his Preſents and went as he directed him into Gall, where he joyned with the Viſigoths his Kinſmen, and made up one Body and People with them, who had dominion both in that Country and in Spain. Theodomir the elder Brother with his Forces paſſed the River Saus, threatning to make War upon the Sarmatians and ſuch others as ſhould endeavour to oppoſe him, which none did concluding he would be too ſtrong for them. Perceiving all thing to ſucceed as he wiſhed, he ſet upon Naiſſus the firſt City of Illyricum; and being Maſter of it joyned with his Son Theodorich, and by his Officers took in the City Ulpiana, and ſeveral places of the Country before this thought to be inacceſſible. For they ſubdued in the courſe of this War Heraclia and Lariſſa Cities of Theſſaly, after having got much Booty. Theodimir taking notice both of his own and his Sons felicity, reſolved to improve it, and from Naiſſus went to Theſſalonica whither the Emperor had ordered Clarianus a Patritian with an Army. He perceiving the Trenches to be opened ſent to Theodimir, and by gifts perſwaded him to quit the City, and an Agreement was made whereby were delivered up to the Goths to inhabit Ceropellæ,

Europa;

Sect. 7.

A. D. 468.

Europa, Mediana, Petina, Bercum, and another place called Sium, where with their King they placed themſelves in quiet. And not long after Theodemir was ſeized with a mortal diſtemper, and calling to him the Goths in the City Cerras, nominated his Son Theoderich his Succeſſor, and then died. This is that Theodorich of whom we are largly to write hereafter. We muſt add as to matters of the Eaſt this Year, that (according to the Computation of Marcellinus and Caſſiodorus) Leo the Son of Zeno and Ariadna was born, and preſently by his Grandfather the Emperor made Auguſtus. But as ſome write he ſcarcely lived ten Months after his Imperial Birth, then dying an Infant, and neither being ſenſible of what he got or loſt. Yet others would have him not an Infant, but a Youth brought up in a vitious courſe of Life. Which could not be, for had he been born that very Year that his Father and Mother were married, he could not at this time have exceeded three years, according to what hath been formerly ſaid, and Baronius alſo now obſerves.

A. D. 474.
Leone Juniore Conſ.

Leo dies.

59. But the following Year, or the CCCCLXXIIII of our Lord, was opened with the Conſulſhip of this Leo Junior, and notable upon this account as well as for his own Death and that of his Grandfather, who now ended his Life after he had reigned ſeventeen years and ſix moneths. He is generally commended for his wiſdom and moderation in Government, and reckoned amongſt good Princes. Some blame him very much for this, that he was not ſufficiently cautious whom he preferred, as Baſiliſcus and Zeno, both who proved great maintainers of the Arian Hereſy, and procured diſturbances in the Empire: neither did he take off Baſiliſcus, as with good reaſon he might have done after his Treachery, but ſuffered him to live and entertain farther ambitious deſigns for obtaining the ſoveraign Power. That ſilly opinion that the beſt Laws are made by the worſt Princes, was confuted by him as well as others, for many excellent ones he enacted both of Eccleſiaſtical and Civil concernment. Some of both ſorts we find without date, and cannot ſo well aſſign them to any particular year. Conſtantine had formerly made it Capital to make any Eunuches within the Roman Pale. But this Law became ſo neglected that Leo by a new Conſtitution directed to Vivian the P. P. forbad any ſuch Caſtrated Perſons to be ſold, by ſubjecting “ every Tabellio that drew the writings of ſuch Sale to puniſhment, as alſo him that ſhould require the eighth penny according to the Cuſtom; for there were certain Publicans, who from gathering this eighth penny from the ſale of Eunuches, had the name of Octavarii. But as for Eunuches made in barbarous Nations without the Roman Pale, thoſe he permits to be ſold. Indeed the practice “ of this Age was ſo degenerate, as uſually before Revolutions, that, as Sidonius “ Apollinaris jeſtingly and yet too near to Truth, wrote to his friend Candidianus concerning the Mariſhes of Padus near Ravenna, the courſe of all things ſeemed perverted, to ſober men. The Walls, ſaith he, fall, and the Waters ſtand; “ Towers float, and Ships lye faſt; the Sick walk, and Phyſitians lye along: the “ Baines freeze, and Houſes burn: the living are dry, and the dead ſwim: “ Theives are vigilant, and thoſe in Power ſleep: Clerks turn Uſurers; Syrians “ ſing: Marchants turn Soldiers, Soldiers traffique as Merchants: old men play “ at Ball; young men at Dice: Eunuches follow Arms, and the Confederates “ their Books.

Good Laws made by him.

Vide. tit. 42. *de Eunuchis Cod. Juſt. lib.*4.

Lib. 1. ep. 8.

60. Though theſe Incongruities might cheifly be charged upon the People of the weſtern Provinces who were now ripe for Ruine, yet as Corruptions will ever be creeping into all States and Empires, Leo took notice particularly of one of thoſe Indecencies mentioned by Sidonius, and that was the trafficquing of military Men, He was ſatisfied that as by a courſe of Trade they neglected their own Imployment, and thereby ſubjected the Provinces unto Danger, ſo in their way of Traffick they oppreſſed too often their fellow Subjects, making uſe of their military Function to inforce it, by terrifying their Neighbours, and frighting them into unequal terms, by the awe of their Girdles. For theſe reaſons he “ gave in Command to Aſpar when Magiſter Militum, that Soldiers ſhould not “ as much as hire any thing that belonged to other perſons, neither be Procura- “ tors or Managers; Ingage themſelves for any, or imploy others in thoſe Af- “ fairs. He requires that they buſy themſelves with Arms, not with private mat- “ ters, and that they conſtantly attend their Colours, and preſerve the Com- “ monwealth which maintains them from all neceſſity of Wars. By the many “ warnings he had from Genſerich and others to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt Invaſions, he was ſo careful to have all things neceſſary for War, that in a publick

He forbade Soldiers traffick.

*L.*3. *de locato & conducto Cod. Juſt. lib.*1. tit. 65.

Edict he declared that no Perſons of what Dignity ſoever, ſhould be excuſed from building or repairing of Walls, from furniſhing of Wheat and other Species “ as the Præfectus Prætorio ſhould think convenient. He was negligent as to ſecu- “ ring himſelf from Baſiliſcus and his ambitious Practices, but if we may judge from another Law, he was jealous that ſome of his Subjects coveted his place, and that from the Splendor of their Clothes and Furniture. As Valens (as jea- “ lous as any) had formerly forbidden to Subjects the uſe of Cloths wrought “ with Gold, he forbids the putting of Pearl, Emrods or Jacinth upon Bridles “ Sadles or Belts, permitting them to be adorned with other Gemms: But all “ ſorts of Gemmes he forbids to be worn in Trappings; under pain of fifty pounds “ of Gold to be forfeited by him that ſhall tranſgreſs in either kind. He fur- “ ther declares that no private Perſon except in the ornament of Matrons or the “ wear of Rings either by men or women, ſhall make any thing of Gold or “ Gemmes which belongeth to the Clothing or Ornaments of the Emperor. Nei- “ ther ſhall they do this under pretence that they make thoſe things on purpoſe “ to preſent them to the Prince, for he declares that he deſires no ſuch Pre- “ ſents, neither that Royal Ornaments ſhall be preſented by private Perſons. “ As a reward for any ſuch things to be preſented to him, he eſtabliſhes ſuch an “ one as would little gratifie the Giver, viz. no leſs than a forfeiture of an hun- “ dred Pounds of Gold, and of life it ſelf to the Bargain. For as much he ſaith “ that his Royal Ornaments ought to be made by his Palatine Artificers within “ his own Court, and not up and down in private Houſes or Shops. There- “ fore he decrees with the greateſt ſeverity, that what is ſacred and agreeable in “ his wearing and Ornament no private Perſon ſhall raſhly dare to make, under “ pain of incurring the Mulct now mentioned.

The too rich furniture of private Perſons.

L. ult. de quibus muneribus, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 10. tit. 48.

L. un. Nulli licere in frænis, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 11.

61. That he was careful to preſerve a regard to Nobility and Dignities he ſhewed in that he commanded that, If any publick Baker (or one of the “ Mancipes) ſhould by ambitious practices, favour or money, obtain the Dignity “ and Office of Comes Horreorum, he ſhould be deveſted of his Dignity, fine in “ twenty pounds of Gold, and be returned to his former Imployment, without “ any ſpecial Indulgence to be obtained. But to liberty he was a great friend, which to obtain he ordained an extraordinary and ſingular matter. Amongſt the Preſents lately mentioned and forbidden to be made to him, it ſeems that Eunuchs were not to be reckoned, but that ſometimes ſuch were preſented to ſerve him in his Bed-Chamber. As he or his Colleague Anthemius had pri- “ viledged their Bed-Chamber-men from being convented before any other Judge “ than the Magiſter Officiorum, he declared that all that were already admitted “ into his Chamber, whether given by the liberality of any perſon, or upon any “ other account, and to be admitted for the time to come, if Slaves ſhould ipſo “ facto, without intervention of Writings or Acts, obtain Liberty and Ingenuity; “ nay this ſhould extend unto the dead, ſo far as they could be concerned. He “ gives this reaſon, that it was a ſeemly privilege of Imperial Majeſty, not to “ be ſerved by Slaves, but perſons of free condition. He grants them therefore “ power to make Teſtaments as well as other men. But in caſe they die without “ lawful Heirs, he declares that their Eſtates ſhall come to his Treaſury. This “ Immunity he gives in caſe any Perſons do voluntarily preſent him with their “ Eunuches. But if it be found that any thruſt themſelves into his Service, “ without the conſent of their Lords, he allows the owners to recover them to- “ gether with their Peculium. Provided they lay their claim within five years, “ which preſcription of time ſhall bar them. And all this he extends to Wo- “ men as well as men, which by their Lords were or ſhould be given into his Bed- “ Chamber.

He favoured Nobility.

Was a great friend to Liberty.

L. un. de Piſtorib. Cod. Juſt. lib. 11 tit. 15.

L. l. 3. 4. de Præpoſitis ſacri cubiculi. Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 5.

62. He was as kind to thoſe that ſerved in his Scrinia, whom he declared “ free from ſordid Imployments, and Tolls according as the Law formerly had “ provided for them. Now theſe Tolls of vendible things roſe and fell according “ to the pleaſure of Princes; of old the twenty fifth or fiftieth part was taken of “ the price of Slaves, of other things the hundredth, which Tiberius reduced “ to the two hundred penny, and Caligula brought it down to the three hundred “ ſo far as the Provinces of Italy were concerned. More than this he declared them free from publick and civil Services, as alſo from the Metatus. And he “ thought fit to eſtabliſh the Number of them; as in the Scrinium Memoriæ ſixty “ two, in the Scrinium Epiſtolarum thirty four, and as many in the Scrinium “ Libellorum. In the Scrinium Memoriæ he would have no fewer maintained “ than four Antiquaries, as they were called, or Copiers of Books, and no Memorialis “ to ſupply or execute two places. But he ſeems moſt concerned about “ military men, forbidding ſtill by another Conſtitution directed to Dioſcorus “ that they undertake any civil Imployment. And that the Army may “ not be filled with unskilful men, or the Cities and Towns emptied upon this “ occaſion, he forbids any Curialis or Cohortalis to betake himſelf to the Armata “ Militia. He was indulgent enough to his Servants and Miniſters; but as other Princes before and after him he found occaſion enough in his Reign to reſtrain their Extravagancies. One in his time was committed by the Governors of Provinces themſelves, who though they had in the Cities of their juriſdiction Palaces, Prætoria, or publick Houſes to dwell in, yet would get into thoſe of private Perſons, whereby two miſchiefs followed. For the Owners might be outed of their Habitations or forced to unequal terms, and the publick Houſes were neglected and fell to decay. To prevent which, he gave in a Conſtitution, expreſs charge to the Præfects that ſuch Governors ſhould be conſtrained to inhabit the reſpective Palaces and Prætoria; and where, in the ſame City, “ there was both a Palace and a Prætorium; the former ſhould be conſigned to “ the Habitation of the Præſident, and the latter he imployed as a Granary for receiving “ or keeping of Corn or other Species, or to ſome publick and neceſſary “ uſe. If any Governor act contrary to this Law, he and his Office ſhall forfeit “ fifty Pounds of Gold to repaire the Palace ſo neglected.

Kind to thoſe that ſerved in his Scrinia.

L. l. 9, 10 De Proximis ſacrorum ſcriniorum &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 19.

L.16. de Re militari Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 36. L. 4. Qui militare poſſunt, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 34.

He commands that Governours dwell in the Palaces or Prætoria.

L. ult. de offic. Rectoris Provinciæ Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 11.

63. Leo at his death is reported to have left his young Grand-Son Leo his Heir and Succeſſor, and Zeno only the Childs father, his Protector or Guardian. But Zeno when the old man was gone, and he had the power in his own Hands, would not be ſo put off. The Soveraign Power of an Emperor we know was very great; they were looſed from Laws that bound other Perſons. They could adopt thoſe that were elder than themſelves. Such Acts of State as paſſed in their Minority their Quæſtors Hands, were as we have ſaid, authentick, as now in our preſent Age, Laws enacted in the Minority of Princes from their authority receive their force, though managed by their Protectors or Regents of the Kingdom. By virtue of this fulneſs of power the Imperial Authority flowing from an Infant, but managed by Zeno, inveſted Zeno it ſeems, with the Imperial Dignity, and as if the Child had done his part, now he paſſed off the Stage, for he ſurvived not long after. How long it was we know not, but we will have recourſe to the Laws, and ſee what from the Dates of them can be Collected. Its only thus much, that he was alive, and his Father had the Title of Auguſtus on the two and twentieth day of April of this year. For in the Code there's a Conſtitution bearing both their Names, which declares that when any doubts ariſe concerning new Laws, which is not approved by old cuſtom, in “ ſuch caſe the Judge muſt ſuggeſt it to the Prince and receive his determination. “ It further appears that on the ſixteenth of March, Zeno had the Imperial Title, by a Law of that Date inſcribed to Juſtinian Præfect of Conſtantinople, concerning the Privileges of the fifteen Advocates in his Court, that ſhould enjoy “ the ſame with the Advocates of the Fiſcus, and their Children, and which the “ ſixty four in the Court of the Præfectus Prætorio enjoyed. There are five other “ Laws extant which bear both their Names, but they generally tend to the eſtabliſhment of the juriſdiction of the Magiſter Officiorum over thoſe imployed in the Palace, of which we have already ſpoken enough.

Zeno Emperor.

Neceſſaria eſt ſuggeſtio judicantis, &c. l. 11. de legib. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit: 14. Dat. 10. cal. Maii. Leone. jun. A. Conſ.

L.16. de Advocatis diverſor judicior. Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 3.

64. Not long after the Date of the former Law we may ſuppoſe the Infant Leo paſſed to the place of Innocents; but whether ſent by the violent hand of his Father or no we cannot tell. Yet ſome, as Paulus Diaconus, reported it, and others tell another ſtory, as if ſome other ſhould be killed for him and he be ſent away and educated privatly, and ſhould have lived till the time of Juſtinian. Evagrius tells us that Zeno after the death of Leo, having by the aſſiſtance of Berina the Empreſs obtained the Purple, and after that of his ſon the ſole Title and Very debauched.

Lib. 2. c. 17. & lib. 3. c. 1.

Sect. 7.

A. D. 474.

and adminiſtration, as if he had been perſwaded that he could not enjoy the Dominion of the whole World, except he violently purſued all ſorts of pleaſures which occurred, did at his firſt beginning ſo give up himſelf to all allurements of Vice, that he refrained from no filthy or flagitious Act, but ſo wallowed in his filthineſs, as thinking it the humour of a baſe and low Spirit to commit ſuch things in darkneſs or an hidden manner, but Royal and worthy of an Emperor to do it in the Eyes of all men. In which practice ſaith our Writer he was of a perverſe and abſolutely ſervile Judgment. For a Prince is not to be valued becauſe he commands other Perſons, but for this that he can ſo govern and moderate himſelf, that he ſuffer no abſurd ſort of pleaſure to creep into his mind, but keep himſelf ſo impregnable as to Intemperance, that his life may be the Image of Virtue, by which his Subjects may be inſtructed to imitation. But he expoſed himſelf to the temptations of Vice, and by degrees was reduced into ſo filthy ſervitude, that thence he could not by any means be redeemed. After ſome other diſcourſe he adds that his Subjects, as well thoſe that inhabited the Eaſt as the Weſt were grievouſly harraſed. For the Barbarians called Scenitæ overran all places; and a multitude of Hunns, of old called Maſſagetes, made an Incurſion into Thrace, nay paſſed Danubius without the controul of any.

c. 2.

65. But, while theſe things happened, Julius Nepos the Siſters Son of Marcellinus once a Patritian, who had been by Leo as we ſaid, deſigned Emperor of the Weſt, hearing that Glycerius had ſeized the Purple was much concerned; and reſolving to diſturb him in his Seat, got together a power of men in the Eaſtern Parts, and obtaining ſhips of the Government, put them on Board, and landed them near to Rome, and that with ſuch ſucceſs, that Glycerius out of fear, as utterly unprovided, flying to a place called Portus, as ſome write, he then beſieged him and forcing him to ſurrender himſelf, he deveſted him of the Imperial Enſigns, which he put on himſelf, on the four and twentieth of June. Sigonius takes this Portus for a Town near to Rome; but Jornandes writing how Nepos depoſed Glycerius, ſaith he ordained him a Biſhop, in the Port or Haven of Rome. The Biſhoprick was that of Salonæ in Dalmatia. and probable it is that upon notice of the Arrival and power of Nepos, Glycerius ſubmitted and the Accord was made at Hoſtia, or thereabouts where he landed. Jornandes further writes that Eurich King of the Goths in Gall incouraged by theſe varieties and Alterations, ſeized on the City Arverna, in which then reſided as Governor Decius a moſt noble Roman Senator, and the Son of Avitus late Emperor. But for Decius is to be read Ecdicius, who was Brother-in-law to Sidonius Apollinaris, to whom are extant ſeveral of his Epiſtles, from which it will appear what the State of the Arverni was at this time in reference to the Goths, who indeed did exceedingly diſtreſs them, though they took not the City this year. But of theſe matters we treat particularly in the Hiſtory of the Kingdom of the Goths in Gall and Spain.

Julius Nepos Emperor of the Weſt.

A. D. 475.
Zenone A. Conſ.

66. The Year of our Lord CCCCLXXV had only Zeno the Emperor Conſul in the Eaſt; they of the Weſt having other things to think of, where the Government and Imperial Dignity, like things contemptible, were toſſed from hand to hand without any reverence or reſpect; the fate of the Empire now preſſing ſore upon it. We have ſeen how for a long time the Soveraign Dignity had been in a manner in ſervitude. How they that bore it were advanced by others who expected to be obeyed as Patrons by thoſe their Clients, or rather their Players whom they had adorned with Purple to act the Part of their Fools, rather than any thing elſe; and when they diſpleaſed them they would drive them off the Stage again. That thoſe Brokers of Majeſty of late had been Officers of the Barbarous Nations, we have abundantly ſeen; as alſo that though they made this Majeſty ſo mean and contemptible in the Eyes of all judicious Perſons (however dear the purchaſers paid for it) yet they had ſuch reverence for the antient glory of it, or were ſo ſtruck with an awe of the Roman Name, that they adventured not to take it themſelves, neither transferred it into their own families; if will was preſent power and ſucceſs being wanting, as to Stilicho when he ſought to advance his Son Eucherius. But now the fatal time of the Empire being come, it had the fortune to die by degrees, not in the moſt ſudain and violent manner. Being to fall, it was to fall from one ſtep to another, and ſo to the ground, not from the higheſt pitch, but from a meaner place, that it might be with leſſer noiſe and pain. Ecdicius ſtoutly defending, or, as others ſay, having yielded up the City of the Arverni, was ſent for by Nepos and honoured with the Dignity of Patritian. Into his place and power in Gall, the Emperor thought fit to promote Oreſtes, whom he had advanced to the Dignity of Magiſter Militum, which he added to that of Patritian.

Auguſtus Emperor in the Weſt.

67. This Oreſtes, its ſaid, was a Goth, who by his military Actions had got reputation, and commanded the Auxiliaries of that Nation, in Italy. He being ordered for Gall, to give reſtraint to the ambitious practices of Eurich, when he had his Army now ready at his Devotion, and conſidered what advantage he might take at the weak condition of Nepos, whom he could eaſily ſuppreſs if he pleaſed, gave way to his Appetite, and coming from Rome to Ravenna, where the Emperor lay, eaſily ſpoiled him of the Imperial Enſignes, which he preſumed to put upon his own Son, who by the Soldiers was admitted and owned for Auguſtus. And ſuch he was before in Name, though out of proſpect of the Thing his Father could ſcarcely be induced to give it him. He is generally called Auguſtulus, but his true name was Momilius Auguſtus, as Baronius from an antient Coin exemplified in his Annals ſhows, who takes it for granted that the People in a jeering manner called him Auguſtulus, being wont to give Nicknames as that of Caligula, and it might be the more readily received becauſe Auguſtus Auguſtus did not ſo well ſound as Auguſtulus Auguſtus with ſome variation. Oreſtes having luſtily provided for his Family, the better to eſtabliſh it, ſent and entered into a League with Genſerich, the greateſt Potentate of his Neighbours, and in Gall took ſuch order as he thought convenient for ſtopping the progreſs of Eurich againſt the Arverni; but all to little purpoſe, as we ſhall perceive in the following year, when we have ſeen how in this preſent, Zeno behaved himſelf in the Eaſt.

Zeno ordains that Governors ſtay in their Provinces ſome time after their adminiſtration expired.

68. However his practice might be irregular and ſuitable to that deſcription of his Manners which Evagrius gives us; he took care that others ſhould do their Duties, or be lyable to Accuſations and Puniſhment if they acted contrary. By the antient Law called Lex Julia Repetundarum, All Judges Military and Civil were obliged to continue in the places of their Adminiſtration, fifty days after the laying down of their Imployments, and of this we have ſeen ſomething alſo ſince enacted by imperial Authority. But the preſent behaviour of Governours of Provinces gave freſh occaſion to the reinforcnig and inlarging former Acts of State, which Zeno did on the eleventh of October, by a Conſtitution directed to Sebaſtian the Præfectus Prætorio. It ordains that none of the Clariſſimi, the Præſidents of Provinces, Conſulares or Correctors, or ſuch as have obtained the Enſignes of greater Adminiſtration, that is to ſay the Spectabiles, as Proconſuls, the Præfectus Auguſtalis, Comes of the Eaſt, Vicar of any Tract, any Dux, or Comes of any Limit whatſoever, or Comes of the Divine Houſes, after he hath a Succeſſor ſhall “ dare to ſtir out of the places he governed, before the number of fifty days be “ compleated. But during this ſpace of time, the Præſidents, Conſulares and Correctors “ ſhall continue, in the Metropolis, and thoſe of the Degree of Spectabilis, “ both Military and Civil in the more eminent Cities of the Dioceſs governed, “ and that publickly, not lurking within dores, not in religious places or Regi- “ ons, or Houſes of great men, but converſing openly in the moſt frequented pla- “ ces in the Eyes of them whom they have governed, that free Liberty may be “ afforded to all men to accuſe them of Thefts or other Crimes, ſo as being de- “ fended from all Injuries by their Succeſſors, and at the peril of their Office, “ as alſo of the Curiales and Defenſors of the Cities, giving only a juratory cau- “ tion, they be forth-coming to anſwer according to Law, to any one that ſhall “ accuſe them. Neither ſhall the Revocatory Letters of the Prince himſelf ex- “ cuſe any from ſtaying theſe fifty days, not a Commiſſion for any other Govern- “ ment, not the Precept of the Prefect, or of any other Power, Military or Ci- “ vil, for diſcharging any other truſt, that ſo all Craft may be prevented, and “ what

Vel qui adminiſtrationis majoris inſulas meruerint. Mereri hic ut et apud veteres, non eſt labore vel opere, vel merito adquirere, ſed aliquid adeptum eſſe et obtinuiſſe ſimpliciter. vide Notas in l.h.un. ut omnes Judices &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 49.

what the Emperor deſigns for the ſecurity of the Provinces, may take ef-" fect.

A. D. 475.

69. He that ſhall violate this Law, ſhall incur a Fine of fifty Pounds of" Gold, and alſo his Succeſſor, who ſhall not ſtop and keep in his Province ſuch" an Offendor, nor give ſpeedy notice of his Flight. Now it is declared that none" ſhall quit his Place or adminiſtration till his Succeſſor be come to the Borders" of the Province, And ſuch Perſon as ſhall go away before the fifty days be" expired, whereever he ſhall be diſcovered, though in Conſtantinople, by com-" mand of the Prefect without any delay, and by the care of the Governor of" the Province wherein he ſhall be found, ſhall be conveyed back to continue" ſix moneths for the diſcovery of his Faults. The Office of the Governor who" neglects to ſtop him that will be gone (though with due reſpect) ſhall forfeit" thirty Pounds of Gold. In caſe he be accuſed within fifty Days, and the Suit" be begun, if there be not time remaining out of the fifty to end it, if he be" only ſued civilly, he ſhall have liberty to make his Proctor, and then he may" depart; if Criminally, the Adverſary inſcribing his Name according to the" cuſtom of ſubmitting to the lex Talionis, he ſhall be forced to continue in the" place till the matter be decided. Moreover all Judges before whom ſuch Con-" troverſies ſhall be decided civilly or criminally, whether by right of their Ad-" miniſtration, or by Precept from the Prefect, muſt know, that if they do not" end them within the ſpace of twenty days from their commencing, for their" neglect they ſhall forfeit ten pounds of Gold. And their deciſions and final ter-" minations ſhall be good.

The remarkeable year.

A. D. 475. Baſiliſco 2. & Armato Coſſ.

70. At length we are arrived at the ſecond Conſulſhip of Baſiliſcus, and that of Armatus, at the year of our Lord CCCCLXXVI, a year of great Revolutions. For great that muſt be indeed which put an end to the dominion of that City, which had ſo long exerciſed it over ſo great a part of the Earth, as was called the Roman World; which put an end to her Dominion, brought her into Subjection to Barbarians, and made her truckle, in ſtead of being the Head of an Empire, among other Members of an Italian Kingdom. But ſo now it was. Oreſtes had already indeed brought the Dominion into a Barbarous Family; but ſtill the Name of Empire continued; and as the name of his Emperor, ſo the Title, Juriſdiction, Authority, and all were owned to be Roman. But the Nobility that ſided with Nepos were much diſatisfied, and they thought it a thing already as bad as could be, and if the Soveraignty muſt be placed in Barbarous Hands, then they would have a Man of their own chooſing. At this time there was eminent in the Northern Parts, Odoacer King of the Heruli, Thuringi and Scyri, by original a Rugian, or inhabitant of an Iſland planted in the Baltick with Germans. He, as well as other Captains of the Barbarous Nations, had a mind to be trying his Fortune in Italy; and, as he deſired he, was choſen to this conduct by the Nations who riſing out of Pannonia and thoſe Coaſts, deſired nothing more than to invade that harraſed Country. They had got a taſte of the goodneſs thereof, in the Invaſions of Attila, and now ſufficiently underſtood in how pityful a condition Momilius Auguſtus, that thing called an Emperor, was; how unable to withſtand ſo great a ſhock as they were able to give him.

Rugui.

Paulus Diaconus.

Odoacer King of the Heruli overcomes Oreſtes.

71. Yet Oreſtes was ready and met him on the Borders of Italy with a very good Force as he could judge, but when he came to compare the ſtrength of the Enemy with his own, he found himſelf inferior in numbers, and well he might be, for the Goths forſook him, becauſe as ſome report, he had not divided to them the third part of the Lands, as he had ingaged. He thought it beſt to retreat to Pavia, and there he fortified himſelf, having more reaſon to truſt to the ſtrength of the Walls, than Fidelity of his Soldiers. Odoacer was not far behind, but purſued and reſolved to attacque the City. And within a few days he became maſter of it, and of Oreſtes in it. The City was permitted to be plundered by the Soldiers, who made cruel havock of all things and Perſons, while to find out Treaſure they omitted none of the cruel means, and it was in a manner reduced to Aſhes with its two Churches, Epiphanius its Biſhop being roughly handled, though he prevailed vailed for the Liberty of his Siſter and other Women. This hapned on the three and twentieth of Auguſt, and Odoacer was by his men ſaluted King of Italy. Contented, yet proud with this Honour, he went to Placentia, and there put to death Oreſtes, which done there nothing remained but to ſuppreſs Auguſtus his Son. To effect this he proceeded to Ravenna, where though he miſſed of him, he took and killed his Uncle Paul the Brother of Oreſtes. Now he thought fit to take in the ſeveral Cities which ſeemed averſe to his Intereſt. For this purpoſe he diſtributed his Forces which made ſad deſolations in ſeveral places, the Empire of Rome not being to fall without many other Cities buried in its Ruines, which Mutina to ſome really ſeems to have been; there being no mention of it, nor its neighbour Regium, afterwards made in the Gothick Wars. At length the Conqueror goes to Rome, the Inhabitants whereof went out to meet him, and received their Lord and Soveraign with Acclamations. Momilius almoſt dead for Fear, put off the Imperial Habit of his own accord, and was confined by Odoacer to Lucullanum a Caſtle in Campania, where we may imagine he quitted the Name as well as the Title of Auguſtus, for fear the Conqueror ſhould find Treaſon in it as well as the other.

Is ſaluted King of Italy.

Momilius deveſts himſelf of the Purple.

71. That Tempeſt of Violence and uſurpation which raged at this time, and was ſo powerful as to overturn an Empire ſo firmly rooted, had alſo its effect in the Eaſt, and at Conſtantinople. For there Baſiliſcus who had been ſpared by Leo, could not brook Zeno ſhould be preferred before him; but laid his Trains ſo artificially, that therewith Zeno circumvented was conſtrained to be gone, ſome ſay into Iſauria his Country, others into Italy, and Baſiliſcus was by the Soldiers ſaluted Emperor, which Title having aſſumed, he conferred that of Cæſar on his Son Marcus, and for about a Year and an half he proſpered in his uſurped Power. Thus new Rome ſeemed to ſympathize with the old, and could not but fall ſick, when ſhe laboured under her mortal Diſtemper. And this happened the very ſame year, though at what time we cannot exactly tell. By the dates indeed of three Laws extant in Juſtinians Code, which have been by the Annotators aſſigned to this year, it muſt have been after the Moneth of February, toward the later end of which one of them is ſaid to have been made by Zeno yet in power. But ſome miſtake is Committed in the Date of them, and indeed Baſilius, not Baſiliſcus, is ſaid to be Conſul: moreover another which bears his Name, and hath this year ſet to it, is ſaid to be dated on the twenty eighth of December, which could not be, for he was forced into retirement before that time, and beſides Baſilius is noted as Conſul. But thus was the whole Empire diſtreſſed and in diſturbance; but that of the Weſt quite failed, being cantonized and parcelled out into the Poſſeſſion of Barbarians. Our Britain, as we have ſeen, was haraſed by Engliſh Saxons, Picts and Scots, and quitted long ſince by the Romans. Spain was held by the Goths, Suevi, Alans and ſuch like; Africk by Genſerich and his Vandalls; In Pannonia and ſeveral Provinces Eaſtward the Hunns, Goths and other Barbarous Nations had neſted themſelves. Gall was lately held and divided by Tetrarchies; for beſides that Pittance which remained to the Emperor, it was parted by the Goths, Burgundians and Franks. And now laſt of all Italy it ſelf was inſlaved to the Heruli, and the Miſtreſs of the World reduced to a Condition below that of Majeſty.

Zeno driven from Conſtantinople by Baſiliſcus.

*L.*23. *de Jure Dotium Cod. Juſt. lib.*5. tit. 12.

*L.*5.de Naturalibus liberis lib. 5. tit. 27. & l.ult.de. Magiſtratibus conveniendis lib. 5. tit. ult.

The Empire in the Weſt fails.

72. Thus we ſee the Inconſtancy of all Sublunary things, the Viciſſitude of human Affairs, and the vanity of all Mundane Greatneſs. Rome which had triumphed over all the World, now affoarded herſelf matter for a Triumph, loſt her Dominion and became ſubject to ſuch Abject People, as formerly, though not of late, ſhe had deſpiſed with the greateſt Scorn. Behold another Face of things. She had run a madding after the new Faſhions and Novelties of the Barbarians, and was now forced to receive them, not as Foreigne but Domeſtick; and the Gown in reality muſt give place to the Pells. She had been Captivated in mind before ſhe was taken, and now was become inſlaved to all purpoſes. So do Novelties longed after often bring a Surfeit, and the World being a Stage ſeems to affect, and to be afflicted with, variety

Sect 7. variety of things and Perſons, as well as men. This Empire of old Rome as it began in Auguſtus, ſo it ended in one of the ſame Name, the like of which is to be obſerved of other Kingdoms. Now it remains that we firſt treat of the remaining part of the Empire, though ſtill Roman in its Body, yet as headed by the New or Daughter Rome, viz. Conſtantinople. And then of the original of the ſeveral Nations which cantonized the Weſtern Empire, and of their Kingdoms therein erected, in order, as theſe Kingdoms were contemporary with the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Empire. A. D. 476.

And of theſe, God willingly, ſhortly.

FINIS.

UMI

A

TABLE.

A.

ABactis, P. 25.
Ablavius his Libel againſt Conſtantine, 4.
Actor, or Syndicus, who, 75.
Adjutor of the Magiſter Officiorum, who. 53.
Admiſſionales, who. 52.
Adore the Purple, what, 52. what Officials were permitted to do it. 105.
Ætius, Captain to John the Uſurper ſubmits to the Emperor. 627. is advanced. 628. worſteth the Burgundians. 637. is ſlain. 692.
Africk in a ſad condition, together with Iſauria and other places. 240.
Agentes in Rebus, their Name, Duty and Privileges. 50. Reduced. 638.
Agonotheta, who. 76.
Ala of Horſe, how many. 47.
Alani, who. 290.
Alarich Invades Greece in an hoſtile manner. 475. reſolves to march for Italy. 537. upon his Entrance they of Italy give all for loſt. 539. marcheth Weſtward. 555. pierceth into Italy, 561. Blocks up Rome. 562. Depoſeth his Mock-Emperor Attalus. 578. Beſiegeth Rome the ſecond time. 579. takes it, when, and upon what occaſion. 580. dies. 584. His Burial ibid.
Almans waſte the Borders of the Empire, but are chaſtiſed by Julian. 144, & 145.
Ambaſſadors from Perſia. 358.
Ambroſe, Biſhop of Milan, his Embaſſy, and the diſcourſe between him and Maximus. 387, 388. commanded by Maximus to be gone. 389.
Ammianus Marcellinus his extraordinary Commendations of Julian. 111. eſcapes at the taking of Amida by Sapor, King of Perſia. 138. his Birth and Breeding. 308. Employment. 309. wrote his Hiſtory at Rome, publiſhed there in parts. 309. its Excellency. 310.
Anthemius and Troilus reform matters. 553. Anthemius lays down. 602. defeats the Huns. 676. owned Auguſtus. 710. Conſul alone the ſecond time, ibid. anſwers the Petition of Julia. 715.
Antonius, a rich Merchant, injur'd, flies to the Perſian King. 133.
Antoninus, his Itinerary, what. 644.
Arbetio defeated. 105. ſuſpected at Court. 112.
Arbogaſtes Invadeth the Territories of the Franks. 427
Arcadius made Emperor. 338. ſucceeds his Father in the Eaſt. 473. Reſtrains perjury. 480. makes it lawful to give Sentence in Aſia, in the Greek Tongue. 495. makes ſuperexaction of Tributes Capital. 497. ſeveral Edicts and Laws. 507, & 519. gives the Title of Emperor to his young Son Theodoſius. 536. dies. 552.
Arcarius of a City. 73.
Archiota, or Antiquarius, who. 75.
Arvandus, Præfect of Gall. 710. mana- ged his Office ill. 711. is tried. ibid. baniſhed. 712. put to death. 713.

Aſpar and his Sons kill'd. 717.

Ataulf ſucceeds Alarich. 584. driven into Spain. 597.

Athanarich driven out of his Country. 328. dies and is buried at Conſtantinople. 329.

Attalus delivered up. 600.

Attila murders his Brother Bleda. 659. breaks the Peace with Theodoſius. 673. his Seat. 677. pierces into Germany. 684. Invades the Weſtern Empire with ſeven hundred thouſand men. 685. rages in Gall with Fire and Sword. ibid. worſted in the Battel in the Campi Catalaunici. 686. eſcapes by permiſſion of Ætius into Illyricum. 687. invades Italy, and takes Aquileia. 688. waſtes it betwixt the Alpes and Apennine, then Retreats. 689. Attacks the Alani in vain. 690. dies. 691. his Funeral, ibid. his Sons driven into Pontus, and their Poſſeſſions ſhared. 692.

Auguſtine Biſhop of Hippo, dies during the ſiege thereof. 635.

Avitus made Emperor in Gall. 666. lays down the Purple. ibid.

Aurelianus ſucceeds Proculus. 422. ſucceeds Anthemius. 602.

Aurelius Victor's Character of Theodoſius. 445.

Aureus, what. 60.

Auxilia, who. 46, & 47.

B.

Barbarians Invade Illyricum. 280. Attempt Leptis. 253.

Barbatio and his Wife put to death. 131.

Barzimeres cut off by the Scythians. 294.

Baſilius, Conſul and Præfect, his Encomium, 704.

Baſilius ſaluted Emperor by the Soldiers, confers the Title of Cæſar on his Son Marcus. 726. proſpers in his uſurped Power for about a year and an half. ibid.

Battle very bloody. 294. moſt dreadful of all others. 298.

Berytus, its Eminency in the Reign of Theodoſius. 360.

Bread given to Conſtantinople by Conſtantine. 8.

Britain fenced by Adrian with Walls, Cities, Towns and Caſtles. 43. falls off from the Empire. 661. what of moment paſſed in Britain after Conſtantius his Reign. 662. bereaved af her ſtrength by Maximus, and harraſſed by the Northern Nations. ibid. ſends to Rome for Aid. 663. a Wall of Turfes made in Britain. ibid. another Wall of Stone made. 664. the great turn of its State. 665. look'd on by the Romans (who kept it with difficulty,) as another World. 666. Adrian ſhares with the Natives, ſtraightned by Lollius Urbicus, though Severus did little againſt them. ibid. the Roman diviſions of it. 667. its Government, Vicar, ſubordinate Magiſtrates, Civil, Military, and the Comes thereof, 668. The Comes Limitis Saxonici, Enſigns of his Authority, and the dux Britanniarum. ibid. The Forces of the Limit. 670. Cawſeys raiſed. 672. Forces ſent out of Britain. 673.

Byzantium its State. 6.

C.

Cæſar, Heir of the Empire who. 24. Enſigns of his Dignity. ibid.

Camelarii, who. 76.

Campi Catalaunici, the bloody Battel fought there, between the Romans and Barbarians. 686.

Carthage deſcribed, and the Vices of the Inhabitants. 645.

Caſſiodorus ſent Ambaſſador to Attila. 677.

Caſtinus baniſhed. 628.

Caſtrenſis, who. 64. Caſtrenſiani. ibid.

Cataphracti, who. 47.

Chryſoſtom, the Biſhop's Oration to reſtrain the people in the Caſe of Eutropius, as to Sanctuary. 516. is baniſhed. 544.

City in the Empire, what. 39. Cities named in the ablative Caſe. 671.

Claudian his Account of the African War. 509. his moſt Elegant Panegyrick, on the ſingle Conſulſhip of Flavius Mallius Theodorus. 513.

Codicils, what. 490.

Cohort, what 45.

Coines Roman, of Braſs, Silver and Gold, 59. their ſumms of Money. 60.

Coloni in the Empire, who. 537.

Comites, three Ranks of them. 26. Comes Britanniarum, who. 44. Comes of the Eaſt. 40. Comes ſacrarum Largitionum, his Title and Office. 56. Comes Largitionum. 57. Comes Commerciorum. ibid. Comes & Rationalis ſummarum. 58. Comes metallorum per Illyricum. 57. Comes diſpoſitionum. 67. Comes rei privatæ, his Titles, Officers and Power. 61.

Commentarienſis, who. 35.

Conſiſtory, what. 26.

Conſtans made Cæſar, 12. publiſhes Edicts. 80. comes over into Britain. 81. makes ſeveral Laws. 82. is murdered. 88. his Character. ibid.

Conſtantine, the Great attains the Monarchy.

narchy. 1. puts Licinius to death. 2. his Son Criſpus. 3. his Wife Fauſta. ibid. makes a Bridge over Danubius. 5. vanquiſheth the Scythians. ibid. Foundeth Conſtantinople. 7. Encourages Phyſicians and Profeſſors. 9. his Felicities. 12. dies. ibid. his Character. 13. Zoſimus his Calumnies of him, anſwer'd. 15. his Iſſue, and the grief of all Men at his death. 77. his Sons ſhare the Empire. 78.

Conſtantine, the younger overthrows the Sarmatæ. 11. makes War on his Brother Conſtans. 80. is ſlain. 81.

Conſtantine ſet up for Emperor in Britain, 551. his Uſurpation, ibid. is taken by Conſtantius and put to death. 585.

Conſtantinople, its Buildings, 7. repaired, 549. great fires there, 546. 637. & 705. a Dearth there, 575. grown burthenſom to other Countries. 626.

Conſtantius made Cæſar, 3. makes away his Relations, 78. goes againſt Sapor, the Perſian King, 79. makes an Haven at Seleucia, 83. makes a Law in favor of Eunuchs and publiſhes an Act of Oblivion, 93. purſues Magnentius into Italy, ibid. a Statue erected to him at Rome, 94. his ſeverity, 97. makes Peace with the Almans, 100. makes bad uſe of the deliverance from Sylvanus, 108. makes ſome gratious Laws, ibid. makes his Couſin Julian, Cæſar, 109. many Perſons put to death on frivolous pretences, 113. prohibits the melting and ſelling of Coin, ibid. Leſſens the power of Governours in raiſing Money, 114. goes to Rome, 115. the manner of his Entry, 116. makes ſome Laws at Rome, 117. builds an Obeliske there, 124. overthrows the Sarmatæ and Quadi, 126. divers of the petty Princes with their people ſubmit, ibid. the deſtruction of the Amicenſes and ſubmiſſion of the Picenſes, 128. makes a Law to exempt his Lands from extraordinary ſervice, 131. regulates Affairs, 139. being jealous, he grows cruel, 141. ſends for part of his Army from Julian, 142. a Libel hereupon, ibid. makes ſeveral Laws, 146. makes a Præfect of Conſtantinople, and an Edict againſt the Abuſes of the Ægyptian Husbandmen, 147. rages at the Letters ſent him by Julian, 148. Beſiegeth Bezabde, but is forced to raiſe it, 153. publiſhes Edicts concerning the Curſus Publicus, 154. buries his Wife Euſebia, 156. receives the news of Julian's Practices, 160. accuſeth him to the Army, and ſends Forces againſt him, 161. dies at Mopſueſtia, 162. his Indulgence to Senators, 163. Virtues, 164. Vices, 165. Characters by Pagan Authors. 166.

Conſtantius the Comes marries Placidia, the Emperor's Siſter, 607. is made Emperor, 615. dies, ibid.

Conſul who, 28. his place merely Titular, 29.

Conſularis, who, 42.

Cornicularius, who, 34.

Corrector, who, 42.

Cubicularii, 48.

Cura Epiſtolarum, 36.

Curator Annonæ of a City, 74. Curator Calendarum, ibid.

Curiales, freed from corporal puniſhment by Conſtantius, 85.

Curioſus, who, 54.

Curſus Publicus, what. 54. by whom firſt inſtituted, ibid.

Cyrus, an Eminent Prelate, 641.

D.

Decani, who, 48.

Decuriones, who, 69. their dignity, ibid.

Defenſor Civitatis, his Work, 72.

Degrees of Dignity, five, 26.

Denarius, of what value, 59. Bigatus and Quadrigatus, the ſame, ibid.

Denſices, the Son of Attila defeated and ſlain, 714.

Deſcription of Paris, 185.

Domeſtick Protectors, 63.

Domitian, the Præfects Indiſcretion, 98. he and Montius the Quæſtor, murdered by Gallus his men, ibid.

Domitian's Law, 133.

Duces Limitanei, 43.

Duumviri, who 71.

Dux Britanniarum, 44.

E.

Earthquakes very terrible in the time of Conſtantius, 83. other dreadful ones, 231. 673. 702.

Edict againſt Informers by Conſtantius and Conſtans, 79.

Emperour, Head of the State. 24. Enſigns of his Majeſty, ibid.

Epibole, what, 339.

Epiſcopus or Inſpector of a City, 74.

Eugenius declared Emperour, 416. ſends towards the Emperour to know his Inclination to him, 417. gains Italy, 427. is defeated by Theodoſius, 429. put to death, 430.

Eu-

Eugenius his Care of Buildings and Highways, 378.
Eutropius procures the Baniſhment of Timaſius, 486. his lewd Actions, 497. deſign'd Conſul in the Eaſt, 515. put to death, 516.
Exceptores, who, 36.

F.

Famine and Peſtilence great, 693.
Fauſtinus ſtrangely put to death, 284.
Ferentarii, who, 47.
Feſtus, Proconſul of Aſia, his Cruelty 262.
Firmus uſurps in Africk, 268. begs pardon of Theodoſius, 269. Hangs himſelf. 272.
Flavianus goes to the Emperor Theodoſius, 382. uſeth Arguments with him to pardon the Antiochians, 383. prevails, 385.
Flavius Mallius Theodorus, Conſul alone, 513.
Florentius his Generoſity and Piety, 649.
Fraiutus made General againſt Gaines, 526. defeats him at Sea, 527.
Franks take Triers, 593. Erect a Kingdom in Gall, 697.

G.

Gabinius, King of the Quadi perfidiouſly murdered, and the Conſequence thereof, 272.
Gaines procures Tribigild to waſte Aſia, 505. he and Leo made Generals, 506. procures Leo and his Forces to be deſtroyed, 507. effects the death of Eutropius, 515. he and Tribigild waſte the Provinces, 525. endeavours to take Conſtantinople, 526. returns to his own Country, and is kill'd by the Huns, 527.
Gall miſerably waſted, 554.
Gallus made Cæſar, 91. Acts like a madman, 96. a Plague to all good men, 98. having loſt his Wife is exceedingly perplexed, 101. moves towards the Emperor, ibid. is made away. 102.
Genſerich waſtes Africk, 634. falls upon Carthage, 645. his Rage and Cruelty againſt it, 646. rifles Rome, 695. carries away Priſoners Eudoxia, and her two Daughters, 696. his Actions, during the Interregnum in the Weſt, 708.
Gerontius defeats a party of Barbarians without order, 372. is call'd to account for it, 373. puts Conſtans the Son of Conſtantine, the Uſurper to death, 585. being in danger in Spain, kills himſelf, ibid.
Gildo uſurps in Africk, 495. is defeated, and put to death, 509.
Glycerius made Emperour, 719.
Godigiſil Invades Gall, 550.
Goths beaten by the Huns, paſs into Thrace, 291. their Admiſſion pernicious to the Empire, 292. Beſige Adrianople, but raiſe the Siege, 307. Approach Perinthus and face Conſtantinople, 308. murder Sigerich, their King, 603. permitted to Inhabit Gall, 612.
Gratian forces the Lentienſes to beg peace, 296. makes Theodoſius his General and Auſonius, his Tutor, Conſul, 311. makes Laws, 312, 313. is indulgent to Phyſicians and ſevere againſt Debtors, 322. favours the Navicularii, 327. makes a Law concerning Precedence of Officers, 338. his laſt Edict, 344. periſheth by Treaſon, 346. his Character by Pagan Writers, and by Auſonius, his Schoolmaſter, 347. his gratitude to him, 349.
Gratian made Emperor by the Britains, but kill'd by the Soldiers, 663.
Grumbates, King of the Chionitæ, aſſiſts Sapor againſt the Romans 135. loſt his Son in the Siege of Amida, ibid. reſolves to Sacrifice the City to his Ghoſt, 136. the manner of the Siege, and a violent Attacque renewed without ſucceſs, ibid.
Gruthungi agree with the other Barbarians to waſte the Territories of the Empire, 292.
Gymnaſiarcha, who, 76.

H.

Haſtati, who, 47.
Heraclianus uſurps, and is kill'd by the Soldiers, 593. his Eſtate confiſcated, and acts, as Conſul, nulled, 595.
Honorati, who, 224. commanded to furniſh out Soldiers, 551.
Honoria, the Siſter of Valentinian, miſcarries in her Reputation, 637.
Honorius, the Son of Theodoſius born, 363. makes Laws, 482. regulates the Office of Peraquator in Africk, 493. the people run a madding after the faſhions of the Barbarians, and he makes a Law a Law againſt it, 501. Subjects his Domain to find Soldiers, 504. makes Edicts after the death of Gildo, 512. commands Judges to put the Laws in Execution, 523. enters Rome in Triumph, 543. endeavours to reform Abuſes there, 554. gives the Title of Cæſar to his Son Conſtans, and marries Thermantia, 555. reſolves for Ravenna, 556. ſends the Imperial Habit to Conſtantine, the Tyrant, 564. reduced to great ſtraights, 568. eſtabliſheth the Defenſors of the City, 569. redreſſes grievances, 588. gratifies the Provincials of Africk in matter of Sports, 593. put to ſhifts for raiſing Money, 603. ſends his Peræquator, Sebaſtius, into Africk, 607. makes ſeveral Laws, 621. dies of a Dropſie, 623. his Character, ibid. ſome Laws made in his time, without note of time, 624.

Horſes, the uſe of them forbidden to certain perſons, 224. two Breeds forbidden to be uſed, by Arcadius, 481.

Huns Invade the Empire, their manner of living, 289. fall on the Alani, then on the Goths, 291. Invade the Provinces, 586. fall into the Empire, 655.

I.

Jaculatores, who, 47.

Illuſtrious Perſons who, 26. their Degrees, 48.

Fifteen Illuſtrious Perſons in the Eaſt, 64.

Inſpector, vide Epiſcopus.

Interregnum in the Weſt, 708.

John, the Præfectus Prætorio, Uſurps, 624. taken, 626. put to death, 627.

Jovian choſen Emperor, 209. could not have proſecuted the War, as left him by Julian, 212. nor ought to have broken the Truce, ibid. dies ſuddenly, 214. Laws ſeeming to have been made by him, 215, & 216.

Jovinus defeats the Almans, near Metz, 234. Uſurps in Gall, 586. driven out of Gall, 587.

Jovius embroils the Emperor in new Troubles, 566.

Irenarchæ, who, 75.

Iſauri-Rovers diſperſed, 36. make depredations, but are quieted, 141. & 146.

Julian made Cæſar, 109. goes into Gall after his Marriage, 110. Accuſed by Marcellus, vindicated by Eutherius, 112. wins the Battle at Argentoratum, 120. hath the better of the Franks, ibid. provides for the Provinces, ſubdues the Salii, &c. 121. his Army mutinies for want of Proviſions, ibid. diverts them by an Invaſion, is envied at Court, 122. Invades Germany, and ſeveral Princes ſubmit, 130. ſaluted Emperour declines, but is compell'd to Acceptance, 143. his Speech in praiſe of himſelf, 144. reduces the Rauraci, 152. bids defiance to Conſtantius, 154. makes his great Officers, 157. falls foul on Conſtantius, and the memory of his Uncle, 159. in fear of himſelf, 160. hears of the death of Conſtantius, 167. comes to Conſtantinople, and puts ſeveral to death, 168. profeſſes himſelf a Pagan, 169. affected in all his ways, 171. courted by all Nations, ibid. makes ſeveral Laws, 172, 173, 174, & 175. an inſtance of his Juſtice and Severity, 177. his Behaviour at Antioch, 177. falls out with them there and compoſes his Miſopogon, 184. enters his fourth Conſulſhip, and in vain endeavours to rebuild Jeruſalem, 191. paſſeth Euphrates, is preſented with a Golden Crown by the Saracens, 193. enters Aſſyria, 195. grows raſh, puts the Perſian to flight, 198. burns his Fleet, 199. met by a power of Perſians, 200. who fall on his Army, 201. he receives a Wound in his ſide, is carried into his Tent, and makes a Speech to his Soldiers, ibid. dies, 202. his Character by Ammianus, his Virtues, 206. Vices, 207.

Julius puts the Goths to the Sword, 308.

Julius Nepos made Emperor of the Weſt. 723. ſpoiled of the Imperial Enſigns, at Ravenna, by Oreſtes, 724.

Juſtinian, the Law for rebuilding Conſtantinople declared univerſal by him, 708.

L.

Lampadarii, who, 52.

Laterculum, what, 64.

Legatee, whether he can be a Witneſs, 490.

Legati, who, and how choſen, 76.

Legions, what, 45. two Legions and a Cohort ſeize on Aquileia in the name of Conſtantius, 158.

Lentienſes humbled, 105.

Leo choſen Emperor in the Eaſt, 699. Commands Soldiers to attend Military Affairs alone, 701. publiſhes a Law for regiſtring Donations, 702. makes Zeno his Vicegerent, 705. publiſheth a Conſtitution for Rebuilding Conſtantinople, 706. a Law for encouragement of the Voluntary Curiales, 708. pitcheth upon Anthemius to be his Colleague in the Weſtern Empire, 709. makes preparations againſt Genſerich, 713. his Fleet burnt by the procurement of Aſpar, 714. directs an Edict to Lupercianus, 716. makes ſeveral Laws, 717. dies, 720. good Laws made by him, ibid.

Libanius his Letter to Ammianus Marcellinus, 309.
Libella, what, 59.
Limenarchæ, who, 75.
Limigantes Sarmatæ Rebel againſt their Maſters, 11. the ſtrange pertinacy of them, 128.
Limits of the Empire, what, 42. nine appointed by Auguſtus, and how many afterwards, ibid.
Littorius defeated, 645.

M.

MÆcilianus brings ſeveral Complaints out of Africk, which Honorius endeavours to ſatisfie, 531.
Magiſter militum, who, 45.
Magiſter Officiorum, his Place and Power, 49.
Magiſter Linteæ Veſtis, 58. Privatæ Veſtis, ibid.
Magiſtri Scriniorum, three, 65.
Magnentius uſurps, 87. cauſes Magiſtrates to be murdered, 89. takes and razeth Sciſcia, 92. overthrown in Battel, flies into Italy, ibid. ſeveral times defeated, killeth himſelf, 94.
Majorianus choſen Emperor in the Weſt, 699. his Letter to the Senate, ibid. Beſiegeth Carthage in vain, 701. ſetles Matters in Gall, 703. is murdered by Ricimer, ibid.
Maratocupreni, who, 250.
Marcellus puts on the Purple, 231. is tortured to death, ibid.
Marina, Daughter of Arcadius, dies, 679.
Martian, the Emperor, who, 681. ſtories portending his Preferment, ibid. remits arrears of Tribute by Edict, 682. reforms ſomthing about the Conſulſhip. 689. dies, 697. his Commendation, 698.
Maſtigophori, 76.
Maximinus his horrible Pranks, 247. his, and his Complices ill ends, afterward, 249. being made Præfect, Governs Valentinian, 263. the cruel Effects thereof, ibid. his cruelty atteſted by Laws, 264.
Maximus rebels againſt Gratian, 345. rages after his fall, 353. his extravagancies in Gall deſcribed by Pacatus, ibid. offers a League to Theodoſius, 355. Invades Italy, 387. his Son Victor, ſlain, 395.
Maxinius uſurps, 694. is diſquieted in mind and kill'd, 695.
Menſores, who, 51.
Microcomia what, and how free, 715.
Miners commanded to return into Thrace, 256.
Modares cuts off a party of Barbarians 318.
Momilius Auguſtus made Emperor in the Weſt, 724. in a very pitiful condition, 725. diveſts himſelf of the Purple, 726.
Money, Braſs, 58. Silver, 59. Gold ibid. ſums, 60.
Montius, the Quaſtor murdered by Gallus his Men, 98.

N.

NAtalis ſent back to his Province, 334.
Navicularii, who, 9. indulged by Valens the Emperor, 267.
Nepotianus, ſetting up for himſelf, is defeated, and ſlain, 89.
Nobiliſſimus, who, 24.
Nomiſma, 60.
Numerarii, who, 35.
Nummus, and Seſtertius Nummus, the ſame Coine, what, 59.
Nyctoſtrategi, who, 76,

O.

OBolus, what, 59.
Odoacer, King of the Heruli, overcomes Oreſtes, 725. is ſaluted King of Italy, 726.
Officers, who ſerv'd the Emperor at Court, 48.
Olybrius Emperor for a while, but died in his ſeventh month, 719.
Oſtrogoths tumultuous, 704. make incurſions into the Eaſtern and Weſtern Empire, 719. Places aſſigned them to Inhabit, ibid.

P.

Pacatus his favourable account of Theodoſius, 392. his Panegyrical Oration to him in the Senate-Houſe, 401. wipes off the dirt thrown on him by Zoſimus, 433.

Pædagogia, 64.

Palatini, who, 47. Comitatenſes, ibid.

Pantapolæ, who, 653. ſtirs about them in Rome, 654.

Paras, King of Armenia, baſely murdered, 277.

Patritii, who, 26.

Paul, the Notary, a covetous malicious Back-biter, 97.

Peace made with Perſia, 618.

Peltati, who, 46.

Perſian King ſends a lofty Letter to Conſtantius, and receives an Anſwer, 123.

Perſians infeſt the Eaſtern Provinces, 115.

Placidia quarrels with Boniface, and the War againſt him goes on, 632. takes courſe to obviate the Attempts of Genſerich in Africk, 634. dies, 979.

Politie of the Empire about Conſtantine's time, 23.

Præfect, a legionary Officer, who, 46. Præfectus Auguſtalis, 40. Præfectus Prætorio, 29. his power abridged by Conſtantine, 30. the Officers belonging to him, with their Names and Imployment, 34. Præfecti Theſaurorum, 57. Præfect of the Eaſt, 32. of Illyricum, ibid. of Gall, 33. of Rome, 37. of Conſtantinople, 38. of Italy, 33. Præfects of Italy ſeveral at the ſame time, and why, 337.

Præpoſitus ſacri Cubiculi, 48. Præpoſiti Baſtagarum, 61.

Præſentales, who, 45.

Præſes, 42.

Prætextatus, Præfect of Rome, his Acts, 241.

Pretextatus, Præfect of Italy, dies, 357.

Prætors, their Election regulated, 114. at Conſtantinople reduced to three, 682.

Primicerius Notariorum, who, 64.

Princeps of the Præfects Office, 34. Principes of the Legionary Soldiers, 46.

Priſcus ſent Ambaſſador to Attila, 677.

Probus much blamed, 283.

Proconſul, 41. of Aſia, ibid.

Procopius, Julian's Kinſman, Uſurps, 228. grows Tyrannical, is delivered up, and put to death, 230.

Procurator of a City, 73. Metallorum, 75. Gynæciorum, Baphiorum & Monetarum, 58.

Protectors ſent into Provinces to bring back Straglers from their Colours, 531.

Province, what, 39. Provincial Magiſtrates, ibid.

Provincials of Africk vexed by the Saturiani and Subafrenſes, 520.

Pſeudo-Comitatenſes, who, 48.

Pulcheria forced to retire to a private Life, 674. the Empire again devolved on her by the death of Theodoſius, and ſhe Marries Martian 681.

Q.

Quadrigatus vide Denarius.

Quæſtor Palatii, who, his Employment, Place, &c. P. 55, & 56.

Quintinus defeated. 395.

R.

Regerendarius, who. 36.

Remigius hangs himſelf, 277.

Ricimer deſpiſeth Severus, 705. rebels, 718. breaks into Rome and murders Anthemius, 719.

Roman Standards, what Images they bore, 47.

Romanus, Præfect of Africa, refuſeth to relieve the People, 252. Romanus and Palladius, their vilianous Practices, 253.

Rome again yielded to Alarich, whoſe Citizens make Attalus Emperor, 567. a great Famine there, 577.

Rufinus cauſeth Promotus to be murdered, 420. procures Proculus to be beheaded, ibid. left Governor to Arcadius, 473. out of Ambition brings all to Ruine, ibid. diſappointed of marrying his Daughter to Arcadius, 474. ſtirs up Alarich againſt him, 475. is kill'd, 476.

S.

Sapor beſiegeth Niſibis, 83. leaves it with loſs, 84. takes two Roman Caſtles, 135. the City Amida and razeth it, 138. beſiegeth Singara, 144. takes it by Aſſault, as alſo Bezabde, 145.

145. repulſed at Urta, ibid. Invades Armenia, murders Arſaces, and drives out Paras his Son, 246.

Sarmatæ driven out of poſſeſſion by their Slaves, 11. receiv'd into the Empire, ibid.

Saxons infeſt the Coaſts of the Empire, but are cut off, 251.

Schola, what, 50. eight ſeveral kinds of them, ibid.

Scrinia, what, 65. four in the Palace, ibid.

Scrinium of the Comes diſpoſitionum, 67. Libellorum, ibid. Epiſtolarum, 66. Memoriæ, ibid.

Sebaſtian cuts off many Barbarians, 296. & 566.

Sembella, what, 59.

Senate and Senators, 25. Senators compelled to diſcharge their Duties in the City, 103. Senates of Citties, 69.

Serena condemned to death by the Senate, 562.

Seronatus, Præfect of Gall, 712.

Services ſordid, what, 337. who excuſed from them, 336.

Seſterces, 61. Seſtertius, 59. their Rules about Seſterces, 61.

Severus made Emperor, 703. poiſoned, 708.

Siege of Rome rais'd by Money, 564.

Silentiarii, who, and their Privileges, 51.

Socrates his Narration of the Siege of Conſtantinople, 310.

Soldiers mutiny, 557.

Spectabilis who, Perſons of that Rank, 64.

Stationarii, 75.

Stilicho made Governour, to Honorius, 473. out of Ambition, together with Rufinus, brings all to Ruine, ibid. marries his Daughter to Honorius, 474. ſends an Army into the Eaſt, which deſtroyes Rufinus, 476. quiets the Franks and other Nations, 479. reſtrains Perjury by ſevere penalties, 480. He, and Eutropius, though at Enmity, agree to ſpoile the Provinces, 505. Stilicho made Conſul at length, 524. appeaſeth the Romans, at the Entrance of Alarich into Italy, 539. Relieves Honorius Beſieged by Alarich, 540. gets one notable Victory, and a ſecond, 542. defeats Radagaiſus, 548. a Statue Erected to him at Rome, 549. put to death, 558. his Commendations, 559. his and his Friends Eſtates confiſcated, ibid.

Subadjuva, 36. Subadjuvæ to the Adjutor, 54.

Suſceptor, 57. & 73.

Sylvanus, a ſtrange device againſt him, 106. forced, for his own preſervation to uſurp, 107. ſlain, ibid.

Symmachus deſires Statues to be Erected to the memory of Prætextatus, 358 his Commendation of the Laws of Theodoſius, 397. his praiſe of him after his death, 445.

Syndicus, vide Actor.

T.

Tabernarii denied the uſe of ſtooles and frequenting publick places, 493.

Tabularius, who, 57.

Teruntius, what, 59.

Themiſtius, his Oration in praiſe of Theodoſius, 438. his ſecond Oration, 441.

Theodorich Victorious in Spain, 697.

Theodoſius ſent to repreſs the Barbarians in Britain, 240. from London he ſettles Matters in Britain, 250. is ſent into Africk againſt Firmus the Uſurper, 268. defeats two Nations there, 269. after all his Services put to death, 272.

Theodoſius, his Son defeats the Sarmatæ, 273. is made Emperor, 312. makes an Edict concerning Aurum Coronarium, 322. enlarges the Power of the Præfectus Prætorio, and makes Laws, 323. &c. ſucceſful by the Confeſſion of Zoſimus and others, 329. makes ſeveral Laws, 329, 330, 331. 339. 361. makes his Son Arcadius Emperor, 338. Reſtrains Ambition, 356. falſe Accuſers, 357. beautifies Conſtantinople, 359. reſtrains libelling and makes Edicts, 369. returns in Triumph to Conſtantinople, 374. ſubjects the Curiales to the Torture by Plummets, celebrates the Quinquennalia of his Son, and Decennalia of himſelf, 379, his Statues are demoliſhed by the Antiochians, 380. ſends Officers to puniſh the Miſdemeanours whom Chriſtian Eremites reſtrain, 381. the miſerable Eſtate of Antioch, during the four days of Proceedings, ibid. the Judges refer the puniſhment to the Emperor, 382. Flavianus the Biſhop goes to the Emperor, ibid. prevailes, 385. the Emperor returns to Theſſalonica, 389. defeats Maximus at Sciſcia, and his Brother at Petovio, 391. follows him to Aquileia, where he is deliver'd up, and put to death, 392. goes to Rome with Valentinian and his Son Honorius, 401. makes an Edict for the Beautifying of Conſtantinople, 401. how he demeaned himſelf, and Pacatus his Panegyrical Oration to him, ibid. what Reformation he made in the City. 402. he, and his two Colleagues in the Empire remove from Rome, to Valencia, 405. come to Milan, and make ſeveral Edicts, 406. Theodoſius removes to Aquileia, 411. thence to Theſſalonica, 412. his Exploit againſt the Barbarians, ibid. arrives at Conſtantinople, 413. prepares for War againſt the Uſurper Eugenius, 417. advanceth his Son Honorius to the Dignity of Emperor, 421. reſcinds the Acts of Tatianus, ibid. enlarges the allowance of Bread to the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople, 422. makes ſeveral Laws, 423. breaks into Italy and defeats Eugenius in Battle, 429. puts him to death, 430. uſeth the Victory with great moderation, 431. dies, 432.

to

Theodoſius the ſecond Emperor his tender Age abuſed, 574. takes care of his Revenue, 575. of the overflowing of Nile, 576. regulates the precedence of Officers, 595. hath War with Perſia, 612. gives his Subjects leave to fortifie their Houſes in the Eaſt, 614. Marries, 616. gratifies Advocates in their Caſtrenſe Peculium, 619. reſtores the leſſer Laterculum to the Quaeſtor, 626. makes an Univerſity at Conſtantinople, 627. Profeſſors Comites of the firſt Rank, 628. is very kind to thoſe of his Bed-Chamber, 635. to the Ægyptians, 639. particularly the Alexandrians, 640. his laſt Conſtitution, 642. his Code confirm'd, 643. when written, 644. ſupplies the defects of his Code by ſeveral Novel Conſtitutions, 646. ſends a Fleet againſt Genſerich which miſcarries, 655. makes Peace with him, 656. hires the Huns to retire, and reinforceth the Limits of the Empire, 657. writes to Valentinian to confirm his Novel Conſtitutions, which he does, 679. dies, 680. his Character and Works, ibid.

Thoriſmond Beſiegeth Arles, 690. is kill'd, 692.

Tiber overflowes extraordinarily, 273.

Treaſons, how many ſorts, 498.

Tribigild waſtes the Provinces of Aſia, 506. is oppoſed by one Valentine, and loſeth his men, ibid.

Tribune, a Legionary Officer, who, 46. Tribune-Notaries, 65.

Tribute to the Empire, what, 31.

Trigetius makes a peace with the Vandals 638.

Tripolis, the Province in a ſad condition, 252.

Truce made with the Perſian, 258.

V.

Valens made Emperor, 218. moveth toward Conſtantinople, 219. reforms Oppreſſion uſed, 225. entercourſe betwixt Valens and others bordering on Ægypt, ibid. ſummons the Sons of the Veterani into the Field, 226. is rail'd on, 227. lays Siege to Nicomedia, 229. is in danger of being ſurpriz'd, ibid. draws off Arbetio from Procopius, 230. ſevere in puniſhment of Rebellion, 231. Invades the Goths, 236. Peace made between him, and the Gruthungi, 237. gives Rules about Tirones, 258. his Succeſſor endeavour'd to be known by Magick, 259. horrible Slaughter thereupon, 261. takes care of his Revenue, 267. provides for Conſtantinople, 274. is Indulgent to the Navicularii, and requires the Luſtralis Collatio, 275. envies his Nephew, going in perſon againſt the Goths, 297. is ſlain in the Battle, 298. his Character, 299. ſeveral Laws made by him after his Brother's death, 300.

Valentinian choſen Emperor, 217. aſſumes his Brother Valens for his Colleague, 218. moves toward Milan, 219. Provides Rome with Neceſſaries, requires the Gold, called Aurum Coronarium, 223. Publiſhes ſeveral Laws, 224. determines the Stature of a Roman Soldier, 238. Condemns the Murci to be burned alive, ibid. makes his Son Gratian Auguſtus, 239. defeats the Almans, 241. makes a cunning Law, 250. Abuſeth the Burgundians, 252. explaines and makes Laws, 254. Indulgent to Widdows, Orphans and Phyſicians, 257. Attempts the Almans, 265. reforms Abuſes, 266. declares the uſe of the Curſus Publicus, 267. makes Edicts, 273. goes into Illyricum, 282. Invades the Quadi, 284. falls into a fit of Rage, and dies, 285. his Government and Vices, 286. Virtues, 287. his Iſſue, 288. a ſtrange Tale of his making a Law for having two Wives together.

Valentinian, his Son declar'd Emperor, 289. concerns himſelf to furniſh Rome with Neceſſaries, 331. makes ſeveral Edicts, 341. leſſens the power of two of his great Officers, 356. makes Laws, 366. flies to Theſſalonica, 387. concerns himſelf for the ſucceſſion of Grand- children by Daughters, 398. is oppoſed by Arbogaſtes, 414. murdered, 415. his Character by Ambroſe the Biſhop, 417.

Valentinian the third born, and the Prodigies at his Birth. 609. made Emperor, 627. Marries the Daughter of Theodoſius, 642. excites his Subjects in Italy againſt Genſerich, 652. makes a Proclamation for aſſerting the value of Aurei, 653. makes Peace with Genſerich, 656. ſlain by Maximus, 693. his Character, 694.
Vallia's ſucceſs, 603. Acts in Spain, 607.
Vandals paſs into Africk, which they miſerably waſte, 632.
Velites, who, 46.
Venice whence her Original to be fetcht, 688.
Veteranio Uſurpeth, 89. is depoſed, 90.
Vexillatio, what, 47.
Vindices of a City, who, 73.
Urbicarian Regions, 131.
Urſicinus, the Eunuch's plot againſt him. 100. Euſebius plots againſt him likewiſe, 133. call'd back to Court, 134. turn'd out of his place, 141.

W.

Weſtern Empire fails, 726.
Wines for the Emperor's Cellars, whence furniſhed, 104.

X.

Xenoparachus, who, 76.

Y.

Year remarkable for its great Revolutions, being the Year of our Lord 476. P. 725.

Z.

Zeno made Emperor, and was very debauch'd, 722. ordains that Governours ſtay in their Provinces ſome time after their Adminiſtration expired, 724. driven from Conſtantinople by Baſiliſcus, 726. forced to retirement. ibid.
Zoſimus his Calumnies of Conſtantine anſwer'd, 15. the Extravagancies in his Hiſtory, 152. his ſtory concerning Julius, 318. concerning Maximus, 345. his Complaints againſt Theodoſius, 319. his objections examin'd, 321. his ſtory of the Rebellion againſt and death of Gratian, 345. his malice to Theodoſius, 392. his reflections on him, 419. dirt caſt upon him after his death by Zoſimus, 432.

FINIS.

ERRATA.

PAge 9, line 32. for Maximilian read Maximian. p. 11, l. 40. f. have r. had. p. 13, l. 14, f. fear r. ſcar. p. 16, l. 47. f. clean r. cleave. p. 18, l. 5. f. moral r. mortal. p. 18, l. 11. f. Parſley r. Pellitory. p. 18, l. 45. f. oppoſition r. oppreſſion. p. 19, l. 38. f. relief r. belief. p. 19, l. penult. f. infirmities r. immunities. p. 22, l. 16, f. decree r. degree. p. 29, l. 45. f. Tomes r. Forms. p. 32. l, 8, f. Fave r. Have. p. 37, l. 2. f. Tome r. Form. p. 44, l. 17. f. Comitates r. Comites. p. 48, l. 19. read, Bed-chamber of the Prince, as the Prefectus. p. 91, l. 8 f. Daughter r. Siſter. p. 96, l. 9, f. Nephew r. Couſin. p. 99, l. 59, f. Nephews r. Couſins. p. 238, l. penult. f. off r. over them. p. 322, l. 21, f. deſired r. deſerved. p. 476, l. 30. f. defeat r. defence. p. 477, l. 18, f. particularly r. poetically. p. 481, l. 8, f. couting r. routing. p. 496 l. 28. f. new r. no. p. 491, l. 27. f. of r. in the time of. p. 511, l. 4. f. dictate r. debate. p. 512. l. 2. Dominion r. Domain. p. 523, l. 18. r. Tributes in Africk. p. 524, l. ult. f. Armies r. Arms. p. 539, l. 9. f. theſe r. Thule. p. 609. l. 41. f. comick r. conick. p. 658, l. 40. dele the 2d. to. p. 707, marg. f. Conſultatiora r. Conſultationa. p. 708, marg. f. Patinæ r. Patriæ.

Books Printed for, T. Baſſet, W. Crooke & W. Cadman, and ſold at their Shops. At the George in Fleetſtreet, at the Green Dragon without Temple-Bar, and at the Pope's Head in the New Exchange.

THe Proceedings, &c. of the four laſt Parliaments of Queen Elizabeth, with other remarkable paſſages of that time, written by Townſend Eſq. a Member of the laſt Parliament of Queen Elizabeth, Fol.

Sixty one Sermons preached on publick occaſions, by Adam Littleton, D. D. Fol.

Heylins Coſmography in four parts, Fol.

Some years Travels in diverſe parts of Africa and Aſia, the great deſcribing more particularly the Empires of Perſia and Indoſtan, &c. the fourth Edition with many Additions, by the Author Sr. Tho. Herbert Bar. Fol.

The Spaniſh Hiſtory or a Relation of the Differences that hapned in the Court of Spain between Don' John of Auſtria, and Cardinal Nitard with other Tranſactions of that Kingdom, Oct.

The Life and Death of Mahumet the Author of the Turkiſh Religion, being an Account of his Tribe, Parents, Birth, Name, Education, Marriage, Alcoran, Proſelites, Doctrine, Miracles, Advancements, &c. by the Author of the preſent State of the Jews of Barbary, Oct.

A General Hiſtory of Man by N. Wanly, Fol.

Pharamond, or the Hiſtory of France, a fained Romance in twelve parts, Fol.

Officina Brevium, ſelect and approved Forms of Judicial Writs and other proceſs, with their Returnes and Entries as alſo ſpecial pleadings to Writs of ſcire facias, printed 1679. Fol.

Scarron's Comical Romance, or a facetious Hiſtory of a Company of Stage-players, Interwoven with divers Choice Novels, Rare Adventures and Amourous Intrigues, Fol.

Clelia, an excellent new Romance, Completed now in five parts, Fol.

Reflections upon Antient and Modern Philoſophy and Philoſophers both Moral and Natural, Oct.

All Homer's Works contained in the twenty four books of his Illiads, and the twenty four books of his Oddyſſes, with the Authors Life all Tranſlated out of Greek into Engliſh by T. Hobbs of Malmsbury with a preface about the Virtues of Heroick poeſie, Twelves.

Partheniſſa that famed and excellent Romance, written by the Earl of Ororry, Fol.

The Hiſtorians Guide, or Englands Remembrancer, an account of the Actions, Exploits, &c. and other remarkable paſſages in his Majeſties Dominions for the year 1600., to 1679. ſhewing the year, month and day that each Action was performed, Twelves.

A Chronicle of the inteſtine Civil Wars of England by Jo. Heath, Fol.

The Court of Curioſity, wherein by the Lot the moſt intricate Queſtions are reſolved, and nocturnal Dreams explained according to the Doctrine of the Antients, Tranſlated out of French, the ſecond Edition much improved, Oct.

Decameron Phyſiologicum, or ten Dialogues of natural Philoſophy, by Tho. Hobbs of Malmsbury, Oct.

The Hiſtory of France from the year 1647. to the year 1655, Fol.

The Engliſh Princeſs or Dutcheſs Queen, a Novel being an Engliſh and French Adventure, Oct.

The Opininn of the Heathens concerning the Immortality of the Soul by C. Blount, Oct.

Conſiderations upon the Reputation, Loyalty, Manners and Religion of T. Hobbs of Malmsbury, written by himſelf eighteen years before he died, Oct.

Mercy Triumphant, or the Kingdom of Chriſt enlarged beyond the Narrow Bounds ſet to it by L. Du Moulins in his moral Reflections on the number of the Elect, by Edward Lane, Quarto.

A Sermon in French and Engliſh which was preached at the Savoy in French by L. Deſcotois, a late convert from the Roman Chatholick Religion, for which Sermon he was accuſed for Hereſie and it is now printed to ſatisfie the curious, Twelves.

FINIS.

UMI

AN INSTITUTION
OF General Hiſtory: OR THE HISTORY
OF THE WORLD.

The THIRD PART. pt. 3

CONTAINING

That of the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Empire and the Contemporaries with it: All diſtinctly by themſelves, and yet linked together as the former Parts were.

FROM

The Taking of Rome by Odoacer, and the Exile of Zeno the Emperour, to the Depoſing of Irene and Promotion of Nicephorus:

WITH

An Account of the ſeveral Actions, Polities, Laws and Things of moment, during the Reign of each Emperour, and the Original Atchievements and Polity of the Franks, the Dominion of the Goths, Saracens, Arabians and Moors in Spain and Gall within this Period.

By WILLIAM HOWEL, LL. D. ſometimes Fellow of Magdalen College in Cambridge.

LONDON,
Printed for the Authour's Widow, by Miles Fleſher. MDCLXXXV.

x8909
H839i
1680
V.3-4
Cop.2

TO

The High and Mighty PRINCE

JAMES II.

KING of Great Britain, France and Ireland,
Defender of the Faith, &c.

GREAT SIR,

AMONG the Crowds of Loyal Counties and Corporations that Addreſs themſelves unto Your MAJESTY, vouchſafe to permit a deſolate Widow to approach into Your Sacred Preſence to Congratulate Your Happy and moſt Juſt Poſſeſſion of the Throne of theſe Kingdoms, by laying a ſmall Preſent at Your Royal Feet.

Which is due to Your MAJESTY by a double Title, both by right of Succeſſion to our late Gracious Sovereign, by whoſe Royal Bounty this Work was encouraged; and alſo by deſignment of the Authour, who intended, had not his Death prevented it, to have Dedicated this Book To His Royal Highneſs JAMES the Duke of York, which I now moſt humbly offer To the Sacred Majeſty of King JAMES the Second.

Whom I beſeech the King of Kings long to preſerve beloved of all his Subjects, dreaded by all his Enemies, and renowned to all Poſterity in the Hiſtory of Future Ages.

So prayeth with due Reverence

Your Majeſty's moſt Loyal Subject

Mary Howel.

854715

UMI

THE

PREFACE

TO THE READER.

THE Authour having ſaid ſo much in his Preface to his Second part of this Work, here is little occaſion to add much to this, but onely to give an Account in ſhort of this Volume.

The Roman ſhare thereof was compoſed out of Authours, as they are quoted in the Margent; beginning from the fall of Auguſtulus, and the Ruine of the Empire in the Weſt, (where the Second part ends) to the depoſing of the Empreſs Irene, and promotion of Nicephorus, with an Account of the ſeveral Actions, Polities, Laws and Things of moment, during the Reign of each Emperour (in particular, the new Modelling of the Civil Law by Juſtinian*) and ſetting forth the Original, and all the Hiſtory of ſuch Nations as are mentioned in this Method, or had nothing memorable, or very little, but what is intermixed with theſe Affairs: And alſo ſuch Kingdoms as were at this Period, but lately begun, and little certainty concerning their matters can be known, are (according to the Method of the* Firſt part) handled as they be Conſiderable.

The French part was taken from their own Authours as they are quoted generally, containing the Original and Progreſs of them, before their paſſing the Rhine, their Kingdom in Gall, from their paſſing the Rhine, to the Death of Childerick the laſt Pagan King, and the promotion of Clodonee the firſt Chriſtian one, to the Ruine of the Line of the Meroningians, which was ſucceeded by the the Carloningians, and continued to the Advancement of Charles the Son of Pipin to the Title of Emperour in the Weſt, with the Original and defeat of thoſe Nations and Countries, which were over-run by the Conduct, Courage, or cunning of the Franks; ſhewing their Polity, Laws, Cuſtoms and Antiquities, out of the Original Tongue, with other critical Remarks ſutable to the Nature and uſefulneſs of ſuch an undertaking.

The Spaniſh part was likewiſe taken out of their own Authours, containing the Kingdom of the Viſigoths, or Weſtern Goths in Gall and Spain, to the Death of King Eurick, the Father of Alarick the Great, then from the promotion of Alarick, to the deſtruction of this Kingdom by the Saracens, the Original of the Saracens, with an Account of their firſt founding their Kingdom in Spain, to the Riſe of new Gothick ones, which at length procured the Ruine of it, being all Contemporary with the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Empire: Left under his own Hand in writing, which is atteſted by us,

H. London.
Tho. Roffen.
Sy. Patrick, D. D.
W$^{m.}$ Denton, M. D.
Rich. Aſhfeild, Gent.

AN INSTITUTION OF General Hiſtory: OR The Hiſtory of the World.

The Third Part.

BOOK I.

Of the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Empire.

Chap I.

From the taking of Rome by Odoacer, and the Exile of Zeno the Emperour to the Reign of Juſtinian the Great.

The ſpace of fifty years.

Rome the Elder being in Captivity, the Younger Succeeded as Head of the Empire remaining.

A. D. 476. Baſiliſco & Armato Coſſ.

1. ROME the Elder, being fallen from her ancient Dominion, and now a Captive, the Right of Succeſſion to all her Empire remaining, was devolved upon her Daughter the younger Rome or Conſtantinople. And to her ſell a very great Inheritance, though vaſtly ſhort of what her Mother had acquired. For with the Ancient Lady her Weſtern Provinces were gone into Captivity. Italy with her ſelf was Subject to the Heruli; Gall was ſeized by the Franks and Burgundians; Spain was become the Inheritance of the Goths; Britain to be poſſeſſed by Saxons, Scots and Picts; Africk was held by the Vandals; and Pannonia by the Oſtrogoths, Hunns and other Nations. But thence Eaſtward as far as the limit of Meſopotamia the Roman Empire remained entire to the young Sovereign Miſtreſs; and the Northern Bounds and alſo the Southern were much the ſame; a fair Inheritance, as the Reader may find by that Inventary we have given him, at the beginning of the Second Volume of this Work, and therein otherwiſe is largely related.

Zeno the rightfull Emperour at this time.

Vide Baronium ad Ann. 477 & 478. Procopium Hiſt. Vandal. lib. 1.

2. The true and Rightfull Prince and onely Roman Emperour was Zeno, though now in Exile, being driven away by the Incroachments of Baſiliſcus the Tyrant, who uſurped for about a year and ſix Months. Procopius writes that he loſt his Power within a year and eight months, after he had driven Zeno and his Wife into Iſauria; for then he became odious for his Avarice to the Pretorian Souldiers. This was not unknown to Zeno, who thereupon got an Army together and went againſt him. Baſiliſcus made choice of Armatus for his General, who led his Army againſt Zeno, and incamped near unto him, but delivered up himſelf and all his men into his hands, on condition that Baſiliſcus, a very Boy the Son of Armatus, being at preſent created Cæſar, ſhould be owned by Zeno for his Succeſſour. Baſiliſcus, thus forſaken by his Souldiers, betook himſelf to the ſame Church to which he had formerly fled; and was delivered up into the hands of Zeno by Acacius, who inveighed much againſt him for his Impiety, having been an earneſt Defender of the Hereſie of Eutiches. Zeno having recovered his Power, to keep his promiſe to Armatus, created his Son Cæſar, but in a ſhort time deprived both the Boy of his Dignity, and Armatus of his Life. And Baſiliſcus the Uſurper with his Wife and Children, he ſent into Cappadocia in a ſharp Winter, forbidding that they ſhould be ſupplied with Food or Clothes, or other things which Nature required; whereby it came to paſs that being oppreſſed with Hunger and Cold, they imbraced one another and periſhed together. So was Baſiliſcus puniſhed for his wicked Actions, being betrayed by Armatus, who the foregoing year had been his Companion in the Conſulſhip, though, becauſe of the Uſurpation, this following be onely known by being after it, or after the Conſulſhip of Baſiliſcus and Armatus. To what Procopius writes concerning Armatus from others, Baronius adds, That being in favour both with Zeno and Baſiliſcus, as he was the Kinſman of the latter, when by command of Zeno he was ſlain, the Citizens rejoyced, for under Leo whatſoever ſeditious Thracians he took, he cut off their hands: But he was killed by one Onoulus, whom coming from his Barbarous Countrey very poor he courteouſly received, firſt made him a Comes, and then Prefect of Illyricum, and furniſhed him with much Plate for his Entertainments. But for his kindneſs, he ſo requited him by his barbarous treachery and bloudy hand. So we bid farewell to the Uſurpation of Baſiliſcus, with this onely obſervation farther, that Euagrius differs ſo far from Procopius as to his Death, that he writes that being ſent into Cappadocia to be killed, he was ſlain in a Station called Acouſus with his Wife and Children.

Baſiliſcus made away.

A.D. 477.
Poſt Conſulatum Baſiliſci & Armati.

Armatus killed.

Hiſt. lib. 3. c. 8.
ἐν Ἀκούσῳ τῷ σαθμῷ ἀποσφάττεται.

3. Euagrius tells us, that Zeno after the Death of Baſiliſcus abrogated by a Law his Decrees which he had written in circular Letters: By theſe Decrees we ſuppoſe he means ſuch Ordinances as he had made in reference to Religion, with which we are not to meddle in this place. And no ſuch Law do we now find extant in the Code, though two others made by Zeno, and both at the latter end of the year, in December. One of them directs how an Eſtimation is to be made, of Damage ſuſtained by a forcible Entry. The other ordains that no Reſcript procured by the petition of any ſingle Perſon, (then called Adnotatio) nor at the requeſt of a Body incorporate or Society (termed Pragmatica,) be admitted by any Judge except it manifeſted that the matter ſuggeſted in the petition was true. Every Quæſtor or Magiſter Scrinii that dictated ſuch Reſcripts ſhould undergo Repreheniſon, and alſo the Judges that admitted them; and ſuch Memoriales of any Scrinium, Pragmaticarii, or Adjutores Primicerii as ſhould unlawfully write them ſo dictated ſhould be puniſhed with the loſs of their Girdles. To which afterward Juſtinian added that the Subſcription of the Quæſtor ſhould be neceſſary, in which ſhould be contained, between whom, and to what Judge, and by whom the ſacred Oracle (ſuch terms were ſtill uſed) was directed, otherwiſe it ſhould not be received by any Judge upon pein of fining in twenty pounds of Gold, and as much by his Office. Of civil matters we meet with nothing more that was memorable this yeare xcept a terrible Earthquake, which happened on the twenty fifth day of September at Conſtantinople. Many Churches and Houſes were demoliſhed, the Roſtra utterly defaced, and a vaſt number of people overwhelmed in the Ruines. Now alſo fell a Globe of the Pillar in the ordinary Forum, and the Statue of Theodoſius the Great, placed upon a Pillar in the Forum of Taurus, with a great part of the inward Wall. The Earthquake continued long, ſo that a Stench alſo ſeized the City. Theſe miſchiefs Baronius takes to be fore-tellers of the great Evils that followed, when the Emperour caſt off that Vizard of Orthodox Belief, with which at preſent he was covered.

L. 9. Cod. Juſt. lib. 8. Tit. 4. Dat. Id. Decemb.
L. 7. de Diverſis Reſcriptis, Cod Juſt. lib. 1. Tit. 22 Dat. 10. Kal. Jan.

Zeno reſtrains the ſurreptitious procuring of Reſcripts.

4. The year following was characteriſed onely with the Conſulſhip of Illus who bore the Title at Conſtantinople without a Collegue. For in the Weſt was none created, meſſages paſſing betwixt Zeno and Odoacer, about a Peace and good underſtanding; and as the Emperour would not intermeddle with the Affairs of that Tract, ſo the other not taking that Title upon him, but onely of King, would not arrogate to himſelf ſo much Power, as one well obſerveth. This year, for what we can perceive, was almoſt barren of civil Tranſactions, ſtirs again breeding about Religious matters through the practices of the Eutychian Hereticks. Onely three laws we find bearing the Date of it, and two of them of the ſame day, or the firſt of March, directed to the ſame perſon Sebaſtian, the Præfectus Prætorio

A.D. 478.
Illo ſive (ut in legibus ſcribitur) Ella Conſ.

Baron. ad h. Ann.

rio, though we cannot ſay they made up one and the ſame Conſtitution. “One of them ſecures theright of Children, ſo as the propriety of things made over to their Mothers in conſideration of Marriage, ſhould deſcend unto them; and if one of the Sons died, his Children ſhould repreſent him, and exclude the Brothers of the Deceaſed. And Sons dying before their Parents, if Nephews by them remained, they ſhould ſucceed equally to their rights. For hereby Parents were obliged to preſerve to their Children profits riſing by Marriage in infinitum; yet ſo as they might have the liberty to chuſe one of their Children, and on him confer the ſaid profits; as a Son might confer on one of his Children which he pleaſed, what deſcended to him by virtue of a Donation made to his Mother in conſideration of Marriage. By the ſecond law he gives greater liberty to the making of Donations than the Emperour Conſtantine was willing to allow, who in his time being acquainted with the great cheats and injuries which were committed by profuſe, fraudulent and extorted Deeds of gift, whereby perſons made havock of their Eſtates, gave them away to evade the Laws or cheat their Creditours, and were conſtrained to doe that to which of themſelves they had no Inclination, by ſeveral laws he put a reſtraint upon theſe practices. As he required a corporal Delivery of the thing ſo given and granted, (viz. by delivering it into the hands of the Donee, if a moveable, if an immoveable by quitting it that he might take poſſeſſion,) ſo he would have the Neighbours called to be Witneſſes of the Act. And beſides this, as he would have no Donation to be made contrary to Law, nor againſt the will and pleaſure of the Donee, required moreover that ſhould be contained in Writing, and as to the form, would have the Name of the Donor to be expreſſed, and the right and Title by which he was ſeized of the thing ſo given or granted; ſo he would have the gift Regiſtred in the Regiſter of a Judge or Magiſtrate.

Makes a Law in favour of Children.

L. 7. de Secundis Nuptiis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. Tit. 9.

L. 31. de Donationib. lib. 8. Tit. 54.

L. 1. de Donationibus, Cod. Th. lib. 8. Tit. 12. Vide Gothiſ. in l.

5. But as that excellent Prince diſcharged his duty in obviating the vitious Inclination of the Times wherein he lived, and in reforming the Abuſes of uſe and cuſtome, ſo now Zeno it ſeems, thought fit after feeling the pulſe of his own Time, to take off this “Neceſſity of the Teſtimony of Neighbours, or others to ſuch Donations as were inſinuated at the Acts, or as we ſay Regiſtred in the Regiſters, or entred in the Records of Magiſtrates. And even in Donations not Regiſtred, he took off the neceſſity of Witneſſes by this Law, provided the Inſtruments were written by a Tabellio or publick Notary, or any other, or the Donor himſelf, if ſuch was the cuſtome of the place, or even if no writing was made thereof, the Donation might be good, provided there were other ſufficient Evidence, as Theodoſius and Valentinian had formerly written to Hierius the Præfectus Prætorio. The third law of thoſe we mentioned to have been enacted this year, was in favour of Illuſtrious Perſons, and is directed to one Alexander of that Rank, though whether in or out of Office is not expreſſed in the Direction, a thing rare in the Conſtitutions of Princes made after the time of Conſtantine. For he hath no Title given him, neither yet doth the Law it ſelf ſeem to hint that he did Militare or was in actual Service. “For it declares, that if an Action of Injury be brought by, or againſt, any Illuſtrious Perſons, either in actual ſervice, (militantibus) or out of Employment, (ſine cingulo conſtitutis) their Wives, Sons, Daughters, (their illuſtrious Fathers and Husbands being yet alive) if the Action be Criminal, the party accuſing ſhall make the uſual Inſcription (to undergo the lex talionis if found to ſlander,) and doe other things ſolemnly which are required in ſuch caſes, but the Accuſer or Accuſed may appear by their Procuratours, without being bound to doe it in Perſon, to which privilege he forbids all other perſons to aſpire, or to petition him for it; requiring that that cuſtomary form of proceeding in Judicature be punctually obſerved. This ſame privilege, by a Novel of Valentinian, was given to Biſhops and Presbyters, provided they ſubſcribed alſo, and the condemnation ſhould be in their Names. Otherwiſe it was a general Rule, In criminal cauſes none can tranſact by a Procuratour.

Of Donations.

L. 29. de Donationibus, Cod. Juſt.

Of Illuſtrious Perſons.

L. 11. de Injuriis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 9. Tit. 35. Dat. 5. Non. Novembr. Alexandro viro Illuſtri.

6. The next year, or the CCCCLXXIX of our Lord, is marked in the Faſti, with the third Conſulſhip of the Emperour Zeno, who, for what we can ſee, did very little of moment in it. Yet two Conſtitutions are ſtill extant in the Code of Juſtinian, bearing his Name and the Date of this year, by one of which he took farther care about Donations before Marriage. “By the Second he ordains that Mothers ſhall be ſubject to a Neceſſity of moving for Guardians, as well for their Natural Children, as thoſe born of lawfull Wedlock; and that Ignorance ſhall not excuſe them from ſuch penalties as by Law or Conſtitutions they are lyable to upon ſuch neglect, that is of being deprived of the Right of ſucceeding to ſuch

A. D. 479. Zenone A. 3. Conſ.

L. 29. de Inofficioſo Teſtam. lib. 3. Tit. 28. Dat. Kal. Maii.

Takes care for Minors.

L. ult. Qui petant Tutores vel Curatores, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. Tit. 31. Dat. Kal. Sept.

A. D. 480. Baſilio jun. Conſ.

L. ult. de in integrum reſtitutione minorum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. Tit. 22.

Relaxates the former Rigour in making Teſtaments.

L. 22. de Teſtam. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. Tit. 23.

Children when nearer Heirs are wanting. As ſmall Intelligence have we concerning any thing tranſacted in the CCCCLXXX year of our Saviour, wherein Baſilius Junior was Conſul: But alſo we find two Conſtitutions publiſhed by Zeno on one and the ſame day, or the firſt of May, though directed to two ſeveral Prefects, as to which a miſtake might be committed by ſome Scribe. Whereas Indulgence was by the laws granted to Minors, or thoſe under the Age of five and twenty, ſo as in reſpect of their want of experience, if they were deceived in Bargains and Tranſactions, they might be reſtored in integrum; ſuch an abuſe was made of this favour, that Zeno now declared, That in caſe they had made uſe of the Law, and had the benefit of it, and therein received Damage, no reſtitution ſhould be granted to them. And whereas for weighty reaſons, the Romans had been wonderfully ſtrict in the making of Teſtaments, ſo as ſuch Lawyers or others as dictated Wills, and ſuch as were Witneſſes to them, could anciently receive no benefit by ſuch Wills, becauſe of the temptation they had to falſifie their truſt, or work upon the weakneſs of the Teſtatour; now by uſe and experience ſo little damage appeared in ſuch caſes, that he gives liberty to Teſtatours to leave what they think fit, in a due and lawfull manner to ſuch perſons, by way of Legacy or Fideicommiſſum.

A. D. 481. Placidio Conſ.

Theodorich moving againſt Zeno,

lib. 3. c. 25.

Miſcarries preſently after.

7. The CCCCLXXXI of our Lord had Placidius for Conſul, and beſides having thence a Conſul was very remarkable to the Eaſt, for the danger that threatned it and Conſtantinople. The Authour of this Danger, as Euagrius tells the ſtory, was Theodorich, and him he terms a Scythian by Nation. He writes that preparing a War againſt Zeno, he raiſed an Army in Thrace; and waſting all the Territories that lay before him, peirced as far as to the entrance of Pontus, and was not far from taking Conſtantinople. His deſign was hindered by thoſe neareſt about him, or his moſt inward Friends, who being vehemently offended at him, conſpired his Deſtruction. This being diſcovered by him he retreated, but not long after was numbered amongſt the Dead though by other means. It happened that in his Camp, his Spear which was double pointed hung aloft according to the barbarous cuſtome; It ſo hanging, he had a mind to exerciſe his Body, and his Horſe was called for, he leaped upon him haſtily, (as his manner was in doing other things) and the Horſe being skittiſh and unbroken, before he could fitly diſpoſe of his Legs, and ſit faſt in the Saddle, reared on end, ſo that Theodorich was extremely put to it to hold his hold, not daring to curb him, leſt he ſhould come over with him; and by this means being toſſed about, and not commanding either Horſe or himſelf, he light upon the Spear and ſo ſhook it, that it peirced his ſide with ſuch a Wound, that taking his Bed he died of it not many days after. Now whereas Marcellinus placing this Accident in this year, relates it concerning Theodorich the Son of Triarius, and writes that he peirced as far as Anaplius, a place diſtant but four Miles from Conſtantinople, and thence purpoſed to March for Illyricum when he was thus by Death prevented. Baronius blames Jornandes or Jordanus the Gothick Hiſtorian, for writing this to have been not Theodorich the Son of Triarius, but Walemir Amalus King of the Goths, the Brother of Theodomir who was Father of Theodorich Amalus, who this year ſucceeded in the Kingdom of the Goths.

A. D. 482. Severino Conſ.

Ibid. c. 26.

Martian rebells,

Is forced to enter into Orders.

Idem Cap. 27.

8. To this ſtory of Theodorich, Euagrius ſubjoyns other deſigns proſecuted againſt Zeno, which fell out about this time, probably, if not in this year, in that which followed, or the CCCCLXXXII of our Lord, which was characteriſed with the Conſulſhip of Severinus. Theſe things being done, ſaith he, Martian the Son of Anthemius who had been Emperour at Rome, and joyned in Affinity with Leo the late Emperour at Conſtantinople, began to exerciſe Enmity with the Emperour Zeno. The truth was, having Married Leontia, the younger Daughter of Leo, he aſpired after the Sovereignty, which proceeded ſo far, that in the Palace a great Fight there was, many were killed on both ſides, and Martian had the better, forcing his Adverſaries to retire, and had been Maſter of the Court, if by deferring what he deſigned till the following day, he had not loſt his opportunity, but taken time by the forelock. But the day following, he was betrayed by his followers and left alone, whereupon he fled to the Church of the Holy Apoſtles, and thence being taken by force, he went to Cæſarea in Cappadocia, where joyning himſelf with ſome Monks, to lie concealed, he was diſcovered, and ſent by the Emperour to Tarſus in Cilicia, and being ſhaven was deſigned a Prieſt. Euagrius adds that theſe things were very Elegantly written by Euſtathius the Syrian, who moreover related how Zeno laid almoſt infinite Snares to intrap Berina his Mother-in-Law, that afterwards he Baniſhed her into Cilicia, and then again confined her to the Caſtle called Papiriana, wherein ſhe died at what time Illus Uſurped. The things that were done by Illus the ſaid Euſtathius very neatly related, then how being laid at by Zeno he fled, as alſo how the Emperour put to death him to whom he had given orders to kill him, cutting his Head from his Shoulders, to reward him for his fruitleſs indeavours. But Illus to conceal his Intentions he made Captain of his Troups that ſerved in the Eaſt, and he contracted Friendſhip not onely with Leontius, but Marſus an Eminent man, and Pamprepes, and made his Abode in the Eaſtern parts. And Leontius was declared Emperour at Tarſus, in Cilicia; but what Fruit thoſe men reaped by their Uſurpation, when Theodorich a Goth by Nation, but held in great Honour by the Romans, was ſent General againſt them with an Army, as well of Native Subjects as Strangers, and how they were miſerably Slain by Zeno, for the good will they had born him; Moreover how Theodorich knowing the will and deſign of Zeno, betook himſelf to old Rome, the ſame Euſtathius doth neatly deliver in Writing. So Euagrius too conciſely, from whom it ſhould ſeem that theſe men were perſecuted by Zeno, and in a manner conſtrained to become his Enemies.

Zeno forceth others to revolt.

Vide Bar. ad h. An.

A. D. 483. Fauſto Conſ.

9. The CCCCLXXXIII year of our Lord, had for Conſul Anicius Fauſtus, whether in the Eaſt or Weſt we are not certain, though the Anicii had their Eſtate in the Weſt, as we have formerly ſeen, and their Abode at Rome; but that there was a commigration of Roman Families from one Quarter to another, may be eaſily granted; as alſo that Odoacer though he named no Conſuls himſelf, might admit that thoſe now ſubject to his power, might receive that Dignity. But as this matter is obſcure, ſo are all other Affairs belonging to this year, and of civil concernment; for as to the Eccleſiaſtical, Zeno was too much employed in thoſe of Religious concernment. But the year enſuing, or the CCCCLXXXIIII, was remarkable for having two Conſuls again, and one of them Theodorich a Gothick King, with whom was joyned Venantius: Theodorich was advanced to this Honour for having vanquiſhed the Uſurpers lately mentioned, for which he had alſo a Triumph, and a Statue on Horſeback erected to his memory. This Victory touched at by Euagrius, is rationally thought to have given occaſion to the conferring of thoſe Honours mentioned by Jornandes the Gothick Hiſtorian. He writes that Zeno the Emperour hearing how he was appointed to be King of his Nation, took it acceptably, and by an Evocatory Letter, commanded him to come to the City, where he received him with worthy Honour, and placed him among the Nobles of his Palace, and after ſome time, to inlarge his Honour in reference to Arms, he adopted him his Son, gave him a Triumph in the City at his own Expence, and he was made Ordinary Conſul; which ſaith the Hiſtorian is cried up as the cheif good, and the firſt Ornament in the World. But this was not all, he alſo ſet up before his Palace a Statue on Horſeback, to the renown of ſo great a man.

Theodorich a Gothick King is Conſul.

A. D. 484. Theodoricho & Venantio Coſſ.

c. 57.

Upon what account.

A. D. 485. Symmacho Conſ.

10. The year of our Lord CCCCLXXXV, had Symmachus alone for Conſul, and hath alſo little remarkable, except we take notice of what Baronius hints from Marcellinus his Chronicon, that Longinus the Brother of Zeno, who had been detained in cuſtody by Illus in Iſauria ten years, now came to him to Conſtantinople. Him did Zeno indeavour to make Cæſar, that he might leave him his Succeſſour in the Empire, but becauſe he was a profligate Perſon, never could he doe it, being amongſt others oppoſed by Pelagius a Patritian, a man of great reputation. For Suidas writes, that Longinus and Conon the Brothers of Zeno, making uſe of their power unjuſtly in all Cities, took the Eſtates of other men, and for reward defended ſuch as were guilty of moſt grievous crimes. As for Longinus, being guilty of all ſorts of Incontinency, he was the daily companion of drunken Perſons, and kept many Pandars about him, who promiſing to convey to him the Wives of the greateſt men, by bringing in ſplendid Chariots Strumpets that were curiouſly dreſſed, did but cheat him. He diſſolved alſo a company of Nuns after this manner, being told by certain Procurers that they were very handſome, coming often to Pergæ, he ſent them certain preſents of things to Eat and Wear, and otherwiſe to divert them from their melancholick Life, and yet entring the Monaſtery, drew away more of them by force than perſuaſion. For he was ſo wanton that importunely he would offer violence to Women of ingenuous condition, the Wives and Daughters of Magiſtrates, and carried himſelf impudently in all concerns. Nay, when he went abroad, he would caſt away Silver Balls, and Bracelets to entice them.

Zeno would make his Brother Longinus Cæſar.

Vide Baron. ad h. An.

For Longinus his diſſolute Life hinders his preferment.

11. Such diſorders were committed by Zeno's Relations; which we cannot wonder that he permitted, when his Government was out of order, by reaſon of the evil evil Miniſters he indulged, if Suidas be in this matter alſo to be credited. But he farther Writes, that the Romans had been ſenſible of an happy adminiſtration, if Sebaſtian, being moſt powerfull at Court, had not carried him every way as he liſted, ſelling all things as in a Market, and not ſuffering any thing to paſs in the Palace without money. All Offices he ſold, partly keeping the money to himſelf, and partly dividing it with the Emperour, and who gave moſt was the man that was preferred. In concluſion, at Court there was nothing that was not ſold. If it happened that Zeno gave an Office to any of his Friends, he would redeem it out of their hands, as if it had been a Captive, and ſell it for a larger Sum. But what wonder ſhould there be that Zeno would ſuffer ſuch corruption, when he permitted the manners of his Son, and him that was to ſucceed him to be ſo corrupted? He, as the ſame Authour writes, adorned him with Dignities, and commanded him to exerciſe his Body for the increaſe of his Stature. But thoſe about him having got an occaſion of emptying the Treaſury, took care that the Youth ſhould be corrupted with Sybaritick Luxury, and by their villanous pimping, provoked him to the love of thoſe that were equal with him in years. Therefore the courſe of his Life carrying him to Pride and Luxury, being removed from all honeſty, and bearing a lofty Countenance for his expectancy of the Sovereign Command, he began to go ſtately, and carry his Head high, and indeed to demean himſelf to all men, as if they had been his very Slaves. But for his depraved diſpoſition, Providence ſo puniſhed him, that defiling his Bed for many days without any Senſe, he was taken away by Death in an immature Age. As for Sebaſtian, he was Præfectus Prætorio, ſeveral Laws being found directed to him both already, and hereafter to be mentioned.

Sebaſtian an Evil Miniſter.

Zeno's Son, a great Debauchie,

Dies.

A. D. 486.
Decio & Longino Coſſ.

Zeno reſtrains falſe Teſtimonies.

L. 14. de Teſtibus, Cod. Juſt. lib. 4. Tit. 20.

L. 1. de Privatis carceribus inhibendis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 9. Tit. 5.

L. Un. Cod. Th. Cod. Tit.

12. The following year, or the CCCCLXXXVI of our Saviour, had two Conſuls to characteriſe it, and theſe were Decius and Longinus. Their Names we find to three ſeveral Conſtitutions, publiſhed in this Conſulſhip by Zeno, one on the twelfth before the Calends of June, whereby he gave authority to Judges to animadvert upon falſe Witneſſes, ordering that all bearing teſtimony in civil matters ſhould be examined aſide and not before the Parties, and that without any preſcription of Judicature. This is directed to Arcadius, the Præfectus Prætorio; and the ſecond bearing date of the firſt of July, we find inſcribed to Baſilius with the ſame Title of Præfectus, and as it ſeems of the Eaſt, out of which a complaint was brought concerning private men, their uſing of Priſons. Theodoſius the Great had formerly by an Edict, directed to Erytrius the Præfectus Auguſtalis, ordained that if any perſon ſhould confine any Malefactour to a private Priſon, he ſhould incur the crime of High Treaſon. This concerned the Dioceſe of Ægypt, or that of Alexandria, which City as above meaſure it was apt to breed Seditions, ſo it ſeems was fruitfull of ſuch a kind of Inſolence. "That Law was now ſo far laid "aſide, and forgot, that Zeno was conſtrained in many words to reinforce it, com"manding that it ſhould be lawfull to no man in the moſt ſplendid City of "Alexandria, throughout the Ægyptian Dioceſe, or in any Provinces of his Em"pire, either in their Fields or any where elſe at Home, to exerciſe the cuſto"dy of a private Priſon, but that the Spectabilis, the Præfectus Auguſtalis, for the "time being, and the Clariſſimi, the Governours of all Provinces, ſhould doe their "indeavour and be always watchfull, that the ſaid Arrogance of moſt Wicked "men might be ſuppreſſed. For after this his moſt wholſome Conſtitution the ſaid "Præfectus Auguſtalis, and whatſoever Governour of a Province, ſhall without "doubt incur the crime of High Treaſon, if he know of ſuch wickedneſs and do "not puniſh it. The ſame crime ſhall be incurred by the Primates of Offices, if "knowing of ſuch forbidden practices committed in any place, they do not pre"ſently acquaint therewith their own Judges to have them ſuppreſſed. For it is "evident ſaith he, that ſuch as commit this ſort of crime, even by the tenor of "ancient Laws and Conſtitutions, are to be puniſhed with Death, as Violators of "Majeſty it ſelf, or Traitors.

Prohibits the keeping of private Priſons.

Sempérque futuris inſpectis.

Which was forbidden by ancient Laws and why.

Vide Gothofred. in d. l. Theodoſii.

13. By ancient Laws and Conſtitutions, that Edict lately mentioned of Theodoſius is principally meant, intended for the ſame Dioceſe, and in both Conſtitutions the crime is declared to be High Treaſon, it being indeed ſuch to bear ones ſelf for a Magiſtrate, having no Authority, and ſo he doth who keeps a private Priſon, which is one mark and Symbol of Royalty amongſt others. Before the time of Theodoſius private Impriſonment was onely reſtrained and puniſhed by the lex Julia de vi; but whereas in his time other ſorts of Violence were chaſtiſed by Deportation, or more light Puniſhments, he thought fit to inflict Death on this by making it High Treaſon, and for this reaſon, that whereas other Acts of Violence offended indeed againſt the publick Diſcipline, ſuch as Uſurped the Right of Priſons ſtrike at the Majeſty of the Emperour himſelf, whoſe Prerogative it was by the Magiſtrates conſtituted by his Authority to commit to Priſon. Indeed of old time ſuch Debtors as could not pay what was adjudged, were wont to be committed to Cuſtody, as appears by the Laws of the twelve Tables; but this Cuſtome was now grown obſolete. By the Lex Julia, concerning Adulterers, A man who found an Adulterer with his Wife, might alſo detain him at his Houſe, or where he firſt caught him for twenty hours by Day and Night; but this was not by way of Impriſonment, but for teſtifying and proving the Fact. Moreover by the Pontifical Law, Clerks may in private Houſes chaſtiſe and keep bound their faulty Wives. And Gothofred tells us, that by the Cuſtome of his Countrey, the ſame was granted to an Husband, after the hearing of the matter, the circumſtances of perſons being duly weighed; if ſo be a Judge committed the cuſtody of a wicked and hare-brain'd Wife, to an honeſt and prudent Husband. Mad-Folks alſo may be kept up by their Friends and Relations, and the Ergaſtula or Work-Houſes of Slaves and Freedmen, or ſuch as ſold themſelves to Drudgery bore ſome reſemblance to private Priſons; but were not ſuch really and meant by thoſe Laws: For hereby was prohibited that reſtraint which was put by greater men upon thoſe of meaner Condition in this kind, and particularly by Poſſeſſours of Lands upon their Coloni, or Tillers, as Gothofred ſhews from an Oration of Libanius, written in the time of Theodoſius. The Emperours were ſo tender of the Liberty of their Subjects in this point; that the Stationarii, as we have formerly ſeen, who were employed in ſearching for Malefactours, were forbidden to have a Priſon, and keep them in Cuſtody, though for a manifeſt Offence.

Juſtinian afterward mitigated the puniſhment.

L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. Tit.

Zeno limits the Number of Advocates in the Forum of the Præfect of Illyricum.

L. de Advocatis diverſorum Judiciorum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. Tit. 7. Electione magnifica tuæ ſedis.

Advocates not perpetual.

Vide Cujacii lib. 16. Obſerv. c. 22.

14. However, though this Conſtitution of Zeno was thought fit to be put into the Code of Juſtinian, yet Juſtinian afterwards enacted a milder Puniſhment for this crime of private Priſons. He forbad them to be uſed, and ſubjected ſuch as uſurped them to pein; and to continue as many days in publick Priſon, as they kept any in a private one, of whatſoever Condition or Dignity they were. They ſhould alſo looſe the Cauſe they had againſt ſuch as they ſo Impriſoned, by the care of the Biſhop and the Preſident. And if the Preſident neglected his Duty herein, he ſhould incur danger both of Eſtate and Life. The third Law made this year by Zeno is concerning the Advocates, which pleaded in the Court of the Præfectus Præterio of Illyricum, and their privileges. “ He tells Paulus the Prefect, that “ he will allow his Highneſs an hundred and fifty and no more, as formerly had “ been ordained, and ſuch when their term was expired, or they Died, or other-“ wiſe their number was diminiſhed, ſhall be ſupplied by the choice of his Magnifi-“ cent See. At the cloſe, whatſoever Privileges had been granted to the Advo-“ cates of the Prefectſhip throughout the Eaſt, without any difference, he confers “ on the Pleaders of his moſt glorious See alſo. As there was a certain and determinate Number of Advocates in each Forum, ſo of that Number none were perpetual but Temporary. Yet ſcarcity of Lawyers about the time of Theodoſius the younger cauſed them to be perpetuated. But then again, when there was plenty of Students, Valentinian and Martian for their Incouragement, reduced the ancient Law, which continued thenceforth to be approved and in uſe. Having executed honeſtly and with Ability the Office of Advocate for a certain time, they then were promoted to the Patronage of the Fiſcus or Treaſury, and afterward by degrees to other various Honours, enjoying that of the Clariſſimatus upon their leaving the Bar, where, in the Courts of the Præfecti Prætorio and of the City, they were wont to plead for twenty years, or fifteen at leaſt.

A. D. 487. Boetio Conſ.

Theodorich infeſts the Empire.

15. The following year, or the CCCCLXXXVII of our Saviour, was enobled by the Conſulſhip of Boetius, thought to be the ſame with Manlius Severinus Boetius that famous perſon of whom we are to hear much, being of the noble Anician Family. And for little more is this year famous, except it was for the danger into which the City of Conſtantinople was brought by the defection of Theodorich King of the Goths; for as Baronius well obſerves, there is very great difference betwixt Authours concerning his carriage toward the Emperour Zeno, ſome making him very ſerviceable and obliging till his very going for Italy, and ſeizing on that Countrey; and others writing him to have been falſe, and indeed to have faln upon the Weſt, becauſe he could not become Maſter of the Empire in the Eaſt. But this we muſt farther inquire into, when we come to relate his Conqueſt of Italy. Now as to this year, Marcellinus notes that being ſatiated with the kind Offices of Zeno, he came as an Enemy with a great Power of his Goths, as far as the Royal City and the town Melantias; and having ſet fire to many places retreated to Noven-

ſis

A. D. 488.
Dinacrio & Siphidio Coſſ.

ſis a City of Myſia, whence he began his Expedition. As this year was otherwiſe empty of civil affairs ſo far as we underſtand, ſo that which followed, or the CCCCLXXXVIII of our Lord was quite barren, onely it had two Conſuls by the Names of which it was marked, viz. Dinacrius and Siphidius.

A. D. 489.
Probino & Euſebio Coſſ.

L. 6. *Ad Senatuſconſultum Trebellianum, Cod, Juſt.lib.*6.*Tit.*49

A. D. 490.
Fauſto Conſ.

Pelagius the Patritian made away.

Vide Bar. ad h. An.

His writings.

16. In like manner that which followed, or the CCCCLXXXIX of our Lord, had for Conſuls Probinus and Euſebius, and all the Noiſe being now in the Weſt, where Theodorich at length became Maſter of the Kingdom of Italy, little do we hear of in the Eaſt or at Conſtantinople. And though probably Zeno not otherwiſe diverted might be buſier with his Quæſtor in making Laws than we can know, there being many extant in the Code without date of Conſul, yet find we but one Conſtitution made this year which was concerning Children, burthened by their Parents with a truſt or Fidei Commiſſum, concerning their retaining a fourth part allowed by the Senatuſconſultum Trebellianum. For the year CCCCXC onely one Perſon, Fauſtus by Name, is nominated as Conſul in the Faſti, but others mention Fauſtus Junior, and Longinus for Conſuls the ſecond time. This year is not Eminent except for the Murther of Pelagius the Patritian, whom Zeno cauſed to be ſtrangled in the Iſland called Inſula Paganorum; a Perſon famous in ſeveral reſpects, for Poetry, and for taking the liberty to reprehend him openly for his wicked Actions. At his Death, he prayed to God to puniſh him for his Cruelty and Injuſtice, which he ſaid he underwent for repreſſing freely his Violence and withſtanding the making of Cæſar his fooliſh Brother. He wrote an Hiſtory in Verſe, which took its beginning from Auguſtus Cæſar; he compoſed alſo Homerolentia and other Treatiſes praiſe-worthy. But beſides him, Zeno put to Death Gazæus a Rhetorician, Arcadius a Prefect, and other Illuſtrious Perſons.

A. D. 491.
Olybrio Conſ.

Zeno is Buried and Dies.

Lege Sennertum de Apoplexia melancholica.

Some Laws of his without date

L. 3. de Officio Magiſtri Militum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. Tit. 29.

17. At length we are arrived at the Year CCCCXCI of our Lord, which brought the Puniſhment along with it prayed for by Pelagius, and in which Olybrius alone was Conſul. Caſſiodorus notes in his Chronicon, that Zeno died this year, and we cannot ſay he died and was Buried, but was firſt Buried and then died in a fearfull manner. Either ſeized with the Epilepſie, or dead Drunk, or in a fit of a melancholick Apoplexy, which long after brought Scotus the great Schoolman to the ſame end, (if a late Eminent Phyſician hath made a right Judgment of the Diſeaſe,) he was laid out for Dead, and as ſuch carried down into a Vault, where recovering his Senſes, he cried out and made an horrible Noiſe. But Ariadna his Wife bearing him no good will, either out of hatred to his Vices, or becauſe ſhe deſired another Bedfellow, would not ſuffer him to be releived, ſo that if Cedrenus tell the truth, he was afterward found to have eaten the Fleſh off his Arms, and the Buſkins he had upon his Legs. To ſome ſuch end came Zeno with whom we have not yet done, finding many Laws of his making without Date, and therefore not able to aſſign them to particular years; but of ſuch as are proper to our deſign we ſhall take notice. Obſerving how many men, to avoid the diſcharge of civil Duties, ſheltered themſelves in theſe days in the Service of the Magiſtri militum, "he declared that ſupernumeraries or ſuch as were beyond the appointed Number in the "Officium of him of the Eaſt, ſhould be ſubject to the Sentence of civil Judges in "every Affair, even in reference to Tributary Collations; directing the Conſtitution to Sebaſtian the Prefect.

No one to be Proctor in two Judicatories.

L. 27. *de Procuratoribus Cod. Juſt. lib.*2 .*c.*13.

Obſerv. lib. 13. c. 5.

18. To remove a doubt, whether the ſame Proctor after Sentence given in a Cauſe, might not proſecute it alſo in the Court of that Judge to whom it was appealed; "by another Edict he alſo declared, that one Perſon ſhould not be Proctor "in two Judicatories, but that one ſhould practiſe as ſuch in the greater Auditory, "as for example of the Preſident of the Province, and another in that from which "a Cauſe was appealed or referred, as for inſtance, that of him they called Judex "Pedaneus; ſo that the ſame man who acted before the latter could not doe it too "before the former, but ſhould make a Tranſlation of the Cauſe or the Mandate, "to ſome one of thoſe which practiſed in the Court of the Preſident of the Pro- "vince, without any charge or expence for a new Caution, the former ſufficing. "And he inflicts puniſhment upon both Proctors and Apparitors, who ſhould "neglect this Conſtitution. For ſuch as were aſſigned Judges, and not onely Magiſtrates, had alſo their Apparitors. And Cujacius farther obſerves from this Conſtitution, that as of Advocates, ſo alſo of Proctors there was a certain number in every Forum, to whom alone ſuch as had Suits might commit their Buſineſs and not to any whatſoever, which holds alſo at this day. And in the laſt place, that each Judicatory had its proper and peculiar Under Judges or Judices Pedanei, to whom Cauſes were delegated or referred. Theſe did not Act in their own Juriſdiction, nor executed their own Sentences, but to execute them, took ſome out from among the Cohortales, out of the Scholæ or Scrinia, of which we have formerly ſpoken. But ſuch Judges as were delegated by the Prince himſelf might have Apparitors of their own, or ſuch as executed their Decrees, as Magiſtrates themſelves; and ſo it is no wonder that they might delegate others, which the Pedanei Judices, or ſuch as were delegated by Magiſtrates could not doe. "This muſt be "ſaid, that Zeno of Judicature had a great care, commanding by other Edicts "that Judges ſhould follow ſtrictly the Law, and not what was irregularly com"manded by the Prince. That they ſhould diſpatch Buſineſs, and if any Judge "at the motion of either of the parties protracted the Suite without neceſſity, the "other ſhould betake himſelf to the Prince and make complaint of his delay. Now from one of the greater Judges the Prince was appealed to after Sentence, but a complaint might be made to him before Sentence of protracting the Tryal. And before conteſtation of the Suite, the Judge might be refuſed; "but Zeno forbad "it ſhould be after the Suite was conteſted. In caſe ſuch Judge ſeemed incompe"tent, as to ſome Article or point of the Cauſe, he ſhould by his own decree remit "that matter to ſome other Judge that was competent indeed.

Idem Obſ. lib. 12. c. 1.

Zeno had a great Care of Judicature.

L. l. 11. 12. de Judiciis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 3. tit. 1.

19. By the old Law, If a man ſued for more than was his own, either as to time, before it was due, or as to Sum, he loſt his Cauſe. Now this Zeno thought unreaſonable as to time, as afterward Juſtinian did as to the Sum it ſelf, where there was no dolus malus or deſign of him that ſued. As he took off the rigour of the old Law in this matter, ſo he was indulgent to Perſons of the greateſt Quality about him, and thoſe who were his greateſt Officers, or had executed the greateſt places of Truſt, when they appeared as Criminals. "He ordai"ned that a Patritian or one who had been ſuch, one who had been Illuſtrious "by executing the Prefectſhip either of the Prætorium or City, an ordinary "Conſul, or one to whom the Honour was given by the Prince his Codicills, "one famous for the having undergone the labour of the Magiſterian Power, who "had executed the place of Magiſter Officiorum or Quæſtor, who having been his "Præpoſitus Cubiculi had been made a Senatour, or one to whom he had commit"ted the Government of the School of the Domeſticks, or of his Treaſures, of the "Res privata either of himſelf or Empreſs; if ſuch after having laid down ſhould "be accuſed of a publick or private Crime, to which they could not anſwer by a "Proctour living either in the City or in the Provinces, none ſhould have cogni"ſance of the ſame but himſelf, or onely ſuch Sacred Cognitor to whom he ſhould "commit the hearing of the Buſineſs vice ſua, by his ſacred Letters. Yet ſo that "by ſuch a Judge not being attended by the Miniſtery of any Officium or School, "after the manner and order of ſacred Conſultations, without any obſervance of "fatal days, ſuch Cauſes ſhould be heard, the Libellenſes (Viri Devotiſſimi he "terms them) of his ſacred Scrinium performing the Solemnities; He who is ac"cuſed (that before proof no Injury may be done him,) having leave to ſit in "ſome part of the Secretarium, inferiour to that of Judges, but above the ordina"ry one of ſuch as have Buſineſs there. And out of reſpect to theſe Dignities, the "very Sacred Cognitor himſelf, after the proof of the Crime, ſhall not determine "any thing againſt their Perſons or Eſtates, but in the room of the Prince himſelf "hearing the merits of the Cauſe, if the Offence be proved, he ſhall certifie him "thereof, in whoſe power alone it ſhall be to puniſh offenders of ſuch Quality. "But he declares it to be Law, as formerly it was, that ſuch a Cognitor may ab"ſolve ſuch a perſon and put a ſtop to the Calumny of the Accuſer, except the "Accuſer be alſo of the ſame Dignity, for then his Calumny is not to be ſuppreſ"ſed without conſulting the Authority of the Prince.

L. 1. de pluſ. petitionibus, Cod. Juſt. lib. 3. tit. 10.

L. l. 11. 12. eod. tit.

Vide Cujacii Obſ. lib. 7. c. 27. & lib. 12. c. 21.

L. 3. Ubi Senatores vel clariſſimi &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 3. tit. 24.

Was kind to great Perſons.

20. "But as for Illuſtrious Perſons living in the City of Conſtantinople, who "without any actual adminiſtration were made honourable by Letters or Codi"cills, although by the Emperour's command, they had obtained ſuch prerogative "as to ſeem to doe what they never did, in Cauſes Criminal they ſhould be ſub"ject to the Judgment of the Præfectus Prætorio, the Prefect of the City and the "Magiſter Officiorum, upon a ſpecial Commiſſion iſſuing out from the Prince, ſo "as thoſe men ſhall not have the liberty of ſitting in Tryals: but ſuch muſt know "that they ſhall not determine any thing about their Perſons or Eſtates, when the "thing is proved without conſulting him. As for Illuſtrious Perſons that lived in "the Provinces, except ſuch as the Cogniſance of whoſe Crimes belonged to him"ſelf, or to ſuch ſacred Cognitor as he ſhould depute in his room, and were accu"ſed of ſome Crime, they ſhould have liberty to ſit in the Secretarium at their Try"als, and their Crimes being proved, the Judges ſhould abſtain from giving Sen"tence againſt them or their Eſtates, till they had received Anſwers from the “ Prince to their Reports. The puniſhment alſo due to Calumniatours ſhall not be deferred by Provincial Judges, though the Parties have not the like dignity as before was ſpoken of. By this we ſee the great Privileges enjoyed by Illuſtrious Perſons in this Age, whereof one was great, to have no Fatal times. And the other of ſitting in the Secretarium we have formerly ſeen allowed, it being ordinarily indulged to the Illuſtrious in criminal cauſes in a place inferiour to that of the Judges, both in the City and in the Provinces; but to Honorary or Codicillar Dignities onely in the Provinces. Hence ſome collect that ſuch reſpect ſhall be paid to moſt eminent Perſons, as to anſwer ſitting. We ſee that in the Secretaria or Auditories of Judges, there were three degrees or ſorts of Places; one of the Judges themſelves, another of Illuſtrious Perſons, and the third of Pleaders and ſuch as had buſineſs to tranſact. It's obſervable alſo that this Law gives one exception to that Rule, That power Condemning and Abſolving go together, ſo as a Judge that doeth one may doe the other. In the laſt place the Offices of Magiſtrates being Annual, they neither could ordinarily be Plaintiffs nor Defendants till their time was out.

Took great care for puniſhing falſe Witneſſes.

L. l. 13. 15. *de Teſtibus, Cod. Juſt.lib.*4.*tit.*20.

21. Zeno, beſides what we have already ſaid of this ſubject, took great care for “ prevention and puniſhment of falſe Teſtimony. A falſe Witneſs he would have firſt impeached of Perjury, and then afterward of the crime of Falſhood; of Perjury becauſe Witneſſes were not heard except ſworn. If in the very time of Teſtimony a Witneſs were ſuſpected to lye, he commands him to be ſubjected to torture. A perſon caſt by a falſe Witneſs, if he pleaſed might bring a criminal Action againſt him. If he would bring a civil, he ſhould recover all damages, and beſides this, the falſe Witneſs ſhould be puniſhed according to the Laws. If in the principal matter he was convicted of lying, the Judge might condemn him in the whole or leſs, and alſo ſubject him to puniſhment, obſerving over and above what formerly the Laws had preſcribed concerning falſe teſtimonies. Moreover for prevention of a crime ſo horrible and prejudicial to the publick good, he gave authority even to thoſe called Judices Pedanei to correct falſe Witneſſes and ſubject them to torture, if they were Plebeians, taking to their aſſiſtence the Præfectus Vigilum. And in caſe ſuch Witneſſes were Decuriones or of Dignity, that ſuch a Judge could not animadvert upon them, he ſhould report the whole matter to the Magiſtrate, by whom he was delegated, ſo as nothing ſhould be paid for the entring of the report; and if the thing was plain, then the Magiſtrate ſhould give his ſentence either for admitting or rejecting the Teſtimony. But if it required more ſearch and ſcrutiny, the cogniſance of the matter ſhould again be delegated to the Judge, with a non obſtante to any Preſcription of the Court, and any privilege; for Witneſſes when they have given their teſtimony ſeem to have renounced all Privileges.

22. “ A perſon who denied his Adverſary to be his Kinſman, and that falſely, and required proofs from him of ſuch kindred, he declared ſhould have no right to ſucceed as Heir to ſuch perſon ſo denied, if he died inteſtate. And he who required ſuch proofs ſhould not be heard, except he took the Oath de Calumnia, and the right of Succeſſion was preſerved for him that ſwore. As for proving kindred he required five Witneſſes, if there were no private Inſtruments or Writings, or three if ſuch Writings were found; but if there were publick Inſtruments or Writings they ſhould ſuffice without any Witneſſes. In the laſt place one who was Witneſs to ſuch Writings ſhould be compelled to give teſtimony of them whenever it was demanded of him, after he had depoſed as ſuch. This care that Zeno had to prevent falſe teſtimonies, was very commendable, nothing being more prejudicial both to lawfull acquiring, and keeping an Eſtate. But he made another Law, which was alſo of very great moment, in order to the firſt of the two, and nothing is more memorable that he enacted. The practice of Monopolies had been complained of in all Ages, and under every Prince, as Pliny writes, and frequent Senatuſconſulta had been made againſt them. Yet the Emperour might grant liberty when he ſaw convenient to a certain perſon or Body Politick to have the ſole ſale of certain Wares, under a burthen of ſuch a Tribute or Impoſition to the Treaſury.

He forbad Monopolies.

L. un.de Monopoliis,&c.Cod.Juſt: lib. 4. tit. 59. *Et vide Cujacii obſ. lib.*10. c. 19. & lib. 16. *c.*23.

23. But Zeno by a Conſtitution directed to Conſtantine the Præfectus Prætorio thought fit to command, “ That no Perſon whatſoever ſhould dare to exerciſe a Monopoly of any kind of thing belonging to the ſuſtenance of Man, or to any other uſe, of any materials whatſoever, by his own Authority, or by virtue of any Sacred Reſcript either already procured or to be procured, or by any pragmatick Sanction, or any Sacred Adnotation of the Prince. Neither “ſhould any man conſpire in any unlawfull Conventions, neither Bargain nor Covenant that the ſpecies of divers Bodies belonging to Trade ſhould not be ſold for leſs than they agreed of amongſt themſelves. Moreover he forbad all Artificers in Building and undertakers, and the Profeſſours of other various works, and Bath-holders to agree by compact that none ſhould perfect a work which another had begun, nor meddle with a Buſineſs wherein another man was employed, giving leave to every one to have a work begun by one man, perfected by another, without any fear of detriment, and to denounce all ſuch Acts without any fear or Judiciary charges. Upon him that ſhould dare to exerciſe a Monopoly, he impoſed confiſcation of Eſtate and perpetual Baniſhment. And on the Primates of the other Profeſſions, if for the future they ſhall dare to oblige themſelves by any Compacts or Agreements, either for ſetting the Rates of Commodities, or any other unlawfull matters, a Fine of forty pounds of Gold. In the laſt place upon the Office of the Prefect a Mulct of fifty, if ſuch puniſhments, either through bribery, diſſimulation or other fault, were not inflicted on Monopolizers and Politick Bodies committing ſuch forbidden things.

He reſtrained the marrying of ones Brother's Wife.

Abhorred Inceſtuous Marriages.

24 By another Edict he thought fit to reſtrain the Marrying of ones Brother's Wife. “Although, he ſaid, ſome Egyptians therefore thought fit to joyn themſelves in Marriage with the Wives of their deceaſed Brothers, becauſe after their death they were thought to remain Virgins, ſuppoſing according to the pleaſure of ſome ancient Law-makers, that Marriage was not contracted without Copulation, and ſuch Marriages in thoſe times had been valid, yet he Ordain'd by that preſent Conſtitution, that if thenceforth any ſuch Marriages ſhould be contracted, their contractours, and ſuch as deſcended from them ſhould be ſubject to the Tenor of the Ancient Laws; neither according to the example of the Egyptians did they ſeem firm, nor to be confirmed. He farther ſhewed hmſelf ſo great an Abhorrer of Inceſtuous Marriages, that by another Edict he commanded all his Subjects to abſtain from them. “And whereas in the time of Uſurpation, there were certain Reſcripts, Pragmatick Forms or Conſtitutions which put the name of Matrimony upon wicked conjunctions, namely, made it lawfull in wicked Conſortſhip, to embrace the Daughter of a Brother or Siſter, or her that lived in the bond of Wedlock with ones Brother, or to commit ſuch like Acts, he declared them as impious to be of no force, leſt ſuch wicked licentiouſneſs ſhould receive ſtrength by diſſimulation. This laſt of the Edicts beareth indeed in the Inſcription the name of Anaſtaſius the ſucceſſour of Zeno as its Authour; but Cujacius judges the Inſcription faulty; and that the true one was Idem Auguſtus Sebaſtiano P. P. For to Sebaſtian (as he hath it, but as it now is to Severian) another Conſtitution is directed for reſcinding the Acts of the Uſurper Baſiliſcus, as this alſo is deſigned; which Sebaſtian, as Suidas writes, was in manners moſt like to Tribonian, of whom hereafter. But as we have ſhewn already, this matter of Inceſt had been variouſly determin'd of in various Ages, till the time of Conſtantius and Conſtans, by whom it was made death to Marry the daughter either of Brother or Siſter. But it ſeems ſomething of this nature was permitted by Baſiliſcus, during his Uſurpation, which Zeno after his recovery of his Power again, declared to be null and void. By an Edict directed to Baſilius the Præfectus Prætorio, we think we find him to have formerly publiſhed another upon this ſubject of the marriage of a Brother's or Siſter's Daughter. “This moſt grievous wickedneſs (nefandiſſimum ſcelus he terms it) which formerly under grievous pein had been by moſt Sacred Conſtitutions condemned, he prohibits by his iterated Sanction all manner of Ways. And he denies leave, for the time to come, to Petition him for ſuch like Conjugium or Contagium rather as he words it, letting every one know that the Impetration of what the Petitioners was denied, though by ſurreption, after that day ſhall ſignifie nothing at all.

L. 8. de inceſtis & inutilibus nuptiis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 5.

L. 9. ſive ult. ejuſd. tit.

Obſ. lib. 8. c. 28.

L. ult. Si nuptiæ ex reſcripto petantur, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 5. c. 8.

An Enemy to tedious Suits.

25. For ending of Suits, Zeno Ordained, “That ſuch as bought of the Treaſury any thing challenged by another Perſon, or obtained ſuch a thing of the Prince himſelf, as Fiſcale or belonging to the Treaſury, ſhould not be diſquieted by the pretended owner or any other laying claim to it; but that for the ſpace of four years any Action ſhould be againſt the Treaſury it ſelf; the preſcription of which years ſhould bar any ſuch Suit or claim. Farther if the Scrinium (or Procurator Fiſci as ſome expound it) confeſs by Writings that the price is received, the Buyer ſhall be ſecured for ever. That every Perſon might attend his own buſineſs and to obviate the rapacity of Officers, he forbad the Governours of Provinces, as alſo the Judices ſpectabiles (though adorn'd with the illuſtrious dig-

L. 2. de Quadriennii præſcriptione, Cod. Juſt. lib. 7. tit. 37. Æneæ comiti rerum privatarum.

L. un. de ratiociniis operum publicorum & de patribus civitatum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 8. tit. 13. Arcadio P. P.

“ nity) to meddle with publick Works or Buildings, or as it ſeems the cuſtome “ has been to receive one ſiliqua for every ſolidus to be laid out, or any other emolu- “ ment: but to leave thoſe things to the care and management of the Recenſores, “ or as he terms them, the Fathers of the Cities, who were deputed to ſuch Em- “ ployments. But if any promiſe or engage by covenant to raiſe any publick “ Work out of their mere liberality, though they be bound by ſuch promiſe or “ engagement, they ſhall incur no damage, nor their Heirs, if the whole ſum be “ not contributed, or the Work happen to be unprofitable.

A friend to the Curiæ.

26. He was ſo carefull of the Courts of Cities and Bodies Politick, as in ſome reſpect to be more ſtrict than had been his Predeceſſours againſt pretences of freedom from their ſervice. “ For he would have none who from the beginning of “ his Reign were obnoxious to the ſaid Courts, though Comites Rei privatæ to hu- “ mour his Father-in-law, or Comites Largitionum, or Domeſticorum, Queſtors, or “ Magiſtri Officiorum, though promoted already to execute ſuch Offices, or who “ ſhould be promoted, for or in behalf of ſuch Offices, to eſcape the ſnares of “ thoſe Curial Employments as he terms them; but ſhould be bounden to them “ with their children whenſoever born, and their Eſtates after the laying down of “ their ſaid Offices, except they were ſecur'd by other Privileges upon this account “ by known Laws. For all other lawfull Indulgences and Privileges granted by “ Conſtitutions, he would have remain inviolable. And that perſons ſo indulged “ might not ſeem to enjoy an empty name, if they executed the Curial Offices by “ their Subſtitutes at their own charge, they ſhould have the Privileges of their “ Dignity entire and without abatement. As for ſuch as obtained the aforeſaid “ Dignities before the beginning of his Reign; he Decreed that they with their “ Eſtates and their Children ſhould after ſuch dignity be freed from all obligations “ and burthens of the Curiæ. And for thoſe who at any time had been or ſhould “ be made Patritians, Conſuls, Conſulares, Magiſtri Militum, Præfecti Prætorio “ of the Eaſt, of Illyricum, or Præfect of Conſtantinople, ſo as to execute the places “ themſelves, ſhould to all purpoſes with their Eſtates and Sons born after their “ Dignity be free from ſuch obligations. But Zeno was farther ſo carefull about theſe Courts and Corporations, to have their ſervices perform'd, as we ſee it was the great endeavour of his Predeceſſours, for ſuch reaſons as we have heretofore expreſſed, “ That he made it unlawfull for the Decuriones to ſell their hereditary “ Eſtates without a Decree of the Court, and this Decree ſhould not be taken for “ valid, if onely ſignified in a Brief or piece of Paper, but it muſt be made Vivâ “ voce by the major part, upon which a ſentence of a competent Judge muſt be had “ for confirmation of the purchaſe. Now this Law ſpeaking onely of Sale and not “ of Donation, is called Mirabilis or Wonderfull by Juſtinian, as if there were not “ reaſon to take care as well of the one as of the other. But this may be ſaid, that “ we more eaſily ſell than give, and therefore there was no ſuch occaſion; but “ however he thought fit by a Conſtitution to ordain that no Donation, nor any “ Alienation ſhould be good without a Decree of the Court; nay, afterward that a “ Donation even with a Decree (for other reaſons of that time then moving him) “ ſhould not be valid.

L. 64. de Decurionib. C. Juſt. lib. 10. tit. 31. Sebaſtiano P. P.

L. ult. de prædiis Decurionum ſine Decreto non alienandis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 10. tit. 33. Sebaſtiano P. P.

He was carefull for furniſhing the City of Conſtantinople with water.

27. The City of Conſtantinople was again grown ſo vaſt and populous, that freſh water was become a very pretious commodity with them, and this put Zeno upon making three ſeveral Conſtitutions for ſecurity of the publick Fountains and Aqueducts. “ By one he ſignified to Amantius, Præfect of the City, that if he “ or any of his Succeſſours ſhould alienate the Gold deputed to the repair of Aque- “ ducts to other uſes, he ſhould reſtore it out of his own purſe. And that there “ ſhould be a peculiar Arcarius or Treaſurer for keeping what Gold belonged to “ this ſervice either proceeding from the liberality of the Conſuls or other ways. “ By another he declared that a Fountain which either from the beginning was “ publick, or afterwards made ſo, ſhould not be applied to the uſe of private men “ though a Reſcript were obtained for that purpoſe. By a third he forbad the pur- “ loyning of publick water by private Pipes, the planting of Trees by the Aque- “ ducts whereby their Walls were ruined, and deriving the Water to Houſes of “ Pleaſure, Gardens, Watermills, or Baths under ſuch pein of forfeiting the building, “ as ſhould not be remitted by the Prince his Letters. And he would have the “ Aquarii, or Keepers of thoſe Waters and Aqueducts, to be marked in the Hand as “ were the Tirones and Fabricenſes, with the Emperour's Name, that being known “ they might not be forced by the Procurators of the Palaces or others to any other “ Employment. And if any of them died, he who ſucceeded, ſhould for the ſame “ reaſon, be marked in the ſame manner.

L. l. 8, 9, 10. de Aquæductu, Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 42.

Of

To keep up the honour of Patritians.

28. Of Dignities he chiefly concerned himſelf for that of Patritian, that it might not become too cheap or common. “ He forbad that any ſhould riſe to that “ ſublime honour (which, ſaith he, is ſet before all the reſt) except he had before enjoyed the honour of the Conſulſhip, had been Præfectus Prætorio of the “ Eaſt or of Illyricum, or was known actually to have exerciſed the Prefectſhip “ of the City, the Office of Magiſter Militum or Magiſter Officiorum. And becauſe, “ as he ſaith, he thought it his part to procure the good of the moſt glorious City, “ which was Head of the World, all ways poſſible, he Ordain'd that all who “ afterward ſhould by the Emperour's munificence be adorned with the Enſigns “ of the Honorary Conſulſhip, ſhould pay the ſum of an hundred pounds of Gold “ towards the repairing of the Aqueducts, in like manner as they who during the “ ſpace of a year gloried in the ſetting forth of Conſular works. For them it alſo “ behoved, that the moſt flouriſhing City being ſuſtained by the munificence of an “ hundred pounds of Gold, ſhould alſo be ſenſible of the honorary Conſulſhip. But “ for the encouragement of Conſulares or Honorary Conſuls he declared by another “ Edict directed to Sebaſtian, that thoſe moſt excellent Men, as he terms them, “ either then made or to be made, might proceed and in reality be Conſuls for a “ year, the Prince his judgment or award therein being procured; ſo as having “ finiſhed the Proceſſion ſo obtained, they ſhould not ſeem to have got ſome new “ thing they had not before; but onely to have iterated the right of Conſulſhip “ which once the Conſular proceſſion had derived upon them, and in adoring the “ Purple, and farther obtaining all the Honours of Conſuls and their Privileges they “ ſhould have them commence from the former time of promotion. Moreover “ ſuch Conſul ſhould not be compelled to pay the hundred pounds of Gold for “ the Aqueducts of that famous City, enjoyned by a Sacred Conſtitution, which “ being but Conſularis he had formerly paid.

L. 3. de Conſulibus, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 3.

L. 4. ejuſd. tit.

Which yet Juſtinian thought not enough.

29. Thus we ſee how carefull Zeno was for preſerving the Grandeur of Dignities, eſpecially that of the Patritian, and yet Juſtinian thought this was not enough; but out of his rather ſuperabundant care, as he himſelf confeſſeth, added unto it. “ He Ordained that thoſe high Perſons ſhould upon receipt of the “ Emperour's Codicils immediately become Patresfamilias or Heads of Families, and “ be freed from that Paternal power which the Roman Laws gave to Fathers over “ their Sons not Emancipated, leſt they who were honoured as Fathers by the “ Prince, ſhould be ſubject unto others, it being a thing not ſufferable, he judged, “ that a Father ſhould be in capacity by Emancipation to releaſe a Son from ſuch “ obligations, and that his Imperial Highneſs ſhould not be able to free him whom “ he had choſen for his Father, from the power of another perſon. But ſo he will “ have it, that the Imperial Majeſty be not diminiſhed. It being ſufficiently certain, “ that ſuch a thing rarely happened; for no man, ſaith he, can eaſily remember a Son “ of a Family to have been promoted to the honour of Patritian, as is uſual in the “ Conſulſhip; but leſt ſuch a thing in time ſhould happen, and be found without direction of Laws, he thought fit to Ordain. Taking ſuch ſcope to provide for things which not onely did uſually happen but might poſſibly do ſo, he might well be ſo numerous in his Laws, as we ſhall find he was upon his new model. But this reaſon of the Rarity of the thing ceaſed to be a reaſon with him afterward, when he “ alſo communicated the ſame privilege of being freed from the Paternal Power “ upon other perſons; upon better thoughts, as he ſaith, even upon Conſuls really “ ſuch, and by Codicils; the Præfecti Prætorio, the Prefects of both Romes, and the “ Magiſtri Militum. He eſteem'd it a thing, he ſaith, unbecoming both his Laws “ and times, that perſons who were Judges, over ſo Great men, and commanded “ others to continue under the Paternal Power ſhould themſelves be ſubject to it. “ He would have this taken for a general Rule, that every Dignity and every “ Girdle which freed perſons from Services of Corporations, ſhould alſo free them “ from the power of their Fathers, to whom this ſhould be ſo great an honour that “ they had ſuch ſons, that they ſhould with joy give them their Peculia and other “ Rights which were wont to follow Emancipation, the Privileges of which were “ not to ſucceed theſe thus conferred by Imperial Authority. In the laſt place he will “ have this Privilege of freedom from Paternal Power to extend to Spiritual Fathers or Biſhops, who alſo from their Ordination were freed from that of the “ Curiæ.

L. 5. & ult. ejuſd. tit.

He freed as well others as them from Paternal power.

Novel. 81.

Zeno was kind to his Courtiers.

30. By other Laws made in behalf of the Primicerii of the Notaries, and the ten Tribunes after them, the Silentiarii, the Principes of the Agentes in Rebus, and the Scholæ; Zeno much obliged theſe ſorts of his Courtiers, moderating Fees to be received of them in Courts of Juſtice, and gratifying them otherwiſe in particulars

Vide Titulos 7. 16, 22, 30, 41. lib. 12. Cod. Juſt.

lars which are too tedious here to be related. He was ſo carefull of his Army that it might be furniſhed with fit Souldiers that ſhould be at his devotion, “ That he forbad that any Horſeman or Footman in any Numerus, or in any Limit ſhould for the future be received or liſted without the Warrant (Probatoria) of the Emperour, antiquating the cuſtome which had formerly obtained, which gave to the Magiſtri Militum, or Duces the power of granting ſuch Licences. If the moſt Eminent Magiſtri Militum for the time being, or the Spectabiles, the Duces thought it neceſſary to fill the places of the Dead, after the debating of the matter they ſhould ſignifie to the Prince, who and how many were to be added, and in what Numerus or Limit, that ſo they might become Souldiers by his Majeſty's order and Authority. And he inflicts a mulct of an hundred pounds of Gold upon the Office of the Magiſter Militum to whom he directs his Conſtitution, if it was violated in any part. Some other Laws we find made by Zeno, but they are either of ſuch matters as relate ſo nearly to the Jus Primatum that they are not ſo proper here to be mentioned, or elſe made in favour of the Officers of the Scrinii, of which we have ſaid ſo much already to give the Reader an inſight into thoſe matters that no more is now to be added, It's time to take our farewell of Zeno, with this farther note, that he Reigned ſeventeen years and five months.

L. ult. de re militari, Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 36.

31. Zeno being removed, Longinus his Brother having been by him advanced to great Authority, purpoſed to ſet up for himſelf, and little doubted to obtain the Empire. But Ariadne the Empreſs had another man in ſtore, one whom with more love and leſs noiſe ſhe could take to her Bed, and make her Partner in the Throne; for ſhe was reſolved to play at no ſmaller a game, Zeno having not left her any Children. This was one Anaſtaſius probably a very comely man, as having little elſe to recommend him to the favour of the Lady, and by her to the greateſt of Earthly Dignities. For he had never reached ſo much as the degree of Senator, onely was enrolled in the Schola of the Silentiarii, ſuch a company as had little of buſineſs and publick employment as we have heretofore ſeen. He was born as Euagrius writes, at Epidamnus, afterward called Dyrrachium and enjoyed the Imperial Sceptre with the Wife of Zeno, in the year CCCCXCI, and the Conſulſhip of Olybrius.

Euagrius lib. 3. c.c. 28, 29.

Anaſtaſius ſucceeds him.

A.D. 491. Olybrio Conſ.

32. The firſt thing he did was to ſend down into Iſauria, Longinus of whom we now ſpoke, under what Guard, or upon what ſecurity for his peaceable demeanour we know not, but Euagrius, who tells this ſtory, adds, that to ſeveral others of that Countrey who deſired it, he gave leave alſo to depart thither. As he had made a ſhew of great Piety while a private man, he did not at firſt throw off that vizard. He was a great maintainer of Peace and Quietneſs, not permitting any great alteration either in Church or State, which Principle (if that according to Euagrius, was the Principle of his Actions) might make him hold the Maintainers and Oppugners of the Chalcedonian Council in equal eſteem and balance. The ſame principle put him at his firſt coming to the Empire upon ſuch courſes as might tend to his own eaſe and eſtabliſhment, however he otherwiſe appeared when he thought himſelf faſt upon his Seat. He baniſhed Informers out of the City, and did another thing, which Euagrius terms a wonderfull or Divine Act, and the Hiſtory of which he cannot but deliver to poſterity, though to ſpeak thereof according to the Dignity of the Subject, he ſtood in need of the Tongue of Thucydides or ſome more eloquent and copious Oratour.

Who making great ſhews of goodneſs,

Baniſheth Informers.

33. There was a wicked Tribute (he calls it) odious to God and Man, highly unpleaſing even to the Barbarous Nations and abominable to all profeſſing Chriſtianity, which yet was exacted of all the Subjects of the Roman Empire, but not regarded (as ſuch) till this time of Anaſtaſius, who acted by Royal and munificent Principles took it away, not without the applauſe of all people under Heaven. This Tribute, called Chryſargyrum, was impoſed on Whores and Bawdy-houſes eſpecially, upon Beggars, Slaves, and Freed-men, Divorced-women, upon all ſorts of Men of what condition ſoever, for their Horſes, Mules, Aſſes, Oxen, Dogs, and ſuch like Creatures, nay, Dung it ſelf, and that with all rigour imaginable. Every fourth year it was paid in to the chief Magiſtrate by the under Collectors, and by them unto the Prince his Coffers; thoſe that were employed in it, being none of the meaneſt, nor the Office it ſelf eſteemed baſe and contemptible in the Commonwealth.

Idem ibid. c. 39.

Vid. ſi lubet Lipſii de magnitudine Romana, lib. 2. c. 6.

34. Anaſtaſius weighing with himſelf the whole matter, acquainted the Senate with his ſentiments, told the Fathers what an heinous and horrible thing it was, commanded it ſhould be quite aboliſhed, and burnt the Rolls and Records made for Levying of it. Having done this, he counterfeited great trouble and anxiety of mind, mind, accuſed himſelf of folly and madneſs, of vain glory and inconſiderateneſs, in that he had taken away ſo great a Tribute, and of ſo long continuance, not foreſeeing the inconveniency which would follow thereupon, particularly in the pay of Military men who are the Bulwark of the Commonwealth, and in the ſuſtenance of thoſe who were by it maintained in the ſervice of God, no leſs conducing by their Prayers to the ſecurity of the Empire. Making no man acquainted with the depth of his deſign, he declared his will to be that the Tribute ſhould wholly be reſtored, and calling to his preſence the old Receivers, told them he was heartily grieved that he had burnt the Records; that he knew not what to doe, nor how to excuſe his folly, they being conſumed. They bewailed their loſs, and deplored the condition into which they were irreparably faln, not knowing what overture to make for the reſtitution of their late employment. He, in extremity as it were of paſſion, begged of them that they would uſe yet their utmoſt endeavour, and try whether they could not find ſome Papers which might give them ſome light to ſettle the Tax in ſuch a method as it had formerly been raiſed. He commanded all the Records in the Countrey to be ſearched, and every Scroll wherein mention was made of this Tribute to be brought to him, that he might uſe the moſt effectual means for its reſtitution.

Taketh away the Chryſargyrum.

35. He ſeemed exceedingly to rejoyce at the ſight of ſuch as they preſented to him; demanded where they found them, if they were to any purpoſe, and if they thought there were yet any more left undiſcovered. They anſwered that their labour and travel had been great, that they had rode about night and day, had ſearched Town and Countrey, and they ſwore by the Emperour's life, that in all his Dominions there was not one Scroll more than what they produced. Then commanded he a Pile to be made, and all the Papers, Regiſters, Records, Bills, and Bawdy notes to be put thereon and burnt to aſhes. When the fire had done its part, he commanded water to be caſt upon the Cinders, either quite to obliterate them, or to carry them away with the ſtream, hereby intending ſo far to aboliſh the monuments of this filthy Tribute, that neither ſpark, aſhes, letter, nor any thing relating to it might remain to poſterity. To this purpoſe Euagrius words it in commendation of Anaſtaſius, and in the two following Chapters inveighs againſt Zoſimus for malitiouſly writing that Conſtantine the Great firſt invented the Chryſargyrum, and for otherwiſe ſlandering that Emperour. How far Zoſimus is to be credited, we have ſeen already in the particulars enumerated and aggravated by him.

He confers Offices of Magiſtracy gratis.

36. Others relate that Anaſtaſius at his firſt coming to the Government farther obliged the State by conferring thoſe Offices of Magiſtracy gratis which had been wont to be ſold by his Predeceſſour. That by other Acts of generoſity he ſo far wrought upon the hearts of his people, that ſober and underſtanding perſons conceived great hope of an excellent Prince and a flouriſhing Commonwealth. But if Suidas be to be credited, thoſe goodly appearances vaniſhed to nothing as ſoon as once he thought he had ſettled himſelf; His generous humour degenerated into Covetouſneſs, and his good Government into a ſort of Oligarchy, by his ſetting all Offices to Sale, winking at heinous crimes for reward, ſpoiling the Provinces and exhauſting the wealth of his private Subjects. Euagrius alſo, whom we lately heard playing the Oratour in his commendation, repreſſeth himſelf as proceeding too far in a Panegyrick, telling us that as the Acts formerly mentioned were noble, worthy of Anaſtaſius and the Majeſty of an Emperour, ſo immediately after he did ſuch things as blurred the luſtre and ſtained the glory of the former. For, he deviſed another ſort of Tribute called Chryſotelia, and, to the great damage of the Empire, made Merchandize of the Souldiers wages together with other exactions. For he took from the Courts the uſual exaction of Tributes, and in every City made thoſe that were called Vindices, at the inſtigation, it was ſaid, of Marinus Syrus his chief Miniſter in the Palace. Whence it came to paſs that a great part of the publick Revenue was loſt, and the reputation of Cities vaniſhed. For before that time the Names of Nobles were entred in the Regiſter of all Cities, which eſteemed thoſe that were made free of their Courts, and honoured them as a Senate. From a ſenſe of this alteration in him, or upon other occaſions, it came to paſs, that even in the firſt year of his Reign a Sedition is ſaid to have happened amongſt the Plebeians at Conſtantinople, wherein the greateſt part of the City and Cirque was burned, at which time it's alſo thought, that the moſt ſumptuous Hoſpital of St. Sampſon periſhed, as alſo that incomparable Church of St. Sophia, rebuilt afterwards in a more magnificent manner by Juſtinian.

Ibid. c. 42.

Soon changing for the worſe, invents the Chryſotelia.

A Sedition and Fire at Conſtantinople.

Vide Baron. ad h. An.

Good Laws he made in his firſt year, but none extant concerning the Chryſargyrum.

37. Now after we have heard Hiſtorians, and thoſe little diligent, eſpecially in Civil matters, it would be well if by any Edict or Conſtitution found in our Law Books, we could give teſtimony to what they write about his taking away the Chryſargyrum. One other Conſtitution indeed he made in his very firſt year, and relating to the Revenue, indulgent alſo to the ſubject, but nothing of that nature: "For in the firſt he Ordains that in all Dioceſes and Provinces whoſoever hath poſſeſſed the Patrimonial lands of the Prince, thoſe anciently belonging to Temples or thoſe called Agonothetæi or deputed to ſports and paſtimes of the Emperour by combate, for the ſpace of forty years, ſhall retain them, whether he held them by a juſt or unjuſt title, or with paying the Canon, or without paying it, for the ſaid ſpace of forty years, in the ſame way as before he held them. Nay we find by another Edict dated in this Conſulſhip of Olybrius, "That all Actions, though they concerned the Publick, which were not limited by the term of thirty years, or under, ſhould be excluded and extinguiſhed by a preſcription of forty; a Conſtitution memorable in this reſpect of forty years, which therefore, he ſaith, he publiſhed, that he might cut off all opportunities of doing miſchief. This his Edict was large, and in ſuch general expreſſions, that this Preſcription of forty years was pleaded by certain perſons who by their originals were bound to the ſervice of the Curiæ, and by ſuch as were indebted in publick payments, whom by two other Edicts he undeceived and confirmed their former obligations. We have nothing elſe of this year agreeable or contradictory to the ſtory of Euagrius concerning the Chryſargyrum, which Cedrenus relates him to have taken away at the Importunity of the Monks of Jeruſalem, and upon occaſion of Timotheus Gazæus a moſt wiſe man, his writing a Tragedy upon this ſubject.

L. ult. de fundis Patrimonialibus, Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 61. Dat. Matroniano P.P. 3. Kal. Aug.
L. 4. de præſcript. 30. vel. 40. an. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 39.
L. 1. 5. 6. ejuſd. tit.

A. D. 492. Anaſtaſio & Ruffino Coſſ.

38. The year following, or the CCCCXCII. of our Lord is famous for little, except it be for the firſt Conſulſhip of this Emperour, which he bore together with Ruffinus. It's little more memorable for having one Conſtitution bearing date the firſt of March, whereby Anaſtaſius forbad under ſevere penalties, "That any ſhould uſurp the Offices and Conditions of the Denote men (as he terms them) ſerving (Militantes) in the Sacred Scrinium Memoriæ. But it alſo is ſaid to have given original to the Iſaurian War which continued five or ſix years, as ſeveral relate, and as Euagrius writes was raiſed by Longinus the Brother of Zeno. This man, though he had been Competitour for the Sovereignty, he ſent as was ſaid into his own Countrey, and with ſo little Guard and Watch upon him, it ſeems, that he had opportunity to raiſe men and make great preparations, and the Biſhop of Apamea in Syria joyned with him. But in the conteſt Anaſtaſius had the better, and an end was put to the War, partly becauſe the Iſaurians, who joyned with Longinus, were utterly defeated, and partly, Euagrius ſays, becauſe the Heads of Longinus and Theodorus were by John a Scythian ſent to Conſtantinople, which Heads the Emperour cauſed to be ſet upon Poles over againſt the City in a place called Sycæ beyond the water, which was, he adds, a gratefull ſight to the Citizens who had been formerly much plagued by Zeno and the Iſaurians. Another Longinus ſirnamed Selinantius (whom others make the ſame with Zeno's brother, one of the Principal Conſpiratours) and another called Judas were ſent alive, and with chains about their necks were led in triumph through the Streets and the Cirque, to the great rejoycing both of the Emperour and Citizens. By this means the Tributes called Iſaurian, which had been paid yearly to the Barbarians, amounting to five thouſand Pounds, were brought into the Emperour's Coffers.

L. ult. de officio Quæſtoris, Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 30.

The Iſaurian War.

Lib. 3. c. 34.

Euagrius his ſtory of it;

Not agreeable to later Writers.

39. Such is the Relation Euagrius gives us of theſe matters, wherein are ſome particulars which badly agree with the reflexions made on them by later Writers. For whereas he ſaith that the Heads of Longinus and Theodorus when ſet upon Poles were a delightfull ſpectacle to the Citizens of Conſtantinople; Suidas on the contrary writes, that the ſaid Longinus the brother of Zeno for his profuſeneſs was exceedingly beloved by the multitude; and the Civil War or Tumult which Marcellinus hints to have happened at Conſtantinople againſt this Emperour in the third year of his Reign, and the Conſulſhip of Albinus and Euſebius (though Albinus be named alone for this year by Caſſiodorus) is therefore judged by * Baronius to have proceeded from this very cauſe, the Rabble being inraged that it's good Maſter and Patron was put by the Succeſſion, which as well the Multitude as he himſelf, deſired impatiently. But it ſeems the Multitude being without an Head, the Tumult came to nothing, though it flew to ſo ſawcy height, that the Statues of Emperour and Empreſs were by Ropes tied to them dragged about the Streets. This Tumult probably happened at the Circenſian Games: Yet it's ſaid farther by Marcellinus that Julianus a Magiſter Militiæ fighting by night, was killed by the Geticks ſword in Thrace.

A. D. 493. Albino Conſ.
* Quem vide ad h. Ann.

40. Paſſing to the year CCCCXCIIII and the fourth of Anaſtaſius, we find two Conſtitutions made by him, and little or nothing elſe of moment. Neither is the one of thoſe of ſuch concern here as we think it proper to mention it. By the other he obviates an abuſe committed in thoſe times againſt a wholeſome and neceſſary law and cuſtome. This was in time of want and neceſſity to impoſe the finding of Wheat, Oil, and other Species upon particular Provinces, as we have ſeen heretofore, which ſort of Charity and Neighbourly courſe for one Member of the Empire to relieve another, ſome perſons were ſo far induſtrious to evade, as to procure a Brief under the Emperour's hand, a Pragmatick Sanction or a Judicial Decree to that purpoſe. " This he ſo far diſapproved as to declare all ſuch Licence ſhould be void for " the time to come; and farther declared, that from ſuch furniſhing of neceſſaries, " according to their proportion, none ſhould pretend exemption, no not his own " Houſe, or that of his moſt Serene Wife or Empreſs. The ſucceeding year is remarkable for nothing; not for the Conſulſhip of one Viator, though ſome joyn to him Æmilianus as a Collegue. That following, or the CCCCXCVI of our Lord, had one Paulus for Conſul without a Collegue, and ſeveral Conſtitutions of Anaſtaſius we find bearing date of it. We have formerly told the Reader how great Privileges, as to making Teſtaments, Souldiers enjoyed, ſo as no Solemnities were required of them therein, when in expedition. " Now there were ſome who attended on the Magiſtri Militum called Scriniarii, and Apparitores who executed " their orders, and their names were alſo entred into the Matriculæ or Muſter-Rolls, being much of the nature with thoſe they now call Secretaries to Generals, or great Commanders; and thoſe men as Souldiers pretended to the ſame " Privileges as to making Wills. But ſuch perſons ſeeming, but not being Souldiers " in reality, he declares that by no means they ſhall enjoy that Military Right by " an Edict dated on the Ides of February.

A charitable Conſtitution.

L. 2. de bonorum poſſeſſione &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 13.

L. 1. ut nemini liceat, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 10. tit. 27.

A. D. 496. Paulo Conſ.

The Military privilege as to making Teſtaments explained.

L. 16. *de Teſtamento Militis, Cod. Juſt. lib.*6. tit. 21.

41. By another bearing date of the laſt of April, he partly confirms and partly repeals a former made by Leo concerning the Inſinuation or Regiſtring of Donations. " So far he confirms it as to Decree that they ſhall be inſinuated by the Magiſter Cenſus, but whereas Leo permitted out of Conſtantinople in the Countrey " Inſinuations alſo to be made by other Officers, he will have it as well in Countrey " as in City by a Magiſter Cenſus alone, under pein of twenty pounds of Gold, to " be forfeited as well by them that receive, deſire and procure ſuch pretended Inſinuations, as alſo the Tabelliones ſhall give their teſtimony in no incompetent " place and Judicatory. On the firſt day of the ſame Month, we meet with another Reſcript directed to Anthemius the Præfectus Prætorio, as the other is to " Euphemius, which we ſhould have mentioned in the firſt place. By this he took care for his Revenue that it ſhould not be diminiſhed by Relevations or Relaxations of Impoſitions upon Cattel, too uſually granted it ſeems at this time. If a " Province or City petitioned for any ſuch Relevation, or for an Inſpector or Peræquator, it ſhould be by Petition referred to the Prince himſelf, and upon Oath " firſt made; and the Præfectus Prætorio ſhould give no anſwer, but after fully having " inſtructed the Emperour, and by receiving a form from him, which was to be " obſerved in all particulars. But he would not permit a private perſon to Petition " for this Relevation of the Capitation of Animals; a Corporation or Province " might. Other matters tranſacted in reference to the Tributes he would not have " valid without licence of the Prince himſelf had in Writing, under pein of making good to the Treaſury all wherein it was damnified, and inflicting the fine of " fifty pounds of Gold upon the breakers of the Law. And he ordains that all Fiſcale " Dues ſhall be paid in at thrice, as alſo thoſe called Armeniaca, viz. on the firſt of " January, the firſt of May, and at the end of the Indiction (which began in September) divided into three equal parts, without any innovation to be made by " Collatours in the mean time. But becauſe the Preſtation of the Armenian Tributes " was divided into two Penſions, they might, if they pleaſed, obſerve that Cuſtome ſo as to pay them in in two Penſions, and another half in the September of " the next Indiction. But if they would pay in at three payments they ſhould be " reſpited the whole September of the future Indiction. But that called the Before-ſent, ſhould as it ought be paid in at the beginning of every Indiction, even as the " very name imported. As by this Law he took care for his own Revenue, ſo " by another in July following, that the Subject ſhould not be haraſſed by Compulſors as to the payment of it; but Compulſors he did allow after a time, which " Officers were afterwards taken quite away.

L. 32. de Donationibus, Cod. Juſt. lib. 8. tit. 54.

The way of regiſtring Deeds of Gift.

Per virum Clariſſimum.

Magiſtrum cenſus tantummodo.

Anaſtaſius takes care of his Revenue.

L. ult. de Annonis & Tributis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 10. tit. 16.

L. ult. de exactoribus Tributorum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 10. tit. 19.

42. The CCCCXCVII year of our Lord had for Conſul Anaſtaſius the ſecond time, and him alone. And we find him to have had ſo little of other Civil Employment

A. D. 497. Anaſtaſio A. 2. Conſ.

He ordains divers things in behalf of Advocates.

ment though with Eccleſiaſtical he buſied himſelf too much ; that he had leiſure to give attention to the ſuggeſtions of his Comes rei privatæ, and the Proconſul of Aſia. “ To theſe Perſons had been preſented Petitions by the Advocates of their “ Courts, deſiring that through the liberality of the Prince they might after the “ time of their Advocation was expired, be honoured with ſome Dignity. This he “ granted, permitting that after their time was out, they ſhould be eſteemed and “ held in the rank of Clariſſimi, and that of the firſt Rank or Order of Comes. This Privilege he granted to thoſe Advocates at the end of this year, and being ſo kind to this Profeſſion that by ſeveral other Conſtitutions he enlarged the Privileges alſo of thoſe that belonged to other Courts, we ſhall here take notice of them together as they occur in the ſame title of the Code. Four years after he declared, “ That ſuch Advocates as belonging to the Court of the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum were promoted pro tempore to the degree and office of Advocate “ of the Treaſury, ſhould together with their Sons born and to be born, be looſed “ from all bonds and ties of a Cohortalis or any worſe condition, together with their “ Patrimonies, in like manner as were free the Advocates of the Præfectus Prætorio “ of the Eaſt, and of the Prefect of the City. And he gives this reaſon to Thomas “ the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, to whom the Conſtitution is directed, that “ theſe three Prefectſhips were Germanæ Poteſtates.

L. 1. de Advocatis diverſorum Judicum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 8. Dat. 11. Cal. Jan.

L. 2. ejuſd. tit. dat. 12. Cal. Decemb. Patritio & Hypatio Coſſ. Et non dubium ſit, non tantum eas, ſed etiam ſublimiſſimæ tuæ ſedis germanas eſſe poteſtates.

43. Four years after this he declared by another Edict, “ That the Primate of the “ Advocates belonging to the Court of the Comes of the Eaſt, ſhould for two years “ execute the office of Patronus Fiſci, or Advocate of the Treaſury, and have the “ Emoluments. That the number of Advocates in that Court ſhould be reduced “ to forty, ſo as thoſe that were at preſent Supernumeraries, ſhould not be rejected. “ That thoſe who had diſcharged the Office of Patronus Fiſci ſhould not be prohibited to plead for themſelves and near Relations, though it was againſt the Treaſury it ſelf. That their houſes ſhould not be ſubject to the Metatus or Quartering. That the Sportulæ paid for them, for their Coloni and Slaves ſhould not be “ exceſſive, but according to a Table preſented to the Emperour. That none “ ſhould be added to their number till he had completed the time of Study preſcribed “ by the Laws. That the ſons of Advocates and of ſuch as had executed the Office “ at the Treaſury, whether alive or dead, ſhould be preferred before Strangers “ coming to be admitted, provided they had finiſhed their time of Studies, and “ that without any expence or Fees. That the Profits due ſhould be acquired not “ onely by ſuch as had been Advocates of the Treaſury, but if dead by their “ Heirs; that ſuch Advocates ſhould not be compelled to employments, moleſted “ with the burthen of exhibition without the Authority of the Prince ſpecially intervening, and being ſued ſhould be cited by decree of the Comes of the “ Eaſt, if in his Province, before whom the cauſe ſhould be heard as the competent “ Judge.

L. 3. ejuſd. tit. Dat. Cal. Jul. Sabiniano & Theodoro Coſſ. A. D. 505.

44. He was ſo great a favourer of theſe Patroni Fiſci, or Advocates of his Treaſury, that he was ſtill adding new honours to them. For, the following year, being farther apprehenſive of their merits, as ſenſible how both laudable and neceſſary the Office of an Advocate was, he Ordained, “ That when in actual ſervice they “ ſhould be admitted, on the firſt of January of the year they ſerved, to receive “ gifts among the Comites ſpectabiles of his Conſiſtory. That after their laying “ down, if they had Legitimate Sons, they ſhould be admitted amongſt the Clariſſimi, the Notaries, and receive the Letters, without Fees for moving it. That “ they ſhould confeſs a Debt without any Arbiter before one or two of the preſent “ Advocates of the Treaſury with the uſual ſolemnity of Regiſtring. So if they “ had a mind to declare any thing concerning their children, though no Inſtruments “ of Dowry had been drawn upon intention of Marriage. That before them “ Slaves might be manumitted as before the Glorious Conſuls. And beſides, he “ confirmed all other Privileges granted them by other Laws. Theſe four Conſtitutions were directed to Euſebius the Magiſter Officiorum, to Thomas the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, and to Conſtantine and Euſtachius with the additions alſo of P. P. But of what Diſtricts theſe two laſt were Prefects is not expreſſed; it ſeems the Advocates belonging to the Court of the Preſident of the ſecond Syria were not concerned in the former Edicts; for two years after we find them to have petitioned the Emperour that they might alſo be conſidered in the like ſort. “ And “ to them he granted the Privileges expreſſed in the third Conſtitution, reducing “ their number to that of thirty, ſo as the preſent Supernumeraries ſhould alſo be “ conſidered. This is directed to one Sergius with the addition too of P. P. being, it's to be ſuppoſed, Prefect of the Eaſt, wherein was this Province of Second Syria.

L. 4. ejuſd. tit. Dat. 12. Cal. Dec. Ariovinio & Meſſala Coſſ. A. D. 506.

L. 5. ejuſd. tit. Dat. Cal. Dec. Anatalio & Agapito Coſſ. A. D. 508.

And thus we thought fit to give the Reader a view of all the five together, becauſe of the ſame ſubject, obſerving out of the third, that whereas the Primate of the Advocates is named, as alſo in the laſt; there was a diſtinction of Advocates, the Primate being diſtinguiſhed from the reſt. Whereas alſo in the third Edict mention is made of the time appointed for Advocates to ſtudy the Law, it was at firſt four years, before which expired none were admitted to plead, and afterwards Juſtinian thought fit to enlarge the term to that of five.

Vide Annotata in l. l.

45. The Year of our Lord CCCCXCVIII would be as barren of Intelligence as any other, if it were not for a Conſtitution directed to one Polycarp a Præfectus Prætorio on the firſt of April in the Conſulſhip of John (a Scythian he is elſewhere called) and Paulinus. This Emperour Anaſtaſius had by a certain Law formerly given right of Succeſſion, in caſe of the death of a Brother or Siſter Germans, to one who had been Emancipated, (by which Emancipation or diſcharge from the Paternal Power, a man was underſtood to be diſcharged as it were of the Family) ſo as he ſhould ſucceed ſuch Relations dying Inteſtate before all other Kindred. Now it was convenient and juſt that he who had the profit ſhould alſo have the burthen, and therefore the Emperour now declared, “ That ſuch an Emancipated Brother ſhould “ be called to be a lawfull Tutour or Guardian to Brothers and Siſters in their minority, without any excuſe of ſuch diſcharge from the Paternal Power, to be admitted. The enſuing year, or the CCCCXCIX. had for Conſul one John ſirnamed Gibbus, with whom ſome joyn Aſclepius, but without any good Authority. Anaſtaſius having little of Civil buſineſs to attend, was wholly intent upon Church Affairs, and ſo bent to encourage Hereticks, that as Baronius obſerves from the Chronicon of Marcellinus, he was this year chaſtized for ſo doing by the Bulgarians, who invaded and waſted Thrace. Againſt them marched one Ariſtus, who commanded the Emperour's Forces in Illyricum, with fifteen thouſand armed Men, and five hundred and twenty Waggons laden with Inſtruments neceſſary for Battel. A fight was fought near the River Zarta, where about four thouſand of the Romans were cut off either in their flight or in falling from the Precipice of a Bank that had no Water running by it. And here the flower of Illyricum fell, Nicoſtratis, Innocentius, Tancus and Aquilinus, all Comites, being ſlain. To this loſs was added another, cauſed by a great Earthquake, wherewith the Countrey of Pontus was ſhaken. But Anaſtaſius bought off and reſtrained the incurſions of the Bulgari with a great ſum of Gold.

A.D. 498. Johan. & Paulin. Coſſ.

Emancipated Brothers called to tuition.

L. 4. de legitima tutela, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 30. Dat. Cal. April.

A. D. 499. Johanne Gibbo Conſ.

The Romans worſted by the Bulgarians.

46. We are now arrived at the year D. which is noted with the joynt Conſulſhip of Patritius and Hypatius, in which meeting with nothing elſe of Civil concernment, we ſearch for Laws, and find two in the late Edition of Juſtinian's Code marked with this year, but dated in the Conſulſhip of John and Aſclepius. The day of the date of both is the very firſt of the year, and that might give occaſion to the miſtake of placing them amiſs. They made up one Conſtitution, being directed on one and the ſame day to one and the ſame perſon, viz. Antiochus the Præpoſitus ſacri Cubiculi, and are both concerning the Silentiarii, their Privileges and Emoluments. By them he declares, “ That thoſe Silentiarii of his Palace “ who ſerved (the word is Militantes) at his ſide (circa latus) ſhall be excuſed “ from Tuitions and Curations: That what they get by this ſervice or Militia “ ſhall be enjoyed by them as a Caſtrenſe Peculium, ſo as their Fathers, if alive, “ and their Heirs ſhall have no right unto it. That if they ſell their places they “ ſhall enjoy all relating to the ſale in the ſame manner. That their Sons, if they “ come to be adorned with the Dignity of Comes Spectabilis or Tribune ſhall not if “ unwilling be compelled to be Prætors. And theſe Privileges he added, ſhould be “ enjoyed not onely by thoſe in preſent ſervice, but by ſuch as ſhould ſucceed them, “ and not onely during the time of their ſervice, but after they had laid down “ their places. As for the excuſing them from Guardianſhips, he hints that they “ cannot attend the Affairs of other men, becauſe through the attendance they “ give to him, they could not diligently manage the concerns of their own Families. But it's obſervable that he gives them but the title of Clariſſimi, though elſewhere they have that of Spectabiles, but this variety was incident to many Officers, their Dignity being enlarged or diminiſhed according to the pleaſure of the preſent Emperours, the Fountains of their Honour.

A. D. 500. Patritio & Hypatio Coſſ.

Anaſtaſius* favourable to the Silentiarii.

L. ult. de excuſationibus tutorum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 62. & l. ult. de Silentiariis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 16.

47. For the year DI. Anienus and Pompeius were Conſuls; Anienus was ſirnamed Fauſtus, had been ordinary Conſul above ten years ſince, and was deſcended from the moſt noble Family of the Scipio's, which Baronius obſerveth to make him ſome return for his Orthodox and Pious demeanour toward Symmachus the Roman Biſhop. And on the other ſide he obſerveth concerning Anaſtaſius the Emperour, that being of the contrary diſpoſition, the people reviled him openly as an Heretick; and that he to puniſh them as well for ſo doing, as to be revenged on them for favouring the Cauſe of Longinus and the Iſaurians, this year took that opportunity which while he was alive he dared not to doe, and cauſed them to be fall'n upon, while they beheld the Spectacula in the Theatre unarmed, with ſuch Violence and Execution, that above three thouſand were ſlain, beſides ſuch as got away wounded to their Houſes. One Conſtitution beſides what we have already mentioned we find of this year (if not rather of the foregoing,) but merely belonging to the Jus privatum, and not by us here to be mentioned. For that which followed, Anienus the younger, Son to him of the former year, was Conſul together with Probus. This afforded matter which Baronius had alſo reaſon to mention as a puniſhment of Anaſtaſius. For now the Bulgari again invaded Thrace without any reſiſtence. And he being accuſtomed to buy off the Barbarians for a Sum of Gold, diverted them from the Eaſtern Provinces to the Weſt, where the year after they were defeated by Theodorich now King of Italy, who took Syrmium and joyned it to that Countrey. This year alſo was Amida a ſtrong Garriſon of the Romans in Meſopotamia taken by Cabades the Perſian, after a Siege of ſix months, by the Treachery of certain Monks. The occaſion of it Procopius declares fetching the matter a little higher.

A. D. 501. Anieno & Pompeio Coſſ.

L. ult. de Tranſactionibus, Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 4.

A. D. 502.

Anieno Jun. & Probo Coſſ.

The Bulgari invading Thrace, are bought off by Anaſtaſius.

Bell. Perſic. lib. 1.

48. Cabades the preſent King of Perſia became in Debt to the King of the Ephthalites, and not being able to pay it, he prayed the Emperour Anaſtaſius to lend him the money. The Emperour conſulting with ſome about him, they diſſwaded him from it, telling him how inconvenient it would be, if he ſhould confirm with his money the Freindſhip of the Barbarians amongſt themſelves, and that it were better for his Concerns that they ſhould ever claſh with one another. Upon his refuſal Cabades reſolved to invade the Romans, and into Armenia he brought the firſt News himſelf with an Army. Having foraged the Countrey, he ſate down though in the Winter before Amida a City of Meſopotamia, the Inhabitants whereof though they had no Garriſon (as having lived before peaceably and quietly,) and wanted all manner of Proviſions, yet ſtood out againſt the dangers and inconveniences of a Siege. At that time one James a Syrian, a juſt and very Religious man, had for many years been a Recluſe, at a place diſtant from Amida but one days Journey, that ſo he might not be interrupted in his godly Contemplations. And thoſe of the Neighbourhood, to be helping to his good intent, had pitched a Pale about him, with ſpaces wide enough onely to ſee and confer with ſuch as came to him, with a Roof to keep off from him Rain and Snow. And there he had long continued not yielding to Heats or Colds, feeding on Roots, and not of them every day, but faſting ſometimes a good while together. Some Ephthalites ranging about the Countrey eſpied this James and offered to ſhoot at him, but their hands were ſuddenly benummed and they could not draw their Bows. Cabades hearing the report would himſelf be an Eye witneſs of the Miracle, and ſeeing it, was aſtoniſhed as alſo thoſe that were about him. He humbly beſought James to pardon his men their offence, which he did at the firſt word, and they were inſtantly free'd of their fears. Cabades then bad him demand ſomething, thinking he would have asked ſome great Sum of money. But he prayed him onely to beſtow on him ſuch men as in this War ſhould come to him for Protection. Which Cabades granted, and left him Letters for their aſſurance. And the rumour being ſpread abroad, many from all parts came and were preſerved.

Cabades the Perſian Beſieges Amida.

49. But Cabades with his Rammes battered Amida on every ſide, and the Inhabitants avoided the ſtrokes of thoſe Engins by croſs Beams, in ſuch a manner that the Wall became impregnable, ſo ſtrong were their Buildings in ancient times. Failing therefore this way, he raiſed a Mount ſo high that it commanded the Wall. To this the Defendants drew a Mine from the Town, and by carrying out the Earth, from within the Mount made it hollow, the outſide retaining ſtill the form it had, and giving no ſuſpicion of any deſign to the Enemy. The Perſians came upon it, thinking as upon firm Ground to Shoot into the Town; but company preſſing upon it, the Mount ſunk, and almoſt all periſhed. Cabades at this deſpaired, and reſolved to raiſe the Siege, commanding the Army the next day to retire. But the Townſmen, as now ſecure, flouted the Barbarians from the Walls, and ſome common Women drew up their Clothes, ſhewing Cabades thoſe parts which ſhould not be ſeen by men. Hereupon the Magi forbad his Retreat, aſſuring him that e'er long the Amidenſes would ſhew him all their ſecret and hidden things. The Camp continuing in its former poſture upon this their ſuggeſtion, ſome days after a Perſian near one of the Turrets found the mouth of an old Vault, covered onely with a few ſmall Stones, he entered it alone in the Night, and when it was day made the matter known to Cabades, who, reſolving not to looſe the advantage, the Night following went with part of his Army and ſcaling Ladders to the place. The Turret was Guarded by Monks, (the ſtricteſt ſort of Chriſtians,) who that day obſerved an Annual Feaſt, and being wearied in their Solemn Aſſembly, and having taken a greater proportion of Meat and Drink than uſual, they perceived not the Enemy.

Amida taken.

50. The Perſians entered the Town by a few at a time, and aſcending the Turret killed the Monks as they lay faſt aſleep. Then did Cabades ſet ſcaling Ladders to the Wall adjoyning to the Turret, and when day appeared the Beſieged who guarded the next Turret, perceiving the danger they were in, haſted to the reſcue. And after an hot Conflict they had the better of it, for killing many men that were already got up; they kept off thoſe upon the Ladders, and were very near quit of the Danger. But Cabades drawing his Scimiter, forced his men up the Ladders, threatning Death to the comers down, and thereby overpowring the Defendants by numbers took the Town after eighty days Siege. Great ſlaughter was made, till Cabades riding into the Town, his fury was aſſwaged by an old Prieſt of Amida, who told him that it was not Royally done to kill men now at his mercy. Cabades yet angry, demanded why then they would ſtand out againſt him? Becauſe, Sir, replied the Prieſt, God would give you Amida, not by our wills, but your own Valour. Cabades pleaſed with this Reply, ſuffered no more Execution to be done, but permitted his Souldiers to ſack the City and take Priſoners, of which he had the principal to himſelf. Then leaving in Garriſon a thouſand Perſians, under one Glones, and ſome wretched Citizens to ſerve them with neceſſaries; with his Priſoners he Marched home. Yet with the Priſoners he dealt very Princely, for he let them all go home free, and gave out that they ran away. Anaſtaſius alſo dealt kindly with them, remitting to the Countrey their Tribute for ſeven years, and conferring many Benefits both upon the City and private men; ſo that they ſoon forgot the miſery they had undergone.

The Romans invade Perſia.

51. But Anaſtaſius having the News of the Siege of Amida, immediately diſpatched away an Army againſt the Enemy. This Army was cheifly Commanded by Areobondus General of the Eaſt, who Married the Daughter of Olybrius the late Weſtern Emperour, Celer who Commanded the two Palatine Cohorts called by the Romans Magiſter, with Patritius the Phrygian and Hypatius the Emperour's Siſters Son, who Commanded the two Legions in Conſtantinople. Theſe were accompanied by Juſtin, who was Emperour after Anaſtaſius, by Patriciolus and Vitalianus his Son, who afterwards rebelled againſt Anaſtaſius Pharaſmenes of Colchos an excellent good Souldier, with Godidſelus and Steſas Goths, both Gallant men and expert Souldiers, who followed not Theodorich into Italy. Of this Army Procopius affirms that ſo brave one went not againſt the Perſians before nor after to his time. The Prefect of Proviſions was Appian an Egyptian, a principal Patritian and Valiant, whom the Emperour declared his Partner in the Empire by Codicills, that he might have abſolute Authority in the expence of the Army, which Marched not together, but each of the four Commanders led his own Forces. They found the Enemy gone home with his Spoils after the taking of Amida, which now they would not Beſiege hearing it to be furniſhed with all Neceſſaries, but made an Impreſſion into the Enemies Countrey, Marching not in one Body, but encamping ſeverally. Cabades being near and having notice, entred the Roman Borders with his whole Army, which being underſtood by Areobondus, though at firſt they thought he had with him but ſome ſmall party, he quitted his Camp and ran to Conſtantina a City diſtant two days Journey. The Enemy took the Camp and Baggage without any men, and thence with ſpeed went to the Quarters of Patritius and Hypatius, who having met with eight hundred Ephthalites, who were marching before the Perſian Army, had killed them all; and not dreaming of the Army with Cabades were making merry like Conquerours, laying down their Arms and preparing for Dinner. Some waſhed their Meat in the adjacent Brook, and others troubled with heat were bathing themſelves, which made the Water run foul.

Some are defeated by Cabades.

52. Cabades having heard of the ill fortune of his Ephthalites, Marched apace toward the Enemy, and by the thickneſs of the Water gheſt at the matter, and that the Romans were unprepared. And commanding to drive on with full ſpeed, he came upon them at Dinner and Unarmed; and being ſo ſuddenly ſurprized, and not able to abide the charge, they ran away without making reſiſtence. Some were overtaken and ſlain, others fled to a Mountain, and for fear leaped down the Rocks, not one of them eſcaping. This done, Cabades ſtanding in fear of his Enemies the Hunnes, who now invaded his Territories, went home with his whole

Army,

Others return having done little.

Amida recovered by money

Army, and had a long War with them upon his Northern Borders. In the mean time the other Roman Forces came, for Celer was not before this Defeat come up to the reſt; but they did nothing, having no Commander in cheif, and the Generals with their Equality of power ever croſſing one another in their opinions. Celer paſſed the River Nymphius, which ran by Martyropolis, and was diſtant from Amida thirty five miles, and having foraged the Countrey ſoon departed home. The Emperour ſent for Areobondus to Conſtantinople, and the reſt ſate down before Amida in Winter, where failing to be Conquerours, they reſolved to force the place by Famine. The Beſieged did really want proviſions, but the Roman Generals knowing it not, and ſeeing the Souldiers weary of a Winter Siege, imagining alſo that the Perſian Army would e'er long return, made haſte ſome way to riſe and be gone. The Perſians alſo were doubtfull of their condition in theſe ſtraits, though they concealed their wants, and made ſhew of plenty, but they deſired they would make ſome handſome Retreat. In concluſion, an Agreement was made, that the Perſians for ten Centenaries of Gold ſhould ſurrender the City. The Articles were performed, and the Son of Glones, who was ſlain in an Ambuſh by the Treachery of a Peaſant that betrayed him, receiving the money gave up Amida. He was vexed that he could not ſtay to revenge his Father's Death, but burnt the Church of St. Simeon where he Lodged. Other Buildings neither Cabades nor Glones nor any Perſian defaced in Amida, nor about it.

Diſhonourably.

A Truce for ſeven years,

53. Thus the Romans recovered Amida by money, two years after the taking of it. Being got within it, their own negligence appeared, and the abſtemiouſneſs of the Perſians. For it was found by conſidering the quantity of the Victuals left, and the Barbarians that went out, that not above ſeven days Proviſion was remaining; yet Glones and his Son had delivered it out to the Perſians more ſparingly than their need could well endure, and to the Romans in the Town nothing at all, ſo that they were forced to Eat unuſual Food and abominable, and at laſt one another. The Generals finding themſelves thus deceived by the Barbarians, reproached the Souldiers for their Intemperance and Diſobedience, who having it in their power to take the Town with all the Perſians in it at mercy, had diſhonourably parted with the Roman Treaſure to Barbarians, and gotten Amida as ſome Merchandize for money. But afterward the War with the Hunnes growing long, the Perſians made a Truce with the Romans for ſeven years, which was concluded by Celer on the part of the Romans, and by Aſpevedes on that of the Perſians. And ſo ended this War about Amida, but ſomething farther happened betwixt the Romans and Perſians in the Reign of Anaſtaſius concerning the Caſpian Gates, ſo called; which Gates deſcribed, and the matter it ſelf you ſhall have from the Relation alſo of Procopius.

The Caſpian Gates.

54. The Mountain Taurus of Cilicia paſſeth firſt by Cappadocia, then Armenia and Perſarmenia, Albania and Iberia with other Nations that way, then either free or ſubject to the Perſians. Extending thus through many Countries, the farther it goes it grows to a greater height and breadth. But beyond Iberia you come to a narrow place, reaching ſome ſix Miles, and ending at a ſteep one unpaſſable, where for the way out, Nature hath built a kind of Gate, anciently called the Caſpian Gate or Straits; beyond which were then fair Champions well watered, and large Plains for Horſe Paſture, where were ſeated the Nations of the Hunnes. Theſe Hunnes extended to the lake of Mæotis, and paſſing the Straits in their Inroads into the Roman or Perſian Provinces, came with their Horſes freſh and luſty, not fetching a compaſs about, nor being ingaged in ragged places, thoſe five miles into Iberia excepted; whereas ſuch as took other paſſages arrived with much toil, and could not make uſe of the ſame Horſes, having been forced to many circuits and craggy ways. Alexander the Great conſidering this, built Gates there indeed, and by them a Fort, which through the Hands of many Owners came at length to Ambazules a Hunne, a friend of the Emperour Anaſtaſius. This man now grown old and near his End, offered to Anaſtaſius for money to put the Romans in poſſeſſion both of the Gates and of the Fort.

Poſſeſſed by Cabades.

55. The Emperour, who was not wont to doe things unadviſedly, conſidered that it was not poſſible to maintain a Garriſon in the place wanting all Commodities, and having no Nation near it that was ſubject to the Romans, and gave the man many thanks for his good will, but would not meddle with the thing. Ambazules ſoon after Died, and Cabades forcing out his Sons, poſſeſſed himſelf of the Gates. Anaſtaſius alſo after the Truce with Cabades was expired, built a very ſtrong City at a place called Daras, diſtant from Niſibis about twelve miles, and from the Perſian Frontier three miles and an half at moſt, and named it Anaſtaſia.

This

Anaſtaſius builds Cities to reſtrain the Perſians.

This building the Perſian deſired to hinder but could not, having his Hands full of the Hunnes; but this War being once over, he expoſtulated with the Emperour for Building ſo near his Confines as contrary to the Articles of Peace. Anaſtaſius put it off, ſometimes threatning, ſometimes pretending friendſhip, but eſpecially by large preſents. Another City alſo he Built upon the frontier of Perſarmenia, which before had been a Village, and from Theodoſius was called Theodoſia. Anaſtaſius compaſſed it with a ſtrong Wall a little before his Death, which no leſs than the other troubled the Perſians, being both as Rampiers upon his Countrey.

A.D. 503. Dexecrato & Voluſiano Coſſ.

He is favourable to Emancipated Children.

L. 18. de Collationib. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 20. L. 11. de legitimis Hæredib. lib. eod. tit. 58. L. 8. de emancipationib. lib. 8. tit. 49. Vide Cujacii Obſerv. lib. 18. c. 18.

56. For the year of our Lord DIII Dexecratus and Voluſianus were Conſuls. In this year was the Defeat given by the Perſian King to the Roman Commanders lately mentioned. While they managed their matters unſucceſfully abroad, Anaſtaſius at Home managed a War againſt the Orthodox Chriſtians. But he employed his Quæſtor in making Edicts in behalf of Emancipations that ſuch as were emancipated by the Reſcript of the Prince ſhould enjoy the uſual Privileges of Deſcent as did other Children, which ſtill continued under paternal power in the Family, contributing their own goods, and ſhould alſo ſucceed their Brothers dying inteſtate. Theſe things he enacted by one Conſtitution divided now, according to the Contents of it, into three ſeveral Laws by the Compilers of Juſtinian's Code. For they have all the ſame Inſcription, and all bear date in July, though a little alteration there be in the numbers of the days before the Calends of Auguſt. Of the following year we have nothing here to obſerve, but that it is marked with the Conſulſhip of Cethæus alone, for which Baronius would have Cetegus to be read, which was a Roman Name. Of which a famous Senator flouriſhed at this time, to whom are Letters found directed from Ennodius Ticinenſis or of Pavia.

Vide Baron. ad hunc Ann.

Incurs the diſpleaſure of the People.

57. The year DV. was ſignalized by the Conſulſhip of Theodorus and Sabinianus. The former was ſirnamed Manlius, and being Nameſake too is alſo reported to be deſcended from that Theodorus Manlius or Mellius of whom we have ſo much ſpoken when Conſul, in the Second Volume of this Work. Whereas Theodorich who had obtained the Kingdom of Italy had along time had for his friend Anaſtaſius, at leaſt as ſome have believed; now they began to be at open Enmity, and its ſaid that this year the Empire was invaded by the Goths, under Conduct of one Mundo by this Deſignment, and that Sabinianus the Conſul being ſent againſt him was defeated, and having loſt his Army he himſelf eſcaped with a few. The year next enſuing had Meſſala Conſul at Rome and Areobondus at Conſtantinople, and preſents us with nothing of civil Concernment though too much of Eccleſiaſtical, the Emperour concerning himſelf ſo far in behalf of Schiſmatical Perſons, that he gave great offence by ſuch his carriage to the People of Conſtantinople. And the year which followed wherein he himſelf the third time, and Venantius Decius were Conſuls, we are told things grew to ſuch extremity in the City, that the People fell into a Sedition in the Cirque, where uſually meeting to behold the Sports they were always wont to uſe licentious freedom toward the Emperours.

A. D. 508. Venantio Jun. & Celere. Coſſ.

Enmity betwixt him and Theodorich King of Italy.

The Saracens waſte Arabia and Paleſtine.

58. The year of our Saviour DVIII was known by the Conſulſhip of Venantius Junior and Celer. Now were the Differences betwixt Anaſtaſius and Theodorich King of Italy grown into open Enmity. For Theodorich endeavoured to get into his hands Pannonia which was accounted to belong to the Eaſtern Empire. And Anaſtaſius ſent out a Fleet againſt him, under the Conduct of Romanus the Comes Domeſticorum, and Daſticus who Commanded the Scholæ, on board of which were eight thouſand Armed men. They proceeded as far as Tarentum, which they attacqued and waſted the Coaſts of Italy, and ſo Romanus having exerciſed Piracy againſt the Romans, brought home their Plunder to Anaſtaſius. He might be incouraged to this undertaking by the Abſence of Theodorich, who this year Warred againſt the Franks in Gall. The year DIX had Importunus for Conſul, and in the Weſt it's thought, being the ſame with him whom Theodorich advanced to the Degree of Patritian, being of the ancient Family of the Decii. The year that followed was enobled by the Conſulſhip of Boetius, that excellent Perſon of whom we have much to ſay in the Hiſtory of the Italian Kingdom. Of theſe years little elſe of civil Concernment do we find in the Eaſt, onely that the Saracens ſubject to the Perſians, waſted Arabia and Paleſtine, while Anaſtaſius made great ſtir at Conſtantinople about Religion, and diſtreſſed thoſe of the Orthodox Party which made the people turbulent and ſeditious. The year DXI is for nothing eminent, except it be for the Conſulſhip of Felix and Secundinus; which Felix was a Gall by Nation, and was promoted to this Dignity by Theodorich as we may ſee hereafter.

59. The

A. D. 512. Paulo & Muſciano Coſſ.

59. The year DXI. had for Conſuls Paulus and Muſcianus; and nothing is it remarkable for, except a Tumult and Sedition of the Citizens of Conſtantinople againſt the Emperour upon the account of Religion, and his acting ſtill againſt the Orthodox Chriſtians. And the ſame we hear of him in that following which was characterized with the Conſulſhip of Probus and Clementinus, as the Chronicon of Caſſiodorus hath it, though ſome call him Clementianus. And for the next enſuing, the Authour of that Chronicon himſelf, or M. Aurelius Caſſiodorus Senator, the great Miniſter of Theodorich attained to this Dignity, of whom much is to be ſaid in the Hiſtory of that Kingdom of the Goths. Here it is onely proper to obſerve that he was Conſul alone, having no Collegue out of the Eaſt, though in the Eaſt the Roman Empire, and conſequently the Conſulſhip could onely properly be found. All the reaſon that can be given for this is, that the diſturbances about Religion were ſo great at Conſtantinople, that Anaſtaſius had other things to doe, than to think of conferring this titular Dignity. Theſe ſtirs arrived at ſo great an height, that the Orthodox Biſhops were expelled from their Sees, and in their places were Hereticks preferred by the Emperour, againſt whom it is obſerved by Baronius, that God Almighty ſtirred up Vitalianas a Scythian, as Marcellinus calls him, who gathering together ſuch Roman Horſe as he could raiſe in three days time, came as far as the place called Septimus, and encamped himſelf. There diſpoſing of his men from Sea to Sea, he proceeded as far as the Golden Gate of Conſtantinople without any loſs, affirming he came to aſſert the Orthodox Faith, and to ſuccour the Biſhops of the City, unjuſtly baniſhed by the Emperour.

Diſturbances about Religion.

Vitalianus his attempts and deſign

Variouſly reported.

Lib. 3. c. 43.

60. Yet by the diſſembling and perjuries of Anaſtaſius, managed by one Theodorus whom the Emperour employed, he was prevail'd with to leave the City the eighth day after he came thither; though as Cedrenus writes, having ſeized on all Thrace, Scythia and Myſia, he had following him an Army of Hunnes and Bulgari, and had taken many Cities together with Cyril the Governour of Thrace. But Anaſtaſius being in a deſperate condition begged Peace, and ſwore that together with the Senate he would reſtore the Baniſhed Biſhops to their Sees, and call a Council. Marcellinus relates that Vitalianus, departing from Conſtantinople, got by craft unto Odyſſus a Town of Thrace in the night time, and there caught Cyril, who was more talker than fighter, ſleeping betwixt two Whores, and there killed him; after which he ſhewed himſelf an open Enemy to Anaſtaſius. But Euagrius makes this enmity to have been rather, for that Vitalianus affected the Sovereignty. He writes that being a Thracian, with ſuch a deſign he waſted Thrace and Myſia as far as Odyſſus and Anchialus, and haſted to Conſtantinople with a mixed multitude of ſuch Nations as were wont to wander about without any fixed habitations. That the Emperour ſent Hypatius againſt him, who was taken Priſoner and ranſomed with a great ſum of Money. After him Cyril undertook the charge, and at firſt they fought doubtfully, till Cyril ſo beſtirred himſelf that he put the Enemy to flight, and had the better of it; but Vitalianus rallying his men, turned back againſt him, and his Souldiers forſaking him by reaſon of their ill will to him, he took him in Odyſſus. After this Vitalianus made excurſions as far as Sycæ, and waſted all with Fire and Sword, having no other thoughts but to deſtroy Conſtantinople and to obtain the Empire.

He is worſted at Sea.

61. Having encamped himſelf at the place called Sycæ, the Emperour ſent againſt him Marinus Syrus with a Fleet, becauſe it ſeems his ſtrength lay at Sea, and the Navies faced each other, one toward Sycæ, and the other toward Conſtantinople. And at firſt they onely faced and viewed each other, but at length began to play and give the chaſe as it were in jeſt, till it came to a Battel in good earneſt, fought near Bythanæ. Herein Vitalianus was forced to turn tail, and having loſt many men, in great fear and aſtoniſhment fled, which example of his they followed, which had fought for him; inſomuch that the next day not one of them could be found either in the paſſage, or about the City. The report went that Vitalianus himſelf for ſome time lay quiet in Anchialus. To this Narration Euagrius adds that another ſort of Barbarians who lived without Houſes, paſſed the Sea, and made an Incurſion to the Pylæ or Gates of Cappadocia. And at the ſame time Rhodes was now the third time miſerably ſhattered with an Earthquake happening in the night, and was almoſt deſtroyed. So briefly doth this Hiſtorian write concerning this War betwixt the Emperour and Vitalianus, attributing it to the ambition of a Rebel, and not to any Religious concern; for which Baronius leaveth him and follows the account given him by Marcellinus Comes in his Chronicon, who digeſts the ſeveral particulars he relates according to the years wherein they were done.

62. The

A. D. 515. Anthemio & Florentio Coſſ.

Still active.

62. The year of our Saviour DXV. had Anthemius and Florentius for Conſuls. This year Vitalianus (in behalf of the Catholick Faith ſay they) became more fierce againſt Anaſtaſius. He ſent before a Party of Horſe, and ſome Boats by Water, and he himſelf with his Foot entred a place called Prædium Sixtinenſe, where he took up the Palace for his Manſion. Now were ſent unto him Senatours to make a peace. As a Ranſome for Hypatius he received ninety pounds of Gold, the Emperour's gifts excepted, beſides one thouſand and one hundred pounds he had when Vranius was taken Priſoner. Being made Magiſter Militum in Thrace, he ſent back Hypatius, whom he had kept in Chains in a Caſtle called Acres, to his Uncle. To theſe conditions Baronius as an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian adds, that an Oecumenical Council ſhould be called; of which we are not here to give an account. This year alſo died Ariadne the Empreſs, having paſſed at Court no fewer than ſixty years, and them to the great detriment of the Church, as is obſerved. Moreover this ſame year was famous for Wars and devaſtations, for the Hunnes roved through Armenia, and waſting all Cappadocia, proceeded as far as to Lycaonia. The next that followed, which was characteriſed with the Conſulſhip of one Peter without a Collegue, was paſſed over without any conſiderable thing but what relates to the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian. Onely Anaſtaſius for fear of Vitalianus and his Orthodox Army diſſembled greatly, and commanded certain Biſhops, whom he had formerly baniſhed, to return to their Sees. But when upon his diſſimulation Vitalianus retired, and he now ſeemed to be ſecure; Baronius judgeth of him, that as having obtained a glorious Victory, and the Rebel being conquered not by Arms but cunning; the Biſhop of Rome, being alſo cheated as to the hope he had of Eccleſiaſtical concord, the year following he erected as it were a Trophy, and took the Title of Conſul; which Title he now bore the fourth time. And to him was given one Agapitus a Collegue for the Weſt.

Anaſtaſius perſecuteth the Orthodox.

63. He had but a ſmall time to reap the fruits of his conceived Victory, and to pride himſelf in his triumph, though what time he had, we are told he improved to the advantage of his own and the perſecution of the Orthodox Party. This Perſecution is ſaid to have proceeded ſo far, as that it entred into the very Court, where under pretence of a Plot againſt the Emperour, the throats of many eminent Perſons were cut, and Juſtin with Juſtinian his Nephew, both of them famous at home and abroad, were hardly preſerved by a terrour ſtruck from Heaven into him: For Zonaras reports, that when he deſigned to put them to death, a terrible man appeared to him in a dream, and bade him doe them no harm; for each of them in his time ſhould ſerve God. Euagrius relates how the people of Conſtantinople being tumultuous againſt him upon the account of Religion, and for baniſhing their Biſhop Macedonius, not onely the Nobility came into extreme danger, but many excellent Buildings were burnt, and barbarous murthers being committed, the flame of Sedition raged ſo far, as bringing all things into danger, the Emperour by neceſſity was driven to commiſeration. He put off his Crown and came to the Cirque, ſending Criers before him to proclaim to the people, That He was moſt ready to lay down the Sovereign Power, but all of them could not be placed in that Dignity, which could receive but one who muſt Reign after him. The People beholding him ſuddenly chang'd it's opinion as from a Divine admoniſhment, and intreated Anaſtaſius to reaſſume his Crown, promiſing upon that condition to be quiet. Anaſtaſius after this lived but a very ſhort time, dying when he had governed the Empire twenty ſeven years, three months, and as many days.

Lib. 3. c. ult.

Dies.

A grievous Earthquake preceding his death.

64. But as he lived an impenitent Perſecutour, he did not depart this World without terrible notice given of his diſmal end, the ſame Eccleſiaſtical Writers obſerve. Marcellinus relates that in the Province Dardania twenty four Caſtles were ruined by an Earthquake in one moment. Of theſe, two ſank down with the Inhabitants; of four was deſtroyed one half, and alſo of thoſe that lived in them; of eleven the third part of the Buildings were undermined, and alſo a third part of the people loſt; and ſeven, by being ruined, a fourth part, with a loſs of a fourth part of thoſe that inhabited them, ſtruck a great terrour into the Neighbourhood. Scupus the Metropolis was utterly defaced, though without the deſtruction of its Citizens who had formerly left it, flying from the Enemy. Many of the Mountains of this Province were by this Earthquake cloven in ſunder, Rocks were rent, and Trees being torn up by the roots, a great hole was made thereby. In a certain Caſtle of the Region called Caniſa, by name Sarnonto, the Veins of the Earth were ſo burſten, that the Earth vomited abundance of Water. They recount from Zonaras another Dream Anaſtaſius had after the diſcharging of Juſtin and Juſtinian, how again he ſaw a terrible Man in his ſleep, who holding a Book in his hand, ſaid, Look, for the perverſeneſs of thy Faith I blot out fourteen years of thy life. And to this Cedrenus adds, that when he awaked he told his dream to Amantius his Præpoſitus Cubiculi; who let him know that he had alſo dreamt, that ſtanding by him the Emperour, there came a great Hog and plucking him down by his cloathes devoured him. Upon this Proclus the Fortune-teller came and declared that both of them in a ſhort time ſhould depart this life.

Which was foretold by Proclus,

65. But as for this Proclus he was not, as appears from Zonaras, a mere Fortune-teller, but the greateſt Mathematician of this and many other Ages. He was famous as well for Philoſophy as Mechanick knowledge. He not onely underſtood all that was known by that famous Artiſt Archimedes, but he himſelf found out ſome new things; for by him was invented that Engine which defeated the Fleet of Vitalianus. This was made of Looking-glaſſes, which being hung upon the wall over againſt the Navy, reflected the Sun beams with ſuch violence upon it, that it burnt both Navy and the Men that were upon it, which yet Dion reported Archimedes to have invented, when the Romans beſieged Syracuſe. But that you may ſee what intimate friends Anaſtaſius had, and what company he kept. Baronius farther tells you out of Suidas concerning this Proclus, that he was a Lycian, the Scholar of Syrianus, and an Hearer alſo of Plutarch the Philoſopher, the Son of Neſtorius. That being himſelf a Platonick Philoſopher he was overſeer of a Philoſophick School at Athens, where Anaſtaſius endeavoured to reſtore the Academy. That his Diſciple and Succeſſour was ſaid to be Marinus the Neopolitan. And afterwards reckoning up his Writings, he adds, that he wrote eighteen arguments againſt Chriſtians; that this is that Proclus who next to Porphyrius whetted his impure and contumelious tongue againſt Chriſtians. But John the Philoſopher moſt famouſly refuted his Propoſitions, and ſhewed him to be rude and unskilfull in Greek Learning, for which he had a great name. But at this time (that they may not be confounded) lived alſo another Proclus far different from the other, a man moſt abſtinent, and tenacious of the ancient Decrees, the Quæſtor of the Emperour Juſtin.

His favourite, and yet a Pagan and one who wrote againſt Chriſtians.

66. It had been, its ſaid, told to Anaſtaſius that he ſhould die by Thunder. To avoid this he cauſed to be made a Building, which Baronius juſtly termeth a mad Work, whereby he hoped to avoid the danger; and Proclus the Philoſopher and Mathematician he thinks to have been Authour of it, which is probable enough; but let us hear how the end foretold him was brought about. It Thundring and Lightning exceedingly, he was terrified, and went down from one Room into another; and paſſed from this Chamber into that, but was found dead in his Apartment. Having been told he ſhould die by Fire, he opened a Ciſtern in the Palace with many windings and turnings, at each of which a Veſſel was placed; endeavouring by this means to evade the Oracle, but to no purpoſe. Such was his end, as it is told by Zonaras and Cedrenus the later Greek Writers, though Euagrius ſpeaks nothing of this manner of it, after he had reigned twenty ſeven years, three months, and twenty nine days, as ſay ſome; though as others, three days over and above twenty ſeven years and three months. His memory was very odious upon the account of his favouring Hereſie, and perſecuting the Orthodox Biſhops; ſo as his name, together with that of his Predeceſſour Zeno, are ſaid to have been ſtruck out of the Sacred Diptychs. As for Civil matters we have ſeen how he took away the Chryſargyrum, though it's ſaid he brought up another as ſevere an Impoſition. Euagrius farther Writes, as to the good things of his Reign, and his commendation, that the Barbarians called Scenitæ, that ſort of Saracens (becauſe they lived in Tents) being grown arrogant, roſe up againſt the Roman Empire to their own loſs. They overran Meſopotamia, both the Phœnicia's and Paleſtine, but being grievouſly beaten by the Commanders in the Provinces made a peace with the Romans in the name of all their Nation and then were quiet. In reference to theſe matters, the Perſian War about Amida and other affairs, its pity that the Hiſtory of Euſtathius is loſt, which is ſo far commended by Euagrius, that he tells his Countrey-men, that if any of them had a deſire to have a perfect account of them, and to get an accurate knowledge, they ſhould reade that Writer, who with great Eloquence, vaſt labour and exquiſite Elegancy, brought down his Narration to the twelfth year of the Reign of Anaſtaſius, and then died.

Anaſtaſius killed by Thunder, according to the later Greek Hiſtorians.

His Actions.

67. Whether Euagrius had it from him or others, he adds that the Perſian War being over, he built the place called Daras (ſome ſaid from Darius his being there utterly overthrown by Alexander) in Meſopotamia, being ſituate in the utmoſt borders of the Roman Empire, and as it were the terminus or boundary by which that and the Perſian Kingdom were diſtinguiſhed. From a field he changed it into Lib.3.c.c.26.&c.

His Buildings.

The long Wall.

to a City. Firſt he compaſſed it with a moſt ſtrong wall; then he raiſed various Structures in it, and thoſe very goodly, as Churches and other Houſes, Royal Porticus's, publick Baths, and ſuch like Works, wherewith famous Cities were wont to be adorned. Farther, this ſame Emperour was the Authour of a vaſt ſtructure being as memorable a work as any other, and this was the long Wall raiſed in a convenient place in Thrace. It was diſtant from Conſtantinople at moſt two hundred and eighty furlongs. Both Seas, like to ſome Strait, it fronted for four hundred and twenty furlongs, and made the City almoſt an Iſland from a Peninſula; and it conveyed thoſe who had a mind to ſail from Pontus to the Propontis and the Sea of Thrace with great ſecurity. In concluſion, ſaith he, it repells ſuch Barbarians as make excurſions from the Euxine Sea, from Colchis and the Fenns of Mæotis, as alſo ſuch as ſhould invade from the places beyond Caucaſus and from Europe. Thus much doth Euagrius write concerning the long Wall, which is to be taken notice of, becauſe that in the courſe of the Byzantine Hiſtory frequent mention is made of it.

His Character.

Laws of his making without Conſul or day.

68. As for the general demeanour of Anaſtaſius, it's to be feared that the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians are much in the right, though ſomething be to be allowed to intereſt and paſſion. Of all other teſtimonies they may well have moſt reaſon to cite what Suidas hath written of him, to make good the very evil character they give him. He tells of him that changing for the worſe, after ſome things well performed at the beginning of his Reign, he turned the whole Empire into a kind of Ariſtocraty. That he ſold all Offices of Magiſtracy, and pardoned Offenders for Money, with an inſatiable deſire after which he burned. Thence came it to paſs that the Military Rolls being exhauſted, the Provincials were plagued with things unwonted and Foreign. For he never drave away the Barbarians by force of Arms, but ſtill would redeem Peace with money. Beſides this he made enquiry into the Eſtates of deceaſed perſons, and brought common poverty upon all. To ſuch as he had deprived of their livelihoods, a little after he would be charitable as it were by giving them ſomething back again. Places that he had made void of Inhabitants he would adorn by repairing their ſtructures, eſpecially he was kind to his own native place, which he compaſſed as it were with three Crowns. Under him the Cities of Libya were grievouſly afflicted by thoſe they called Larici, for he ſet over them Marinus, his Nephew by his Daughter, one that was young and of a light diſpoſition; and after him Baſianus his Son, who exceeding his Predeceſſour in naughtineſs, it happened that the Provincials wiſhed for their former condition again, when they remembred what ſlaughter and ſpoils they had undergone: So Suidas ſets him out. But there remains ſomething more to be ſaid, which will give light to diſcover the Conſtitution of the State, if not of the Prince himſelf. For we have ſeveral other Laws extant in the Code which bear his name, though they be without day or Conſul, and ſo cannot be certainly aſſigned to any particular years; we ſhall make mention of ſuch of them as relate to the Government and the jus publicum of the Roman Empire.

L. ult. Si contra jus, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 22.

He forbad unlawfull Reſcripts to be obeyed.

Adnotatio.

69. And the firſt Law we meet with of this ſort without Conſul or day, is for removing a grievance in the Government proceeding from the Emperours Orders, often ſurreptitiouſly and fraudulently obtained. Complaints being urgent upon this account, by an Edict directed to Matronianus a Præfectus Prætorio, "he admoniſhed all Judges throughout his Dominions that they ſhould ſuffer no Reſcript, no "Pragmatick Sanction, no Sacred Adnotation, which was againſt the general Law, "or publick utility to be made uſe of in the canvaſing of any cauſe; in the mean "time not doubting but they were ſtrictly to obſerve the general Sacred Con"ſtitutions. Now for an underſtanding of theſe ſeveral terms, Reſcript was a general one. Of Reſcripts ſome were Law and ſome were not, ſome were Perſonal and ſome were General, ſome were Temporary and others Perpetual, ſome were of Force and ſome not. More particularly a Pragmatick Sanction was ſolemnly made concerning the judgment of Council at the petition of ſome other Perſon. An Adnotation was made briefly, the name of the Prince being noted or written to the Petition. That they termed an Oraculum was ſome ſimple command ſubnoted by the Quæſtor alone, or the Magiſtri Scriniorum. A Mandatum was given about a Suggeſtion or a Petition. But as for general Conſtitutions made to bind all, as this whereof we now write, they being better and of more weight than ſimple Reſcripts were to be obeyed.

He forbad Soldiers to be removed from place to place without the Emperour's order.

L. 4. de officio Magiſtri Militum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 29.

70. By another of this ſort directed to one John who was Magiſter Militum through Illyricum, "He forbad Souldiers to be removed from one place to another. "But if it happened that there was ſome urgent and neceſſary cauſe, then he tells “ him the Prætorian Præfecture, and his See, (viz. of the Magiſter Militum) ought to provide for the publick utility and ſecurity without delay, and ſend to the Emperour their ſuggeſtions, which ſhould declare as well the places from which the Souldiers ſhould be removed, as thoſe in which they were to quarter, and the names of the moſt valiant Numeri, in which the ſaid Souldiers were liſted; withall, the quantity of their Annonæ, and eſpecially the cauſe why they ſhould be removed, that after ſuch ſuggeſtion, he might give ſuch orders as he ſhould judge convenient. This alſo was remarkable and praiſe-worthy in Anaſtaſius, that he reſtrained a courſe which procured great vexation in Law matters, whereby a Suit was ſold or made over for conſideration to one who otherwiſe was a ſtranger to the Action, and this was called Ceſſio actionis: This he forbad, except in certain caſes; and Juſtinian afterward coming to conſider of it approved of this Conſtitution firſt, then regulated the caſes wherein Ceſſion was permitted, and in concluſion would have it abſolutely to take place, onely in caſe it was made for Donation ſake, and for the cauſe of mere liberality, without diſſimulation.

Tàm ampliſſimam Prætorianam Præfecturam, quàm tuam ſedem, &c.

L. 22. Mandati vel contra, Cod. Juſt. lib. 4. tit. 35.

He reſtrained the Ceſſio actionis.

L. l. 23, 24. ejuſd. tit.

Vide Cujacii obſ. lib. 16. c. 16.

71. We have formerly ſeen how kind Anaſtaſius was to Emancipated Sons in giving them right to ſucceed as other Children, though by being out of the Paternal power, they ſeemed alſo out of the family. But as he gave them the profit and advantage, he ſeemed herein unequal that he did not alſo impoſe the uſual burthens upon them. And this was it ſeems ſo clamoured, that he found it convenient to ſatisfie the Subject herein by an Edict directed to the People it ſelf, wherein taking notice of his omiſſion, he decrees that according to the Law of the twelve Tables they ſhould be Curatours or Guardians to their Brothers and Siſters that were diſtracted, as Legitimi, or ſuch as were Tutours and Curatours as neareſt a-kin. For of thoſe perſons which governed the perſons and eſtates of Infants and others not able to govern themſelves, the Romans had three ſorts, either ſuch as Parents aſſigned by Teſtament, or ſuch as they called Legitimi, who were by the Law of the twelve Tables of courſe to take this charge as the next a-kin; or Dativi, which were given and aſſigned when the other failed by the Pretor or other Magiſtrate. The reaſon of the cuſtome was to protect and aſſiſt thoſe who were not able to help themſelves; and this inability proceeded not onely from Infancy or Minority, but alſo from madneſs and diſtraction, by which diſeaſe they were rendred as infirm and helpleſs, and in a worſe condition than the other; becauſe the prevalency of a diſeaſe is very dangerous, whereas nature outgrows the inabilities of Infancy or Minority. And becauſe ſuch as were deaf and dumb were alſo incapacitated thereby to ſee to their own affairs, as alſo ſuch as laboured under ſome perpetual diſeaſe, they, and generally all who could not provide for themſelves, had Curatours aſſigned them to doe it.

He cauſed Emancipated perſons to be Curatours as other Sons.

L. 5. de Curatore Furioſi vel Prodigi, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 70.

Juſtin. Inſtit. lib. 1. tit. 23.

72. But ſuch was the care the Roman State had of its Members, that not onely ſuch as could not, but alſo ſome that would not, had alſo Curatours aſſigned them to take care of their Affairs. And that this is the meaning and ſenſe of this Law is alſo concluded, the Title in the Book being concerning the Curatour both of a Mad-man and of a Prodigal, and as to Emancipated Brothers the reaſon was the ſame. And the Roman Law eſteemed a Mad-man and a Spendthrift to be very little different in their intellectuals, both being acted by diſtempers and thoſe of the Imagination, which produce very ſuitable effects, though the Prodigal hath not the excuſe from vice and ſin which may be pleaded for the other. Now he was eſteemed a Prodigus who neither had any meaſure nor end of his expences, but tore in pieces and diſſipated his Eſtate. Some indeed are of opinion that nothing expreſly was ordered by the Law of the twelve Tables concerning ſuch an one, but that by way of Interpretation it was ſo taken. But Juſtinian in his Inſtitutions expreſly ſaith it, concerning as well Prodigals as Mad-folks, that although they were elder than twenty five years, yet they were under the Curation of their Adgnati (or neareſt a-kin who were to ſucceed them in their Inheritance) and that by the Law of the twelve Tables. But at Rome he adds, the Prefect of the City, or the Pretors, and in the Provinces the Preſidents were, after inquiſition, wont to aſſign them Curatours.

Vide Vinnii com. in Inſtit.

73. Paulus the great Lawyer, in the third Book of his Sentences, hints that it came by cuſtome, that the Prodigal was interdicted the management of his Eſtate, and ſome are of opinion that it was the cuſtome at Rome for the Agnati to take care of the concerns of a Spendthrift, and that afterward it became inſerted amongſt the Laws of the twelve Tables. But it is made ſome queſtion whether a Spendthrift, and one who lives luxuriouſly, be underſtood to be interdicted his Eſtate ipſo jure, and by the Law of the twelve Tables; or he is firſt to be inquired into and pronounced to be a Spendthrift by the Magiſtrate. Now he who is ſuch an one indeed as we have deſcribed him, is in reality and morally a Prodigal, foraſmuch as vertues and vices do not depend on man's knowledge, approbation or cenſure, but have their own forms and nature. But yet as to what concerns the management of Eſtates, no man Politically and with effect of Law ought to be accounted a Prodigal, till ſuch management upon hearing the matter be taken from him by Decree of the Magiſtrate. For the depriving one of the management of his Eſtate, or an interdiction, is not properly of Law but of Juriſdiction; that is, the Law doth not ſpecially and particularly interdict any one the government of his concerns, nor can interdict him, but it in general commands that all ſhall be interdicted their Eſtates by Decree of the Magiſtrate, who ſhall be found to be ſuch upon hearing of the cauſe, and will have ſuch to remain in Curation of their Agnati. Now Madneſs is a diſtemper which ſufficiently diſcovers it ſelf, and there is no ſuch need that a Diſtracted perſon be interdicted his goods by the Magiſtrate, but that a perſon is a Prodigal ought to appear by many and various circumſtances, of which the Magiſtrate ought to give judgment; for lightly no man is to be forbidden the management of his own affairs, every one being preſumed in a condition to doe it till it appear otherwiſe. Indeed if a man contract with one who is manifeſtly luxurious, and who he knows will caſt away the money he is to receive, he may thank himſelf for ſo doing. The Decree of the Magiſtrate, when he interdicted any ſuch perſon the management of his Eſtate, was of this Form; Foraſmuch as thou waſteſt wickedly thy Fathers and Grandfathers Eſtate, and bringeſt thy Children to want, for that cauſe I interdict thee the medling with and management thereof. A courſe which would doe good in our days, wherein there are ways enough to get Eſtates, and for the circulation of Riches, beſides the advantage taken at the madneſs of Prodigals, who becauſe they will not live upon ſomething, muſt afterward live upon little or nothing, whether they will or no.

Pauli Sentent. lib. 3. tit. 4.

74. We do not hear from Hiſtorians, but though Anaſtaſius was not acceptable to the people, eſpecially of Conſtantinople, upon the account of Religion, yet he well enough pleaſed his Courtiers and the Nobility. Anſwerably we find in the view of his Laws, that he choſe rather to oblige his great Officers than the Curiæ or Bodies Corporate. For whereas Zeno his Predeceſſor in favour of theſe Courts obliged ſuch perſons as had attained to be Comites Rei privatæ, Comites Largitionum, Domeſticorum, Quæſtores, or Magiſtri Officiorum, but at the beginning of his Reign were obnoxious to the ſervices of the ſaid Courts, to remain with their Children bound to the ſaid ſervices; " He repealed the Conſtitution of Zeno, as to " this point, releaſing them by an Edict directed to Polycarp the Præfectus Prætorio " from ſuch obligations, together with their Children born after ſuch adminiſtration, and their Eſtates, although it had happened that they had been ſubject to " and obeyed the ſaid Conſtitution. Which was to have its effect and force from " the day wherein it was promulged, it being agreeable he ſaith, that Laws ſet " Rules to future things, and not ſtir up reprehenſions to what are paſt. However Anaſtaſius might manage his matters by Money rather than Arms, as we are told by ſome Hiſtorians; yet out of deſire to be furniſhed with Weapons, " he forbad " the Fabricenſes or thoſe that belonged to the Forges, to be either Hirers or Managers of other mens Lands and Eſtates, under pein to ſuch as employed them " if they knew them to be Fabricenſes of the loſs of the land or thing ſo hired, " and grievous puniſhment to the men themſelves, with forfeiture of their Eſtates " and perpetual Exile. And farther, for the Removal of the Arms forged by theſe " Fabricenſes, when there was need thereof, he orders Euſemius the Magiſter Officiorum to whom he directs this Law, that his Sublimity, as he terms him, ſend " out his Letters to the moſt eminent Prefectſhip, to which he muſt therein declare both the number of the Arms and from what place they are to be removed; " that according to the quantity the Prefect may iſſue out his Precept to the " Clariſſimi the Governours of Provinces, on obedience to which Angariæ (beaſts of " burthen or carriages) as alſo Boats might be prepared. In caſe of failure the Numerarius in preſent attendance at the Prefect's Office, and others concerned ſhould incur a Fine of fifty pounds of Gold to be paid into the Fiſcus; and the Governours of Provinces, and alſo their Apparitours, one of thirty.

He favoured his Officers.

L. 65. de Decurionib. Cod. Juſt. lib. 10. tit. 31.

Cum conveniat Leges futuris regulas imponere, non præteritis calumnias excitat.

Was carefull as to making and conveying of Arms.

L. ult. de Fabricenſibus, Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 9.

75. He was farther ſo civil to dignified Perſons, that he permitted both them and ſuch as enjoyed Illuſtrious titles onely honorary to return out of the Countrey to Conſtantinople without Letters revocatory. He permitted the two Præpoſiti Cubiculi, viz. his own and him belonging to his Empreſs, though out of Office, if they were

He was kind to dignified Perſons.

L. ult. de Dignitatibus, Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 1.

L. ult. de Præpoſitis S. Cubiculi, Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 5.

were of the Senatorian Rank, when they went into the Countrey to ſee their Eſtates, or upon other occaſions to wear the Girdle, it ſatisfying, as he ſaith, their deſire, and being injurious to no other perſons. To the Conſiſtorian Comites of the Order of Spectabilis, he granted the ſame Privilege, both as to protection, and acting, as Zeno by his Pragmatick Sanction had granted to the Clariſſimi the Principes of the School of the Agentes in Rebus. Theſe three Conſtitutions were directed to Euſebius the Magiſter Officiorum, and poſſibly for Euſemius lately mentioned, Euſebius is to be read. To the ſame Euſebius alſo he publiſhed another Edict in favour of ſuch as ſerved in the Scrinia; "If the Sons were unfit to ſucceed their Fathers, ſuch as were ſubrogated in their places, ſhould pay to the Heirs or children of the deceaſed, an hundred ſolidi. Beſides this he was kind to them as to the Judicature in which their cauſes ſhould be tried, whether Criminal or Civil, the caution they were to give, and the Fees, in another Edict directed to one Celer by the title alſo of Magiſter Officiorum who was their proper Judge. And with this Edict another ſeems to have made up one and the ſame Conſtitution, being directed to the ſame Perſons, and giving muchwhat the ſame Privileges, granted to the Agentes in Rebus and their Principes. "He was favourable to the Souldiers in preſent attendance, or thoſe they called Milites præſentales, as to deciding their Controverſies, and paying Fees; and by an Edict directed to one John, as Magiſter Militum Præſentalium, he Ordained that ſuch Souldiers ſhould not be convened before the Magiſter Militum through the Eaſt, but before the Magiſtri Militum Præſentales, and the Duces, though the Duces themſelves were under the command of the Magiſtri Militum through the Eaſt.

L. ult. de Comitibus Conſiſtorianis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 10.

L. 11. de Proximis S. Scriniorum, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 19.

L. 12 ejuſd. tit.

L. ult. de Præpoſitis Agentium in rebus.

To the Milites Præſentales.

L. ult. de re Militari, Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 36.

Juſtin ſucceeds Anaſtaſius.

76. Anaſtaſius being dead, Juſtin a Thracian on the Ninth day of the Month Panemus, by the Romans called July, and in the five hundred ſixty ſixth year from the time that the City of Antioch was ſo named (according to the computation of Euagrius) was proclaimed Emperour by the Prætorian Souldiers. He was of a very mean Original. His firſt employment was the keeping of Cattel, which having changed for that of a Souldier, he managed himſelf with that perſonal valour and conduct, that he aroſe to the Dignity and Command of a Tribune, and afterward we are told to the higheſt Office of Præfectus Prætorio, thence was he Elected to the greateſt of Earthly dignities, but by what method and by what means is not ſo clear and evident. Euagrius delivers it for truth, that his advancement was altogether ſurpriſing and unexpected to himſelf, there being many and very worthy Perſons allied to Anaſtaſius ſtill ſurviving, who were in a very flouriſhing condition, and ſeemed to be qualified with ſuch circumſtances as were wont to prefer men to the Imperial Diadem. At this time Amantius, a man very Potent, was Præpoſitus Cubiculi to the Emperour. He knowing well that no Eunuch could ſucceed his Maſter, and conſequently that he himſelf was incapable, endeavoured by all means to advance Theocritus his intimate friend, and for this purpoſe ſending for Juſtin, delivered to him a great ſum of money to be diſtributed amongſt ſuch as had greateſt power in the Election. Juſtin having got the money made his own markets with it, by purchaſing the favour of the Guards, which having done and attained his end, he immediately made away Amantius, Theocritus and ſome others.

*L.*4. c. 1, 2, 3.

77. Such is the Relation of Euagrius with which ſome other accounts do not at all agree. Baronius acquaints us how from the Letters of Juſtin, written to Hormiſda the Roman Biſhop, it appears that he was created Emperour by the Nobility, Senate and Army, much contrary to his mind and inclination. Here we may call to mind how Anaſtaſius was terrified in a dream, and diverted from his purpoſe of killing Juſtin and Juſtinian his Nephew, as was reported, which if true he may ſeem reſerved and appointed by God for this Dignity in an extraordinary manner. By what way or what ſteps ſoever he mounted the Throne, he gave the people ſuch ſatisfaction in his Government as obliterated the memory of his ſiniſter and underhand actings, if ſuch they were, as alſo the deſpicableneſs of his Birth and former condition. This he did chiefly by adhering to the Orthodox Faith, and reſtoring ſuch as had ſuffered upon that account in the time of his Predeceſſour. Having hereby obliged the People ſo as to ſecure himſelf from Popular Tumults and Seditions, it ſeems he thought not yet his Eſtate ſufficiently ſetled ſo long as Amantius and the reſt continued in being. Therefore did he by one means or other make them away, having a double advantage by ſo doing. For he both prevented all Tumults and Dangers, which they might have procured him, and thereby it's thought he farther ingratiated himſelf with the Multitude, which hated them upon the account of Religion as having been the Inſtruments of Anaſtaſius. Some ſay

How he ſecured himſelf.

Amantius and Andreas a Gentleman of his Chamber he cauſed to be beheaded. Miſciel and Ardabures he baniſhed to Sardica, and Theocritus the Minion of Amantius, on whom he purpoſed to confer the Empire, he cauſed to be beaten and ſtoned, and then caſt into the Sea, thereby depriving him as well of Sepulture as of the Sovereignty, after which he had gaped.

Jornandes de Regn. & temporum ſucceſſione.

A. D. 519. Juſtino A. & Eutharico Coſſ.

78. In the year of our Lord DXIX Juſtin the Emperour aſſumed the Conſulſhip, and took to him for Collegue Eutharick Sirnamed Cillica the Son-in-Law of Theodorich King of Italy. He was now very much buſied with Church matters, endeavouring to undoe and rectify what had been done amiſs by his Predeceſſour. And not onely did he thus act in things purely Eccleſiaſtical, for one thing we find which had relation to civil Affairs. Anaſtaſius had made a Law in his fourth Conſulſhip, which he bore with Agapitus, whereby he gave leave to ſuch as, having no legitimate Children, kept Women in the place of Wives, to hold the Children begotten of ſuch Women as their own true Sons, in their paternal power, and legitimate, and to transfer upon them their Eſtates, either by Will, by Donation or any other ways known to the Laws, if ſo they pleaſed. If the Parents died Inteſtate, ſuch Children ſhould ſucceed them in their Inheritances, without any queſtion or alteration to ariſe concerning them and the Kindred (Agnati or Cognati) or any others, upon any pretence or quirk of Laws or Conſtitutions. Notwithſtanding, whoever ſhould have ſuch Woman in the place of a Wife, the Inſtruments of Dower being made, the ſame rule ſhould be obſerved for his Iſſue, leſt the liberty of acquiring his own Patrimony after a manner by his Children ſhould be taken from him. Moreover Sons and Daughters adopted (properly arrogated) with the Prince his Licence ſhould enjoy the benefit of this moſt provident Law, as he himſelf calls it.

L. 6. de Naturalibus liberis, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 27.

He reſtrains Inceſt.

L. 7. Ejuſd. tit.

79. From this Law Juſtin would have Children begot in Inceſt, to have no benefit. “And for the time to come he admoniſhed all his Subjects to ſeek for Off-ſpring in the way of lawfull Matrimony, declaring that unjuſt and libidinous Conjunctions ſhould find no pardon, as if the Conſtitution of Anaſtaſius had never been, which Piety moved him now to abrogate, and leave the former Laws in force, ſo as no pretence of Adoption, no craft in procuring the Prince his Letters ſhould avail; foraſmuch as fortreſſes were to be made for Vice, whereby it ſhould be lawfull to ſerve wantonneſs, and the Right and Name of a Father which was indeed denied to ſuch Perſons ſhould be pretended by the colour of a Law. Afterward Juſtinian approved of this Conſtitution of his Uncle, for repealing the ſaid Law of Anaſtaſius, and prohibiting the Adoption of Natural Children, in that it contained much abſurdity, and indiſcreetly ſuperinduced them as ſo many Strangers upon the legitimate. But ſuch as had already received any benefit from that Act of Anaſtaſius he did not deſign to deprive them of it.

Novel 89. c. 7.

A. D. 520. Vitaliano & Ruſtico Coſſ.

Vitalianus the Conſul killed in the Palace.

80. The year of our Lord DXX had for Conſuls in the Eaſt Vitalianus, and in the Weſt Ruſticus. Of Ruſticus who was created in the Weſt, we hear no farther than that he was ſo honoured; but Vitalianus rendred the year remarkable, not onely for his Conſulſhip, but the ſad end he came to in the ſeventh month thereof, wherein he was diſpatched in the Palace by ſeventeen wounds, together with Clarianus and Paulus his Abettors. Baronius improves this paſſage in Marcellinus, to ſhew how he was puniſhed for his patronizing the Eutychian Monks againſt the Legates of the Roman Biſhop. But Euagrius fetcheth the matter higher, and aſcribes his puniſhment to another ſort of guilt. He writes that this Vitalianus who lived in Thrace, and indeavoured to depoſe Anaſtaſius, was ſent for by Juſtin to Conſtantinople; for he ſtood in fear of his power, and of Fortune which is wont to be doubtfull and uncertain in War, of the reputation he was in with all men, and the ardent deſire he knew him to have after the Empire. And he rightly conjectured, that by no other means he ſhould be able to bring him under but by a ſhew of friendſhip; and therefore compoſing his Countenance to deceit in a wonderfull manner, he deſigned him one of thoſe Officers call'd Præſentes, and the more powerfully and effectually to overreach him, promoted him to the honour of the Conſulſhip. Being made Conſul, and converſant in the Palace, in a certain Gate behind the Court he was ſlain by treachery, and ſo received puniſhment for the wicked Acts he had ſo inconſiderately committed againſt the Roman Empire. Thoſe Acts, doubtleſs, Euagrius means, which he committed againſt the Government and Perſon of Anaſtaſius. And yet Baronius his principles moved him to affirm, that for them he was to be highly commended, if what he did, he did not out of deſire to Reign, but out of reſpect to true Religion. So that, ſaith he, it plainly was made to appear, that

lib. 4. c. 3.

Things rightly done, if they want a right Intention, are not wont to attain to a right end.

A. D. 521. Juſtiniano & Valerio Coſſ.

Juſtinian the Conſul his great Shews.

81. The year DXXI was remarkable for the Conſulſhip of Valrius in the Weſt, and of Juſtinian the Nephew of the Emperour Juſtin in the Eaſt, who indeed rendred it remarkable. For ſurpaſſing in magnificence all other Conſuls of the Eaſt, as Marcellinus notes, he exceeded ſo much in Conſular liberality, that he conferred two hundred and eighty eight Seſterces of Solidi on the People, and upon the Spectacula. He exhibited on the Amphitheatre a ſhew of twenty Lions, and thirty Leopards, beſides other Wild Beaſts, at one time. He preſented alſo a numerous ſight of Horſes adorned with their Riders in the Cirque, though he gratified not the mad multitude in all it deſired. Upon this occaſion Baronius obſerves, that though the bloudy Spectacula of the Gladiators were taken away, yet ſtill ſuch Shews were retained in the hunting of Wild Beaſts, and fighting with them; inhumane practices, and much more unchriſtian; the Bodies of Chriſtians being torn in pieces, for which Chriſt had ſhed his bloud. The following year was rather more famous for its Conſuls, ſuch a pair as theſe Ages ſeldom produced. Theſe were Symmachus named in the Eaſt, and Severinus Boëtius for the Weſt; of which Boëtius this probably was the third Conſulſhip. For two Conſulſhips of Severinus Boëtius are mentioned in the foregoing years, and they might be of the ſame perſon.

Procopius de bello Perſico, lib. 1.

Cabades the Perſian King deſires Juſtin to adopt his ſon Choſroes.

82. About this time Cabades the King of Perſia was much troubled in his mind, fearing innovation in his Houſe after his deceaſe. For upon his Sons he could not transfer the Succeſſion without ſome queſtion. His eldeſt, by name Caoſes, had the legal claim, but him he could not endure, therein over-ruling both Nature and the ancient Conſtitutions of that Kingdom. His ſecond Son Zames the Laws excluded, becauſe he had loſt an Eye, prohibiting a King to be made who had that or any other maim. He chiefly affected Choſroes, born of the Siſter of Apſemedes; but ſeeing the Perſians admire the valour of Zames as a good Souldier, and a favourer of Vertue, he feared leſt taking Arms againſt Choſroes, they might ruine his Family and his Kingdom. Hereupon he reſolved to make a Peace with the Romans, by procuring his Son Choſroes to be adopted by the Emperour Juſtin; and this he conceived to be the onely means to preſerve the ſecurity of his Empire. To this purpoſe he diſpatched Ambaſſadours to Conſtantinople with Letters to Juſtin. Therein he told him that He himſelf knew that the Romans had done the Perſians wrong, which yet he was reſolved not to urge; knowing that in reaſon thoſe ought to have the victory, who being in the right are yet willingly put to the worſt to gratifie their friends. But for this he muſt demand a favour; which would bind them two and their Subjects by Alliance, and conſequently by good affection, and ſo for ever ſettle the bleſſings of Peace in their poſſeſſion. This was, that he would adopt his Son Choſroes, who was to ſucceed him in his Kingdom, for his Son.

Juſtin at firſt likes the motion.

83. Juſtin was glad of the propoſition, and ſo was Juſtinian his Siſters ſon and ſucceſſour deſigned, urging the ſpeedy diſpatch and drawing up of the Adoption after the Roman form. But Proclus the Aſſeſſour to the Emperour, whom the Romans, Procopius ſaith, called Quæſtor, a known juſt man, not to be bribed, nor who haſtily paſſed Edicts, or altered things ſetled, croſſed it. He told the Emperour, that he did not uſe to meddle with Novelties, which of all things he feared moſt, knowing that they could not ſtand with ſafety. But had he been a very daring man, he thought he ſhould have ſhrunk and trembled at the ſtorm which was to be expected from ſuch an Act. He ſaid he could not perceive but the Conſultation was to betray the Empire to the Perſians with a fair pretence, who in plain words without diſguiſe or modeſty, now prayed them the Romans to let them take it from them, covering their groſs deceit with ſimplicity, and their impudent propoſal with a pretended deſire of quietneſs. He told the Uncle and Nephew, that they had both need to oppoſe this deſign of the Barbarians to the utmoſt of their power; the one leſt he ſhould prove the laſt Roman Emperour, and the other New General, leſt he ſhould block up his own way to the Empire. Some tricks he added, covered with fair pretences, need an Interpreter to the common ſort: But this Embaſſage bluntly at firſt daſh would have this Choſroes Heir to the Roman Emperour. He bad them conſider, that by nature the Eſtates of Fathers were due to children. All Laws though differing in other things yet in this agreeing both among Romans and Barbarians, ſo that yielding to their firſt requeſt, the reſt they muſt neceſſarily grant.

But is diſſwaded by Proclus the Quæſtor.

84. The Emperour and his Nephew approved of this Diſcourſe, and conſulted what was to be done. In the mean time came other Letters from Cabades, deſiring Juſtin to ſend to him men of experience for concluding a Peace, and to ſignifie the form that was to be obſerved in the Adoption. Upon this Proclus more earneſtly oppoſed the propoſal of the Perſians, and urged that they ſhould rather adopt to themſelves the Roman Power and Dominion, declaring it to be his opinion, that it was fit they ſhould conclude a Peace as ſpeedily as might be; and withall that ſome perſons of eminence ſhould be ſent, who being demanded by Cabades in what manner the Adoption ſhould be, ſhould anſwer, as was fit for a Barbarian; for the Barbarians adopted Sons not by Writings, but by Arming them. Accordingly Ambaſſadours were ſent by Juſtin with promiſe of ſome greater men to follow for conſummating all toward the Peace, and concerning Choſroes; and ſhortly after were ſent Hypatius a Patritian, Nephew to the late Emperour Anaſtaſius and General of the Eaſt, and Rufinus Son of Sylvanus a principal Patritian, and one well known to Cabades. From the Perſians came Seoſes their moſt powerfull man, who had the chief Command over all Armies and Offices, and with him Mebodes Maſter of the Palace; theſe met upon the Frontiers and treated. And Choſroes came down to the Tigris, two days journey from Niſibis, that the Peace being concluded, he might go to Conſtantinople. Many diſcourſes paſſed about their differences; amongſt others, Seoſes alledged that Colchis, afterward called Lazica, anciently belonged to the Perſians, and that the Romans held it from them unjuſtly. On the other ſide, the Romans took it very ill that their title to Lazica ſhould be queſtioned; and when they ſaid that the Adoption muſt be performed in a manner fit for a Barbarian, the Perſians thought it unſufferable: So they broke off and went ſeverally home. And Choſroes returning to his Father vowed to revenge this affront upon the Romans.

Ambaſſadours on both ſides about it.

The Commiſſioners differ and part.

85. The Ambaſſadours afterward accuſed one another. Mebodes accuſed Seoſes for mentioning Lazica without having received any Inſtructions from their Maſter for ſo doing, purpoſely to break the Treaty, and for dealing therein firſt with Hypatius, who bearing the King leaſt affection, croſt the concluſion of the Peace and the Adoption. Seoſes being charged with theſe and many other things, was called to a Trial before the Perſian Senate, who all were diſpleaſed at his new Office, and offended at his behaviour. He was a man free from corruption, and very juſt, but extremely arrogant; which though a vice natural to the great Officers of Perſia, yet in him they thought reigned in extremity. Beſides what was now mentioned, his Accuſers laid to his charge, that not contenting himſelf with the ancient cuſtoms of the Perſians, he worſhipped new Gods, and that lately he had buried his Wife, the Perſian Laws prohibiting the burying of dead Bodies in the Earth. They condemned him to death, and it was executed upon him; for, Cabades would not pardon him, though he ſeemed to grieve as for a friend, profeſſing that he himſelf was not offended at him, but he muſt not infringe the Laws. Indeed he owed his life to Seoſes who contributed moſt to his living and Reigning. But, his Office as it began ſo it ended with him, none after him having the like general power over all Offices and Armies. Rufinus alſo accuſed Hypatius to the Emperour, who upon it diſcharged him of his Office. He cauſed alſo to be tortured ſome about him, but finding no truth in the accuſation, he did no other harm unto him.

They accuſe one another.

Seoſes the Perſian put to death

Hypatius the Roman diſcharged of his Employment.

86. Cabades then burned with a deſire to invade the Romans, but found this impediment to his deſign. The Iberians of Aſia, who were ſeated by the Caſpian Gates to the Southward, had next them to the Weſt Lazica, and to the Eaſt part of Perſia. Theſe people were Chriſtians as devout as any, and had always been ſubject to the King of Perſia. Theſe Cabades would needs force from their Religion, writing a command to Gurgenes their King, to doe all things as the Perſians did, and not to bury their dead Bodies in the Earth, but to caſt them out to the Dogs and Fowles. Hereupon Gurgenes revolted to the Emperour Juſtin, and deſired aſſurance from him that he would not leave him to the mercy of the Perſians. He willingly granted his requeſt, and ſent Probus the Siſters Son of Anaſtaſius late Emperour, a Patritian, with Money to raiſe an Army of Hunnes for his Aſſiſtence. Probus returned without doing any thing, and then the Emperour ſent Peter as General into Lazica with ſome Hunnes to aid Gurgenes; at which time alſo Cabades ſent an Army againſt him, under the command of Boes a Perſian, the General of his Forces. Gurgenes found the Roman Succours not competent, and himſelf too weak for the Perſians, and thereupon he fled into Lazica with his Wife and Children, the chief men of Iberia and his Brothers, whereof Peranius was the eldeſt. In the confines of Lazica he ſtaid, and fortified himſelf in the Faſtneſſes, which hindred the Perſians that purſued him, from doing any thing to purpoſe. Afterward ſome Iberians came to Conſtantinople, and Peter was called home.

Gurgenes King of the Iberians revolts to Juſtin.

The Lazians alſo refuſing to help to guard the Province; the Emperour ſent an Army commanded by Irenæus.

Expeditions of the Romans into the Perſian Dominions.

87. Formerly the guard of two Forts at the entrance of Lazica from Iberia was carefully maintained by the Provincials, though they endured much. For no Corn nor Wine grew near, nor other commodity; nor, for the Faſtneſſes, could be brought thither, but upon mens backs, and they lived, being uſed to it, upon Panicum or Mill-ſeed there growing. But the Emperour now took thence thoſe Warders, and put Roman Gariſons to keep thoſe places, and them at firſt the Lazians ſupplied with Proviſions, though hardly; but after they refuſed the ſervice, and the Romans thereupon abandoning the Forts, the Perſians ſeized on them. In the mean time the Romans, under conduct of Sittas and Beliſarius, invaded Perſarmenia, and having foraged much of the Countrey, and taken many Priſoners, retired. They were then but youths, their beards ſpringing, and Lanciers of the Guard to Juſtinian the chief General, who ſoon after held the Empire with his Uncle Juſtin. Another inroad Sittas and Beliſarius made into Armenia, and were ſuddenly met and put to the worſt by Narſes and Aratius, who not long after revolted to the Romans, and ſerved under Beliſarius in Italy. Licelarius alſo a Thracian made an Invaſion about Niſibis with another Army of Romans, but they retreated or ran away, none charging them. Thereupon the Emperour diſcharged Licelarius, and gave to Beliſarius the Command of the Forces in Daras, and then was Procopius Writer of the Hiſtory choſen his Counſellor or Aſſeſſor. Shortly after, Juſtin died, having before declared Juſtinian his Siſters Son Emperour with him. Theſe things thus falling out betwixt the Romans and Perſians in the time of Juſtin, we thought convenient to relate altogether, and then to continue our ſurvey of the other year remaining of this Emperour's Reign.

A. D. 523. Maximo Conſ.

The Conſulſhip almoſt dwindled to nothing.

Juſtin kind to Advocates.

L. l. 6. 7. 8. 9. de Advocatis diverſorum Judicum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 8.

88. The year of our Lord DXXIII had Maximus Conſul alone in the Weſt. Some wonder it is that we have no certainty of any one named at Conſtantinople; for leiſure enough they had there, for any thing we can perceive to have been tranſacted by them of Civil concernment; but this Dignity began now to dwindle ſo much, that in a ſhort time it was quite extinct. The year following, being the DXXIV of our Saviour, had for Conſuls Juſtin himſelf the ſecond time, and Opilio, ſuch an one by name as he had formerly been by Trade and profeſſion. Juſtin as he had formerly been kind to the Advocates of the Treaſury, in reſtoring to them their Salary given them at firſt by Zeno and taken away by Anaſtaſius, ſo this year was favourable to the Advocates pleading in the Court of the Prefect of the City, defining their number of Eighty, and confirming to them their Priviledges; but withall regulating their time, and reſtraining their abſence; as he forbad the Advocates of the Treaſury ſhould be preferred per ſaltum, the perſon of Menander onely excepted. What concerned the Advocates was afterwards extended to thoſe that ſerved in the Forum of the Prefect of Illyricum by Juſtinian. Beſides what concerned Advocates, we find that this year Juſtin Enacted ſomething he found wanting in the matter of Teſtaments, as he had done three years before. Of what he did we ſhall give an account altogether.

Sentent. lib. 3. c. 4.

L. 8. Qui Teſtam. facere poſſunt. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 22.

Grants to blind Perſons Power to make Nuncupative Wills.

Novel. 69.

L. 23. de Teſtamentis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 23. Dat. 13. Kal. Decembr.

Declares the Inſinuation of Teſtaments to be onely in the Magiſter Cenſus.

89. It had formerly been a queſtion, Whether a blind man could make a Teſtament, becauſe of his imperfection; at length it was reſolved he might, becauſe, as Paulus ſaith, he could call Witneſſes together, and hear ſuch as would bear him teſtimony. The Law for the like reaſon permitted ſuch an one both to adopt and be adopted, much more to manage his own Eſtate, inſomuch that a Curator was not wont to be aſſigned a blind man, but he himſelf might make a Procurator for the management of his buſineſs. Now Juſtin thought fit farther to Ordain, that a blind man whether ſo born, or by diſeaſe or accident, might make a Teſtament by Nuncupation; provided there were preſent a Tabularius, and ſeven Witneſſes, which the Law required in other Teſtaments. The way and method he preſcribes is not ſo proper here to be inſerted; but this liberty thus given, Leo one of his Succeſſors thought not large enough, but gave to blind perſons leave to make Wills ſecretly as other perſons did. By another Edict bearing date of the latter end of November, "Juſtin was pleaſed to confirm ſuch Conſtitutions as had been " made by former Emperours, that the laſt Wills and Teſtaments of perſons dying " in Conſtantinople, ſhould be proved or inſinuated onely in the Office of the Ma- " giſter Cenſus, and there recorded in the publick Monuments. That where the " Inheritance exceeded not an hundred Acres, neither the Magiſtri nor their Officers " ſhould dare to take any Fees or Reward for the Inſinuation of them. He admo- " niſheth not onely the Judges of Tribunals, but the Defenſors of Churches alſo, " among whom a moſt filthy ſort of Intimation had crept, that they meddle not

“ with that which onely belonged by Law to the Magiſter Cenſus; affirming it “ abſurd, that Employments ſhould be diſturbed by promiſcuous Acts, that one “ ſhould ſteal from another, and eſpecially Clerks, to whom he ſaith it is a ſhame
“ to pretend themſelves skilfull in the diſputes of Courts. The breakers of this “ his Sanction, he puniſhes with a Fine of fifty pounds of Gold. And he adds, that “ it is not to be permitted that the laſt Wills and Teſtaments of the dying, ſhould “ be rendred any-whit invalid by any improper Inſinuations, while ſuch as are “ improper for that work boldly uſurp the practice of it. But what this and other former Conſtitutions enjoyn concerning the Magiſter Cenſus in Conſtantinople, was in the Provinces performed by the Preſidents, Magiſtrates, or Defenſors. Afterward in the time of Leo it was committed to the Quæſtor. But it will not be amiſs here to acquaint the Reader with the ancient form of Inſinuation of Teſtaments before the Defenſors and the Curiæ of Cities.

Et præcipuè Clericis, quibus opprobium eſt, ſi peritos ſe velint diſceptationum forenſium.

The form of Inſinuations.

Vide Notas in h. l.

90. Such a year and ſuch a day the Defenſor and all the Court of that City being preſent, Titius that followed the buſineſs, ſaid; I deſire of you moſt worthy (Optime) Defenſor, and you the laudable Curiales and Municipes, that you command the publick Records to be laid open to me, for I have ſome things in mine hands which I deſire may be roborated by the Allegation of thoſe publick Acts. The Defenſor then and Curiales ſaid, The publick Books are open to thee, proceed according to thine own deſire. He then replied, Gaius an illuſtrious perſon hath employed me to inſinuate his Teſtament amongſt the Municipal Acts as the Cuſtome is. Then ſaid the Defenſor, The Mandate we have heard, but we muſt alſo hear the Teſtament which thou ſayeſt thou haſt in thine hands, and then it ſhall be confirmed by publick Acts as thou requireſt. After the reading of the Teſtament, the Defenſor and the Curiales ſaid, Let this Teſtament now recited be put amongſt the publick Acts. After this ſaid, the Party implyed, Moſt worthy Defenſor, I farther deſire that the Geſts may be publickly delivered to me. The Defenſor and Order of the Court anſwered, Foraſmuch as the Teſtament and Mandate are rightly made, and we have found them confirmed by the hands of honeſt men ſubſcribing, it is fitting that the Geſts when they are ſubſcribed by us, and publiſhed by the Amanuenſis, be delivered to thee as the manner is, and at length be preſerved in the publick Acts. In like manner were Donations or Deeds of Gift recorded, in the publick Regiſters.

How Teſtaments were opened after the death of Teſtators.

Vide Notas ad. l. 2. Quemadmodum Teſtamenta, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 32.

91. Thus we ſee Teſtaments were opened in the life time of the Teſtators, that they might be regiſtred, and ſo firm belief might be given to them, if ſo the Teſtator pleaſed. They were again opened publickly after the death of them that made them, that ſo they might be known to Heirs, (or Executors) Legataries, thoſe that had Truſts, Slaves manumitted, the Treaſury to which the twentieth part was due, and others therein concerned. They were opened in the preſence of Witneſſes or honeſt Perſons, by thoſe that were preſent within three or five days, and by the abſent within the like ſpace of time after their coming to thoſe places. The Witneſſes or the greateſt part of them that had ſigned the Teſtament were there. They having owned their Seals, the thread was broken, the Teſtament was opened and read, and a Copy of it was permitted to be taken, and then it was cloſed with a publick Seal, and committed to the Archives; that if the Copy were loſt, the loſs might thence again be ſupplied. Afterward it was read, the ſame Perſons of repute being preſent in the Forum or the Baſilica between the hours of Eight and Four. But to our matter.

A. D. 525.
Probino & Philoxeno Coſſ.

Stirs about Religion betwixt Juſtin and Theodorich.

92. The year of our Lord, DXXV. had Probinus (ſome have it Probus) and Philoxenus for Conſuls, it being the Eighth of Juſtin the Emperour: little we have of Civil concernment managed this year by our Emperour; who moſt employed himſelf in things relating to Religion. His zeal for the Catholick Faith carried him ſo far as to take the Churches from the Arians, which endangered the breeding of very ill bloud between him and Theodorich King of Italy. For, he being of that perſwaſion cauſed the Biſhop of Rome himſelf accompanied by Theodorus, Importunus and Agapetus Senatours, and Exconſuls, and another Agapetus a Patrician to undertake an Embaſſy to the Emperour. Their inſtructions were to obtain a revocation of the Edicts made againſt thoſe Hereticks, otherwiſe he threatned to deal as ſeverely with ſuch Orthodox Chriſtians as had their Abode in his Dominions. How John the Biſhop behaved himſelf in this Employment, and what his Entertainment was it will be more pertinent to declare upon another occaſion, as alſo that he was at his return caſt into priſon and ſo hardly treated that therein he died not long after. But we are told that while he remained at Conſtantinople, he Crowned Juſtin; not but that this ceremony had been formerly performed, but the Emperour would have it again performed out of piety by the Succeſſour of St. Peter, whom he was overjoyed to ſee within his Dominions. So Baronius and others deliver the ſtory, who alſo obſerve (and in this juſtice doth not contradict them) that the City of Antioch having been proſtituted to Hereticks, and become the Aſylum, firſt of Neſtorius and Neſtorians, afterwards of Eutychians, and Theopaſchites, now received double for her ſins, and drank deep of the cup of God's wrath. It belongs not to us to aſſign ſuch a cauſe; but for the calamity that Antioch underwent at this time, it ought not to eſcape our obſervation.

Ad h. An. & Seq.

Greivous Calamities at Antioch.

93. About the time that John the Biſhop of Rome was employed in the meſſage before related, a moſt dreadfull Earthquake happened at Antioch, which as Euagrius writes, had been uſhered in with frequent and grievous fires, and was attended by other great calamities. In the Seventh year of Juſtin, he ſaith, though Baronius from Marcellinus refers it to this, in the tenth month, or Artemiſius, by the Romans called May, on the nine and twentieth, being Friday, at noon time of the day, (Marcellinus ſaith juſt at dinner time) fell out ſuch a ratling, quivering and ſhaking of the Foundations, as in a manner overturned the whole City. After it, came Fire again, which joyning as it were in a league offenſive with the other calamities almoſt made an end of all. For what the Earthquake did not deſtroy, on that did the Fire prey; and after the raiſing of moſt dreadfull flames, conſume to aſhes. What parts of the City were conſumed, how many men periſhed both by Fire and the fall of Houſes, and what miſchief happened, ſo ſtrange that no Style could ſufficiently deſcribe them, John the Rhetorician (he tells us) ſet forth with lamentation in his Hiſtory, which concluding with this fire could not but move the paſſions of the Reader in an extraordinary manner. And for a concluſion, and which was another calamity to this City, Euphraſius the Biſhop periſhed in the ruines, that none might be left to provide neceſſaries for the City.

Euagrius lib. 4. c. c. 5. 6.

94. And yet, as he himſelf obſerves, the carefull and loving Providence of God towards Mankind, which is wont before the arrival of a Plague or puniſhment to provide a remedy; to blunt the ſword of wrath with clemency, and when things grow to a deſperate point, to ſet wide open the fountain of mercy, raiſed up Euphræmius Prefect of the Eaſt to take care of Antioch, ſo as nothing neceſſary (afterwards it ſeems) ſhould be wanting to it. This the Citizens took ſo well, as reverencing the man for his Zeal and Charity they made choice of him for their Biſhop, and he obtained the Apoſtolical See as a reward of his forecaſt. Again after two years and five months Antioch was ſhaken with Earthquakes, and then for Antioch it was called Theopolis, obtaining alſo more effects of the Emperour's care and vigilancy. Indeed others give Teſtimony of the Chriſtian compaſſion ſhewed by Juſtin upon occaſion of the former Earthquake; how he received the news with grief and aſtoniſhment, put off his Purple, laid aſide his Diadem, clothed himſelf with Sackcloth and ſate ſolitary in Aſhes many days together; and afterward relieved the diſtreſſed Antiochians with all neceſſaries to his great charge and trouble. But it appears farther from Euagrius that he had ſeveral other objects of his pity and compaſſion, of this very ſect, theſe Calamities being frequent in his time. For Dyrrachium of old called Epidamnus was ſorely ſhaken alſo with a trembling of the Earth. So was Corinth in Greece, and Anazarbus the principal City of Cilicia the leſſer, which underwent that calamity now the fourth time: which Cities Juſtin repaired not without the expence of vaſt ſums of money. About the ſame time Edeſſa, that moſt ample and happy City of the Oſroeni as he calls it, was defaced by the overflowing of the River Seirtus which ran by its ſide, ſo that many Houſes were carried away by the violence of the Waters, and an infinite number of men was drowned. Both Edeſſa and Anazarbus received a new name from Juſtin, being each of them called Juſtinopolis.

Καὶ τὸν Ἀποστολικὸν λαγχάνει θρόνον.

C. 8.

And other places

A. D. 526.
Olybrio Conſ.

95. The DXXVI year of our Lord was marked with the ſole Conſulſhip of Olybrius. This year is famous for little tranſacted by Juſtin, except this be to be taken notice of, that growing toward the end of his own life, he was moved to Enact ſomething in favour of the deceaſed. By the practices of ſome Perſons he was conſtrained to declare, "That it was unjuſt, and a thing ſtrange in thoſe times,
" to offer injury to the Reliques of the Dead by them who pretending the Party
" deceaſed was their Debtor, and to Exact their Debt, hindred his Burial: That " for the time to come no ſuch injury might proceed, he now took order, impoſing
" a Fine of fifty pounds of Gold upon one that ſhould be found guilty of ſuch wic-
" kedneſs, or if he was not able to pay it, he ſhould undergo Corporal puniſhment
" at the award of a competent Judge. This humanity towards the Dead, his Nephew afterwards extended to the Dying, Ordaining that if any going to the houſe of a dying perſon ſhould moleſt him or others belonging to him, or not obſerving legal proceeding ſhould mark or ſeal any of his Goods, ſuch an one ſhould loſe his

L. ult. de Sepulchro violato, Cod. Juſt. lib. 9. tit. 19.

Novel. Juſt. 60. c. 1.

Action after the Parties death, the Executors or Heirs of the deceaſed ſhould recover as much of him; he ſhould forfeit the third part of his Eſtate, and be noted with infamy. The ſame puniſhment ſhould he incurr who ſhould hinder the Funeral. Nay he decreed that before Nine days, to be reckoned from the death of the deceaſed, no moleſtation ſhould be offered to any belonging to his perſon, otherwiſe ſuch Action ſhould be invalid and ineffectual, after thoſe days of mourning, no damage yet hereby coming to the Creditour by reaſon of the ſtay of the Nine days.

Novel. 115. c. 5.

A. D. 527. Mavortio Conſ.

Juſtinian promoted to the Empire.

96. The DXXVII of our Saviour had Mavortius for Conſul without a Collegue. This year was famous for Juſtin his taking Juſtinian to be his Partner in the Empire. This Juſtinian was the Son of Sabatius (by the Illyrians called Iſtokus) and of Bigleniza the Siſter of Juſtin, which Woman the Romans, by reaſon of the likeneſs of the ſound, termed Vigilantia. By his Countrey-men the Illyrians he was called Uprando, or Right Juſtice, to expreſs the ſignification of his Latin name. He was born at Taureſium, and educated at Bederina the native place of Juſtin, Towns ſituate in the Borders of Illyricum near to Thrace, upon which account by later Writers he is called a Thracian, it being ordinary when Cities are ſo placed to be reckoned by ſeveral Authours as members of both Provinces, eſpecially it being obſervable, that the Partitions of Provinces are not the ſame in all Geographers and Hiſtorians. Hereupon Juſtinian himſelf in his ninth Novel, placeth Juſtiniana prima, and Bederina, in Pannonia Secunda: When a Youth, he was ſent an Hoſtage to Ravenna to Theodorich King of the Goths by Juſtin his Uncle then General of the Army. He began to learn the Military Art at the beginning of his Uncle's Reign, who about this time adopted him, and gave him the title of Nobiliſſimus. Vitalianus being ſlain in the Palace, in the place called Delphicum; by his Faction it's ſaid, and ſome ſay by his procurement, he was made Captain General of the Roman Legions in his room. Now when Juſtin had reigned eight years, nine months and three days, as Euagrius punctually obſerves, he began to Reign with him, and he received the Title on the firſt day of the month Xanthicus, or of April.

Vide Notas in Procopii Secretam Hiſtoriam.

In what Senſe.

97. But what the Title was doth not ſo clearly appear, whether that of Auguſtus or of Cæſar onely, betwixt which there was a vaſt difference, as may be ſeen by what we have ſaid in the preceding Volume. Some Writers ſay he created him Cæſar, and ſome that this day he deſigned him his Succeſſor in the Empire, which words rather make out to us that he was Cæſar not Auguſtus, or the complete Collegue of the Emperour, though Writers generally ſpeak of his making him his Partner, which might be in ſuch ſenſe as we have formerly related; though Cæſar as ſuch was a Subject, and we have heard how as a Subject, and even as an Apparitor or ſervant, Diocletian made one of them run by his Chariot. As Polities and Governments with time decay and alter, the Cæſar poſſibly at this time might be in greater Authority than formerly. But let us from Hiſtorians betake us to our Law Books, without which, lame Hiſtories muſt be written both of this and other times. And ſo it happens that after this his Promotion we find a Conſtitution ſtill extant in his Code, bearing the name both of him and his Uncle: The Contents of it we may declare afterward. It was firſt reſtored out of the Baſilica by Cujacius, and as now it is placed in the Code being tranſlated into Latin, the Publiſhers of the Book have prefixed this Inſcription Impp. Juſtinus & Juſtinianus A. A. and not without reaſon. For though from the Greek it ſelf no ſuch thing appears, as either that Juſtinian was now Auguſtus or indeed joyned with his Uncle in the making of the Edict, yet from another Novel Conſtitution he made upon this Subject it is evident that he was joyned with him. The matter was this.

L. 2. de Mandatis Principum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 15.

98. Becauſe much inconvenience happened in the Provinces through the impudence of Perſons who pretended to have ſecret Inſtructions or Mandates from the Emperour, a Law had been made in the time of Gratian, Valentinian and Theodoſius, which forbad that any credit ſhould be given to any ſuch pretended Inſtructions or Mandates, except exhibited in Writing, and the Prince his Letters appeared, be the Meſſengers of what dignity they would, whether making a ſhew of the dignity of Tribune, Notary or Comes. After this another Conſtitution was made, or that which Cujacius reſtored out of the Baſilica, and repeats in a manner the ſame thing, leſt Judges ſhould mention in their Sentences that the Emperour had commanded by word of mouth, that ſuch an one ſhould be brought into Judgment, or ſome Sentence be given, which ſhould be divers from what was wont to be. For the Mandates of Princes ſo far bind, as they are reduced into Writings or Letters; but this Conſtitution excepts when the Emperour Aſſigns an Aſſeſſour or Aſſiſtant to a Judge, Vide Cujacii Obſ. lib. [illegible] c. 31. L. 1. 2. de Mandatis Principum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 15.

Judge, or commands a Sentence to be rightly given. In ſuch caſes they might mention that they had ſuch mandate from the Prince his mouth, or elſe from the moſt glorious Quæſtor of his Palace, or ſome of the Spectabiles, the Referendarii, and obedience was to be given to ſuch Mandates without writing. Now in a Novel Conſtitution made ſome thirteen years after, Juſtinian expreſly makes mention of a Law as well of his Father of pious memory, as of his own Tranquillity; (ſuch was the phraſe uſed at this time,) which diſpoſed that Judges ſhould by no means write in their Sentences, as if it had been commanded them by word of mouth from the Emperour and not written, to bring forth certain Perſons into Judgment, and to the ſame purpoſe as before. Now though the Names of Cæſars, as we have ſeen, were added to thoſe of the Emperours in the Inſcriptions of Laws, yet it was with the Diſtinction of Cæſars, and ſuch as had not Sovereign Authority had not legiſlative power, though to grace and honour them this was done. But Juſtinian makes this Law as much his as his (adoptive) Father Juſtin's. And to confirm this our opinion that he was made Auguſtus and not Cæſar; Baronius hath exhibited the Image of a Coin, to be ſeen in his Annals, wherein are both the Emperours expreſſed in ſhape, both adorned with Diadems, with an Inſcription of three Auguſti, by which he ſaith its certain that Juſtin, Juſtinian and Theodora his Empreſs are deſigned. If ſo, ſome late Writers though very learned ought to have been more accurate than to ſay he was created Cæſar, betwixt which Title and that of Auguſtus there was ſo great a difference.

Novel. 124. c.4.

He was made Auguſtus.

Ad h. A.

99. But the Title though he had with the uſual Concomitants and Effects, how he came by it is not fully agreed. The pretended ſecret Hiſtory of Procopius makes him to have affected the Empire, to have Exerciſed a Tyranny, covering violence with a ſhew of doing buſineſs. Affirms that they ſaluted him King or Emperour together with his Uncle, if it was legally done; for the Senate by fear and threats were drawn into that Suffrage. Another writes that Juſtin the Emperour made Juſtinian his Cæſar Nephew, at the ſupplication of the Senate, he being unwilling to doe it. But others ſay that all the Senate approved of the thing, and Zonaras tells this ſtory how it was performed. The cheif of the Senate deſiring the Emperour that he would take Juſtinian for his Collegue, he took hold of the Purple and told them they had reaſon to deſire that no younger Perſon ſhould have that come on his Back; and at that time he rejected their Petition. However, after ſome little time they decreed the Title of Nobiliſſimus to Juſtinian, and obtained of the Emperour a confirmation of their Decree by his Letters. Not long after, the Emperour falling ill of a wound in his thigh, and being in danger called Epiphanius the Patriarch and the cheif of the Nobility to him, declared Juſtinian his Nephew Emperour, and ſet the Diadem on his Head with his own Hands. The People being aſſembled in the Cirque, Juſtinian made his Entry with the Diadem, and was received with lucky acclamations by all, and returned to the Palace being at that time forty five years old. Preſently after his Wife Theodora was declared Empreſs, and not long it was before Juſtin died when he had Reigned Nine years and twenty days. Thus much Zonaras, who might be miſtaken as to the time of making him Nobiliſſimus. To this Cedrenus adds that as ſoon as he was made Emperour, he gave away all his private Eſtate to the Churches of the Holy Apoſtles and of the Holy Martyrs Sergius and Bacchus whom he much reverenced.

Vide Notas ad Procopii Arcanam Hiſtoriam & Baronium ad h. A.

Poſt. Conſulatum 2 Juſtini & Apionis, Juſtinus Aug. Juſtinianum nepotem ſuum, ad ſenatorum ſupplicationem invitus Cæſarem facit. Victor Tunnunenſis in Chron. p.37. Edit. Jugæ Stadii 1600.

100. Juſtin having promoted thus his Nephew, whether to the good liking of himſelf and the Senate or not, died of an old wound he had received in Battel by the ſhot of an Arrow, (in his Foot ſay ſome, or as others in his thigh) four months after, about the firſt of Auguſt, having Reigned nine years, one month, and three days; and lived ſeventy ſeven. A mark of extraordinary Fortune, which wrought ſo wonderfully, that from a Keeper of Cattel, he ſhould riſe to be a Commander of men, firſt of Souldiers, then of the Pretorian Guards, and at laſt of all men within the Roman World, having eſcaped two Impriſonments. Yet was he Analphabetus as the Greeks termed him, or one who could not read, or knew no Letters, which had not happened to the Romans before in the opinion of the Authour of the ſecret Hiſtory aſcribed to Procopius. Whereas the Emperour, he ſaith, was wont when he ordained any thing to add to the Paper the Letters of his Name, he could neither ordain, nor was able to doe buſineſs, but Proclus who executed the Office of Quæſtor, and was his Aſſeſſour governed as he pleaſed. But that there might remain ſome ſhew of the Emperour's Hand, he that waited or the cheif Secretary (who from that thing formed to the ſhape of a little Dog, wherein the Ink was contained had the Title of a Caniculo) found out a way. They ingraved in a poliſht peice of wood the form of four Latin Letters, which being laid on a Paper, a pen dipped in the purple Ink with which Emperours were wont to write, was put into Juſtin's Hand, which thoſe about holding ſtirred it about and drew the pen through thoſe clifts of the wood or forms of Letters, and ſo carried away their Writings ſigned.

101. This Invention by ingraving onely four Letters in the Table or piece of wood, did not onely provide for the Convenience of Juſtin, but retained the ancient cuſtome of the Romans, who, as Alamannus obſerves from Plutarch, were not wont to write their Prænomina out in length, but either one ſingle Letter of it, as N. T. L. or two as C. N. or three as Sex. Ser. Juſtinian afterward, as he gathers from Corippus the Poet, uſed the ſingle Letter I. to denote his Name; but theſe cuſtoms were a little after intermitted, when the Eaſtern Emperours put down their whole Names to Writings and Inſtruments, but Women in certain ſecret knots and foldings of the Letters, as appears by their ancient Diplomata, and otherwiſe, which our men at this day imitate upon their Coaches. Concerning the Eucauſtum or purple Ink made of the Fiſh Murex we have formerly ſpoken. The Perſon who attended at it, and from the ſhape of the Standiſh wherein it was kept, had the Title of a Caniculo was uſually of the King's bloud, and his Dignity and Authority were very great. To return to Juſtin, who is ſaid to have been very ignorant and blockiſh, his Marriage if poſſible was lower than his firſt condition. The Name of his Wife was Lupilina or Lupilia, derived it ſeems from Lupa, by which the vileſt Strumpet was wont to be called. This ſhe brought not with her to Court, for her Husband and the People of Canſtantinople when ſhe came to be Empreſs changed it for that of Euphemia. As ſhe was Barbarous ſhe is ſaid to have been very ignorant and unpoliſht; but having taken the Name of the Martyr Euphemia, ſhe built a magnificent Church at Conſtantinople, and dedicated it to her, wherein ſhe placed her own Statue.

Vide Alamannum in Notis.

102. We find Juſtin by this time dead, but yet have not done with him, for there being ſome Laws of his making extant without day or Conſul, they cannot properly be placed in any one year of his Reign, and therefore are to be ſpoken of in groſs when his Reign is out; we mean ſuch of them as illuſtrate the Jus publicum, and ſhew the manner of Adminiſtration in his time. He was a Souldier, and though otherwiſe ſaid to be dull and heavy, yet might ſufficiently underſtand what were Clogs and Incumbrances of the Military profeſſion. Yet did not he find out one certain particular of theſe miſcheifs which was too prevalent in his time, till the common obſervation preſented it to his view, as ſhould ſeem by the remedy he preſcribed, which is not directed to any one private man, but to the Senate it ſelf. In a certain Law or Oration thus directed, he takes notice of it as manifeſt, that his Predeceſſours had enacted many things concerning Souldiers, who undertook to manage Eſtates under the Title of Hiring; but ſo little were they regarded, that ſuch Souldiers forgetfull of the puniſhment threatned, dared to undertake ſuch ſordid Employments, and neglecting their care for the Publick, and their Victorious Standards, haſted to turn Tenants to other men, and converted the ſharpneſs of their Weapons not againſt their Enemies, but to miſuſe their Neighbours, and perhaps the miſerable Husbandmen they had undertaken to manage. Wherefore he was conſtrained to betake himſelf to the making of another Conſtitution, more deeply and fully to remove the Cauſe. He Commands therefore all that bear Arms, or Souldiers both of greater and leſſer Rank for the time to come, to abſtain from all hiring of other mens Eſtates. And by Souldiers he ſaith he means as well thoſe who ſerved under the High Magiſtri Militum, as them who were inrolled in the eleven moſt denote Scholæ, as alſo ſuch as under divers Options were graced with the Name of Confederates. Such ſhall know, that upon ſuch Contract they ſhall ipſo facto, without any ſentence given, forfeit their Military Employment, without poſſibility of being reſtored to their former Degree, either by the Emperours Indulgence, or by conſent or permiſſion of the Judge, under whom they undertook to diſcharge the Duty; that ſo by ſuch new undertaking they may not looſe their eſteem, being from Souldiers rendred Pagani, and Infamous from men of repute; and that after ſuch turning Tenants, which he abſolutely forbids, what they had received from the Publick they be compelled to reſtore without all delay. In concluſion, ſuch as let their Eſtates out to Souldiers, ſhould be deprived of all help to recover them into their own Hands again. There are other Laws bearing his Name without Day or Conſul, which relating to Marriage are to be conſidered of diligently in the place proper to the Character and Marriage of Juſtinian his Nephew and Succeſſour.

CHAP. II.

Containing the long and active Reign of Juſtinian the Great.

The ſpace of Eight and thirty years, three months and thirteen days.

SECT. I.

Containing his Wars eſpecially.

1. JUSTINIAN was advanced to the Imperial Dignity, being as ſome write forty five years old, in the ſecond year of Athalrick King of Italy, the ſecond of Fœlix the Fourth, the Roman Biſhop, fifty years after the Deſtruction of the Empire in the Weſt, and the fall of Auguſtulus, the DXXVII of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt, in the ſole Conſulſhip of Mavortius.

2. Having vaſt deſigns in his Head, he took at his firſt Eſtabliſhment a right courſe to attain unto them. He began with the Service of his Maker, by directing his Subjects into the right way to know and ſerve him, by ſuppreſſing ſuch as would lead them out of the way into the by-paths of Hereſie, and by ſeveral Acts of Charity and Royal Bounty, as our Eccleſiaſtical Writers obſerve, though they had no real kindneſs for him. His vaſt deſigns were of all ſorts which a Prince is capable of cheriſhing, extending both to the ſecurity and imbelliſhment of the Empire he received from his Anceſtours, and to the inlargement of it by recovering what had been loſt by his Predeceſſours. The former part he performed both by his Sword and his Pen, by oppoſing its Enemies and modelling the Laws; and the latter by a vigorous aſſerting of his Right, for ſo he eſteemed it, to the members which lately had been Provinces; and though they were now become Barbarous Kingdoms, yet he thought the Pretenders to them could not plead ſuch Preſcription, as to invalidate his ancient Title, if his Arms could but procure him a reentry. How all theſe things he diſcharged, with other matters, is to be ſhewn in due method and place. And firſt, e'er his Uncle was well cold in his Grave, and he himſelf warm in his Seat, he found himſelf concerned to curb the Inſolence of his Neighbours, for ſuch he eſteemed the Perſians, but grudged to vouchſafe the Title to ſuch Barbarians as had ſet up for themſelves in the Roman Soil. The times requiring that much now ſhould be ſaid of the Tranſactions of the Perſians with the Romans, it may be very convenient to fetch their matters higher, to give an account of the Succeſſion of their Kings, and of ſuch actions as either have been omitted, or onely touched at in the Relation of Roman Affairs. For the Dignity of this Kingdom requires that it ſhould here alſo have a place by it ſelf, if we were furniſhed, beſides the Succeſſion of Kings, with any conſiderable bulk of Hiſtory relating merely to it ſelf, and not as conjoyn'd and interwoven with the occurrences of the Roman Empire. Foraſmuch as ſince the Conqueſt of Alexander the Great, and the fall of their Empire with Darius, their Affairs have been ſcatteringly related, we ſhall now take the opportunity to preſent the Reader with a view of them. But firſt, it will be requiſite to give an account of the Dominion of the Parthians, who not long after the death of Alexander became their Maſters; and becauſe the Kingdom of Perſians and Parthians may by thoſe that heed not well be confounded together, a clear diſtinction is neceſſary to be made of them.

3. It muſt be obſerved that the Perſians being caſt down from the grandeur of Perſians Slaves to the Parthians. Empire and Sovereignty by Alexander and his Macedonians, were firſt ſubject to his Succeſſours, and then for a long time Slaves to the Parthians. The Parthians Parthians who. were a Baniſhed Company of Scythians; for in the Scythian Language, the very word is ſaid to ſignify ſo much; and during the Empire of the Aſſyrians and Medes Vide Onuphrium de Imperio Romano, p. 257.
were moſt obſcure. When the Perſians arrived at the ſupreme power of the Eaſt, they were but an abject People, becoming a Prey to the Conquerour. They ſerved the Macedonians in the like ſort, as long as they deſired they ſhould; but when after

Revolt from Seleucus when and upon what occaſion.

after Alexander's death his Empire came to be divided, none of his Captains would accept of them, and ſo they were delivered as Booty to Satagenes a Stranger Aſſociate. But the Captains falling into Civil Wars, they together with the reſt of the Nations of the upper Aſia, followed Eumenes, and he being overcome, went over to Antigonus, after whom they came into the Hands of Seleucus Nicanor, and afterwards of Antiochus and his Succeſſours; from whoſe great Grandſon Seleucus they firſt revolted, at what time the firſt Punick War depended. C. Attilius Regulus and L. Manlius Vulſo both, the ſecond time, being Conſuls; in the year of Rome DIIII. The Diſcord of the two Brothers about the Kingdom, viz. of Seleucus and Antiochus, gave them the advantage and opportunity who mutually ſtriving to diſpoſſeſs each other, regarded not this People which by falling off, diminiſhed what they ſtrove about.

Arſaces procured the Revolt.

Formeth the Parthian Kingdom.

His Succeſſours called after his Name.

Arſaces.

Pampacius.

Pharnaces.
Mithridates.

4. The Authour and Procurer of the Revolt was one Arſaces, a man as of uncertain Original, ſo of manifeſt Valour, who being accuſtomed to live by violence and robbing, and believing that Seleucus was overthrown in Aſia, without fear of the King's power, with a Number of Robbers entred Parthia, and killing Andragoras the Governour made himſelf Maſter of the Nation. Not long after he ſeized on the Kingdom of the Hyrcanians, and entred into League and Society with Theodotus King of a thouſand Bactrian Cities, after which he gave Battel to Seleucus, who came to reduce him and his fellow Revolters; overthrew him and put him to flight. This Day was afterward obſerved as Solemn, and the beginning of their liberty. Seleucus being gone into Aſia, he then formed his new Parthian Kingdom. He raiſed men, fortified Caſtles, ſecured the Cities, and Built a great one called Clara on the Mountain Thabrotenus. By theſe means Eſtabliſhing his deſigned Kingdom, Arſaces became no leſs famous and memorable to the Parthians than was Cyrus to the Perſians, Alexander to the Macedonians or Romulus to the Romans; and moreover lived to be an old man. After his Death, out of reverence to his memory, the Parthians called all their Kings by his Name, as the Romans named their Emperours Cæſars and Auguſti. His Son and Succeſſour, Arſaces alſo by Name, with wonderfull valour ingaged Antiochus the Son of Seleucus, though followed by an hundred thouſand Foot, and twenty thouſand Horſe, and at laſt was admitted into his Friendſhip and Alliance. The Third was Pampacius who had alſo the Sirname of Arſaces, and dying in the twelfth year of his Reign left two Sons Pharnaces and Mithridates. Pharnaces the Elder ſucceeding his Father, ſubdued the Nation of the Mardi, and left his Brother Mithridates his Succeſſour by his Teſtament, who Conquered the Medi and Elymi, and ſo many other people, as to extend the Dominion of the Parthians from Mount Caucaſus to the River Euphrates.

Phrahartes.

Artabanus.

Mithridates.

Orodes deſtroyed Craſſus.

Phrahartes 2.

5. After him came Phrahartes his Son, the Sixth King of the Parthians, who firſt of all deſired friendſhip of the Romans from L. Sulla then Proconſul, who in Aſia then carried on the War againſt Mithridates King of Pontus. He was killed in a War againſt the Scythians, and was ſucceeded by his Uncle Artabanus, as was Artabanus by his Son Mithridates. He from the greatneſs of his preferment, obtained to be called Mithridates the Great; for he waged many Wars with his Neighbours, and brought under the Parthian Yoke ſeveral Nations, and fighting ſometimes proſperouſly againſt the Scythians, revenged the Injuries done to his Anceſtours. He made War alſo againſt the Armenians, but was for his cruelty driven from the Kingdom by the Parthian Senate, and was ſucceeded by his Brother Orodes. He waged War with the Romans, and deſtroyed Craſſus with his Son and almoſt the whole Roman Army. Pacorus his Son being ſent to diſpatch the Roman War did great things in Syria, but was ſuſpected and called back by his Father, and in his abſence all the Parthian Army was Cut off in Syria by C. Caſſius the Quæſtor of Craſſus, with all its Captains. During the Roman Civil Wars, the Parthians ſent aid to Pompey againſt Cæſar, as alſo to Brutus and Caſſius, againſt Octavius and Antonius. The Wars being over under the Conduct of Pacorus and Labienus who had been on Pompey's ſide, they invaded and ſeized on all Syria. But P. Ventidius Baſſus the Roman General gave them Battel, and killing Pacorus and Labienus deſtroyed almoſt the whole Army, neither in any War did the Parthians receive a greater blow; and it is obſervable that Pacorus the Son of Orodes was ſlain on the ſame day that Craſſus was deſtroyed, whoſe Death they accounted thereby revenged. Not long after Orodes was moſt wickedly Murthered by his Son Phrahartes, who ſeized on the Kingdom.

6. Againſt Phrahartes M. Antonius the Triumvir made War with ſixteen moſt valiant Legions, becauſe of the Aides that had been ſent againſt Cæſar and himſelf. The Iſſue of it was that being tired out with many Battels, with Famine, Peſtilence and Tempeſts, he fled from Parthia with his Army much leſſened. With this ſucceſs Driven into Baniſhment.

Recovers his Station.

Auguſtus frights him.

Phrahartes 3.

ceſs Phrahartes was made more Inſolent, and thereupon doing many cruel things, he was driven by the Parthians into Baniſhment, and his Kingdom was delivered to one Tyridates, whom yet by the aſſiſtence of the Scythians, he drove away and recovered his Station. But he ſcarcely thought himſelf ſecure in it, when he heard how Auguſtus, after his diſpatching of the War of Spain, talkt of making another upon him. It put him into ſuch a fright, that he cauſed the Captains which had been of Craſſus or Antonius his Army, to be gathered out of all Parthia, and with the Military Enſigns to be ſent back to Auguſtus. Moreover he delivered over to him his Sons and Nephews for Hoſtages. So that Auguſtus with the mere terrour of his Name did more than another Prince could have effected by his Arms. But Phrahartes being Dead, his Son of the ſame Name, and the twelfth King of the Parthians ſucceeded him. And after him followed Orodes.

Orodes 2.

Vonones.

Artabanus.

Tyridates.

Gotharzes.

Meherdates.

Vonones 2.

7. Orodes was ſlain; and then came Meſſengers or Ambaſſadours from Parthia to Rome, to deſire that Vonones the Eldeſt of the Sons of Phrahartes might Reign amongſt them, whom his Father had formerly delivered an Hoſtage to Auguſtus. He was ſent by Tiberius accordingly, but ſhortly after was driven out and had Artabanus for his Succeſſour. Vonones retired into Armenia which then had no King, and Artabanus ran the ſame riſque of Fortune, being laid at by his Subjects, and having War with the Romans, he was through the endeavour of Vitellius the Legatus of Syria, driven from his Kingdom by Tyridates one of the bloud Royal of the Arſacidæ. Tyridates then became the ſixteenth King of the Parthians, but not long ſo continued, for he was driven out by Artabanus, whom the Hyrcanians and Caramanians aſſiſted, and fled to the Romans into Syria. Artabanus having recovered the Kingdom, had again like to have been betrayed by the Treachery of one Sinnaces, whom having ſlain, the third time he recovered his Condition, and at length being thus toſſed by various Accidents, was with his Wife and Son killed by his Brother Gotharzes, who became the Eighteenth King. To make good the Cuſtome, Gotharzes was expelled by his Brother Bardanes, whom yet having ſlain he recovered his Eſtate, and overthrew in Battel Meherdates, whom Claudius the Emperour had ſent to ſeize on the Parthian Kingdom, and taking him alive onely cut off his Ears. He being Dead, Vonones who governed Media became the twentieth King of the Parthians. Of him there is nothing obſervable, but that he was Father to Vologeſes, who became moſt famous in the Roman Annals.

Vologeſes.

Vologeſes 2.

Choſdroes worſted by Trajan.

Vologeſes 3.

Artabanus 2.

Overthrown by Artaxerxes a Perſian, together with the Parthian Kingdom.

8. He waged a long and difficult War with the Romans, wherein he was not onely ſometimes an Equal, but a Superiour alſo. In the time of Nero, he took from them Armenia, and put under the Jugum two Roman Legions to their great Infamy. Having done extraordinary things he died an old man, and left his Son Vologeſes his Succeſſour; whoſe Actions are as obſcure as his were remarkable. After him Choſdroes was King of the Parthians, upon whom the Emperour Trajan falling, took from him firſt Armenia, and then Meſopotamia and Aſſyria, and him he drove away, ſo that the Parthians were for ſome time without a King. When they were about to revolt, Trajan gave them for King Parthenaſpates. Him Choſdroes expelled, and recovered the Kingdom of his Anceſtours. After him Vologeſes long held it, with whom Marcus and L. Verus had many Wars, and took from him Aſſyria and Armenia which had been left by Hadrian. After him Artabanus was the laſt of the Arſacidæ that held the Empire of the Parthians, who waged War with various ſucceſs againſt Severus, Antoninus Caracalla and Macrinus the Roman Emperours. At length when Alexander Severus Governed the Roman Empire, he was overthrown in three Battels by one Artaxerxes a Perſian, who not onely put a period to his Life, but to the Kingdom and Empire of the Parthians in the CCCCLXXIII year from the firſt Arſaces; by which means the Parthians, to whom the Perſians all this while had been Slaves, were again ſubjected in Servitude to that People in the CMLXXVIII year of Rome; of our Lord the CCXXVI.

Artaxerxes who inſlaved the Parthians again, what he was.

The Empire of the Eaſt reſtored to the Perſians.

Vide Agathiæ Hiſt. lib. 2. c. 14. & lib. 4. c. 11. & Onuphrium quo prius. p. 263.

9. Artaxerxes is ſaid as Arſaces formerly to have been of obſcure Original, but a man of great Spirit and valour. That he might reſtore the Perſians to their ancient Name and Repute, he ſolicited the ſeveral Nations of them to revolt, and when Artabanus came to chaſtiſe the Rebellion, overthrew him thrice in Battel, killed him, and moreover reſtored the Empire of the Eaſt to the Perſians. Elevated by his Succeſs, he fell upon the Neighbour Nations, to bring them alſo under the Yoke, and having cauſed all that had formerly ſerved the Parthians to ſubmit, he would not keep himſelf within the Boundary of Tigris, but paſſing the River, and the Roman Limit, overran Meſopotamia, threatned Syria and laid claim to that Countrey lying oppoſite to Europe, the Ægean Sea and Strait of Propontis, and known by the Name of Aſia (the Leſs,) as having been governed by the Perſian

Sapor Succeeds Artaxerxes,

Who took Meſopotamia and the Emperour Valerian.

ſian Satrapæ from the time of Cyrus to Darius the laſt King in that Succeſſion. For he boaſted that it was his Duty to recover all the ancient Empire to the Perſians. Having procured a great Name by his Arms, he died after he had Reigned fourteen years wanting two Months, and left a peaceable Kingdom to his Son Sapor. This is that Sapor, the moſt cruel of all others, who brought ſo much diſgrace and prejudice to the Roman Empire and Name, who defeating them in a great and bloudy Battel, took from them Meſopotamia, and Valerian their Emperour alive, as the Reader may remember. Agathias relates, how having waſted Meſopotamia, he fell upon the Cilicians, Syrians and Cappadocians, whom he overthrew with ſo great ſlaughter, that he filled up with dead Bodies the Holes and diſtances of Mountains, thereby made the Hills even, and ſo Rode over them as on plain ground. But returning home, he was humbled by Odenathus of Palmyrena, and died when he had Reigned one and thirty years.

Ormiſda.

Vararanes.

Vararanes 2.

Vararanes 3.

Narſes.

Miſdates.

Sapor 2.

Artaxerxes.

Sapor 3.

Vararanes 4.

10. After Sapor ſucceeded Ormiſda his Son, who held the Kingdom not long, dying without having any thing performed worthy of memory, after a year and ten days. The next to him was Vararanes, who having Reigned three years, gave place to his Son of the ſame name. Vararanes the Second Reigned ſixteen years, after whom ſucceeded Vararanes the Third, but onely taſted of Sovereignty, which he enjoyed but four months. He was ſirnamed Seganeſma, as Agathias judges, from the Nation of the Segani which his Father had Conquered. For when the Perſians conquered a People they onely put to death the principal Perſons, and reſerved the reſt to Till the Ground and pay them Tribute; but as a Trophy or mark of Conqueſt they would have their Sons take the name of the place, as Seganeſma King of the Segani. But he being quickly gone, Narſes ſucceeded for ſeven years and nine months, who left his Son Miſdates his Succeſſour, ſo truly his Succeſſour, that he not onely Reigned over the ſame Nation but exactly the ſame time, ſeven years and nine months. After him Reigned Sapor the Ninth King of the Perſians, whoſe Reign and Life was of the ſame extent; for his Mother having newly conceived him, upon prediction that it was a Male, they put the Cidaris upon her belly. He lived and reigned together ſeventy years, and this is he in whoſe days Julian invaded Perſia, and in his twenty fourth year was Niſibis delivered up by Jovian into his hands. He left his Kingdom to his Brother Artaxerxes who died after four years, and had for Succeſſour his Son Sapor the Third who Reigned five. In the next place came Vararanes the Son of Sapor, who, as Agathias Writes, doubled his Fathers years, and added one more to them. He was ſirnamed Cermaſat, from a certain Nation called Cerma which had been ſubdued. In like manner our Authour tells us, as the Romans gave the Additions of Africanus and Germanicus from the Conqueſt of thoſe Countries.

Iſdigertes.

Vararanes 5.

Procop. de bello Perſico, lib. 1.

11. After him Iſdigertes his Son was King of the Perſians, and of great Name amongſt the Romans. This is he whom Arcadius at his death is ſaid to have made Guardian to his Son Theodoſius. So it was delivered by Tradition Agathias confeſſeth, and to his time the report went both amongſt the Learned and Ignorant perſons. But he affirms it was not to be found in any Writings; not in the Hiſtories of thoſe who wrote of Arcadius his death, onely in the Book of Procopius the Rhetorician. He expreſſeth himſelf hard of belief, and wonders that Procopius not telling how he came to the knowledge of the matter, ſhould fall into commendation of Arcadius for his Prudence. Whereas the man being a Barbarian, an enemy to the Provinces, and of Manners, and opinion quite different from thoſe of the Romans, the event was onely to be admired. And if Iſdigertes kept faith with Theodoſius, who was but now a ſucking Infant, and diſcharged his Truſt, he was more to be commended for his Goodneſs than Arcadius was for his Wiſedom, whom Procopius makes to have been onely wiſe in this particular. However Agathias confeſſeth that Iſdigertes, though he Reigned one and twenty years, yet never undertook any War againſt the Romans, neither ever moleſted them with any injury, but was peaceable and kind to them; whether it happened ſo by chance, or that he ſpared the Boy, and was for preſerving both Nations. His Son and Succeſſor Vararanes invaded the Roman Territories with a great Army, but did no hurt, being overcome with the Civility of Anatolius the Emperour's Ambaſſadour. The Perſian being come near the Army, Anatolius leaped from his Horſe, and alone and on Foot went toward him, who demanded of the Company what he was; they ſaid it was the Roman General; at which the King amazed as at an exceſſive Honour, turned his Horſe and rode away, and after him followed his Army. Being in his Countrey he entertained the Ambaſſadour with much Courteſie, and yielded to the terms of Peace he deſired. That neither People ſhould erect any Fortification near the Borders of the other; which if done they gave either ſide opportunity of doing what they pleaſed.

Sect. 1.

Vararanes 6.

Perozes.

Hunnes Ephthalites who.

Perozes overthrown by them.

12. When Vararanes had Reigned twenty years, he left his Kingdom to his Son Vararanes the Sixth, who after ſeventeen years and four months gave way to Perozes. This Perozes was Valiant and Warlike, but with more Courage than Diſcretion made War againſt the Ephthalites, as Procopius, or Nephthalites as Agathias calls them, about their Boundaries. They were a Nation of Hunnes, known by the Name of White Hunnes, not mingled with the reſt, as having no part of their Countrey bordering upon them. Their dwelling was to the North of Perſia, being no Nomades or wanderers as the other Hunnes, but ſeated in a good Land, where was a City called Gorga, and it ſeems it ſo contented them, that they made no Inroads into the Roman Territories, but with the Perſian Armies. As theſe Hunnes had white Bodies and Viſages not uncomely, their courſe of Life was not, as that of the reſt, brutiſh. They were under one King in a lawfull Government, and dealt juſtly amongſt themſelves and with their Neighbours, no leſs than the Romans or any other People. Their rich men had each twenty or more Companions, to be their perpetual Comrades, and to partake in a community of their Goods. When any of the Principals died, the Retainers were wont to be put into the ſame Graves with them. Thoſe Ephthalites Perozes invaded, when Euſebius the Ambaſſadour of the Emperour Zeno was with him. They pretended fear and to flie before him, and thereby drawing him into a place beſet with Mountains and Thickets, from which there was no paſſage forward, they ſtopped his Retreat and forced him to ſubmit to hard Conditions. Their King upbraiding him for his Raſhneſs, ſaid he would grant him and his Men their Lives, if he would adore him, being now his Lord, and ſwear his Countrey Oath, that the Perſians ſhould no more invade the Ephthalites. Perozes conſulting the Magi, they anſwered that for the Oath he might do what he pleaſed; but in the thing he might delude the Enemy by a Trick. They having a Cuſtome every morning to adore the Riſing Sun, he ſhould obſerve the hour, and meet the King of the Ephthalites with his Face to the Sun riſing, and ſo adore, and hereby avoid the diſgrace. Perozes accordingly ſwore the Peace, adored his Enemy, and then went home with his Army.

Defeated by a Strategeme and Slain.

13. But not long after, neglecting his Oath he reſolved to be revenged on the Ephthalites, and with all his own men and Confederates went againſt them; of his thirty Sons taking all along with him except Cabades the youngeſt, but then grown a man. They hearing of his deſign, reviled their King for looſing the former opportunity, and required he ſhould go and meet the Enemy. He refuſed to doe it, the Perſians being yet in their own Countrey; but, within his own Borders upon a Plain, through which they were to enter, he digged in a great ſpace of ground a deep Pit extreme broad, leaving in the middle a narrow paſſage for ten Horſe a breaſt; over the Pit he laid Reeds, and upon the Reeds Turffs which concealed the Hole, directing his people when they ſhould flie from the Enemy, to keep cloſe and few in Rank upon the firm ground, and avoid the Pit. Then on his Palace he hung out his Holas or Gods by whom Perozes ſwore, and breaking his Oath invaded now the Hunnes. He ſtirred not ſo long as the Enemy was within his own Countrey, but underſtanding by his Scouts that they were come to Gorga, on the Borders and marching toward him, he himſelf with moſt of his Army ſtaid ſhort of the Pit, ſending out a Party to ſhew themſelves upon the plain at a good diſtance; and no ſooner ſeen by the Enemy but to retreat amain, remembring the Pit. They did ſo, and the Perſians purſued upon full ſpeed as in an open plain, and ſo fell into the Pit, not onely the foremoſt, but the Rere alſo; for purſuing furiouſly, they perceived not the miſcheif of thoſe of the Front, but falling down upon them with Horſes and Lances, killed them, and were deſtroyed for Company. Amongſt whom was Perozes and all his Sons. Such as eſcaped the Pit, fell into the Enemies Hands.

Cabades his Son made King,

And depoſed.

Blaſſes Succeeding.

14. Upon this dreadfull Diſaſter, the Perſians made a Law, Not to follow the chace in full ſpeed, though the Enemy ſhould run away in that haſte. And to put themſelves into order, they made King, Cabades, the onely Son of Perozes ſurviving. Two years they ſerved the Ephthalites, and paid them Tribute, till Cabades being confirmed in his Seat refuſed it. He afterwards governed tyrannically, made many alterations, and particularly one Law, that the Perſians ſhould have their Women in common, which the People miſliked, and taking Arms depoſed him and kept him in Priſon. They choſe Blaſſes (Agathias calls him Valens) the Brother of Perozes for King, all his other Sons being dead. For of a private Race the Perſians might not chuſe one, if the bloud Royal was not quite extinct. Blaſſes ſucceeding aſſembled the cheif men of Perſia, and propounded in Council concerning Cabades, whom the Multitude would not endure to be put to Death. Many opinions being ſpoken, Guſanaſtades a principal man and by Office a Chanaranges or General upon the Borders of the Ephthalites, ſhewed them his Knife, ſuch as the Perſians were wont to pair their Nails with, of a finger length, and an inch thick. See, ſaith he, this Knife is a very ſhort one, yet can it doe that now, which within a while twenty thouſand men will not be able: intimating that if they did not now diſpatch Cabades he would get abroad and trouble them again. But they thought not fit to kill one of the Bloud Royal, but rather to keep him in the Tower of Oblivion; where if a man was impriſoned, it was not lawfull to mention him, once to name him was death, and thence the Tower had its Name. Though at one time the law of it was broken, in the Perſon of Arſaces King of Armenia therein a Priſoner, as Procopius tells the ſtory out of the Armenian Hiſtories.

Cabades eſcapes out of Priſon.

Puts out the Eyes of Blaſſes, and recovers the Kingdom.

15. Cabades, being in Priſon, conſented that his Wife ſhould yield to the Luſt of the Captain of the Caſtle, that ſhe might have free acceſs to him, which advantage he ſo improved as that changing Clothes with her, he got out of Priſon, and being received by one Seoſes, who had prepared Horſes for him, eſcaped away into the Countrey of the Ephthalites. There he Married the King's Daughter, and brought an Army againſt the Perſians, who finding themſelves too weak, fled from the Hunnes. Coming where Guſanaſtades was Governour, he ſaid that ſuch Perſian as that day firſt came to offer his Service he would make Chanaranges; and he repented of what he had ſaid, when he remembred the Perſian Law, that no Government ſhould be conferred upon Strangers in Bloud, but ſuch onely were to have the place to whoſe race it did belong. But by chance his word was kept without Injury to the Law, Adergudunbades appearing firſt, a young man, Couſin to Guſanaſtades, and very expert in Marſhal Affairs. He firſt ſaluted Cabades as his Lord, adored him as King, and beſought him to Command him as his Slave. So he entred the Palace, and finding Blaſſes without a Guard, put out his Eyes, as the Perſians were wont to deal with Malefactours, pouring into them boyling Oil, or with a Bodkin red hot, melting an Ointment into the inſide of them, and he ever after kept him in Priſon. After two years he put Guſanaſtades to Death, and made Adergudunbades General. Seoſes he created Adraſta-daras Salenes, or Superintendent over all Offices and Armies, an Office firſt held by him in Perſia. None before nor ever after had it. Cabades Eſtabliſhed himſelf and ſecured his Empire, being witty and valiant, no man more. His reſtitution happened in or about the DI year of our Lord. This is that Cabades who two years after Quarrelled with Anaſtaſius, becauſe he would not lend him money, wherewith to pay a Debt due it ſeems to his Father-in-Law. And this is he, who alſo fell out with Juſtin the Emperour, becauſe he refuſed to adopt his Son after the Roman manner. It concerned the Reader that he ſhould have this Account, concerning the Succeſſion both of the Parthian and Perſian Kings. Elſe this Hiſtory would have been deficient, and he could not have well diſtinguiſhed concerning Parthians and Perſians, the greatneſs of which Kingdoms, and that great part they acted in the World, would have required a Chapter or Section by themſelves, if we could have had Intelligence ſufficient of their matters, which were tranſacted amongſt themſelves.

Beliſarius made General of the Eaſt.

16. To omit then what we have already written of ſuch Actions as fell out betwixt Cabades and thoſe two Princes, Juſtinian being ſole Emperour, directed Beliſarius to build a Fort at Mindon upon the Confines, on the left hand of the way to Niſibis, who having advanced it to a conſiderable height, the Perſians with threats commanded him to deſiſt. The Emperour perceiving he ſhould be too weak for them, Commanded Cutzes and Buzes the Duces of the Limits of Phœnicia Tibani, one of the fifteen Provinces ſubject to the Prefect of the Eaſt, to march to his Aſſiſtence with another Army. Theſe Officers were Thracians and Brothers, and being young and raſh were worſted, loſt many of their men, and they themſelves at length being taken Priſoners were ſhut up in a Cave, and no Forts defending the Building, the Perſians demoliſht it. After this Juſtinian made Beliſarius General of the Eaſt, Commanding him to make an Inroad into Perſia, and joyn with him Hermogenes Captain of his Guard, ſometime Quæſtor to Vitalianus when he rebelled againſt Anaſtaſius. He alſo nominated Rufinus his Ambaſſadour, in caſe a Treaty, of which there were made ſome Overtures, ſhould proceed. Beliſarius having levied a good Army came to Daras, and Perozes, by Office a Mirranes, with an Army of Perſians advanced within two miles of it. Beliſarius and Hermogenes wrote to him, adviſing him to forbear Hoſtilities and expect the coming of Rufinus, but he anſwered he could not truſt them being Romans though upon Oath, and bad Beliſarius make ready a Bath for him; for he intended the next day to bathe in Daras. The Romans had drawn a Line before the Town, and were ranged in ſuch Order as amazed the Perſians, who though they faced them forbore to fight, onely ſome ſlight Skirmiſhes had paſſed, and two Perſians who challenged any Romans to ſingle Combats were killed, the one after the other, by one Andrew the Maſter of a Wreſtling School in Conſtantinople. Beliſarius deſired a ſuſpenſion of Arms, becauſe the Perſian Army was increaſed by a ſupply of ten thouſand men. But what moved him to deſire a Ceſſation, moved alſo the Mirranes to deny it. Thereupon both prepared for a Battel.

17. The Battel they began with ſhowres of Arrows, which darkned the Air, and did great Execution on both ſides. The Perſians herein had the Advantage that their Numbers were greater, and their freſh men ſtill let flie upon the Romans, who at firſt did not conſider it. Yet a ſtrong Wind blew upon them, which ſuffered not their ſhot to doe much more miſcheif than they received. When their Arrows were ſpent, they came to their Lances, and the left Wing of the Romans was much diſtreſſed, till releived by three hundred Heruli, who being placed on purpoſe on an adjoyning Hillock, fell in upon the Rere of the Enemy, which being charged alſo by another Party on the Flank, gave ground, and at length ran away, about three thouſand men being loſt in their Right Wing. But their left together with their Immortal Band charged their Oppoſites with ſuch Violence, that they put them to the rout. But then from the Angle of the right hand line, which the Roman Generals had cauſed to be drawn, a party ordered by Beliſarius fell with fury on the Flank of the Barbarians as they purſued, and cut their Army in two. The Perſians who gave the chace foremoſt perceiving their Diſadvantage, faced about and fell upon their purſuers, whereby they came to be charged both ways by the Romans, they that had fled before them now turning head. When the Immortal Band and the other Perſians near them ſaw the great Enſign lying upon the ground, acted by Indignation they charged the Romans a-freſh, who received them ſo warmly, that they ſoon had enough, and fled away in Confuſion. The Foot ſurprized with terrour and amazement, caſt away their Bucklers and were cut in peices. The Romans killed about five thouſand, yet the chaſe laſted not long, their Generals cauſing them to retreat, leſt the Enemy ſhould rally and worſt them thus purſuing without order. They thought it enough to have got the Victory in this manner, for before that day it had been long ſince the Perſians were defeated by the Romans, ſo they parted for this time, neither would the Perſians come to any more Battels. There onely followed ſome Skirmiſhes upon Inroads, wherein the Romans had not the worſt.

The Perſians defeated,

18. Such was the Succeſs Cabades found in Meſopotamia, who had ſent another Army into the Roman Armenia. This conſiſted of Perſarmenians and Sunites who bordered upon the Alans, and three thouſand Sabirian Hunnes, a very Warlike Nation, Commanded by Mermeroes a Perſian. Intelligence being given where they lay to Dorotheus the Commander in Armenia, and Sittas General of the Forces, they fell on a ſudden upon them, and killing many, rifled their Camp. Not long after their Return, Mermeroes to be even with them, invaded the Roman Territories, and overpowring his Enemies in Numbers had deſtroyed them in their Camp, but that Sittas placed with a Reſerve behind an Hill, came upon his Rere in good time, and the Perſians by reaſon of the Duſt, not being able to diſcover how many men he had, and fearing they might be more numerous than they were, left the Camp, and retiring into a Body were defeated and fled. But becauſe they exceeded the Romans in number, they rallied, and coming to dint of Sword the Fight was very ſharp, till Florentius a Thracian, and Captain of a Troop of Horſe, with the loſs of his Life ſeized the Perſian Standard and caſt it to the ground. The Barbarians looſing ſight of their cheif Enſign fell into fear and diſorder, and retiring to their Camp the next day marched home. And none purſued them, the Romans thinking they had done enough, having firſt beaten them in their own Countrey, and now ſent them home worſted by a ſmaller number, without having any thing performed. Afterwards they took in ſome Towns in Perſarmenia with two Forts called Bolus and Pharangium, whence the King had a Revenue of Gold Mines. Sittas before this War had alſo ſubdued the Tzanians, who Inhabiting the Inacceſſible Mountains covered with perpetual Snow, had lived by picking and ſtealing, but now by him civilized were inrolled in the Roman Troops, marched with their Armies and turned Chriſtians. About the ſame time Narſes and Aratius, who had formerly fought againſt Beliſarius and Sittas, revolted to the Romans, and were entertained by Narſes the Emperours Quæſtor who was alſo a Perſarmenian. This their younger Brother Iſaac hearing, held ſecret Intelligence with the Romans, and delivered into their Hands the Fort Bolus, which was not far diſtant from Theodoſiopolis, letting in the Souldiers by a Poſtern. And ſo he alſo came to Conſtantinople.

And Retreat with loſs.

Rufinus Ambaſſadour to Cabades about a peace.

19. But the Perſians who lay about Daras, though defeated by Beliſarius, yet kept together about theſe Parts, till Rufinus the Ambaſſadour coming to Cabades, ſolicited him about a Peace as moſt conducible to the flouriſhing Eſtate of both Nations. Cabades laid the load upon the Romans, urging that the rearing of the ſeveral Forts of Daras, Mindon and the reſt, were quite contrary to the Articles of the Agreement concluded with Anaſtaſius the Emperour, and he alledged that the Romans ought to contribute half of the expence toward the keeping of the Caſpian Gates, through which the Neighbouring Nations were wont to forage both Countries. He diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadour with publick Anſwer, that he was reſolved not to lay down Arms till the Romans either joyned in the Guard of the Gates, or diſmantled Daras, yet privately he intimated to him that for a Sum of money he would be content to lay aſide all Quarrels, wherewith Rufinus acquainted the Emperour at his return to Conſtantinople. Thither ſoon after came Hermogenes, and ſo together with the Winter ended the fourth year of the Reign of Juſtinian. The Occurrences of theſe years being thus interwoven by the Authour, ſo as not to be diſtinguiſhed, we are conſtrained to give the Narration of them unbroken, as it lies before us, and muſt now proſecute what remains till the concluſion of this preſent War.

The Perſians and Saracens invade the Roman Territories a new way.

20. In the beginning then of the following Spring, ſeventeen thouſand Perſian Horſe under the Command of Azarethes their Countreyman invaded the Roman Territories, and with them Alamundarus King of the Saracens, followed by great numbers of his Subjects, not as they were wont by the way of Meſopotamia, but by Comagena at that time called Euphrateſia. This way they took by the Advice of Alamundarus, who was now become chief Councellor to Cabades; for Perozes the Mirranes having loſt moſt of his Army was in diſgrace, the King having taken from him the Head-Tire of Gold and Pearl which tied up his hair, a mark of the greateſt honour in Perſia, next to the King, where none might wear Ring, Belt, Buckle or any thing of Gold, but by the King's expreſs Licence. To truſt Alamundarus he had good reaſon, both in reſpect of his Abilities being a very wiſe man, and an experienced Souldier, as alſo becauſe his Enmity to the Romans was remarkable, he having for the ſpace of fifty years, much indamaged them by foraging their Countrey, from Ægypt to Meſopotamia, burning, killing and making an innumerable company of Slaves, being indeed the moſt circumſpect and dangerous Enemy the Empire had. His great advantage was his having Command of the Saracens, under the Perſian Dominion, with the Title and Authority of King, whereby he could make his Invaſions when, where and as he pleaſed. Neither the Duces of the Limits, nor the Phylarchæ or Princes of the Saracen Tribes, in League with the Romans were able to oppoſe him. Juſtinian put many of theſe Tribes under Arethas Cheiftain of the Saracens in Arabia, to whom he gave the Title of King, though this was a thing not uſual with the Emperours, and it profited nothing, either through the ill fortune or treachery of Arethas. For, Alamundarus continued to make Inroads and Depredations as far into the Eaſt as ever, ſo long till he was become very old. He told Cabades that if he invaded the Roman Dominions as formerly, by the way of Meſopotamia and Oſroene, he could have no ſure bargain of it. That the Countrey about Euphrates and Syria, next it, had neither any fortified City, nor conſiderable Forces, but he ſhould find Antioch the chief City of the Eaſt with no Souldiers to ſecure it, and the Inhabitants onely intent upon Feaſts and Paſt-times. He urged that he might eaſily take it by ſurprize, and return home ſecurely before the Forces in Meſopotamia could have the News. For Water and Proviſions he ſhould take no care, for he himſelf would lead the Army the moſt convenient and ſecureſt way.

21. Theſe Perſians being the firſt that ever made an Invaſion this way, much ſurprized the Romans and perplexed Beliſarius. Notwithſtanding he having left convenient Garriſons in Meſopotamia, haſted with two thouſand men to give them a ſtop, which they underſtanding, reſolved not to hazard themſelves, and fairly retreated. Beliſarius overtook them as they were truſſing up their Baggage on Eaſter Eve, but had no mind at all to ingage, and finding his men eager to fight, by a ſpeech he indeavoured to ſhew them how improper a thing it would be to ſet upon a flying Enemy, and provoke him by neceſſity and deſperation to doe that which he had formerly neither deſired nor thought: and the ingagement would be unreaſonable at this time eſpecially, when they were all faſting, and according to the Chriſtian Cuſtome, were to Eat nothing all that day and the Night following. But the Army reproached him for his Speech, not muttering but with open clamour to his Face calling him Fainthearted Man, and a Diſcourager of them; ſo that he plainly ſaw he muſt diſſemble the matter and comply, and amazed at their impudence he turned his Diſcourſe to incourage them, ſaying that he knew not their Alacrity before, but now he took Courage, and ſhould lead them againſt the Enemy with more hope. Azarethes ſeeing the Romans Embattelled, exhorted his men to ſhew themſelves Perſians by arguments drawn from neceſſity and deſpair, which are wont to make even Cowards Valiant. At the firſt Encounter more Perſians than Romans fell by Arrows, though they ſhot thicker being almoſt all Archers, and the moſt dextrous then living; but their ſhafts coming from weak Bows little bent, and lighting upon the Armour of their Enemies, broke without doing much harm, whereas the ſhot of the Romans, though it was ſlower, coming from ſtiff Bows much bent, and ſtronger Armes than thoſe of the Perſians, ſped where it lighted, no Armour reſiſting its force. Two thirds of the Day paſſed, and the fight was equal; but then the beſt Souldiers amongſt the Perſians, agreed to charge the Right wing of the Romans, where ſtood Arethas and his Saracens. They opened their Battel, and probably out of deſign to betray Beliſarius, ran away.

The Roman Army willfull to fight is defeated.

22. The Roman Horſe ſpent with toiling and faſting, and now overcharged on all ſides, gave it over and betook them to their Heels. Some that gallantry of mind ſtaied, died with grinning honour. The Iſaurians and Lycaonians making no reſiſtence were cut in peices, for they were men utterly unexperienced, newly taken from the Plough, knew not what a Battel meant, and yet they were hotter for the fight than any, and reproached Beliſarius with Cowardiſe not long before. He having for ſome time ſucceſfully made head, and defended himſelf from being run down by the Perſian Horſe, Night came on, whereupon the Enemy returning to his Camp, he paſſed into an Iſland of Euphrates, and with the remainder of his Army was conveyed to Callinicum, in Boats ſent from thence for that purpoſe. The Perſians coming to plunder the Field, found they had no cauſe to brag of the Victory, having loſt as many of their own men, as they had ſlain of the Romans. And when Azerothes returned to Court, he had no thanks for what he had done, having neither taken Antioch, nor any other place as the King expected. It had been an ancient cuſtome in Perſia, that when an Army was levied, the King ſate upon his Throne, having by him the General deſigned for the expedition. And certain Baskets were placed there, into which as the Army paſſed before the King man by man, each caſt an Arrow, which done, they were ſealed up with the King's own Seal. When the Army returned from the Expedition, each Souldier took out his Arrow, and certain Perſons were intruſted to number the Arrows remaining, who thereby informed the King concerning the number of the Souldiers come home, and thence he knew how many had periſhed in the War. This courſe being now taken, when Cabades underſtood how many Arrows were left in the Baskets, he reviled Azarethes and ever after held him in diſgrace.

23. Juſtinian ſeeing he had work enough made him by the Perſians, bethought himſelf of ſome Aſſiſtence; and for that purpoſe reſolved to try if he could draw the Homerites and Æthiopians to joyn with him againſt them. The Homerites Inhabited to the Eaſt of Paleſtine upon the Red-Sea, which taking its beginning from India according to the Hydrography of Procopius, terminated in that part of the Roman Empire, having upon the Coaſt, where it ends in a narrow Strait, the City Ælas with the Mountains of Ægypt to the South, and toward the North a deſart Countrey reaching far. Oppoſite to the Homerites on the other ſhore, Inhabited the Æthiopians called Auxomitæ from the City Auxomis their King's Reſidence. The Sea betwixt them (by ſome called the Red Sea, as the reſt towards Ælas the Arabian Gulf,) was five days and nights Sail over with a reaſonable gale, there being no danger by Night from any Shelves or Rocks in the paſſage. The Haven of the Homerites whence they Sailed into Æthiopia was called Boulicas, and they Landed at an Haven of the Adulites, diſtant from the City Adulis onely two miles and an half, and from Auxomis twelve days Journey: The Veſſels of India and others, which in thoſe days Sailed theſe Seas, were not built like other Ships, neither trimmed with Pitch or ſuch like ſtuff, nor were the Planks faſtened with Iron, but tied together with Cords. Not becauſe of Iron-drawing Rocks as was then vulgarly thought, the Roman Ships on the ſame Sea finding no ſuch matter though built with Iron; but becauſe neither Indians nor Æthiopians had Iron, nor other materials for that uſe, neither could they buy any of the Romans who forbad it on pain of Death.

24. During the War with Perſia, Helliſthæus King of Æthiopia being a very devout Chriſtian, and hearing that many of the Homerites were Jews, and ſome Heathens laying exceſſive burthens upon Chriſtians, ſent out a Fleet and an Army againſt them, and ſlew their King with much People. He made King one Eſimiphæus one of their own Nation and a Chriſtian, and impoſed on them a Tribute, many of his own Souldiers alſo liking well the Countrey, would not return but fixed there. Not long after, the People impriſoned Eſimiphæus, and made one Abram King, a Chriſtian, who had been ſlave to a Roman Merchant at Adulis. To puniſh theſe Innovators Helliſthæus ſent two Armies, but one revolted allured with the goodneſs of the Land, and the other returned with loſs, ſo that he forbore to meddle any more with Abram, who yet after his death was content to pay the Tribute to his Succeſſour, and ſo was confirmed in his place. During the Reigns of Helliſthæus and Eſimiphæus, the Emperour Juſtinian ſent his Ambaſſadour Julian, to deſire their Confederacy with the Romans againſt the Perſians. Beſides that they were of the ſame Religion, he propounded to the Æthiopians, that they might make themſelves Maſters of a very rich Trade, by dealing with the Indians for their Silk and ſelling it to the Romans, for of this Silk were then made the anciently called Perſian, and afterward Serick Clothes. He deſired of the Homerites, that they would ſet over the Maadeni Saracens one Caiſus deſcended from the Phylarchæ, and an ancient Souldier, who was fled into the Wilderneſs for having killed a Kinſman of Emiſiphæus, and he prayed that together with theſe Saracens they would invade the Perſians.

25. Each of them diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadour with fair promiſes, but never performed them. The Æthiopians were not able to buy the Silk, becauſe the Perſian Merchants being the next Borderers, came firſt to the Havens where the Indians unladed, and bought up all. The Homerites thought it too much to travell through a Deſart many days Journey, to fight with a more Warlike People than themſelves; and Abram afterward often promiſed and once began the Journey, but returned home again. About the ſame time Hermogenes, being ſent on an Embaſſy to Cabades, had as bad or worſe ſucceſs, not being able to procure a peace, the King was ſo inraged after the Battel of Euphrates. Beliſarius was ſent for home to make War upon the Vandals, and Sittas was ordered to take care of the Eaſt. The Perſians with a freſh Army Commanded by Chanaranges, Apſendes and Mermeroes entered Meſopotamia, and there being none to reſiſt them, ſate down before Martyropolis in the Province of Sophanene, thirty miles to the North of Amida, and ſituate upon the River Nymphius, which bounded the Roman and Perſian Dominions. They were valiantly received by the Defendants, though the Town was not at all fortified for a Seige, and wanted all ſorts of Proviſions. Sittas was then abroad with a Roman Army, but durſt not come within twelve miles, being accompanied by Hermogenes, who was now ſent on another Embaſſy.

Martyropolis Beſieged by the Perſians.

26. In the mean time one of the Perſian Spies, diſcovers to Juſtinian much of their affairs, and that a Nation of Maſſagetes was coming into Perſia, and thence were to invade the Romans with an Army of that Kingdom. The Emperour having had experience of the Man's truth, perſwaded him for a reward, to go and report to the Army lying before Martyropolis, that theſe Maſſagetes were hired by the Emperour, and were inſtantly to come and raiſe the Seige, upon which ſtory they were ſore afraid and doubtfull what to doe, when in the mean time a matter of great concernment fell out, which expedited their Buſineſs. Cabades the Perſian King died, after he had Reigned thirty years from his Impriſonment, and on his Death-bed by advice of Mebodes his cheif Favorite, ordained Choſroes his Son his Succeſſour by Teſtament. The Will being kept cloſe, Caoſes the Eldeſt preſuming upon the Law aſſumed the Title, but Mebodes checked him for ſo doing, alledging that none of himſelf might take the Kingdom, but by the Votes of the principal Perſians. Caoſes never ſuſpecting the great Officers, gladly referred the matter to their Cognizance, who when they perceived what was the determination of Cabades, out of reverence to his Virtues declared Choſroes King of Perſia. The Report hereof being carried to the Camp before Martyropolis, the Perſian Generals not knowing in what condition the affairs of their Countrey ſtood, and ſtill being afraid of the Maſſagetes, began to liſten to Sittas and Hermogenes, who not being able to releive the Town, preſſed them much to ſuſpend all Acts of Hoſtility, and retiring home to ſuffer Ambaſſadours to take up the Quarrel, and for the reality of the Embaſſy they offered Hoſtages. The Hoſtages being received, the Army Cabades dies.

The Seige raiſed.

drew off and returned home. Which done, the Hunnes, or Maſſagetes, ſhortly after entred the Roman Territories, and finding no Perſian Forces to joyn with them, in a few days alſo returned home.

27. Hermogenes with his fellow Ambaſſadours, Rufinus, Alexander and Thomas, had Audience of the Perſian King at the Tigris, who upon their Arrival releaſed the Hoſtages. To make him tractable they uſed flatteries, little becoming the Character they bore, which moved him to conclude a perpetual Peace for an hundred and ten Centenaries, on condition that the Commanders of the Forces in Meſopotamia ſhould reſide no longer at Daras, but at Conſtantina, as formerly they had done. But the Forts in Lazica he reſolved to reſtore, and yet demanded of the Romans reſtitution of Bolus and Pharangium. Now a Centenary weighed one hundred pound weight, ſo called of Centum in Latin, (containing of our money, as ſome reckon, three hundred forty ſix thouſand, and five hundred pounds,) and this Gold he demanded to quit the Romans from demoliſhing Daras, and ſharing in the charge of the Garriſon at the Caſpian Gates. The Ambaſſadors agreed to all but the Forts, alledging that they could not deliver them without expreſs Licence firſt had from the Emperour. It was reſolved therefore to ſend Rufinus to Conſtantinople, about theſe particulars, prefixing him for his Journey ſeventy days, the reſt being to ſtay till his return. Juſtinian hearing the terms, the Perſian ſtood upon, gave his conſent; but Choſroes having a falſe ſtory, how that he was offended with Rufinus, and had put him to death, in great Anger invaded the Roman Territories with an Army. When Rufinus returned and met him near Niſibis, it was reſolved to conſummate the Peace, and the money was brought into Town by the Ambaſſadours.

28. But now again, Juſtinian repenting the quitting of the two Forts, wrote to his Ambaſſadours not to part with them, whereupon Choſroes refuſed to conclude the Treaty; Rufinus conſidering how unluckily he had brought the money into the Perſian Dominions, caſt himſelf at the King's Feet, begging of him ſafe conduct for the money, and to defer his deſigned Invaſion. Choſroes granted all for his ſake, ſo that the Ambaſſadours carried the money back to Daras, and the Perſian Army retreated, which made them jealous of Rufinus, and accuſe him to the Emperour, becauſe the King had yeilded to every thing at his perſwaſion. But the Emperour neglected the complaint, and ſent him ſhortly after back to the Perſian with Hermogenes, and they concluded that each ſhould reſtore what had been taken in this War, viz. The Romans the Forts of Bolus and Pharangium, and the Perſians the places in Lazica. That there ſhould be no Commanders of Forces reſiding in Daras. And for the Iberians now at Conſtantinople, they had free liberty either there ſtill to continue or return home. Thus was concluded the perpetual Peace, as it was called in the ſixth year of Juſtinian's Reign, the DXXXII of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt; for which were no Conſuls nominated, no more than for that preceding it, and therefore in the Faſti it is thus marked, The ſecond after the Conſulſhip of Lampadius and Oreſtes.

A perpetual Peace concluded.

Perge ad hujus Sect. paragraph 128.

29. Beliſarius as we ſaid, before the concluſion of the Peace, was ſent for to make War againſt the Vandals, which the Emperour Juſtinian had ſecretly and with himſelf reſolved. But not a word was ſpoken of his ſending an Army into Africk: It was onely given out that he was diſcharged of his Government. But when the Peace was now fully completed, and all was well at home, the Emperour at a Conſultation held with his great Officers, acquainted them that he would raiſe an Army againſt Gehiner and his Vandals. The moſt of them diſliked it, remembring the overthrow of Baſiliſcus, of that great Fleet of the Emperour Leo, the Souldiers loſt and the vaſt debt contracted by the State. Above all, the Prefect of the Palace was netled at it, and all Officers belonging to the Revenue, who quickly apprehended that they muſt without end ſupply the neceſſities of the War, without being as they were wont admitted to Excuſe and Delay. Every Commander alſo doubted of the Employment, apprehending the greatneſs of the hazard, in the firſt place to paſs the Sea, and then to incamp in an Enemies Countrey, and immediately upon Landing to graple with a great and potent Kingdom. The Military men, newly returned from a tedious and difficult War, were no-what pleaſed they ſhould be led to a Sea Fight, a thing they had never heard of, and that before they had ſcarcely taſted of home Contentments. All others were indifferently affected, as content to be Spectatours of other mens dangers. However of thoſe who were againſt the Expedition, none dared to croſs it, but John the Prefect a Cappadocian, being the boldeſt and ſmarteſt man of his time, who laid before the Emperour the difficulty of the Enterprize. For his Army muſt either march Juſtinian conſults about a War againſt the Vandals.

John the Prefect againſt the War.

by Land an hundred and forty days Journey, or Sail to the utmoſt bounds of the Great Sea, as he called it; ſo that the very News of the ſucceſs muſt be a year coming to him. Grant he ſhould have the better, he could not be Maſter of Africk, both Sicily and Italy being in other Hands. And if Fortune ſhould prove Croſs, he muſt needs draw the War upon his own Dominions, and indanger his Affairs now well ſetled. The Emperour for theſe Reaſons let fall his eagerneſs for the War. But a Biſhop out of the Eaſt got Acceſs to him and told him, that God had charged him in a Dream, to blame him for having undertaken to deliver the Chriſtians of Africk from Tyranny, and now to grow cold upon no ground at all, whereas I will aſſiſt him, ſaid he, and make him Maſter of that Countrey. Upon this the Emperour could hold no longer, but made preparations both by Sea and Land, requiring Beliſarius to fit himſelf for the Expedition.

But the Emperour is prevailed with by a Biſhop to undertake it.

A great Tumult happened before the Peace at Conſtantinople.

Vide Baronium ad h. A.

The Factious in Cities diſtinguiſhed by Colours.

30. Here being ready with him to paſs over into Africk, where we are to make ſome ſtay, we muſt firſt ſet all in order at home in point of Hiſtory, and diſcharge our ſelves of a tumult which happened at Conſtantinople, a little before the Concluſion of the Peace with Perſia. Marcellinus Writes that it happened in January on the Ides thereof, in the fifth year of Juſtinian, through a Conſpiracy made againſt him by three Perſons that were Couſin Germans, viz. Hypatius, Pompeius and Probus, the Nephews of Anaſtaſius late Emperour. Each of them indeavouring to ſet up for himſelf. That the City hereby was much waſted for four days together by Fire, Sword and Rapines; and that on the fifth, when they intended to force the Palace, Hypatius and Pompeius were ſet upon, knocked down and Slain, great numbers being killed in the Circus, and the Companions of the Uſurpers, who were fled for it, proſcribed. Procopius, giving us a fuller Relation of the matter, premiſeth that the Commons of every City, anciently divided themſelves into the Veneti and Praſini, the Blews and the Greens; but of late about theſe Names and Colours wherein they ſtood to ſee Sights, they conſumed their Eſtates, abandoned their Bodies to Tortures, and refuſed not the moſt ſhamefull Death. They would run the danger of fighting with their Oppoſites, being ſure, ſhould they get the better, to be haled to Priſon, and after extreme torturing, to be killed. There grew ſo ridiculous an hatred betwixt them, that it was without ground, and no Kindred, Alliance, Religion, or indeed Divine or Humane things or conſideration whatſoever could withſtand it. What became of themſelves or any thing elſe they cared not, ſo their Party did but proſper. The very Women did partake in this Abomination, not onely as the followers of their Husbands, but often being their Oppoſites, though they were never wont to go to the Theatre, nor had other Inducements. Our Authour knows not what to call it, but believes that it was a Diſtemper of the Imagination or fancy; however thus it was in every City and Corporation, and this gave original to that Mutiny, he thence proceeds to deſcribe.

Vide quæ citat Alamannus ex antiquis Hiſtoriarum Collectaneis, Cod. Vat. in Notis ad Arcan. Hiſt. p. 30.

Their Original.

De Spectaculis, c. 9.

31. But before we follow him, ſeeing that this madneſs did ſo ordinarily rage, and was of ſuch conſequence as to produce ſtrange and diſmal effects in the Common Wealth, it will be convenient to inquire farther into the Original and manner of theſe Diſtinctions. Some have Written that Onomaus firſt found out thoſe Colours of the Circus, by which the Factious People diſtinguiſhed themſelves, and that thereby he as it were repreſented the Conteſt of the Earth and Sea. They caſt Lots, and he who happened to act the part of the Earth in the Conteſt, put on a Green Garment; but he that was for the Sea, was Clothed with one of a blewiſh Colour. That this Conteſt Onomaus inſtituted on the twenty fourth day of March. If ſo be the Green Colour had the better, all hoped for plenty from the Earth, if the Blew, they expected Serene and ſafe Navigation; therefore Husbandmen wiſhed for the Succeſs of the Green, and Seamen of the Blew. But as the People thus diſtinguiſhed themſelves by theſe Colours, ſo did the Chariot drivers that ran the Races in the Circus. And Tertullian tells us, that at firſt there were onely two of theſe Colours, viz. the White and the Ruſſe, or Reddiſh. The White was devoted to Winter, by reaſon of the Snow, and the Ruſſe (ſo he calls it) to Summer, becauſe of the redneſs of the Sun. But afterwards as both Pleaſure and Superſtition increaſed, others Conſecrated the Ruſſe to Mars, others the White to the Zephiri, the Green to Mother Earth or Spring, and the Blew to Heaven and Sea or Autumn. But whereas, ſaith he, all Idolatry is Condemned by God; that is alſo condemned which is profaned by the worldly Elements.

32. It ſeems therefore, that at the firſt theſe Colours were taken up by ſuch as made Conteſts, or celebrated Games in honour of theſe Elements, (which Tertullian accounts Idolatrous,) and that time and Cuſtome bringing theſe heatheniſh Solemnities into every City and place any whit conſiderable, they continued ſuch contentions in their Cirques or Hippodromes, and at length the Spectatours took upon them the Names, if not the Colours which at firſt the Actours onely wore, and divided themſelves as their Affections or other Inclinations carried them, to that prodigious exceſs as Procopius relates. In Rome theſe four Factions had been from the beginning of the Cæſars, and before. The colour they called Praſinus was Green like that of a Leek, there being alſo a Gemm of this Name and Colour. Caius Caligula was ſo extremely addicted to this Faction, that he ſupped and was commonly to be found in the Stable belonging to the Chariot drivers, and he would drive himſelf in the place which was called Caianus after him. Its alſo reported of Verus that he loved theſe Aurigæ, favouring this Faction of the Praſini. Of Commodus that at his own Houſe he would drive Chariots clothed in this colour, where he killed a great number of wild Beaſts, as he did many alſo publickly. And of Elagabalus that he did the ſame thing. The Faction called Ruſſata as alſo Roſea, and Rubea or Ruſſa, was alſo of old in Rome; Livy making mention of one of thoſe Drivers or a Ruſſatus Auriga: and Pliny relates that it was found in the Acts of Felix, another of this ſort (Ruſſati Aurigæ) that fire being put to his Funeral pile, one of his favourours caſt himſelf upon it. This Faction is called by Martial, Coccina. And Onuphrius Panninius mentions two Marbles with their Inſcriptions dedicated to the memory of two Drivers, or as they are there called Agitators of this ſame Faction.

The Factio Praſina.

Vide Onuphrium de ludis circenſibus. c.10.

Ruſſata.

Albata.

Veneta.

The Praſini & Veneti moſt factious and remarkable.

33. Of the third Faction called Alba or Albata, becauſe the Drivers were Clothed in white, mention alſo is made by Pliny, as Onuphrius obſerves, as alſo in an ancient Table of Stone deſcribed by him. Of that of the Veneti or Venetiani, as ſometimes it is read, there is a large account, for which Vitellius the Emperour had ſo much reſpect that he killed ſome of the multitude for openly curſing it, as done in contempt of himſelf, and out of the preſumption of ſome new hope. L. Verus was abuſed by them becauſe he moſt idly ſided againſt them. Caracallus drove Chariots himſelf in this colour. Theſe four Factions had their Stables for their Horſes which ran Races in the Circus, near the Circus Flaminius. To theſe four ancient, Domitian added two more, one of a Golden and the other of a Silver, (ſome ſay Purple) colour; but after his Death, when all his Acts for his Cruelty were reſcinded by the Senate, its probable they were again aboliſhed, and ſo four remained as before, though Dio ſpeaks of ſix Chariots which ran in the Circenſian Games in the days of Commodus and Severus. But whether four or more than four, the principal Factions moſt taken notice of, moſt daring, petulant, and indeed in a manner onely factious and ſeditious, were the Praſini and Veneti, eſpecially toward and in the time whereof we now write. The whole People in a manner was divided into them, and when met in the Circus, broke out into unſpeakable impudence and violence, taking occaſion to vent other Acts of emulation and malice, than what related to the Races run by their ſeveral Drivers. The Emperour had a particular Officer, who was his mouth to them, as was the Quæſtor in the Senate, who preſcribed what he would have done, and checked their tumultuous humour. But the Emperours might thank themſelves for the Diſorders that happened, moſt of the Debauched and Extravagant Princes having of old driven Chariots themſelves, and others of them addicted themſelves with too much zeal and favour to one of the Factions againſt the other.

The beginning of the Mutiny called Nica.

John the Prefect.

34. So is Juſtinian reported to have done, as we ſhall hear with both Ears, from the pretended Hiſtory of Procopius; let us now attend this Authour in his unqueſtionable Relation of this Mutiny. At this time, then, he ſaith the Prefect of the City led ſome Factioniſts to Execution. Thereat both Parties took Allarm and agreeing betwixt themſelves, firſt reſcued the men, then broke the Priſons, and let out all ſorts of Malefactours; and at laſt without any reſpect to Authority, killed the Officers of the Prefect. The Citizens who were of neither Faction, fled to the oppoſite Continent, and the City as if under an Enemy was ſet on Fire. The Temple of St. Sophia, the Bath of Zeuxippus, the Emperour's Court from the Porch to the Temple of Mars, the great Porticus reaching to Conſtantine's Forum, and the Houſes of many great men, with much wealth were conſumed. The Emperour and Empreſs with ſome Senatours ſhut themſelves up in the Palace, and ſtirred not. The word of the Mutineers was Nica or overcome, and thence this Mutiny was afterward called by that Name. At this ſame time one John a Cappadocian was Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, and Tribonian a Pamphylian was Quæſtor to the Emperour. John was a man altogether unlearned, ſcarcely able to Write, but of excellent natural Abilities, the moſt powerfull man Procopius ever knew, both to diſcern what was fit to be done, and in doubtfull things to find a Reſolution, ſolution, but the wickedeſt man alive, in wickedneſs he employed the ſtrength of his Parts, without reſpect to God or men; for gain ſtudying the Ruine both of the Eſtates of private men, and of whole Cities. Growing ſuddenly to exceſſive Wealth, he fell into boundleſs luxury, preying upon the Subjects till Dinner time, and then ſpending the reſt of the day in Gluttony, Drunkenneſs and Leachery: In Sum, a man greedy to get money, and more laviſh in ſpending it. Tribonian on the other ſide, over and above his great natural Abilities, had attained to ſuch excellency of Learning, as he was inferiour to none of his time. But in the methods of Covetouſneſs, as induſtrious as the other, being ever ready to ſell Juſtice for gain, making and repealing Edicts every day, ever ſelling them to any one who had occaſion to uſe them.

Tribonian the Quæſtor.

Turned out of their Places.

Hypatius ſaluted Emperour by the Mutineers.

35. During the Quarrels of the People about Names and Colours, there was little ſaid concerning the miſgovernment of theſe men. But when they conſented, and were now formed into a Mutiny, they openly railed upon them, and conſulted how they might kill them. The Emperour to appeaſe the Tumult put them both out of their Places. To that of Prefect he advanced Phocas a Patritian, a wiſe man and naturally addicted to Juſtice, and Baſilides alſo a Patritian and a famous honeſt man he made Quæſtor. But the Mutiny raged nothing leſs. On the fifth day thereof towards Evening, the Emperour cauſed Hypatius and Pompeius, Nephews of Anaſtaſius, to retire from Court to their own Houſes. At firſt they delayed to do it, which made him more earneſt they ſhould, though they pretended it was not fit to leave him; for he was jealous of them, and they feared that the People would force them to the Empire. And ſo it came to paſs; for the Mutineers hearing that they were retired from the Palace, the next morning ran to them, and ſaluting Hypatius Emperour, conducted him to the Forum to take the Government upon him; Maria his Wife, a ſober diſcreet Woman, crying, lamenting, and proteſting that they were leading him to his Death, and hanging upon him to ſtay him till they forced him from her. Having by plain conſtraint brought him to the Forum of Conſtantine, they proclaimed him Emperour of the Romans, binding about his Head a Golden wreath, for want of a Diadem.

The Empreſs ſtays the Emperour from running away.

36. The Senatours, as many as were not in the Palace, joyned, and the opinions of many were to trie their Fortunes at the Palace; but Origen a Senator perſwaded them not to hazard all at one puſh, but carry their buſineſs leaſurely, not doubting but Juſtinian would run away. Hypatius then bade them lead on to the Circus, as ſome thought purpoſely out of affection to the Emperour, who now conſulted whether he ſhould ſtay or fly by Sea. Many ſpeeches were made, but the Empreſs Theodora with a manly Courage diſſwaded him from ſtirring, affirming Death better than Exile or Depoſing, and ſticking to that old ſaying, How brave a Sepulchre is a Kingdom? Hereat taking Courage, they conſidered how they might defend themſelves. All the Souldiers who lay Quartered about the Palace or elſewhere, neither affected the Emperour nor joyned in the Mutiny, but expected the Event. All his hope was in Beliſarius, who being newly come from the Perſian War, had brought with him a ſtrong Guard of Lanciers, Targetiers and others, all old Souldiers. And Mundus the Magiſter Militum of Illyricum, being ſent for to Conſtantinople, chanced to bring with him a Troop of Heruli. Hypatius in the Circus, went directly and ſate down in the Emperour's Seat, where he was wont to behold the Horſeraces and other Exerciſes. But out came Mundus by the Gate Cochlea, ſo called from its round ſhape like the ſhell of a Snail. Beliſarius firſt reſolved to ſet upon Hypatius in the Imperial Seat, and called at an Hall where was wont to be a Guard of Souldiers, bidding them open the Doors for him to go againſt the Uſurper. But they reſolving to expect who ſhould be Conquerour, made as if they heard him not, upon which he returning to Juſtinian, cried out that all was undone, becauſe the Souldiers had revolted.

Beliſarius and Mundus quell the Mutineers.

37. But being directed by the Emperour through the Brazen Gate and the Portal, and paſſing with much danger and toil, through Rubbiſh and places half burnt, he got to the Circus. Being come to the Gallery of the Veneti, which was to the right hand of the Emperour's Seat, he thought to ſet upon Hypatius, but fearing to be cut in peices in a narrow paſſage, he reſolved to fall on the innumerable Multitude which crouded together. Drawing his Sword, and bidding the reſt doe the like, he ran upon them with a great Shout, who ſeeing Armour, and old Souldiers hewing them down unmercifully, fell to running away. A fearfull cry being made, Mundus ruſht into the Circus alſo at the Gate called Neera, and ſo between them both, the Mutineers were cut in peices. Of the common People were ſlain more than thirty thouſand. Hypatius was pull'd out of the Seat, none reſiſting, by Boraides raides and Juſtus the Emperour's Nephews, and led together with Pompeius to Juſtinian who commanded them to Priſon. Pompeius little verſed in Affairs of the World, could not refrain from weeping, but Hypatius chid him, ſaying, that men who periſhed unjuſtly, ought not to be lamented, as they being forced by the People firſt, and then coming to the Circus for no hurt to the Emperour. However the Souldiers killed them both the next day, and caſt their Bodies into the Sea. Juſtinian confiſcated their Eſtates, as of all the Senatours that had joyned in the Mutiny, and afterward when he had given away all their beſt Lands and Goods, reſtored to them and the Sons of Hypatius and Pompeius their former Dignities, with ſo much of their Eſtates as he had not given away: ſo ended this Mutiny. Tribonian and John were reſtored to their Places. Tribonian being a pleaſant fair ſpoken man, and able to veil his Covetouſneſs with abundance of Learning, died in his Bed without any other diſgrace, of whom we are to ſpeak upon a better occaſion. John was troubleſome to the World, and being both a publick greivance and terrour, at length after ſeveral years came to ſuch an end as he had deſerved. Of which hereafter.

Hypatius and Pompeius killed.

Tribonian and John reſtored.

38. Such is the Relation made by Procopius, concerning this Mutiny, thenceforth called Nica. This is ſtrange in it that both the Factions, Veneti and Praſini, ſhould joyn againſt the Emperour. For, he is exceedingly blamed, even as a madman, for ſiding with the Veneti againſt the other. We have another ſtory told concerning the Mutiny being begun by the Praſini, who clamorouſly demanded Juſtice againſt Calapodius a Bed-chamber-man, and a Spatharius. But Procopius himſelf diſtinguiſheth as to the time, betwixt that ſpace wherein theſe Mutineers contended about Names and Colours, which it ſeems was three or four days together, and that wherein the Factions joyned together, and then demanded Juſtice againſt John and Tribonian. During the Contention betwixt themſelves, and while they were divided, the Praſini found occaſion to quarrel with the Emperour about Calapodius a Bed-chamber-man, and a Spatharius, as Theophanes relateth out of the ancient and publick Monuments of Conſtantinople. Now becauſe from this ſparke proceeded ſo great a flame as was that of Nica; and becauſe as in ſome Picture, Alamannus tells us, may therein be diſcovered the State of the Empire as now it ſtood, the humour of Juſtinian, the licentious demeanour of the multitude, in the Circus and Theatre, and other things relating to the clearing of the Hiſtory of theſe times, we ſhall tranſcribe the Relation as we find it worded, Dilogue or ſcoldingwiſe, betwixt the Emperour's Mandator and the Factioniſts, though the ſtyle and expreſſions be very rude and bald.

Apud Alnman in. Notis p. 62.

The eludingLanguage betwixt the Emperour's Mandator, and the Mutinous Praſini.

39. The Rebellion (it begins) called Nica, happened after this manner. Both the Factions met in the Circus, and the Praſini or Greens with great clamours required that Calapodius of the Bed Chamber, and a Spatharius, might be proceeded againſt according to Law. Praſini. Long mayſt thou live, Juſtinian Auguſtus. I ſuffer unjuſt things, Good Cæſar, neither can I bear them, God is my witneſs, but I dare not mention any Perſon leſt I ſhould procure him better fortune and, for ſo doing, danger to my ſelf. Mandator. Who is that? For I am ignorant of the matter. Praſ. He that injures me lives in the Region of Tailors, moſt Auguſt Prince. Mand. No body injures you. Praſ. One there is and he alone who deals unjuſtly with me. So may he never lift up his Head, O Mother of God. Mand. Who is this? for we know nothing of it. Praſ. Calapodius the Spatharius, my Sovereign, it is he that injures me. Mand. But Calapodius hurts no body. Praſ. Whoſoever he is, let him periſh as Judas. Let God puniſh him that injures me, and that ſpeedily. Mand. Ye come not hither to behold the Shews, but to revile your Governours. Praſ. Whoſoever, I ſay, vexeth me with Injuries let him periſh as Judas. Mand. Be quiet, ye Jews, Manichæans and Samaritans. Praſ. Do you call us Jews and Samaritans, and the Mother of God is propitious to us? Mand. How long will ye pour out Curſes upon your own Heads? Praſ. Whoſoever ſaith not that the Emperour doth believe aright, Anathema to him as to Judas. Mand. If ye will hear me, be all baptized into One. Praſ. They tumultuouſly cry out, as Antlas Commanded, I am baptized into One. Mand. Abſolutely, if ye will not be quiet it ſhall coſt you your Lives. Praſ. Every one indeavours to uſurp that he may be ſecure. But if we who are afflicted, if we ſay any thing, let it be interpreted in the beſt Senſe by your Majeſty, for the Divine power beareth with all. We have a Tryal to be, O Emperour, and therefore we ſpeak all. Foraſmuch, Mighty Auguſtus, as there is neither Court nor any Eſtabliſhment of Polity; then I go onely forth into the City when I am at Burdone, and I wiſh, Mighty Auguſtus, not then neither. Mand. Every Freeman may freely go whither he pleaſeth. Praſ.

I am confident of my liberty, yet am not permitted to come abroad. What Freeman ſoever he be, if he be ſuſpected to be of the Faction of the Praſini, he is openly puniſhed with loſs of the Light.

40. Mand. Ye that are near to deſtruction, ſpare ye not your own lives? Praſ. Let us indeed that bear this Colour be cut off; And let there be no ſuch thing as that called Juſtice. Abſtain from ſlaughters, and then let us be puniſhed. As thoſe Waters flow from the Fountain, ſo let their Bloud flow, whom thou wouldſt have puniſhed. But thoſe two things (Injuſtice and Cruelty) humane Nature abſolutely abhors. O would Sabatius (the Father of Juſtinian) had never been born, and then he had not had a Son of bloud. Now the ſix and twentieth Murther hath been committed at Zeugma. In the Morning he was a Spectatour, and in the Evening he was killed. O Sovereign! Veneti. Amongſt you onely are to be found Murtherers in the Circus. Praſini. And when didſt thou part hence without bloud? Ven. As for thee, thou without any cauſe falleſt on killing. For as I ſaid of ſuch as meet in the Circus, thoſe that kill are onely to be found amongſt you. Praſ. Our Lord Juſtinian, They provoke others, and no body kills them. I think he that hath no mind to it, underſtands this. O Emperour, who killed the Carpenter at Zeugma? Mand. Ye killed him. Praſ. Who killed the Son of Epagathus, O Emperour? Mand. And that did ye; but ye draw the Veneti into the guilt. Praſ. Now, Lord have mercy upon us. How is Truth oppreſſed! And one would almoſt now diſpute with them who contend that humane Affairs are governed by Providence. How comes this Misfortune? Mand. God is no Tempter of evil things. Praſ. True, God is no Tempter of evil things. But who oppreſſes me unjuſtly? Go to. Whether thou beeſt a Philoſopher, or an Hermite, give a diſtinction of both. Mand. Ye Blaſphemers and impious, when will ye be quiet? Praſ. Seeing ſuch is your pleaſure, moſt Auguſt Sir, I am quiet, though unwilling. I know all and every thing, but I am ſilent. Juſtice farewell. There's no place left for thee now. I will be gone, that I may turn Jew. It's abſolutely better, and to be initiated in the Rites of the Gentiles, God knows, than to agree with the Veneti. Ven. Let me not ſee ſuch wickedneſs; yet the hatred of you provokes me to wiſh it. Praſ. Let their Bones be digged up after death that will ſtay here to gaze. So the Praſini departed, leaving the Emperour and the Veneti in the Circus. It ſeems however that both Factions afterward agreed to join againſt the Emperour; a wonderfull thing! But how infirm muſt this Government have been, which was continually in danger from the Meetings of ſuch multitudes together, where ſo many thouſands, though of one Faction, were unanimous, as we ſee they ſpake as one man in the firſt Perſon ſingular. Their boldneſs was ſuch as ſcarcely could a Prince bear, who had life and death in his power, ſo long at leaſt as they were pleaſed to permit it. Now we have cleared all at home, though long firſt, and left no diſturbance behind us; we muſt therefore launch forth, and attend upon Beliſarius into Africk. But we muſt firſt clear the way for him, by declaring who they were he was to conquer; and what Dominion, Kingdom or Power it was that he was ſent to ſubdue.

Beliſarius ſent againſt the Vandals.

41. Africk then, the Reader may remember, was ſeized by Genſerick or Gizerick and his Vandals, who were called in by Boniface the Roman General, diſobliged by Placidia, the Emperour Valentinian's Mother, through the tricks of Ætius. They were both great Souldiers, inferiour to none of their time, and ſo high in worth and ſpirit, that in the opinion of Procopius, he ſhall not err who calls either of them the laſt of the Romans; but they always differed in publick Affairs, and the emulation of Etius procured the loſs of Africk. How Boniface too late repented he had called in the Vandals, and was beaten by Genſerick, we have ſeen; as alſo how Genſerick, proceeding in his deſign, ſubdued Africk, ſetled his Intereſt therein, took Rome, and became troubleſome to all his Neighbours. How the vaſt Army and Fleet ſent to chaſtiſe his Inſolence by Leo, miſcarried through the treachery of Baſiliſcus we have alſo heard, moreover of the Deſign of Majorianus to recover Africk; how he diſguiſed himſelf as the Emperour's Ambaſſadour to make a diſcovery, but died when the Romans had good hope to recover that Countrey. Genſerick having either by force or artifice ſhaken off his Enemies, haraſſed the Roman Provinces more than ever, till Zeno came to a Treaty with him, and a perpetual Peace was concluded; That the Vandals ſhould commit no Acts of Hoſtility againſt the Romans, nor from them receive any. This Treaty was obſerved all the time of Zeno and Anaſtaſius his Succeſſour, and during the Reign of Juſtin. Genſerick at length died a very old man, having reigned over the Vandals, from the taking of Carthage, ſeven and thirty years.

Who they were.

Genſerick their King.

Honorick. Gundamund. Traſamund.

42. By his Teſtament he charged the Vandals that the Kingdom ſhould fall ever to ſuch Male deſcendent from himſelf as was eldeſt in years. Honorick his eldeſt Son ſucceeded him, Genzo being lately dead; and during his Reign the Vandals had war onely with the Moors, who being rid of Genſerick who kept them in awe, did the Vandals much miſchief, and received much from them. But this Honorick was moſt cruel and unjuſt to the Chriſtians of Africk, forcing them to turn Arians, or for refuſal, burning, and in ſeveral ſorts deſtroying them. From many he cut out their Tongues by the roots, who, Procopius writes, to his time lived in Conſtantinople, ſpeaking perfectly, and feeling no manner of inconvenience from that torture. Two of theſe medling with light Women after it, loſt their Speech. Honorick having reigned eight years, died of ſickneſs, at which time the Moors held Auraſium a Mountain of Numidia, thirteen days journey Southward from Carthage, and there lived in liberty, having ſhaken off the yoke of the Vandals, who could not make war againſt ſo high and craggy a Mountain. By the death of Honorick the Kingdom came to Gundamund, the Son of Genzo, and Grandſon of Genſerick, having the advantage of years above any of his Race. He had many Battels with the Moors, vexed the Chriſtians in the moſt extreme manner, and died in the twelfth year of his Reign. His Brother Traſamund ſucceeded, a goodly man, wiſe and magnanimous. He alſo laboured to make the Chriſtians change their Religion, not by Tortures, as his Predeceſſours, but by courting them with Honours and Offices, and with large Gifts; taking no notice of ſuch as would not ſubmit. If he found a man in a great crime, he offered him impunity to change his Religion.

43. Having loſt his Wife, and being without Children, out of deſire to eſtabliſh the Succeſſion, he asked in marriage Amalaſirda, the Siſter of Theoderich, King of the Goths, whoſe Husband was lately dead. He ſent him his Siſter with a Guard of one thouſand ſelected Goths, who were followed by five thouſand more fighting Men; and he gave her Lelybæum, one of the Promontories of Sicily. Traſamund ſeemed the moſt powerfull of all thoſe who had governed the Vandals, and moſt illuſtrious; yet in his Reign they received a great overthrow from the Moors. Cabaon who was Prince of the Moors, inhabiting about Tripolis, a man experienced in many Wars, and very witty, hearing that the Vandals would be upon him, firſt injoined his People to forbear unjuſt dealings, delicious diet, and eſpecially the company of Women. He made two Intrenchments; in the one he lodged himſelf and his Men; and in the other he ſhut up the Women, making it death for any Men to go into their Intrenchments. This done, he ſent Spies to Carthage, with direction to obſerve what indignities the Vandals in their march offered to Chriſtian Churches, and when they were gone from the place, that they ſhould doe the quite contrary. And he ſaid he was ignorant indeed of the God whom the Chriſtians worſhipped; But it was likely, if he was ſo powerfull as they ſaid he was, that he would puniſh thoſe that ſcorned him, and defend thoſe that honoured him. The Spies having obſerved the preparations of the Vandals at Carthage, followed the Army in a poor diſguiſe toward Tripolis. The Vandals in their firſt days march lodged in the Churches of the Chriſtians, put into them their Horſes, and other Beaſts, and ſpared no kind of indignity. They practiſed therein all lewdneſs, and beat and whipt the Prieſts they found, commanding them Duties which they impoſed on their meaneſt Slaves.

44. So ſoon as they were gone, the Spies of Cabaon, according to their order, cleanſed the Churches, lighted the Lamps, did low reverence to the Prieſts, and uſed them courteouſly, and to many Poor about theſe Churches gave Money, and then followed the Vandals. In all the Journey they mended what the Vandals did amiſs; and getting before to Cabaon, told him how far off the Enemy was, and what they had done to the Churches. He preſently then prepared for a Fight. The Field he choſe to intrench in, he took in with a circle, and placed his Camels ſide-long in a round to fence his Camp, making the Front twelve Camels deep. The Women and Children, unſerviceable Men and Baggage he put in the middle, and his fighting Men he placed within the Legs of thoſe Beaſts, having Shields to ward with. To ſuch a kind of Battalion he Vandals knew not what to doe, being neither Archers, nor Darters, nor good Infantry, but moſt Horſemen, uſing the Lance and Sword, and not able to hurt an Enemy afar off. Their Horſes not enduring the ſight of the Camels, would not approach the Enemy, who plying them with Darts from a ſafe place did ſuch execution upon them and their Horſes, that they ran away. The Moors followed the chaſe, and took and killed ſo many, that few got home. Such fortune had Traſamund with the Moors, and after ſeven and twenty years died.

45. Hilde-

Hilderick.

Helde-rick, viris eximiis pollens.

45. Hilderick the Son of Honorick, and Grandſon of Genſerick, ſucceeded, a Prince mild to his Subjects, and not harſh to Chriſtians or any elſe, but fainthearted, not enduring to hear of War. Hoamer was his General, his Nephew, and a good Souldier, whom they called the Achilles of the Vandals. In his Reign the Vandals loſt a Battel againſt the Moors of Byzacium, commanded by Antallas, and quarrelled with Theodorich and the Goths in Italy. For Amalafrida they kept in priſon, and put all the Goths that attended her to death; pretending they preached againſt their King and State. And this Theodorich was not in capacity to puniſh, wanting a Navy to make war upon Africk; and Hilderick was an ancient Friend of Juſtinian, who then had the Government in his own Hands, (his Uncle Juſtin being very old, and not skilled in Affairs of State) and they courted each other with Preſents. But there was of the Race of Genſerick one Gelimer, the Son of Gelilac, the Son (or Nephew by his Son Genſon) to Genſerick, who being next in years expected to ſucceed Hilderick. For War he was renowned, but wicked of diſpoſition, and skilfull in Mutinies and Rapines. Hilderick had yielded to him the management of Affairs; but perceiving his Reign to come ſlowly, he could not content himſelf with that condition, but made a Party, and perſuaded the Principal Vandals to depoſe Hilderick as a Coward, and beaten by the Moors, and one who betrayed the State to the Emperour Juſtin, to keep the Kingdom from him who was of the other Houſe; and this he ſaid was the intent of the late Embaſſy to Conſtantinople. Upon theſe perſuaſions they did ſo. And Gelimer being advanced to the Kingdom, ſhut up Hilderick in Priſon in the ſeventh year of his Reign; as alſo Hoamer and his Brother Euagees.

Gelo-mer, Pecunioſus Princeps.

Gelimer cauſeth him to be depoſed, and ſucceeds.

Oam-mer, Cognatorum Princeps, Ewages, pro lege fortis.

Juſtinian interpoſeth in Hilderick's behalf;

46. Juſtinian, who was now Emperour, having notice of it, ſent Ambaſſadours, and wrote to Gelimer. He told him that he acted not religiouſly, nor as was due to the Teſtament of Genſerick, to keep in priſon an old Man of his Bloud, and his King too, if Genſerick's wiſe Conſtitution was worth any thing; and to force him from a Kingdom, which ſhortly he would have by Law. He adviſed him not to proceed in Evil, nor change the Title of a King for that of an Uſurper for a little advantage of time; but to let him carry the Image of Royalty to his Grave (into which he was ſtepping) he having the management of it already; and having the Subſtance to attend upon the Law of Genſerick for the Name. If ſo he did, he would find God propitious, and him his Friend. Gelimer herewith was onely ſo far concerned, as to ſend away the Ambaſſadours diſſatisfied, to put out Hoamer's Eyes, and to keep Hilderick and Euagees in ſtraiter priſon, accuſing them to have attempted an eſcape to Conſtantinople. Upon this Juſtinian ſent other Ambaſſadours, and told him that he did not think he would have done quite contrary to his Advice. But ſeeing it pleaſed him thus to get a Kingdom, he bid him take what Fortune gave him; but he would have him ſend Hilderick, and blind Hoamer and his Brother to Conſtantinople, to get ſuch comfort as men were capable of, who had loſt Kingdoms and Eyeſight. If this he refuſed to doe, he would not endure it. The hope they had in his Friendſhip, he ſaid, induced him thus to act in their behalf; and the Treaties with Genſerick could be no obſtacle, being not to make war upon, but to vindicate his Succeſſour.

But in vain.

47. To this Gelimer gave an Anſwer, which had this direction; King Gelimer to the Emperour Juſtinian. He told him he had neither taken the Kingdom by force, nor committed impiety againſt his own Bloud. That the Vandals depoſed Hilderick for practiſing againſt the Houſe of Genſerick. That time had called him to the Kingdom, giving him his right of Elderſhip according to Law. That it was good for a man to govern what he himſelf had, and not incroach upon other Mens Cares; and 'twas juſt in him who had a Kingdom of his own, not to be thus medling. If he broke the Treaties and invaded, he would oppoſe him to his power, calling to witneſs the Oath ſworn by Zeno, whoſe Succeſſour he was. Juſtinian was angry before, but theſe Letters more excited him to revenge. And being, Procopius ſaith, an acute Deviſer, and nimble in execution, he reſolved to conclude the Perſian War ſpeedily, and then to invade Africk. Beliſarius General of the Eaſt was then at Court, and ſent for; but not a word of his leading an Army into Africk. It was given out that he was diſcharged of his Command; and the Perſian perpetual Peace was newly made. But all being well at home, and with Perſia, the Conſultation was held with the great Officers we lately mentioned, whereby the Emperour was diverted, till animated again to the Enterprize by the Eaſtern Biſhop.

48. Tripolis was already in the Emperour's Hands, being betrayed by Pudentius a Native. Pudentius was protected by Godas a Goth, and Servant of Gelimer, a man pragmatical and courageous, and ſeeming moſt affected to his Maſter. To him Gelimer had committed the care of Sardinia, and to collect the Tributes there; but his mind not digeſting ſuch a Fortune, he uſurped the Iſland, and denied to ſend the Tributes, keeping them to himſelf. Underſtanding that Juſtinian ſought occaſion of a War with Gelimer, he wrote to him, and told him that not out of ingratitude, or ſuffering any diſfavour from his Maſter, he had thought upon a Revolt: But conſidering the Man's cruelty, both to Kindred and Subjects, he would not willingly be a partaker of the ſame. He ſaid it was better to ſerve a Rightfull Emperour, than a Tyrant who commanded things unlawfull. He prayed him therefore to conſider the weightineſs of the Enterprize, and to ſend him Forces to defend him from an Invaſion. The Emperour ſent Eulogius to him, and in an Anſwer commended his Wiſedom and Zeal to Juſtice, and promiſed Aides, and a General ſufficient to keep the Iſland, with aſſiſtence otherwiſe, that the Vandals ſhould not hurt him. Eulogius being come into Sardinia, found Godas had taken the Title and Habit of a King, and got a Guard about him. To the Emperour's Letters he replied, that for Souldiers, he deſired them, but had no need of a General; and diſmiſt Eulogius.

Juſtinian's preparations for the War.

Preparations for the War with the Vandals.

Joan.Leoncl. procæmio in Zozim. vide Aleman. in Procopii Hiſtor. ſecret.

49. Juſtinian had prepared four hundred Men, commanded by Cyrill, to defend the Iſland for Godas. He had in readineſs for the Expedition of Carthage ten thouſand Foot, and five thouſand Horſe, levied of the Legionaries and Confederates; for tranſporting of whom were appointed five hundred Veſſels, of which none were of more burthen than fifty thouſand Medimni, nor of leſs than thirty thouſand; now a Medimnus contained ſix Modii, in weight one hundred and eighty pounds. They were manned with twenty thouſand Mariners, moſt Ægyptians, Ionians and Cilicians: the Admiral of the whole Fleet being Calonymus, an Alexandrian. In caſe of a Sea-fight, they had ninety two Pinnaces, called then Dromones for their ſwiftneſs (for the uſe and names of Triremes and Liburnæ were then grown out of date;) with one row of Oars and Decks over the head to cover them from the Enemies Shot, having aboard no Paſſengers but two thouſand Rowers from Conſtantinople. Archelaus a Patritian, formerly Præfectus Prætorio, in Conſtantinople and Illyricum, went Prefect of the Camp; for ſo they called the Officer who made proviſion for the Army. Over them all was Beliſarius Commander in chief, with abſolute authority, whom by a ſpecial Commiſſion the Emperour impowered to act and doe as he ſhould think fit; ratifying and confirming all things ſo acted and done, as if he himſelf had given the orders. He was attended by many Launciers and Targetiers, old tried Souldiers. He was born, not in Germany, as ſome of that Nation would have it, but in Germania, a City of Thrace, in the Confines of Illyricum, which was a Metropolis, and is mentioned in the Sanctions of the Eaſtern Biſhops. Procopius ſaith expreſly that this Germania lay betwixt the Thracians and Illyrians; and he had reaſon to know, being both his Contemporary, and his Aſſeſſor in this very expedition; being at firſt afraid of the Voyage, but afterward incouraged and made eager upon it by a Dream, which he himſelf relateth.

Procop. de bello Vandal. lib. 1. & ex Hiſt. ſecret.

Beliſarius the General taketh Ship.

50. In the ſeventh year of Juſtinian's Reign, about the Summer Solſtice, the Army imbarked, and Beliſarius commanded the Admiral Gally to ride under the Palace. Thither came Epiphanius the Patriarch, and having made ſuch Prayers as were ſuitable to the occaſion, put aboard a Souldier newly baptized, whoſe Godfather and Godmother were Beliſarius, and his Wife Antonina, who named him Theodoſius, the Man being one of their own Retainers, and much valued by them. Thus the ſaid General and his Wife put to Sea, with Procopius in their company, having received the Patriarch's benediction in the manner related; for the Ancient Chriſtians put a great ſtreſs upon Baptiſm, holding that by it all Sins were forgiven to the Parties, (which made them defend it till the period of their lives;) and that an Action could not better be hallowed and bleſſed than by celebration of that Sacrament. The Fleet following the Admiral, and coming to Perinthus (at that time called Heraclia) ſtaid there five days, whence ſailing to Abydus they were becalmed four days, and ſo had time to mutiny about two Maſſagetes, whom the General had cauſed to be crucified for killing in their drink one of their Countreymen. Having by a Speech appeaſed the minds of the Souldiers, and perſuaded them to live ſoberly, he painted the Maſts of his own Ship and two others, aboard of which was his Train, with red from the top about a third part, and ſet up high Poles in the Stern, on which he hung Lanthorns that they might be ſeen both by day and night, and thereby the Fleet be kept together. By this means he procured that not one Veſſel was caſt behind; and when they weighed Anchor from any Harbor, the Trumpets were ſounded to give warning. From Abydus a ſtiff gale brought them to Sige-

to Sigeum, whence, being becalmed, they came to Malea, where the calm ſtood them in good ſtead, the want of Sea-room for ſo great a Fleet ſo much indangering the Ships by night, that although the Mariners behaved themſelves very well, calling out, and with their long Poles thruſting and keeping diſtance from one another, yet had the Wind been great, they could hardly have kept from falling foul, and indangering the Fleet. Getting clear, they reached Tænarus, at that time called Cænopolis; whence coming to Methone, and the wind not ſerving, the General landed his whole Army.

The Army ſuffers through the Avarice of John the Cappadocian.

51. Here he modelled the Army, and diſtributed the Commands thereof, wherein when he buſied himſelf, lying Wind-bound, many of his Souldiers died of a ſickneſs, occaſioned by the avarice of John the Cappadocian lately mentioned. The Bread for the Army, that it might not quickly corrupt, was wont to be twice baked (whereupon it was called panis biſcoctus, or Bisket) ſo that of neceſſity the Souldiers muſt have a fourth part leſs in weight. Now this John the Prefect, that he might ſpend leſs wood and wages upon the Bakers, and alſo gain by the weight, brought the Loaves unbaked to the publick Bath, called Achilli, where putting them into the Stove, under which the fire was made; when they were thus ſorrily baked, he ſent it in ſacks to the Fleet. Being come to Methone, the Bread turned to dough, grew mouldy, corrupt and muſty; but ſuch as it was, the Officers diſtributed it to the Souldiers, who feeding on it in Summer, in a place of extreme heats, fell ſick, and more than five hundred died; and more had, but that Beliſarius procured Bread of the Countrey adjoining, for which he received thanks from the Emperour, but as then could not get John to be puniſhed. From Methone they ſailed to the Port of Zante, where taking in freſh Water, and other neceſſaries, in ſixteen days they paſſed the Adriatick Sea, (ſo Procopius calls that which others know by the name of Ionian) and with a ſlack wind arrived at a deſart place of Sicily, near to Mount Ætna, having all their Water corrupted, except what was drank at the General's Table, which his Wife had preſerved in ſix Veſſels of Glaſs, covered thick with Sand in the Hold, where no Sun could come. Beliſarius was now got hither, but he wiſt not well himſelf to what purpoſe, neither knowing what Souldiers the Vandals were, nor how, nor whence to make the war upon them; the Souldiers alſo were ſo fearfull, that they ſhamed not to profeſs, that as on Land they would doe their beſt, ſo if the Enemies Fleet ſhould appear, they would fly, not being able to fight with them and the Waters too. In this perplexity he ſent Procopius, his Aſſeſſor, to Syracuſe, to make what enquiries he could, and then to meet him at Caucana, twenty ſeven miles diſtant from Syracuſe, where the Fleet ſhould ride at Anchor. He was fully informed by an old Friend of his, concerning all circumſtances; as that there was no fear of the Vandals way-laying them, becauſe there was not any report of an Army coming, their beſt Souldiers being ſent againſt Godas, and Gelimer being ſo ſecure, that neglecting Carthage, and the Sea Towns, he made his abode at Hermione, near Byzacium, four days journey from any Sea. The General receiving this intelligence with great joy, weighed Anchor, and ſailed by the Iſlands of Gaula and Malta, whence with an Eaſterly wind they came the ſecond day upon the Coaſt of Africk, to a place called Caputuada, five days journey from Carthage.

Beliſarius lands.

52. Beliſarius commanding Anchor to be caſt, called a Council of Officers to conſult about landing, and how to begin the War; ſome were for paſſing directly towards Carthage, both becauſe in a tedious march through the Countrey they ſhould meet with many hazards and inconveniences, and leave their Ships at the mercy of the Sea; or of their Enemies. But Beliſarius conſidering that above all things his Men abhorred a Sea-fight, and that if he ſailed directly toward Carthage, in all probability he muſt come to an ingagement, reſolved to land forthwith; and taking the Horſe they had brought with them, Arms and other neceſſaries, to intrench within a good Rampire, and thence to begin the War. The Rampire was finiſhed the ſame day, and their ſucceſs therein was double, lighting upon a Spring in digging, which ſupplied both Men and Beaſts with water, a thing never heard of before in that dry Tract of Byzacium. Having ſecured the Ships by appointing eight Archers to each, and the light Gallies to lie round about them; by Boraides, one of his Life-guard, he took in Syllectus, a Sea-town in the way to Carthage, the Townſmen willingly delivering up the Keys. The ſame day the Maſter of Gelimer's Poſts revolted, giving up his Horſes; and one of the Veredarii, or Poſts themſelves was taken, whom the General would not ſuffer to receive any hurt, but giving him a good quantity of Gold, took his oath to deliver Juſtinian's Letters, which he had written to the Vandals, into the hands of the Governours. They were written to this purpoſe; that, It was not his intent to make war upon the Vandals, nor infringe the Treaty formerly made between Genſerick and his Predeceſſors, but to free them from an Vſurper, who neglecting that King's Teſtament, kept their Lawfull Prince in Priſon, and otherwiſe afflicted and tormented thoſe of his Bloud. He exhorted them to join with him in this good work, to the end that they might enjoy peace and liberty, which to obſerve inviolably to them, he made Oath to Almighty God. The Man took the Letters, but durſt not ſhew them to any, except ſome private Friends, and ſo nothing material came of this Project.

53. Beliſarius beginning his march for Carthage, ordered it in this manner. To the Right hand was the Sea, and therefore on that ſide was no danger, the Fleet by his order keeping them company. A Forlorn-hope, conſiſting of three hundred Targetiers, he committed to John the Controller of his Houſhold, by the Romans called Optio, being an Armenian, and a man eminent both for valour and conduct. Directing him to march ſome two miles and a half before, he commanded the Maſſagetes to keep on the left hand of the Army, himſelf bringing up the Rere, with his beſt Men, and expecting Gelimer to come ſhortly from Hermione. He governed his Souldiers ſo well in his paſſage, that by their ſobriety and temperance he gained much upon the Africans, ſo that he marcht as in his own Countrey, the People neither removing themſelves nor goods, but giving free Market, and doing all offices of kindneſs to his Men. Gelimer hearing of their approach, wrote to his Brother Ammatas at Carthage, to kill Hilderick with his Relations, and arming ſuch Vandals as well he might, at a Town called Decimum, about eight miles from Carthage, where was a narrow Paſſage, to charge the Enemy on both ſides, and intrap him. He accordingly killed Hilderick with Evagees his Couſin, Oamer being dead before; and prepared his Men for the deſign of Decimum. Gelimer alſo ſent his Nephew Gibamund with two thouſand Vandals to keep on the Enemies left hand, that ſo Ammatas from Carthage, he himſelf in their Rere, and Gibamund on their left hand charging together might encompaſs them. Thus was the Plot laid. As to the ſucceſs, Ammatas came to Decimum three hours before his time, both the Armies of Romans and Vandals being then ſhort of the Place. And he came but with a few, and thoſe not of the beſt neither, leaving the main Body in Carthage to follow after. He killed twelve ſtout Fellows in the head of John's Troops, but fighting valiantly was himſelf ſlain, at the ſight whereof his Men were diſcouraged, and running away, cauſed the main Body to fly, who marching out of order, and ſeeing their Fellows running, turned head, and imagining great numbers purſued, fled back for company. In the purſuit John's Troops did great execution, killing up to the Gates of Carthage for eight miles length ſuch a number, that one would have gueſt it a work of twenty thouſand Men at leaſt.

Ammatas ſive Ambt-haiʒ, Miniſteriis Imperans.

Gibamund ſive Gaue-Mund, Purum Os.

54. At the ſame time Gibamund with his two thouſand Men falling into the hands of the Maſſagetes, periſhed every Mother's Son without any reſiſtence, at the Salt Plains, five miles from Decimum. Beliſarius having no notice of any of theſe Accidents marched towards Decimum; four miles from which, in a convenient place, he intrenched himſelf. There having made an incouraging Speech to his Army, and a Prayer to Almighty God, he left the guard of his Wife and Camp to the Foot, and ſallied with his Horſe, ſending the Confederates before him. The Confederates had not long continued their march when they were encountred by the Vandals, and Gelimer at the head of them, by whom they were eaſily put to flight, running away to a Town leſs than a mile from Decimum, where was Vliaris, one of Beliſarius his Life-guard, and eight hundred of his Targetiers. Here the Vandals, concluding that Vliaris would receive them ſtoutly, made an hault, although his Troops fled amain to Beliſarius; and Gelimer having the Victory in his hands, careleſly quitted it. If he had followed on the chaſe, the General himſelf had not ſtood him, but all had been utterly ruined, ſo vaſt ſeemed the number of the Vandals, and ſo great was the fear of the Romans. Had he rode on towards Carthage, he had defeated the Troops of John, then wholly diſordered and intent upon the Plunder of the Field; whereby he ſhould have ſaved the City, become Maſter of the Enemies Ships, and cut off both all victory and hope of a ſafe return. But he did none of theſe things, riding ſoftly down the Hill, and then in the Plain, ſpending the time in lamentations after he had found his Brother's Body, and neglecting ſuch an opportunity, as thenceforth he could never recover. For Beliſarius cauſed his flying and diſperſed Men to rally, and animated upon report of the ſucceſs of John againſt Ammatas, after he was ſufficiently informed, both concerning the Enemy and the Place, marched againſt Gelimer and his Vandals. They being unprepared, and in diſorder, ran away amain; and the execution laſting till night, many of them fell. The reſt fled not to Carthage, nor Byzacium, whence they came, but towards the Plains of Bule, and the way to Numidia. In the Evening John and the Maſſagetes came up with the Army, and both telling and receiving joyfull News, lodged with it that night at Decimum.

Defeats Gelimer.

55. The next day, the Foot coming up with the General's Lady, they marcht toward Carthage, and arriving within night, lodged abroad without the City, although they might have ſafely enough entred, for the Carthaginians had ſet open their Gates, the City ſhined all night with Lights and Bonfires, and the Vandals were fled to the Churches. The ſame day the Fleet having made the Promontory, the Citizens opened the Iron Chain of their Haven Mandracium to let it in, yet the Admiral not knowing of their intent, put into the Bay, called the Pool, five miles diſtant from the City, very commodious to harbour in, and capable of receiving the whole Fleet, of which the Haven was not. The next day the General commanded the Men aſhore, and fearing the Ambuſhes of the Enemy, marched to Carthage in order of battel, but entred without reſiſtence, having firſt put the Souldiers in mind what effects their moderation toward the Africans had produced; and admoniſhed them to continue their good order, eſpecially in Carthage. Paſſing directly to the Court, he ſate down in Gelimer's Throne, and commanded his Dinner to be given him in the place where Gelimer was wont to make his great Feaſts, by the Romans called Delphica, from a threefooted Table ſtanding in the Palace at Rome, which ſerved for the Emperour's Cupboard, firſt uſed at Delphos, and now at Conſtantinople, and thence whereſoever the Emperour's Table ſtood, they called the Room Delphica. Here the General dined with his Officers of that Proviſion which the day before had been made for Gelimer, whoſe Servants brought in the Meat, and waited at the Table, ſo that he attained (all circumſtances conſidered) an Honour ſcarcely to be parallell'd; moreover the Souldiers were not wont to enter into any Roman City, if but five hundred together, without ſome ſudden diſorder; yet did he ſo manage his Matters, that there was not the leaſt inſolence nor menacing word uſed. There was no interruption of Trade; but in a City newly taken, and full of Souldiers, in a State quite changed, all things ran in their former chanel, not a Man having his Houſe or Shop either ſhut up, or moleſted. The publick Scribes aſſigned Quarters to the Souldiers by Tickets, who bought what they liked in the Market, as when all things are in deep ſilence and ſecurity, and not a ſyllable ſpoken of War.

Enters Carthage

in wonderfull order and quietneſs.

56. Thus was the old Prophecy, frequently in the mouths of the Boyes, verified in Africk; that Gamma muſt expell Beta, and Beta ſhould expell Gamma again; Genſerick having firſt driven out Boniface, and now Beliſarius having outed Gelimer. The General gave his word to the Vandals that were fled to the Churches, and took order for repairing the Walls of Carthage, which were ſo ruinous, that Gelimer did not think it ſafe to truſt himſelf in the City. Gelimer in the mean time playing at ſmall games, procured by money and fair words the Peaſants to kill many ſtragling Slaves and Attendants upon the Army, who pilfred about the Villages, at the ſight of their Heads much rejoycing, as at the loſs of ſo many Souldiers. His Brother Tzazon, who having arrived with his Fleet in Sardinia, at the Port of Carnalis, had taken the Town at the firſt onſet and ſlain Godas with his Souldiers, hearing that the Emperour's Fleet was upon the Coaſt of Africk, but nothing of the Succeſs. Therefore did he write to Gelimer a triumphant Letter, the Bearers whereof ſailed into the Haven of Carthage without the leaſt thought of an Enemy, and were brought by the Watch before Beliſarius, who took their Letters, and diſmiſſed them in ſafety. This Paſſage reſembled another done much upon the ſame time in Spain, whither, before the arrival of the Romans, Gelimer had ſent two Ambaſſadours to Theudis, Prince of the Viſigoths, about a League and Alliance. Theudis had heard all before, by reaſon of their ſlow Journeys, from a Merchant-man, who ſet ſail from Carthage the ſame day, that the Romans entred it with a fair gale of Wind, and him he commanded not to divulge the News. When he asked the Ambaſſadours their buſineſs, and they propounded a League; he bid them go to the Seaſide, and there they ſhould hear how their Affairs ſtood at home, which they taking for an idle Speech of a Man in drink, neglected it, returning no reply. But the day following, when they propounded the ſame thing, and had the very ſame anſwer, they perceived there was ſome great change in Africk; yet not imagining that any thing had happened at Carthage, ſailed thither, and landing near the Town, fell among the Souldiers. Being brought to the General, they revealed their buſineſs, and were alſo diſmiſſed without receiving any harm.

Taſo, Tato, Tazo, apud Paulum, Trazo apud Procopium —— Alem. Taſſo, Tatto coacervator. Goda bonus.

Godas ſlain.

Theud-hais. Populis Imperans.

57. During theſe Motions and Changes in Africk, Cyrill, whom Juſtinian had ordered to the aſſiſtence of Godas, came to Sardinia; but hearing what was become of him, Gelimer makes the beſt of the worſt of Fortunes.

Enſigns of principality amongſt the Moors.

of him, he ſailed to Carthage, where he found Beliſarius and the Roman Army victorious. Solomon the Aſſiſtent of Beliſarius, ſuch an Officer as the Romans called Domeſticus, being an Eunuch not by deſign, but by accident in his ſwathing Clouts, was ſent to the Emperour to give him an account of the Succeſs. As for Gelimer, he made the beſt of the worſt of Fortunes, in the Plains of Bule, near the Border of Numidia, and four days journey from Carthage, gathering together the Vandals, and ſuch Moors as were well affected to him, though Jews, and without diſcipline. For their Governours throughout Mauritania, Numidia and Byzacium had profered by their Ambaſſadours their Service to the Emperour, ſome of them ſending their Sons to Beliſarius for Hoſtages, and deſiring to receive from him Enſigns of Principality. It was an ancient Cuſtome, that none might govern thoſe Moors before he had received thoſe Badges from the Emperour, yea, though he were an Enemy to the Romans; and taking them now from the Vandals, they did not eſteem their Government firm and lucky. Theſe Enſigns were a ſilver Rod gilt, a ſilver Cap, not covering the whole Head, but ſet upright like a Crown with ſilver Wire; a white Covering, faſtened together with a golden Claſp over the Right Shoulder, in the manner of a Theſſalian Mantle; a white Robe embroidered; and a gilt Shooe. Beliſarius both ſent them all theſe, and Money alſo, yet did they not join with him, but ſtood a-loof as Neuters, watching the event of the War. Gelimer wrote a lamentable Letter to his Brother Tzazon, wherein having given an account how Africk was become a Prey to the Romans, through the cowardize and negligence of the Vandals, he deſired him to quit Sardinia, and come to him with his whole Fleet. Tzazon and his Vandals with grief and lamentations obeyed his Orders; and when they came up to the Army on the Plains of Bule, ſo ſad a greeting was betwixt them, as cannot be expreſt, and as would have moved the Enemy with compaſſion and a ſenſe of the ſlippery condition of Mankind. The two Brothers embracing each other, could not be parted, ſaying nothing but by tears, expreſſing their inward grief. In like manner did the others embrace them that came from Sardinia, being all ſtruck with ſuch conſternation and amazement at the preſent poſture of their Affairs, that what at another time would have been very important, was not now ſo much as thought of. For Gelimer neither enquired any thing concerning Godas, nor Tzazon after what had happened in Africk, although the Place where they now were, hinted thoſe and ſuch like things ſufficiently to them. There was not a word ſpoken of their Wives or Children, they well enough perceiving that ſuch as they ſaw not in that Place, were either certainly dead, or in captivity; with which words Procopius concludes the Firſt Book of his Hiſtory of the Vandal Wars.

Procop. Hiſt. Vandal. lib. 2.

58. Nevertheleſs, when a little time had diſburthened their grief, and made way for conſideration, Gelimer led them againſt Carthage, where he cut off the Aqueduct of the City, a Piece of excellent Workmanſhip; and after a little ſtay, when no Enemy ſallied out, he retired, quartering his Men in the adjoining Towns, and blocking up the City, as he ſuppoſed. His Men expecting that the Carthaginians would betray it into their Hands, and looking upon the Countrey no otherwiſe than their own, kept very good order; they hoped that ſuch Romans as were Arians would join with them, and by large promiſes invited the Commanders of the Hunnes to their ſide, who were nothing affected to the Romans, complaining that they had been trepanned into Conſtantinople by Peter the General. They agreed to the Propoſals of the Vandals, and promiſed when they came to fight, to turn their Power againſt the Romans. But Beliſarius having ſmelt out the Plot, firſt nailed to a Croſs one Laurus a Carthaginian, convicted of Treaſon, and then ſo won upon the Maſſagetes, or Hunnes, by courtſhip, and inviting them to his Table, that he got out of them the whole matter propounded by Gelimer; and whereas the apprehenſion of two things diſguſted their minds, and aliened them from the ſervice of the Emperour; the one a Jealouſie, that though the Vandals were ſubdued, they ſhould not be diſmiſſed to their own Countrey, but be worn out in Africk; the other, that their Booty ſhould be taken from them; he by Oath aſſured them, that neither of theſe things ſhould be done; and in like manner bound them by Oath to aſſiſt him with all alacrity. Having then by a Speech exhorted his Army not to ſuffer the Conqueſt which was even almoſt atchieved, to fall out of their Hands, he ſent out all the Horſe, except five hundred, under Command of John the Armenian, to attacque the Enemy as he ſhould ſee occaſion. He himſelf, the day following, with theſe five hundred Horſe and all the Foot followed. The Maſſagetes reſolved to keep their word ſo with both Parties, as to expect the event, and join with the Conquerours. The Roman Army overtook the Vandals at Tricamar, ſeventeen miles from Carthage, and encamping at a reaſonable diſtance from them, about midnight ſome of them were troubled at the ſight of a great Prodigy. Fire ſeemed to faſten upon the points of their Spears, the heads of them appearing red and glowing hot. Thoſe few that ſaw it were amazed, ſolicitous about the Event. But when the ſame happened afterward in Italy, they were incouraged, and took it for an undoubted ſign of Victory and good ſucceſs.

59. The next day Gelimer placed the Wives and Children of his Vandals, with all their Wealth in the midſt of the Camp, which was not fortified by any Work, and then calling them together, propounded that object to them as alone ſufficient to excite their Valour, the Conteſt being as he ſaid not for Empire, Dominion or Honour; but what was their All, their utmoſt hopes and deareſt Pledges. He cauſed his Brother Tzazon to uſe the ſame exhortations to his men apart, and then moving toward the Enemy about Noon, when the Romans took their Dinner, faced them upon the Bank of a Brook, keeping his men in good order. The Romans on the oppoſite Bank put themſelves alſo in order, and ſo they ſtood facing each other a good while, till John by Beliſarius his order with a few ſelect men paſſed the Brook, and charged the main Body of the Vandals, but was ſo warmly received by Tzazon, that he was glad to retreat, being purſued to the Brook by the Vandals, who yet durſt not venture over; John renewed the charge the ſecond time, and was repulſed, but at the third onſet had better Fortune, though the Barbarians valiantly received them, fighting onely with their Swords according to Gelimer's Command. The Fight growing ſharp many Vandals fell, and amongſt them Tzazon himſelf, after which came on the whole Roman Cavalry, and paſſing the Brook charged the Enemy. Now was the Quarrel quickly determined, each one with eaſe routing his Oppoſite, which the Hunnes perceiving, according to their former reſolution joyned with the Romans in the chaſe, though it laſted not long, the Vandals recovering their Camp, and the other not thinking themſelves able to graple with them in their Entrenchment. The Vandals loſt eight hundred of their men, and the Romans fifty, who retired alſo to their Camp. But Beliſarius when his Foot was come up, in the Evening marcht with his whole Army to the Camp of the Vandals, which Gelimer ſeeing, without ſpeaking one word, or giving any directions, took Horſe and fled toward Numidia, accompanied onely with a few of his Domeſticks and Relations, who covered all with a confuſed ſilence. When the Vandals perceived he was gone, and the Evening coming upon them, the men were in a tumult, the Women ſhrieked, the Children cried, and every one forgetting his natural affection for others, made what ſhift he could for himſelf. The Romans following the Chaſe all Night, killed the men they could reach, and made Slaves of their Women and Children. In the Camp they found ſo great a maſs of Wealth, as never the like had been ſeen in any other. For the Vandals had long ranſackt the Roman Provinces, beſides what riches they had hoarded up for the ſpace of ninety five years, out of the Commodities of that plentifull Countrey. But thus were they utterly defeated, and deprived of all they had ſcraped together, three months after the Arrival of the Romans at Carthage, at the end of December, in the ſeventh year of Juſtinian's Reign, of our Lord the DXXXIII, the Emperour himſelf the third time being Conſul.

Beliſarius again overthrows the Vandals.

60. The Roman Souldiers being ſo ſuddenly and unexpectedly become Maſters of ſo great Riches, were intoxicated with their good Fortune to ſuch a height, that they ſtragled up and down, wholly intent upon Plunder, not regarding the preſence or authority of their General, ſo that had the Vandals rallied and come upon them, not one had eſcaped, and lived to enjoy what they ſcrambled for with ſuch greedineſs. Beliſarius having, with very much adoe, reduced them to ſome reaſonable Order, Commanded John the Armenian with all ſpeed to purſue Gelimer, and ſuch Vandals as were found in Churches, having given them aſſurance of their ſafety, he ſent under Guards to Carthage. John after five days came up very near to Gelimer, but was deprived of his hopes of taking him, and his Life together, by one Uliaris a Lancier of Beliſarius, a drolling and drunken Companion, who ſhooting at a Bird upon a Tree, miſſed his mark but ſhot him into the Neck, of which hurt he died ſoon after; leaving a great miſs of him both to Prince and People, ſuch was his valour, vertue and moderation. Beliſarius coming preſently after, continued the purſuit as far as Hippo Regia, a Maritime City in Numidia, ten days journey from Carthage, where he heard Gelimer was got up to Pappua a Mountain incompaſſed with Rocks, ſteep and almoſt impaſſable, inhabited by Moors his friends and Confederates. He betook himſelf to Madenos, an ancient City Situate on its utmoſt border thinking he was ſecure enough from Beliſarius, who being not able to attempt the Mountain in that unſeaſonable time, and the ſettlement of affairs

Purſues Gelimer.

Returns to Carthage where he receives Gelimer's Treaſure.

requiring his preſence at Carthage, left the Seige to Pharas, a valiant, prudent and vertuous man, and ſo much more remarkable, becauſe an Herulian, it being rare to find any in that Nation that was not infamous for breach of Faith and Drunkenneſs. The General in his return had the Treaſures of Gelimer delivered into his hands by Boniface, who was ordered in caſe of a defeat at Tricamar, to tranſport them into Spain whither the King intended to follow, but attempting ſo to doe, was forced by contrary Winds and Tempeſts into the Haven of Hippo. Being come to Carthage he ſent Forces to take in ſuch places as had been under the Vandals, who poſſeſſed themſelves of Cæſarea in Mauritania, thirty days Journey from Carthage in the way to Gades, and Hircules Pillars, of the Caſtle of Septa one of the Pillars, with the Iſlands Ebuſa, Majorica and Minorica. He reinforced Tripolis againſt the Moors that preſſed upon it, ſent Cyrill back to Sardinia, who by ſhewing the Inhabitants the head of Tzazon, procured them to yeild, and taking in Corſica, (anciently called Cyrnus,) made both Iſlands tributaries to the Empire. He ſent ſome alſo to receive the Caſtle of Lilybæum, as having been in the Dominions of the Vandals; but the Goths refuſed to yeild up any part of Sicily, and denied the Caſtle to have belonged to the Vandals. Beliſarius angry hereat, ſent the Commanders a threatning Letter, to which the Queen Regent of Italy returned ſo pithy an anſwer, in ſo ſweet and mollifying words, (affirming that Theodorich when he Married his Siſter to the Vandal King, had onely given that People the liberty of this Mart Town) that he yeilded to her reſolution, of referring the matter to the Emperour himſelf, and ſtanding to his determination.

Gelimer ſorely diſtreſſed in the Mountain Pappua.

61. Pharas in the mean time growing weary of a Winter Seige, would needs try if he could get up into Pappua; but the Moors ſo demeaned themſelves, that he was forced to retire with the loſs of an hundred and ten men. Then did he block up all acceſs to the Mountain by diligent Guards and Watches, whereby he brought Gelimer and his Relations, who were all delicately bred, to unſpeakable neceſſity and diſtreſs. For a vaſt difference there was betwixt the Vandals and thoſe Moors that entertained them. The Vandals were the moſt effeminate Nation upon Earth, ever after their poſſeſſing of Africk, uſing their daily Baths and plentifull Tables, of the choiceſt things which Land and Sea afforded; moſt of them wearing Gold and Silk, and paſſing their time in Theatres, at Horſe-Races and other delights, but eſpecially Hunting. Maſques, Plays, Muſick, pleaſant Groves and Gardens, and dalliance with Women were their ordinary Divertiſements. On the contrary, theſe Moors were choaked up in cloſe Huts both Summer and Winter, whence neither the extremity of Cold, nor violence of Heat could drive them. Lying on the Ground, they eſteemed themſelves excellently Lodged, if they got but a Sheeps skin under them. And as their Lodging, ſo their Clothing in Winter and Summer was the ſame; being no other than a thick coarſe Mantle, and a ſhaggy Coat. Bread, Wine or any pleaſant ſort of feeding they uſed none, living on their Wheat, Barley and Rice, without any Boyling or other preparation, than Nature it ſelf afforded, as other Animals. Gelimer and his followers, falling from their pleaſant fare, to ſuch harſh and irkſome Diet, and now wanting neceſſaries too, could not hold out any longer, but eſteemed Death moſt pleaſant, and Slavery it ſelf no baſe Condition.

62. Pharas, not ignorant of their diſtreſs, thought it ſeaſonable to write to Gelimer, wiſhing him to conſider with himſelf, whether it were not better to yeild, and enjoy the dignity of a Patritian, with large Revenues by the favour of the Emperour, than thus to torment himſelf with ſo lingring miſery? Nay whether it were not a Condition rather eligible to be a Slave among Romans, begging, than to Reign over the Moors of Pappua? At the ſight of the Letter he bitterly lamented, and in his anſwer complained much that the Emperour ſhould thus diſturb him, by whom he was never injured in word nor deed, and he begged of Pharas that he would ſend him an Harp, a loaf of Bread, and a Sponge. This requeſt Pharas knew not how to interpret, till the Bearer told him that the King longed to ſee a baked Loaf, having not beheld ſuch a thing ſince he came to Pappua; that he needed a Sponge for one of his Eyes, which was ſwelled with Rheum, and that being skilfull on the Harp, he deſired one to which he might ſing a ſad Ditty, compoſed by himſelf upon his preſent Calamity. Pharas touched with a ſenſe of his miſery, and the viciſſitude of humane affairs, ſent him the things deſired, but blocked him up cloſer than ever. Three Winter months were now ſpent in the Siege, yet nothing could Conquer him, till he feared the Romans would by degrees get up to him, and the ſight of two Boys fighting for a newly baked Cake ſo affected him, that he preſently wrote to Pharas, and promiſed to yield, on condition that Beliſarius rius would give him aſſurance of ſo good entertainment by the Emperour, as in his Letter he had mentioned. Beliſarius overjoyed at the News, as ambitious to preſent him alive to the Emperour, immediately diſpatched away Cyprian the Captain of the Confederates towards Pappua, to give Oath to him for the ſafety of himſelf and his followers, and alſo that he ſhould have an honourable Rank with the Emperour. Gelimer having yielded himſelf, was brought to Carthage, and there being preſented before Beliſarius, could not forbear Laughing. Some imagined he was diſtracted, through the exceſs of his miſery. But his Friends affirmed him a man of quick apprehenſion, which, when he conſidered how from a King, ſo rich and powerfull, he was become no better than a Slave, poor and deſpicable, and that ſo ſuddenly, forced Laughter from him; the inconſtancy of Fortune, and the ſlipperineſs of humane Condition deſerving no better. And indeed, ſcarcely did Fortune ſhew her power more than in this Captivity of Gelimer, who being the fourth Succeſſour of Genſerick, to a Kingdom flouriſhing with Wealth and Military men, was Ruined in ſix months time by five thouſand Strangers, who had not ſo much as a place to Anchor in. For ſo many and no more were the Horſe, who either by their Valour or Fortune did the whole buſineſs.

Yeilds.

Beliſarius triumphs at Conſtantinople.

63. Beliſarius acquainted the Emperour, how Gelimer was a Priſoner at Carthage, and craved leave that he might bring him to Conſtantinople, keeping him in the mean time in honourable reſtraint and preparing his Fleet. But ſome of the Inferiour Officers envying him the glory of this enterprize (as is uſual in all great felicities,) accuſed him to the Emperour of Uſurpation, who either deſpiſed it, or thought it beſt to diſſemble, giving him his choice, either to come to Conſtantinople with his Priſoners, or to ſtay and ſend them. He having diſcovered the Plot, was earneſt for the Journey, that he might clear the Imputation, and be revenged of his Accuſers; and when he had now taken Ship, the Moors of Byzacium and Numidia broke the Truce and waſted the Countrey. He could not now come back himſelf, but appointed Solomon Governour of Africk, leaving ſufficient ſtrength for the Repreſſion and Chaſtiſement of the Moors, to which afterward the Emperour ſent another Army with Theodorus a Cappadocian, and Ildeger, who had Married the Daughter of Antonina, Beliſarius his Wife. Being arrived at Conſtantinople, he was thought worthy of thoſe ancient Honours which were given to Generals for the greateſt atcheivements, and had been now diſcontinued for ſix hundred years, except when Titus, Trajan, or ſuch Emperours led the Armies in Perſon, and Conquered ſome barbarous Nation. He triumphed, though not after the ancient manner, going a foot from his own Houſe to the Circus, and thence from his Pavilion, to the Emperour's Throne, leading the Priſoners and Spoils through the City. Amongſt the Spoils conſiſting of great Treaſure and Royal furniture, were ſome Monuments of the Jews, which being brought to Rome by Titus, were amongſt infinite Wealth taken thence by Genſerick when he ſackt the Palace, and were now, upon ſome words ſpoken by a Jew, how they could not continue but where Solomon firſt placed them, ſent by Juſtinian's order to the Chriſtian Churches in Jeruſalem. Gelimer wearing a purple Robe amongſt all his Kindred, and the talleſt and beautifulleſt of the Vandals, when he ſaw the Emperour ſitting on his Throne, the multitude of Spectatours on both ſides, and himſelf in ſo great Calamity, made no lamentation at all, but ſtill repeated that of the Preacher, Vanity of Vanities, all is Vanity. Being come to the Throne, they deveſted him of the purple Robe, and cauſed him to fall on his face and adore the Emperour. The ſame did the General, who interceding in his behalf, he had Towns of good value aſſigned him in Galatia, where he was permitted to dwell, not being admitted a Patritian, becauſe he would not change his Arian Religion. Hilderick's Children had large means beſtowed on them, as the deſcendants of Valentinian. Not long after, thoſe Honours were added to Beliſarius, which formerly had been proper to ancient Triumphs. Being made Conſul, he was carried on the Shoulders of Captives, and drawn in a Chariot, from which he caſt of the Spoils of the Vandals amongſt the People, which ſcrambling for Plate, golden Girdles, and other curious things of the Royal Treaſure was much pleaſed, not onely for getting ſuch things into their hands, but for beholding the Solemnities of their Anceſtours revived; of which they had heard much but ſeen nothing. And ſo did they rejoyce and careſs the Conquerour at Conſtantinople.

The Government ſetled in Africk by Juſtinian.

64. Leaving the Triumph for the Conqueſt, let us, as it's more material, ſee how the Countrey of Africk was ſetled, and under what Government. Before ſuch time as it became a Prey to the barbarous Nations it was ſubject, as we have formerly ſeen, to the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy. But now Juſtinian having recovered it, and over joy'd at ſo tranſcendent a Providence, reſolved it ſhould have a Præfect of its own, and gave the charge to one Archelaus, to whom he directs a Conſtitution under that title, therein making proviſion for his port and dignity. His Seat he tells him he will have at Carthage, and under him ſeven Provinces ſubject to their ſeveral Governours, whereof Tingi or Zeugia, and (which formerly was Proconſular) Carthage, and Byzacium and Tripolis ſhould be governed by Conſulares, but the reſt, viz. Numidia, Mauritania and Sardinia (for this Iſland he joyned to Africk) by their ſeveral Preſidents. He allowed him for his Attendance, and inferiour Officers ſuch as we have formerly deſcribed, ſerving in his Office and Service, three hundred and ninty ſix Perſons. Then doth he expreſly forbid all exactions upon the Subject, which as he ſaith he hates in all places, but eſpecially abominates in Africk, ſo lately recovered from Captivity, that as yet it hath not had time to breathe. He appoints how much the Officers both Military and Civil, ſhall give for their Commiſſions, forbidding the Prefect's Servants to exceed the rate upon pain of Death, after which he ſettles the allowance to the Prefect himſelf, the Conſulares, Preſidents and all their Inferiour Miniſters, ordaining that it ſhould take effect from the firſt of September of the thirteenth Indiction. He concludes by giving ſtrength and virtue to what the Prefect ſhould ordain, according to this his Conſtitution, telling him that as for Military matters, reſpecting his Province he would provide by another Sanction.

Cod. Juſtin lib. 1. tit. 27. l. 1. pag. 50.

Civil.

65. This Sanction he directs to Beliſarius, under the title of Magiſter Militum of the Eaſt, beginning it as the former, with a very pious and Chriſtian Preface. He ordains firſt at what places the ſeveral Duces ſhall reſide. He charges him that a continual Guard be kept at the Straits of Gibraltar, or the Caſtle called Septa, under a Tribune both prudent and faithfull, who upon occaſion ſhall give notice to the Dux, and he to Beliſarius of any motions; he would have alſo in the Straits mouth a certain number of Dromones, or ſwift Barkes perpetually kept. In Sardinia he Commands him to ſettle one of thoſe Officers called Duces, with a ſufficient power to ſecure the borders againſt Barbarians, and gives expreſs charge for recovery of the ancient Roman bounds, to which end he will have Souldiers that ſhall watch conſtantly upon the borders. He charges the Officers to Train and Exerciſe their men, not ſuffering them to ſtraggle from their Enſigns, and forbids them the raiſing of any profit or advantage out of their Pay, upon pein of fining four times as much, beſides caſheering. All violence towards the Subject, he ſeverely prohibits. Gives power to Beliſarius, to inlarge or leſſen the Forts and Towns, upon the Frontiers as he ſhall ſee occaſion. And then ſets down how much every Officer ſhall be allowed, to commence from the firſt of September of the thirteenth Indiction, as alſo what ſhall be paid at the Offices of the Præfectus Prætorio, and the Magiſter Militum, for recording the Emperour's Grants. He tells him he muſt appear at Court, as ſoon as he had ſet theſe things in order, which he charges him to do to all effects and purpoſes. This Law bears date on the thirteenth of April, when Juſtinian himſelf the fourth time, and Paulinus were Conſuls, that is in the year of our Lord DXXXIIII, and whereas it ſpeaks of Africk as already Conquered, (though ſome of the ancient Limits were not yet recovered,) they are much out in their Chronology, who refer the taking of Gelimer, and the finiſhing of the War with him to the year following.

Ibid. l. 2. p. 51.

Dromones navigii longioris & ad curſum expediti genus, vide Iſid. 19. Etymolog. Caſſiod. var. 1. 5. Dromoni contrarius Muſculus curtum Navigii genus, vide Zonar. Tom. 3. in Mauricio.

A Dromone Dromonarii dicti, Caſſiod. var. 2. 4. Vide Notas in l.

Gloria itaque tua quæ per hanc pragmaticam ſanctionem noſtram ſtatuantur æternitatis effectui mancipari obſervarique præcipiat.

66. But the account which Procopius gives us of Beliſarius his motions doth not very well ſuit with the Letter of this Law. The Law Commands him, as ſoon as he had ſetled the Countrey, to come away to Conſtantinople, the Hiſtorian ſaith, he either gave him leave to come or ſtay, as he had occaſion. The date of the Law is but on the Ides of April, at which time according to the ſtory of Procopius, Gelimer could hardly be taken, if he was defeated at the end of December, and held out in Pappua three months longer, and then what time muſt be allowed, for ſending Intelligence as far as Conſtantinople? But as to this it may be ſaid, that Intelligence might be ſent to the Emperour, after the defeat of Tricamar, and the flight of Gelimer, by which Africk was Conquered, although not ſo certainly and ſecurely, as after the Captivity of that Prince. More difficulty there is in reconciling what theſe Laws, and the late mentioned Authour have concerning the Taxes, and Impoſitions upon the People of Africk. In his Sanction directed to the Præfectus Prætorio, Juſtinian expreſſes a great deal of tenderneſs and care leſt his Subjects ſhould be oppreſſed, who had lately groaned under the tyranny of the Vandals, ſtrictly Commanding that no oppreſſion be uſed towards them, by any of his Miniſters, as it was his indeavour to take off the burthens from all the Provinces in general. But Procopius, as is pretended in his ſecret Hiſtory, which he durſt not publiſh in this Emperour's time, tells us that as he Licèt enim per omnes Provincias noſtras (Deo juvante) feſtinemus ut illæſos habeant Collatores; maximè tamen tributariis Diœceſeos Africanæ conſulimus qui poſt tantorum temporum calamitatem meruerunt (Deo juvante) per nos limen libertatis aſpicere. Ergo jubemus omnes violentias & omnem avaritiam ceſſare, & juſtitiam atque veritatem circa omnes noſtros tributarios reſervare. Sic enim & Deus placabitur, &c.

he haraſſed the Provinces Subject to the Roman Empire, ſo he endeavoured the recovery of Italy and Africk, for no other reaſon than that he might involve them alſo in the ſame miſery and devaſtation.

67. That the Number of thoſe, of whoſe deſtruction he was Authour, could no more be Summed up, than that of the Sand. As for Africk, though it was a Countrey ſo large, he ſo waſted it, that it was eſteemed nigh miraculous, for one travelling there to meet with a man. Of the Vandals that bore Arms, there were eighty thouſand men, beſides an innumerable Company of Women, Children and Slaves. Of Africans living in Cities, in the Countrey and at Sea, ſo many as cannot be expreſſed, but of Moors a far greater Number. Now all theſe were deſtroyed with their Wives and Children: Beſides a great part of Roman Souldiers, and thoſe that came from Conſtantinople; ſo that in all, there periſhed above one million and five hundred thouſand Souls in Africk. The cauſe of all this miſchief was this. Juſtinian after the overthrow of the Vandals, took no care for ſecuring theſe Countries, in the good will and affection of his Subjects. He ſuddenly recalled Beliſarius upon a falſe accuſation, and for ſuch a Crime as that Man could not commit, it having never entred into his thoughts to uſurp againſt him. Then that he might ſqueeze and ſpoil Africk at his pleaſure; he ſet over the People cruel Taskmaſters, and impoſed on them unheard-of Burthens, beſides appropriating the beſt Lands to his own Domain. He prohibited Arians the exerciſe of their Religion, paid not his Souldiers, and diſquieted the Countrey ſeveral other ways, whence Seditions and innumerable miſchiefs aroſe, this being his humour never to be content with the preſent poſture of things, but always innovating and confounding by his Innovations. Thus the pretended Procopius in his ſecret Hiſtory, whoſe account how it agrees with the late mentioned Laws the Reader ſees. The probability of theſe and other accuſations, we ſhall examine when we come to this Prince his Character, proceeding in the ſtory of Africk for the preſent, wherein let the Reader take notice, how far the certain Procopius his Narration at large makes out, what briefly is delivered in the ſecret Hiſtory. As for the Impoſitions upon Africk, we may take his Note out of his Hiſtory of the Vandal Wars, that the ancient Tributes being not to be found upon the old Roman Tables there, which Genſerick had deſtroyed; Tryphon and Euſtratius were ſent in Commiſſion from the Emperour to make a Tax, men whom the Africans found harſh and Intolerable.

Lib. 2.

68. We ſaid a little before that the Moors ſeeing Beliſarius imbarked for Conſtantinople, broke the Truce and revolted, the reaſon and manner thus. When news was firſt brought into Africk of the Emperour's Fleet, they reſorted to their Propheteſſes, (for Women with them were the onely Southſayers) anxious about the iſſue, and eſteeming their anſwers no leſs Infallible than Oracles. Theſe Women foretold an Army from the Waters, and the ruine both of Vandals and Moors, when a Roman General ſhould come without a Beard. Hereupon afraid, they renounced Friendſhip with the Vandals, and made a League with Beliſarius, ſtill intent upon the Succeſs. The buſineſs of the Vandals being diſpatcht, they ſent to ſpie in the Roman Army, if there were any Commander that had no Beard, where finding all well ſtored in that part, they thought, as they would have it, that the Oracle concerned not them but ſome after Ages, and longed to break the Peace; yet afraid of Beliſarius, they deſpaired of ſucceſs ſo long as he continued with the Army. When they ſaw him Shipped with his Guard and Priſoners, and the Roman Souldiers diſperſed in Garriſons upon the Borders, and altogether unprepared they fell upon the Africans, killing the men, enſlaving the Women and Children, and pillaging their Houſes and Fields. Killing the Garriſon Souldiers in Byzacium, and foraging the Countrey, Aigan an Hunne one of Beliſarius his Life-Guard, and Rufinus a Thracian his Bandophorus or Standard-bearer with ten Troops of Horſe, made head againſt them, and cut off many in a narrow paſſage, but were way-laid themſelves by four Barbarian Princes, with many thouſands of men, and being overpowred by Numbers, were defeated and ſlain. Solomon who had the charge of the Roman Army, hearing this news, knew not well how to carry himſelf. He firſt tried to convince the Moors of imprudence by Letters; but this having ſuch ſucceſs as was likely it ſhould, he diſpoſed of matters at Carthage, and marching into Byzacium incamped in Mamma, where the Moriſh Princes had intrenched themſelves, and upon ſight of his Army put their Battel into ſuch order, as formerly Cabaon their Countreyman did, placing the Camels in a round, and their Women and Children in the middle. At the firſt Onſet, the Romans were put into a confuſion by the skittiſhneſs of their Horſes, at the ſight and cry of the Camels, which made them they could neither defend themſelves, nor keep their ranks; the Moors increaſing the tumult by darting their Javelins amongſt them. Solomon ſeeing this, leapt from his Horſe, commanded his men to doe the like, and keep their guard and good order, warding with their Shields againſt the Enemies Javelins. Then fell he himſelf upon the Round with five hundred men, giving command to kill the Camels. Some two hundred Camels being killed, the Moors, who ſtood between their Legs, ran away, and the Round was entred where the Women ſtood; at which ſight, the Barbarians amazed fled up to the Mountain adjoining; and the Romans purſuing, killed about ten thouſand of them in the chaſe. This done, and the Camp taken, the Romans marcht back to Carthage to celebrate their Victory.

Upon Beliſarius his departure the Moors revolt.

Solomon defeats them.

69. But Solomon was ſcarcely arrived at Carthage when the Moors, enraged at this defeat, made an univerſal Invaſion, leaving none behind them; and having overrun the Countrey of Byzacium, and done all the miſchief they could, encamped themſelves upon the Mountain Burgaon. Solomon being come thither with his whole Army, would fain have drawn them down upon the plain ground, but they meant nothing leſs, dreading the thought of fighting upon ſo equal terms with the Romans. Therefore did he order Theodorus his Scout-maſter, without any noiſe, to get up by night into the Mountain, where it was moſt difficult to paſs, with a thouſand Foot, and in the morning to ſhew himſelf, and charge the Enemy. He himſelf alſo by night removed to the skirt of the Hill, and by Sun-riſe both of them ſet upon the Moors; who ſeeing themſelves ingaged on both ſides, deſpaired, and took them to their heels. Not daring to fly either to top or bottom, they ran headlong into a deep woody Valley, lying between two Rocks; and being a multitude in tumult and fear, threw down and killed one another, till the Valley being full of dead Bodies, the reſt paſſed over upon them to the other Rock. The Survivers affirmed fifty thouſand of their Countrymen to have periſhed. The Romans on the other ſide loſt not a Man, received not one hurt, but enjoyed the Victory intire and untoucht. One of the four Princes, Iſdilaſas by name, yielded to quarter. So great was the number of captive Women and Children, that a Mooriſh Boy was ſold at the rate of a Sheep. And now with ſorrow they called to mind what their Women had foretold, that their Nation ſhould periſh by a Beardleſs Man.

Gives them another great Overthrow.

70. Moſt of the Barbarians that were left in the Province of Byzacium would not there continue, for that being few, they feared to be oppreſt by the Africans, but betook themſelves to Jabdas, Prince of the Moors, inhabiting Auraſium in Numidia. Jabdas at this time invading Numidia with thirty thouſand Men, made what work he pleaſed, being indeed the completeſt Man, and moſt valiant amongſt the Moors. Several other Princes of his Nation envied him, and incenſing Solomon againſt him, joined their Forces with his for attaching him upon the Mountain of Auraſium. An expedition they undertook together, and Solomon diſtributed Moneys amongſt thoſe his Auxiliaries to incourage them. But when they had travelled ſeven days together, and could not light on any Enemy, he ſuſpected his Confederates, whom as Moors, he knew to regard no Oaths, nor Hoſtages (though their own Children) nor any League, but as fear and awe overruled them, and fairly retreated, as it was time, all proviſions being ſpent, reſolving at the beginning of the next Spring (for Winter was now come on) to return without any Auxiliary Moors, and better furniſhed. Wintring at Carthage, he provided Forces and a Fleet againſt the Moors of Sardinia, called by the Natives Barbaricini, who being at firſt a few, and confined thither by the Vandals, poſſeſſed the Mountains near Caralis, whence committing petty Stealths, at laſt they grew to a Body of three thouſand Men, and then openly invading the Countrey, waſted all before them. In theſe cares and employments he ſpent this Winter at Carthage, as Beliſarius did in Syracuſe, being in his Expedition into Italy againſt Theodatus and the Goths. Toward the latter end of this year, the Sun gave a fearfull and prodigious Light, like that of the Moon, being without its clear and uſual luſtre, as if it had been eclipſed. The cauſe Renatus Des Cartes, a late learned Philoſopher, aſcribes to the increaſing of his Maculæ, or Spots, which how they come to be generated at firſt, and increaſed to ſuch a proportion, it is not proper for us here to declare; and the Reader, if he pleaſe, may conſult that Authour. But hence doth he ſolve many Phænomena in the Heavens. For this reaſon, he ſaith, many Stars appear now bigger or leſſer than they are deſcribed by ancient Aſtronomers; and it is poſſible that a Star may be ſo covered by theſe Maculæ, as utterly to diſappear, as for inſtance, the Pleiades were once reckoned ſeven, although at preſent ſix onely be ſeen by us. Hence alſo a Star may appear ſuddenly to us, and either continue in its ſplendour, or return by degrees to its former darkneſs and obſcurity, as it happened in the New Star in Caſſiopeia, which appearing very

Some of them fool him.

Princip. Philoſoph. part. 3. p. 112. Edit. Amſtelodami, 1656.

Sic referunt quidam Hiſtorici, &c.

very glorious at the end of the year MDLXXII. failed in its light by little and little, and at laſt vaniſhed in the beginning of MDLXXIV. So, ſaith he, do ſome Stars now ſhine in Heaven, which in time paſt did not appear; the cauſe of which is in this place more largely to be explained. But here we leave him in a road not proper to us, and return to our Hiſtorian, who aſſures us, that during this Prodigy Mankind was afflicted with Famine, War, and all other Miſchiefs which contribute to Mortality. This was the tenth year of Juſtinian, the DXXXVI. of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt, the third of Theodatus, King of Italy; being not diſtinguiſhed by any Conſulſhip, onely noted thus, After the Conſulſhip of Beliſarius, in ancient Monuments, and famous for the beginning of the Gothick War in Italy.

The Souldiers in Africk mutiny.

71. In the beginning of the Spring, at the time of Eaſter, the Souldiers in Africk mutined upon this occaſion. Solomon granted the Slaves and Moveables as booty to the Souldiers; but the Lands which were conquered, he annexed to the Exchequer, and the Emperour's Domain; by whom Souldiers, War, and all were to be maintained. Now the Romans having overthrown the Vandals, married their Wives and Daughters, who ceaſed not, with clamour and diſcontent, to tell them how unjuſt it was for them, who had formerly poſſeſſed the Lands by their Vandal Huſbands, to be deprived of them now they had eſpouſed the Perſons and Intereſt of the Conquerours. Another thing was, Juſtinian the Emperour permitted to no Hereticks the free uſe of Sacraments, or Churches, wherewith the Arians in the Army, being in number about a thouſand men, and moſt of them Heruli, were inraged; eſpecially becauſe at the Feaſt of Eaſter they were neither ſuffered to baptize their Children, nor exerciſe any other uſual acts of Devotion, in a publick manner. And as it happened, another accident there was which ſeemed to blow the coals of theſe Diſcontents. Juſtinian had, out of the Vandals which Beliſarius brought to Conſtantinople, made five Troops of Horſe, which he reſolved ſhould lie in Garriſons in the Eaſt, and ſpend their days there in the Wars againſt the Perſians. Being ſhipt away for this purpoſe, four hundred of them coming upon the Coaſt of Lesbos, forced the Mariners to put into Peloponneſus; whence ſailing into Africk, they landed in a deſart place, and went ſtreight to the Mountain Auraſium, and the Parts of Mauritania. The Mutineers herewith encouraged, combined together; and the Arians pricking them forward, reſolved to kill Solomon in the Church on Eaſter-day, many of his Domeſticks, becauſe of the Lands, being in the Conſpiracy. At the time appointed they made ſigns to one another, and had their hands on their Swords, yet either ſtruck with reverence of the place and ſervice, daſhed at his preſence, or overruled by a ſpecial Providence, they could not doe the deed, though they met again the ſecond time for that very purpoſe, and reviled one another for want of courage. But now it being unpoſſible but the thing muſt out, moſt of them withdrew out of Carthage, and falling upon the Africans, pillaged their Towns.

They chuſe Stotzas for their General.

72. When Solomon exhorted thoſe that remained in the City to continue faithfull to the Emperour, at firſt they ſeemed to liſten to him, till hearing what ſucceſs their Fellows had in the Countrey, the fifth day of the Mutiny they reviled both him, and the reſt of their Officers. They choſe Theodorus the Cappadocian their General in his room, a man that was thought not to love him; and yet after they had killed the other Theodorus the Scout-maſter, and rifled the Town, he entertained Solomon, and brought him to a Ship in the Harbour, provided for him, wherein with Procopius the Hiſtorian, and five of his Retinue, having taken what care he could to reduce the Mutineers, and preſerve Carthage, he ſailed to Beliſarius, now lying at Syracuſe, to whom he related the accident, and deſired his aſſiſtence for ſuppreſſing the Sedition. In the mean time the Mutineers, having plundred Carthage, made their Rendevous in the Plains of Bule, and choſe Stotzas one of the Guard for their General; a couragious and active Fellow, who gathering together ſome nine thouſand men in all, led them to Carthage, to which he ſent a ſummons, requiring them to yield without more adoe. Theodorus and the Citizens returned anſwer, that they kept the Town for the Emperour, ſending one Joſephus to him, formerly the Clerk of the Emperour's Guards, at preſent at Carthage, about ſome buſineſs from Beliſarius; but him he put to death, and prepared for the Siege. The Defendants were thinking to yield, when Beliſarius, attended onely by a hundred of his Life-guard, and Solomon with one ſingle Ship arrived at Carthage about twilight, the Beſiegers not doubting to have the Town the next day delivered up; upon which being intent, they paſſed all that night without taking any reſt. But the next morning, as ſoon as it was day, and it was noiſed that Beliſarius was come, they broke up the Leaguer, and ran away ſhamefully in great diſorder. Beliſarius reduced to obedience two thouſand of them by good words; the reſt he purſued as far as Membriſſa, a Town forty three miles diſtant from Carthage, where they both drew up, and prepared for fight; the General by the River of Bagradas, and the Rebels on a ſteep and ragged ground. They truſted to their numbers. He deſpiſed them as a fooliſh and undiſciplined rabble. Both the Commanders incouraged their men with words fitted to the preſent occaſion.

Beliſarius puts them to flight.

73. When they came to the Encounter, a ſtrong wind blew in the faces of the Mutineers; which diſadvantage conſidering, they wheeled about, thinking that the Enemy would doe ſo too, and that thereby they ſhould gain the wind. But Beliſarius ſeeing them open their Ranks, and fall into diſorder, began the Fight, which they not expecting, ran confuſedly together, and preſently quite away into Numidia, where they rallied, having loſt but a few men, and thoſe of the Vandals; for Beliſarius having but a ſmall Army, thought it ſufficient thus to ſend them going; and then giving the Camp to be pillaged by his Souldiers, wherein was found much wealth, and the Vandal Women, that had been the cauſe of the War, returned to Carthage, and thence, having taken order for Africk, and committed Carthage to Ildiger and Theodorus, into Sicily, where he heard that his Army alſo mutined. By this time, Marcellus, who governed Numidia, and other Officers, hearing that Stotzas was there, got their Forces together to ſurprize him, perceiving he was but with a few men at Gazophylæ. He conſidering his danger, boldly goes amongſt their men, expoſtulates with them for fighting againſt him, who ſtood for defence of their Rights and Liberties; he puts them in mind of the ſhortneſs of their pay, and how they were defrauded of the price of their bloud and travels, bids them, if they ſhould find good reaſon upon due conſideration, kill him in that place; if otherwiſe, to take Arms and fight, not againſt, but for themſelves. With this language he overcame, and brought them over to his Party; which their Officers perceiving, withdrew themſelves into the Church near at hand. Stotzas having united the Forces, comes thither, promiſes them their lives; and when upon his faith they were come forth, perfidiouſly kills them. Theſe matters coming to the knowledge of the Emperour, he ſent Germanus his Kinſman, a man of Patritian dignity, with a few others, amongſt whom was Symmachus and Dominicus, both Senatours; Symmachus with the title of Magiſter Militum, to manage the expence of the Army; and Dominicus to command the Legions in the room of John, who was lately deceaſed. Coming to Carthage, he found upon a Muſter that two parts of the Souldiers were revolted, and a third onely remaining in that and other Cities; wherefore he ſaw there was no fighting, and employed his time in courting the Souldiers with fair words and promiſes, whereby he ſo much did his buſineſs, that he drew in many of the Mutineers themſelves, whom treating with courteſie, and giving them their full pay for the time they had been in Rebellion; at length got together ſuch an Army, as to match the Rebels in number, and then prepared for a battel.

The Emperour ſends Germanus into Africk;

74. Stotzas alſo perceived it his intereſt to come to fight as ſoon as poſſible: For his men daily fell from him; and he hoped, that if he came near Carthage, he could entice them back to him again. Therefore did he march, and incamped near the Sea, about four miles from the City. But Germanus by a prudent diſcourſe ſo ſetled the minds of his Souldiers, that every man of them became ambitious to ſwear the good affection he had to his General; and the Mutineers ſeeing that none came over to them, as Stotzas had warranted them, ſeparated themſelves in fear, and went into Numidia, where were their Wives and Booty. Germanus followed them, being very well prepared, and overtook them at a Town called Scalæ veteres, where coming to an ingagement, his men at the beginning had the worſt, till drawing his Sword himſelf, and calling upon his Guard to doe the like, with much adoe he routed the Enemy on his ſide, and then galloping up to Stotzas, ſo incouraged and aſſiſted his Troops, that they got the day. So great tumult and diſorder there was in the Fight, that both ſides uſing the ſame Language and Arms, and not differing in habit, or any other conſiderable thing, thoſe that gave the chace killed their own Friends, till Germanus commanded his Souldiers to ask the word. He had his Horſe killed under him; and being diſmounted, and in danger, was hardly reſcued by his Life-guard. Stotzas being fled, and the Enemy routed, he marched to their Camp, where finding much oppoſition, after a ſharp fight, he ſent a Party to another place, where the intrenchment was eaſily entred, and ſo thoſe coming upon the backs of the Mutineers, he became Maſter of it. The Souldiers fell to plundring without any regard of the Enemy, or their General's orders, who fearing the Rebels might rally, ſtood in the Gate crying out, and complaining to no purpoſe. The Moors who had, according to their cuſtome, ſtood a-loof, and expected the who overthrows the Mutineers.

iſſu

iſſue, followed the Execution upon thoſe that were worſted, and pillaged the Camp together with the Army. Stotzas at firſt truſting to them, rode up and deſired them to reſtore the Fight, but perceiving how matters ſtood, after he had made head and attempted in vain to renew the charge, eſcaped with a few Vandals, and retired into Mauritania, where Marrying a Daughter of a Prince of the Countrey he remained. And ſo ended this Mutiny.

75. After the ſuppreſſing of this Danger, another aroſe from one Maximinus, who endeavoured to renew the Mutiny, with a deſign to uſurp and make himſelf Emperour. Germanus at firſt would not take any publick notice of it, for fear of driving him into ſome deſperate Act, but ſent for him, and made him one of his own Life-Guard, which employment he gladly undertook, not refuſing the Oath of fidelity to the Emperour, always taken upon ſuch occaſions, becauſe he thought he ſhould have a fitter opportunity to facilitate his Deſign. But when the Souldiers began to aſſemble in a tumultuous manner, having an eye upon him, he cauſed him to be ſecured, which broke the neck of the Plot; for when they miſſed him, had none to lead them, and wanted the numbers they expected, they ran away, yet many were killed, and many taken. Such as had not time to joyn with them, put on other Faces, ſhewing as if they had known nothing of the Conſpiracy, and Germanus was ſo prudent as to take no notice of them, nor make any farther Inquiſition. But finding that Maximinus after the Oath of Allegience taken, had been more buſie in his deſign than formerly; he cauſed him to be Crucified under the Walls of Carthage, and ſo utterly broke in peices this treaſonable Project. After this the Emperour called home Germanus, with Dominicus and Symmachus, in the thirteenth year of his Reign, and reſtored to Solomon his former Employment, giving him another Army. He ſo ordered his affairs, that he quickly ſetled Africk in a very quiet and peaceable condition, for he uſed great moderation, kept the Army in exact Diſcipline, and without any noiſe, removed all ſuch as he knew to be Seditious, by ſending them upon ſome ſpecious pretext or other, either to Conſtantinople or to Beliſarius, ſupplying their rooms with others, and baniſhing the remains of the Vandals, with all their Women. Having thus ſetled the Countrey, he made war upon Jabdas and the Moors of Auraſium, beat them out of Zerbule and Tumar two Caſtles, the later whereof he repaired, and left therein a Garriſon to reſtrain their Rebellions. He took alſo the Wealth and Women of Jabdas, who fled into Mauritania, and forced the Moors into Zebe a part of that Countrey, the Metropolis whereof was Sitiphis tributary to the Empire.

And breaks in pieces another dangerous Deſign.

Solomon ſent back into Africk, Settles it.

76. Such was the proſperous Eſtate of Africk, under the prudent government of Solomon, which in the fourth year changed thus into miſery and deſolation. The next year after his Arrival, and the fourteenth of Juſtinian's Reign, Cyrus and Sergius the Sons of Bacchus Solomon's Brother, were ſent to Govern, the one Pentapolis and the other Tripolis. To theſe came the Leucathian Moors, with an Army as far as Leptis Magna, under pretence of giving them preſents and eſtabliſhing a firm Peace. Sergius receiving ſeventy of them into the City, feaſted them and gave them good words, but ſo it happened that jealouſies ariſing from their deportment, they were all killed in the Houſe, except one who eſcaping to the Camp incenſed his Countreymen. They came to revenge the Fact, and were met by Sergius and Pudentius, with all the force they could make, who put them to the rout, and ſacking their Camp got much Plunder. But the Leucathians would not ſo give it over, coming better prepared than formerly, and with them joyned Antalas, who till of late had been faithfull to the Romans, but now revolted out of diſpleaſure againſt Solomon, for he had taken from him thoſe proviſions the Emperour had allowed him, and had put to Death his Brother, for raiſing a Commotion amongſt the Byzaceni. He then undertook the Conduct of them againſt Solomon and Carthage. Solomon hearing this marched toward his Enemies, accompanied with Sergius, Cyrus and young Solomon, all of them his Brother's Sons, and met them at Tebeſte, a Town ſix days Journey from Carthage. Solomon having in vain tried to perſwade the chief of the Leucathians to lay down Arms, the next day defeated a party of them, and recovered great Booty they had taken, which when the Souldiers expected to have ſhared amongſt them, he unadviſedly put them off till the concluſion of the War. Coming then to Fight, he was overpowred in numbers by the Enemy, ſo that his Army being routed, when he had to no purpoſe endured much hazard and trouble to renew the Fight, he was forced to flie. In full ſpeed, his Horſe ſtumbled, and down he fell. His Life-Guard ſet him up again, but being ſo diſordered with the fall, that he was not able to hold his Bridle, he was overtaken and Slain with many of his Guards.

Solomon Slain.

Sect. 1.

77. He being Dead, his Nephew Sergius by the Emperour's order, took the charge of the Province, unluckily as it proved. The Commanders were much diſcontented at it, being diſobliged by his young, rude and inſolent carriage; for, carrying himſelf high upon his Riches and Power, he was perpetually affronting one or other. The Souldiers ſlighted him as a Coward. The Africans hated him for his extraordinary avarice and luſt; but eſpecially John, the Son of Siſinniolus an able Souldier and of great repute, was inraged, being ſubjected both to a mean and moſt ungratefull Perſon. So that none of them would ſtir againſt the Moors. Antalas having this People at his Devotion, ſent for Stotzas out of Mauritania, and yet wrote to the Emperour, letting him know how he had been injured by Solomon, who having now paid the price of his injuſtice, he was ready to ſubmit to his Empire as formerly, provided he would remove Sergius from his Command, and ſend ſome worthy Governour in his room, as he was well aſſured he could not want many that were much more fit for the place than he. Notwithſtanding, the Emperour would not remove him, though he ſufficiently knew how much the man was hated, he reſpected the worth of Solomon, and pitied the manner of his Death ſo much. Therefore did great diſorders follow. Antalas with his Moors and Stotzas every where committing cruelties upon the Africans, and ſparing no Age nor Condition, inſomuch that the Countrey lay waſte, the Inhabitants that remained alive flying ſome to the Cities and fortified Towns, others to Sicily or other Iſlands, and the beſt to Conſtantinople. None oppoſed theſe outrageous actions of the Moors: many Roman Souldiers followed Stotzas; ſome Renegado's and others, who had been Priſoners ſtaying now with him out of choice. And John, whoſe name was famous amongſt the Moors, being out with Sergius lay ſtill and did nothing at all.

Sergius his Nephew ſucceeding him, Great diſorders thereupon.

78. By theſe things, the Emperour was moved to take ſome farther care about Africk. Yet would he not for all this, put Sergius quite out of Command, but ſending into the Province Areobindus a Senator, and a worthy Perſon, though no Souldier; he divided the General-ſhip, the Countrey and Souldiers betwixt them two, ordering Sergius to make War in Numidia, and Areobindus in Byzacium. Areobindus being arrived, when he heard how Antalas and Stotzas were incamped three days Journey from Carthage, ſent John the Son of Siſinniolus againſt them, with the flower of his Army, writing to Sergius to joyn with him, who diſdaining to be directed, and ſlighting the Buſineſs, John was forced with his ſmall power to encounter an infinite number of Enemies. Both John and Stotzas to their mutual ſatisfaction, for they were irreconcileable Enemies, died in the Battel, beſides John an Armenian, who with Artabanes his Brother, being of the race of the Arſacides had revolted to the Romans, and Commanded ſome of their Countreymen that came over with Areobindus. The Emperour was much troubled for the Death of John, and being convinced how inconvenient a thing it was to have two Generals, ordered Sergius to paſs with ſome Forces to the Wars of Italy. But though he redreſſed one evil, yet another inconvenience wrought ſo much, as ſtill to involve this Province in trouble and diſorder. For Areobindus was ſo little verſed in matters of War, that one Gontharis, who Commanded the Cohorts in Numidia, was incouraged to revolt and attempt the Sovereignty. To this purpoſe he procured the Moors to march againſt Carthage, and held ſecret Intelligence with Antalas, and John whom the Mutineers had made General in the room of Stotzas. Areobindus hearing of Antalas his motions, ſent for Gontharis and the reſt of the Officers to attend him at Carthage, and on the other ſide he practiſed with Cutzinas who led the Numidian Moors to turn in the Battel againſt Antalas, and the Moors of Byzacium. But never ſuſpecting Gontharis, he told him his deſign, and he thereupon revealed it to Antalas, who yet kept all things from Cutzinas, for they hated each other, though with theſe clandeſtine deſigns, they fought in company together, each againſt him with whom he entertained Correſpondence.

Areobindus joyned with him.

Sergius ordered into Italy.

79. But Gontharis, to bring about his Uſurpation, firſt reſolved to kill Areobindus ſecretly in the Battel, that he might not ſeem to intrude into the Empire, but rather that the Souldiers ſhould put it upon him, without his ſeeking, according to the uſual hypocriſie of Tyrants. This device ſucceeded not, becauſe he could not perſwade Areobindus to go out to Fight, therefore he concluded he was either to be frighted away to Conſtantinople, or openly Murthered. And when he had once diſcovered the Plot, he had fled indeed, if a ſudden Storm and power of his own fate had not ſtopt him; but now conſtrained to make the beſt of it he could, he was adviſed by Artabanes, not to be diſmaid at this preſumption of Gontharis, but inſtantly

Gontharis Uſurps;

And kills Areobindus.

inſtantly to fall upon him before any farther miſchief. This good advice he had no power to follow, but would needs ſend firſt and feel the pulſe of Gontharis, who owning the Uſurpation, then at length he reſolved to go out and fight. By this time the Uſurper had indeavoured to poſſeſs the Souldiers with a belief of his Cowardiſe, and how he meant to defraud them of their pay; when Areobindus and Artabanes iſſuing out began the fight. The moſt part of the Souldiers being uncorrupted and iſſuing out from ſeveral Quarters, had eaſily made an end of the Tyrant and his Mutineers, but that Areobindus frighted to ſee men killed, being a ſight he was not uſed to, like a Fool and Coward ran away, and took Sanctuary in a Monaſtery within the Walls of Carthage, after which Artabanes and the reſt retired, and Gontharis became maſter of the City, the Palace and the Haven. Then did he ſend Reparatus, the Biſhop of the place, to Areobindus, to come to the Palace upon aſſurance of ſafety, who upon condition that the Biſhop in Gontharis his name at the celebration of Baptiſm would by Oath eſtabliſh his Security, came forth, and in a Garment called by the Romans Caſula, befitting rather a Slave, than a Souldier, came to the Palace. Here taking the holy Bible from the Biſhop, he fell at the Feet of Gontharis, holding out the Book, a Petition, and his little Son at whoſe Baptiſm the Biſhop had ſworn his ſafety, and conjuring him by all that was Holy to tell him whether he ſhould have his Life. He promiſed him that the next day he would ſend him away ſafe for Carthage, with his Wife and Goods, and having with much adoe raiſed him from the Ground, entertained him at Supper with much Honour; but cauſing him to lie in a Chamber alone, and near at hand, ſent ſome of his Confidents, who after his much weeping and wailing, diſpatched him; which done, the next day he ſent his Head to Antalas.

80. Antalas, his diſſatisfaction with the Emperour being not great, was vexed at the Treaſon and perjury of the Tyrant, and concluding that he would neither keep faith with him nor any other, after much debate with himſelf, he reſolved to ſubmit to his Prince, and ſo marcht off, and drew to him Marcentius Commander of the Horſe in Byzacium. John with his Mutineers, about a thouſand men, revolted to Gontharis; and Artabanes, upon aſſurance of ſafety, came alſo to the Palace with his Armenians, profeſſing all Service and obedience to the Uſurper. But being of a generous ſpirit he plotted to kill him, animated and ſpurred on to this act, as a means of attaining immortal Glory, by Gregorius his Nephew, and Artaſiris one of his Guard; and to cover his deſign, he undertook an expedition againſt Antalas and his Moors as he was ordered by Gontharis. Antalas ſtood him not but ran away, and Artabanes turned about alſo and marched back, whom Vlitheus a great Creature of Gontharis would have killed at his return; but Artabanes excuſed the matter, leſt he ſhould have loſt the Army, Marcentius being in a capacity to have ſuccoured the Enemy from Adrametum, and affirming it was ſafeſt that the Tyrant ſhould oppoſe him with all his Forces. Gontharis took his advice, and reſolved to lead them himſelf, leaving a Garriſon in Carthage, under the Command of Paſiphilas, his chief Councellour who had been a Ringleader in the Mutiny of Byzacium, and his principal Aſſiſtant in the Uſurpation. Him he ordered to murther all the Greeks, having every day himſelf killed ſome upon fear and jealouſie, and having all things now in readineſs, he thought good to Feaſt his Friends the night before his departure. Artabanes being invited amongſt the reſt, reſolved upon it as a fit opportunity to execute his deſign againſt the Tyrant. Acquainting Gregorius, Artaſiris and the others of his Guard with his purpoſe, he ordered them to get in with their Swords, it being the cuſtome when the Commanders Feaſted, to have their Guards ſtand behind them. Artaſiris he would have doe the deed when he ſaw it moſt convenient, and inſtructed Gregorius to bring ſome of their ſtouteſt Armenians to the Palace with their Swords, (for they might not attend their Officers with other Arms) who ſhould, (upon jealouſie that their Captain was invited out of no good intention towards him,) deſire to ſtand with the Guards of Gontharis. Artaſiris cut Arrows in two, and thruſt the peices round his Arme up to the Elbow, tying them with ſtrings and covering them with the ſleeve of his Coat, that he might receive any blow made at him upon his Arme, and fence it off from his Body.

81. He deſired Artabanes that, if he ſaw the Tyrant was not mortally wounded, he would kill him, the ſaid Artaſiris, inſtantly, leſt by torture he ſhould diſcover him, and periſhing baſely himſelf ruine his Captain alſo; which ſaid, he went with Gregorius and one of the Guard and ſtood behind him, the reſt ſtaying with thoſe without, and expecting till they heard the cry within as they were directed. He had his hand upon his Scimiter, and would have done the deed at the beginning of the Feaſt; but that he was ſtopt by Gregorius, who in the Armenian Language told him that Gontharis was yet himſelf, and had not drunk ſufficiently. When he had drunk largely, and grew into a pleaſant humour, he gave ſome Diſhes of Meat to the Guard who then went out to eat it, leaving with him onely Vlitheus and two others, and Artaſiris went out with them, fearing he might not handſomely draw his Scimiter within; and being without he drew it, then covering it with his Clothes, he ſtept to Gontharis as to ſay ſomething to him in private. But being come near to him, one of the waiters diſcovered his Sword, and thruſting him away cryed out; with that Gontharis turning about to look at him, Artaſiris fetcht a blow and cut off part of his Skull, with his fingers he had laid croſs his right ſhoulder in turning. Notwithſtanding Gontharis indeavoured to riſe, which Artabanes perceiving ſtabbed him into the ſide as he ſate by him, and then did Vlitheus ſtrike at Artaſiris, whoſe device ſtood him in good ſtead; the peices of Arrows within his Sleeve keeping off the blow, ſo that he had no harm. He then killed Vlitheus, Peter one of Solomon's Guard who Supped there alſo, joyned with Artabanes, and they taking up the Swords of Vlitheus and Gontharis, ſlew the two others of the Guard that were left behind, and then the Armenians hearing the Noiſe, ruſhed in and killed the Vandals, and the favourites of the Tyrant, who were placed upon other Couches in the ſame Room at Supper.

Is Killed.

82. The Guards without perceiving what was done, joyned preſently with the Armenians, having moſt of them belonged to Areobindus, and cryed out Juſtinian the Emperour, which Noiſe received by one Company from another, reached to moſt parts of the City. Paſiphilus and other Mutineers were killed in their Lodgings. John with ſome Vandals fled to a Church, but were taken out upon promiſe of ſecurity and ſent to Conſtantinople; and thus was the City and Africk recovered, on the thirty fifth day of the Uſurpation, in the nineteenth year of Juſtinian's Reign, to the great renown of Artabanes. Projecta the Wife of Areobindus, and Neice of the Emperour, richly preſented him, and Juſtinian made him General of the Province; yet not long after, he was recalled at his deſire, and John the Brother of Pappus ſucceeded him, who immediately defeated Antalas, and the Moors of Byzacium, recovering all the Enſigns which were loſt at the Death of Solomon, but was again beaten by the Leucathians; and having loſt many men, fled to Laribum. Then did they overrun Africk, which they waſted to the Gates of Carthage, and he, ſtirred up by anger and indignation, rallied his Souldiers remaining, and drawing in Cutzinas and other Moors to his aſſiſtence, gave them a great overthrow, from which ſuch as eſcaped, fled to the uttermoſt marches of Africk. Hereby it came to paſs, that the Provincials in Africk being few and very poor, enjoyed at length ſome quietneſs. And here Procopius concludeth his Hiſtory of the Vandal Wars in that Countrey, proceeding to the Gothick, which by this time had been carried on nine years in Italy. For thither Beliſarius, as we hinted, was ſent; upon what occaſion, and with what ſucceſs, now we come to ſhew from the firſt Original.

Africk recovered by the means of Artabanes.

Overrun again and recovered by John.

83. Amalaſuntha the Daughter of Theodorich the Goth, who had Conquered Italy out of the hands of Odoacer, and the Heruli, educated her Son Athalarick his Succeſſour, after the manner of the Roman Princes, cauſing him to be inſtructed in Grammar and other principles of Ingenuity. This the Goths diſliked, deſiring he might be bred after the Barbarian way, upon which they could found greater hopes of liberty to ſpoil the People. The Mother at one time ſtriking her Son for ſomething he did in his Chamber, he went out into another Room and wept, where ſome of them ſeeing him, made a great buſineſs of it, railing on her, as if ſhe deſired to be rid of the Boy, that with his Patrimony ſhe might Marry ſome other man, and Reign her ſelf over the Goths and Italians. The Principal of them meeting together, complained that their King was ill bred, that Learning was an Enemy to Valour, producing cowardly and baſe Spirits, and they objected the example of his Grand-Father, who did ſuch great things without as much as knowing his Letters. They beſought the Queen to diſmiſs his three Pedagogues, and to give him Companions of his own Age, who growing up with him might incline him to govern according to their own Laws, and this out of fear ſhe was conſtrained to admit, though ſorely againſt her mind. Theſe Companions having ſome advantage of him in years, when he grew up drew him to Wine and Women, and made him ſo ill natured, undutyfull and diſobedient to his Mother, that he deſerted her in a faction, which had the impudence to Command her to retire from Court. Yet carrying a mind undaunted, and above the Condition of her Sex, ſhe pickt out three of the chief, and confined them ſeverally to the fartheſt parts of Italy, under pretence of ſecuring the borders againſt the Enemy. But holding holding for all this a Correſpondence with their Friends and Relations, they ſtirred up the People againſt her, and the Faction grew ſo ſtrong, that not able to bear up againſt it, ſhe ſent to Juſtinian to deſire that, foraſmuch as ſhe was minded to quit Italy, he would give leave that ſhe might repair to Conſtantinople.

Procop. de bello Goth. lib. 1.

Athalarick the young King of the Goths debauched by ill Company.

84. The Emperour glad of the News, kindly invited her to undertake the Journey. But ſhe intending it but as a Reſerve, and a remedy for neceſſity, having procured thoſe three perſons to be killed, remained ſtill at Ravenna and fortified her Government. However, things went ſtill very croſs with her. Theodatus the Son of Amalafrida the Siſter of Theoderich, a man in years, well skilled in Latin and the Doctrine of Plato, but utterly unpractiſed in Civil and Military matters, and exceſſively Covetous, being Lord of many Towns in Tuſcany, oppreſſed the Inhabitants round about him, which humour ſhe endeavouring to curb, he became much incenſed and bitter againſt her. For a great Sum of money, and the dignity of a Senatour, he plotted to betray Tuſcany into the hands of the Emperour, dealing with ſome Ambaſſadours that were ſent to the Biſhop of Rome, from Conſtantinople for this purpoſe. By this time alſo the King her Son, was faln into a Conſumption through his Intemperance, which diſtracted her exceedingly, taking no comfort in him whilſt he lived, and perceiving that if he died, ſhe ſhould be in extreme danger, becauſe ſhe had much incenſed the Principal of the Goths. Upon the whole matter ſhe reſolved to ſave her ſelf, by delivering Italy into the hands of Juſtinian, who, together with the Ambaſſadours that came to the Biſhop of Rome, ſent one Alexander a Senatour under the ſame Character, to ſpie out her actions, wondering that ſhe came not to Conſtantinople as ſhe once intended. Alexander expoſtulated with her about ſeveral matters of no very great concernment, to which ſhe openly returned a reſolute and ſmart Anſwer, but ſecretly promiſed to deliver up Italy to Juſtinian, who underſtanding what was offered both from her and Theodatus, was overjoyed, and diſpatched preſently into Italy, one Peter an Illyrian by Nation, by Profeſſion an Oratour, but a man of a great reach, much mildneſs, and of excellent ability to perſwade.

Theodatus. Theodahatus. Theodahadus. Theudatus & Theudathus i.e. Theud-aht vel Theod-aht, Populis æſtimatus. Aht enim & Acht idem ſunt.

Amalaſuntha his Mother purpoſeth to deliver up Italy to Juſtinian.

85. In the mean time Theodatus upon evident proof, not onely of oppreſſing his Neighbours, but intruſion into the Royal Domain, was compelled to make reſtitution, wherewith he was infinitely offended. About the ſame time alſo, Athalarick died of his Conſumption, after he had Reigned eight years, which put his Mother upon a new plunge. Without conſidering the Nature of Theodatus, and her late proceedings againſt him. To appeaſe his mind, ſhe offered him the Title of King, on condition that ſhe continued in her former Power. He remembring how ſhe had uſed him, ſwore what ſhe pleaſed, with an intent never to perform it, and being in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, acted quite contrary both to her expectation, and his own Ingagements. For he made of his Council the Relations of thoſe ſhe had put to Death; ſome of her Friends he ſuddenly diſpatched, and in concluſion Impriſoned her in a ſtrong Caſtle, in an Iſland of the Lake Vulſinus in Tuſcany. Fearing the diſpleaſure of the Emperour, he ſent ſome Ambaſſadours to perſwade him that ſhe had no harm, and cauſed her to write to the ſame purpoſe. The Ambaſſadours in their way met with Peter, who perceiving the Scene was quite changed in Italy, thereof ſpeedily advertiſed his Maſter, and he thence reſolved to take occaſion to imbroil Theodatus and the Goths. Now he ſent inſtructions to Peter publickly to own the cauſe of Amalaſuntha, to whom he wrote Letters full of comfort, and of his reſolution to take her part. But before Peter could reach Italy, the Kinſmen of thoſe ſhe had put to Death, perſwaded Theodatus ſhe was to be removed out of the way, without which neither he nor they could be in any ſafety, and therefore he conſenting they went to the Iſland and murthered her, to the great greif of the reſt of the Goths, who deſervedly admired her for the excellency of her Virtues. Peter proteſted openly againſt the Fact, and declared perpetual War from the Emperour. Theodatus was ſo ſilly, as although he openly favoured the Murtherers, yet to deny the Fact, to have been committed with his knowledge and approbation. Her Death happened in the DXXXIIII year of our Lord, in the fourth Conſulſhip of Juſtinian, who had Paulinus for Collegue, in which year Marcellinus Comes finiſhed his Chronicon.

She procures Theodatus to be King upon her Son's death.

Vide Ep. ſi placet apud Caſſiod. var. lib. 10. princip.

And he cauſes her to be Murthered.

Vide Baron ad h. Ann.

Thereupon Juſtinian reſolves to make War upon the Goths.

86. The Emperour being advertiſed of the Death of Amalaſuntha, reſolved upon that occaſion to make War with the Goths; the following year being the ninth of his Reign, having lately Conquered Gelimer and the Vandals in Africk, through the Conduct of Beliſarius. He Commanded Mundus the General of Illyrium to march into Dalmatia, which was ſubject to the Goths, and attempt Salonæ. Be- liſarius he ordered to make himſelf ready, to Sail with a Fleet, aboard of which were four thouſand Legionary Souldiers and Confederates, three thouſand Iſaurians, two hundred Auxiliary Hunnes, and three hundred Moors, beſides his Life-Guard, making him General with abſolute authority. His Inſtructions were to pretend a Voyage to Carthage, but to attempt Sicily, which if he found eaſie, he ſhould ſubdue it, and not quit it upon any account; otherwiſe to Sail away for Africk, without diſcovery of his Intent. Juſtinian courted the Princes of the Franks by good words and preſents to joyn with him, uſing arguments drawn from the Hereſie of the Goths, and their equal enmity to them. Mundus without much adoe Conquered Salonæ. Beliſarius eaſily reduced Sicily, onely Panormus ſtood out, the Goths preſuming upon the ſtrength of the place, and it was indeed by Land impregnable, but by Sea he attacqued it, and had it delivered up by compoſition. This Succeſs of his, Peter the Ambaſſadour made uſe of to terrify Theodatus, whoſe Heart failing him, in a ſecret Conference he came to this accord, to quit all pretenſions to the Iſland of Sicily, to ſend the Emperour yearly a Crown of Gold, weighing three hundred pound, and three thouſand fighting men when he ſhould deſire them. That he ſhould not put to Death, or confiſcate the Goods of any Prieſt or Senatour, without the Emperour's conſent, nor advance any to the Degree of a Senatour or Patritian, but petition him upon occaſion to doe it, that in the Acclamations of the People, Juſtinian's name ſhould be firſt mentioned, and when ever Theodatus had his Statue erected, the Emperour ſhould have another placed on the right hand.

87. Theodatus though he had ſubſcribed the Accord, yet fearing that the Emperour might not accept of the terms, was much diſtracted in his mind, out of apprehenſion of a War which he infinitely dreaded. He ſent back for the Ambaſſadour, now on his Journey as far as Albania, who diſcovering the terrour he was in, ſo applied himſelf to his humour, that he was perſuaded to reſign the Kingdom to Juſtinian, having bound Peter by an Oath, not to diſcover this his Intent, till he perceived the Emperour would not accept of the former Capitulations, and with him he ſent one Ruſticus a Prieſt, and a man whom he much reſpected, and whom ſome will have the ſame with Agapetus the Roman Biſhop. Juſtinian not admitting of the firſt Accord, they ſhewed him the ſecond Agreement, whereby he was content for a yearly allowance of twelve Centenaries of Gold, to ſurrender the Dominion over the Goths and Italians, having no skill, as he ſaid in his Letter, in the tumults of War, and being by his love to Philoſophy, eſtranged from the noiſe of Battels, and preferring his Studies before a Kingdom. The Emperour raviſhed with joy, flattered him in an anſwer to his Letters, approving and extolling his high Wiſdom, and adding to what he demanded, the chief Honours of which a Roman Subject was capable, ſent Peter and one Alexander joyned in Commiſſion with him, with Inſtructions to aſſign him Lands out of the Emperour's Domain, by the Romans called Patrimonium; and having perfected the Agreement by Oaths and Inſtruments of Conveyance, to call in Beliſarius from Sicily, to take Poſſeſſion of the Countrey, to whom he ſent Orders accordingly to go over.

Mundus and his Son Slain in Dalmatia.

88. During this Negotiation, an Army of Goths entred Dalmatia, and near Salonæ killed Mauritius the Son of Mundus, who went out with a few onely to view their Body, wherewith Mundus being much greived, in great paſſion led his men without any good order againſt the Enemy, whom he clearly defeated, but giving the Chaſe negligently, and without good conſideration, (ſo much he was inraged for the Death of his Son;) he was Slain by one whom he purſued, according to a verſe of Sibylla which the Romans now called to mind, that When Africk ſhould be recovered, Mundus and his Son ſhould periſh, which they out of the ambiguous ſignification of the word, Mundus, interpreted of the World, and the whole fabrick of Nature. The Romans now having none to head them, retired home, and the Goths having loſt their chief Officers, kept cloſe in their Garriſons, for they could not truſt to the Fortifications of Salonæ, nor to the Romans that Inhabited it. Theodatus now in the mean time, for all his Tranſactions with the Emperour, ſlighted his Ambaſſadours, being of ſo fickle and weak a diſpoſition, as either to be depreſſed with greater fears, or elevated with higher Confidence than the occaſion required. Exalted upon this diſaſtre of Mundus, he derided Peter, who expoſtulating with him for his breach of Faith, he publickly told him, that as Ambaſſadours are by all men much reſpected, yet they retain that privilege by moderation onely, it being not unuſual for ſuch an one to be put to Death, if he carry himſelf inſolently to the Perſon of a Prince, or commit Adultery. He did not mean that Peter had lain with any man's Wife, but onely expreſſed the limits of his Privilege; however he and his Collegue net-

Africa capta eſt, Mundus & ejus nate periſtis.

led hereat, admoniſhed him not upon ſuch frivolous pretences, to violate the Laws of Nations; told him that an Ambaſſadour, who could not have water to his hands without the knowledge of thoſe that guarded him, could not be guilty of ſuch a Crime. As for words, if he have in commiſſion to ſpeak them, he is not to be blamed, but his Maſter. That it is his part to doe that for which he was ſent: that they therefore would utter whatſoever the Emperour had commanded them, were he angry or pleaſed; and again putting him in mind that it was high time to perform what he had ſworn to, they told him they had, beſides the Letters directed to him, others which they muſt deliver to the Principal Goths themſelves. By theſe the Emperour promiſed that their union with him ſhould tend to their benefit, and not at all to their diſadvantage; and deſired them to give credit and aſſiſtence to theſe his two Ambaſſadours, whom he had ſent into Italy about this buſineſs.

Theodatus puts a guard upon Juſtinian's Ambaſſadours.

Grypus, the Commander of the Goths, quits Dalmatia.

Beliſarius paſſeth from Sicily into Italy.

89. He peruſed the Letters, but refuſed utterly to perform the agreement, and put a ſtrict guard upon the Ambaſſadours. Juſtinian being thereof informed, ſent Conſtantianus, Maſter of his Horſe, to raiſe Forces in Illyrium, and attempt Salonæ. Beliſarius he ordered without delay to paſs into Italy, and make war upon the Goths. In the mean time Gripus, who commanded the Goths, had entred Salonæ; but hearing a report that Conſtantianus had a far greater Army, both by Land and Sea, than indeed he had, he removed into the Champion Countrey; and then Conſtantianus ſeizing upon the Town, and his Fleet lying before it at Anchor, ſeven days after he aroſe, and tranſported his men to Ravenna. Now did Conſtantianus take in Dalmatia and Liburnia, the Goths ſubmitting themſelves, and ſo ended the Winter, and the firſt year of the War. Beliſarius leaving Garriſons in Syracuſe and Panormus, tranſported his Army from Meſſina to Rhegium, over that Strait where the Poets feigned Scylla and Charybdis to have been ſeated. Paſſing up the Countrey, where many daily came in to him, he ſate down in Campania before Naples, commanding the Fleet, which kept all this while cloſe to the Coaſt, to lie within a Bow-ſhot in the Harbour. The Caſtle in the Suburbs he took by compoſition; and then giving leave to the Citizens to ſend ſome to treat with him, or hear what he had to offer, they ſent one Stephanus; to whom he offered many arguments drawn from ſelf-preſervation and liberty, pawning his Faith for as good conditions as the Sicilians had obtained. Stephanus making report hereof to the Commonalty, added his own opinion of the inconvenience of reſiſting the Emperour; but Paſtor and Aſclepiodotus, two Oratours, much devoted to the ſervice of the Goths, on purpoſe to croſs the Treaty, perſuaded them to make ſuch demands of Beliſarius as they concluded he would never grant; and when contrary to their expectation, he had cloſed with their Propoſitions, and the People commanded the Gates to be ſet open, they again perſuaded them it was their intereſt to ſtand out; foraſmuch as it was uncertain which Side would get the better: And though Beliſarius ſhould have that good fortune, he could not in wiſdom ſo much blame them for being true to their truſt, as hate and deſpiſe them for, either as Traitours or Cowards, forſaking their old Friends and Maſters at the firſt onſet.

90. Hereupon they defied Beliſarius, who making ſeveral aſſaults, was as often repulſed with loſs of many of his beſt men; the Walls, by reaſon of the Sea, and the ſteepneſs of the ground, being inacceſſible. He cut the great Aqueduct which ſerved the City; but this inconvenience was eaſily ſupplied by the Wells within, which furniſhed them with water ſufficiently; ſo that he was much perplexed, conſidering the loſs of his time, and that he muſt be forced to ſet upon Rome and Theodatus in the Winter. Reſolving to riſe, he had given out orders to the Army to diſlodge, when a certain Iſaurian, curious to view the ſtructure of the Aqueduct, entring into it perceived, that if a paſſage, which was cut for the water through a Rock, was but a little inlarged, Forces might eaſily get through it, and ſurprize the City. Beliſarius herewith acquainted, joyfully entertained the overture, and procured ſome Iſaurians to widen the Paſſage, which they did not with Hatchets and Axes, but by filing off the Rock, leſt they ſhould be diſcovered by the noiſe. When all was ready, Beliſarius ſent again for Stephanus, and uſed all the arguments he could to perſuade them to yield, telling them his Engines were ready, wherewith he ſhould not fail to take the Town; but the People being ſtill deaf to all advice of this nature, he provided him ſcaling Ladders, and then cauſed Magnus, a Commander of the Horſe, and Ennes, Captain of the Iſaurians, in the dead time of the night, with about ſix hundred men to enter the Vault, taking with them Lights, and two Trumpets to affright the City, and give notice to the General what they did. When they were within the City, they were at a loſs, not knowing where to get up, till the foremoſt at laſt found the Roof uncovered at a place where ſtood a Cottage, in which a poor Woman man dwelt alone, and an Olive-tree grew at the top of the Arch. The Vault being high arched with Brick, and no ſteps at the hole, they found it impoſſible to climb with their Arms about them, till one laying his down, made a ſhift to clamber up, and threatned to kill the Woman if once ſhe ſtirred. Then tying a Rope to the Tree, he caſt the other end down into the Aqueduct, by which all the Souldiers mounted, one by one.

Takes Naples.

91. All being mounted, and the night now far ſpent, they made up to the Wall, and killed the Sentinels on the North-ſide, where the General ſtood expecting the event; who upon the ſignal of the Trumpets given, commanded the Souldiers to ſet to the Scaling Ladders. The Ladders were two ſhort; but they tied two together, and ſo mounting the Battlements, eaſily took the City, and opened the Gates for the reſt of the Army to enter. Great ſlaughter was made of all ſorts and conditions, eſpecially by the Maſſagetes, who killed thoſe alſo that had taken ſanctuary in Churches, till Beliſarius rode about and reſtrained the Angry Souldiers, bidding them take the Wealth, but ſpare the Owners; and let the Conquered find by experience how good Friends they had loſt by the falſe meaſures of their own Councils. He cauſed all the other Priſoners to be releaſed as well as the Women and Children; and reconciling the Souldiers to them, both made them Slaves, and reſtored them to liberty in one day; after which they recovered alſo the choiceſt of their Goods, having hid their Gold and things of value under-ground, which now they found upon reſtitution of their Houſes. The Gothick Garriſon, conſiſting of eight hundred men, he took into the Emperour's pay; and ſo ended the Siege of Naples, after twenty days continuance, as Procopius writes, who ſpeaks much of the humanity of Beliſarius; although ſome others, but thoſe of no great authority, ſay he was grievouſly reprehended for his cruelty in this City by Silverius, the Biſhop of Rome, and compelled to doe penance, having put all the Citizens to the Sword, and neither ſpared Churches, Prieſts, nor the Religious Virgins. However, the Goths throughout Italy were exceedingly alarmed at his ſucceſs, and more amazed at the ſtupidity of their Prince, who made no preparations for a Battel, ſuſpecting that he betrayed the Countrey to Beliſarius upon ſecurity of a quiet and idle life. Aſſembling at Regeta, a place thirty five miles diſtant from Rome, they choſe one Vitigis for their King, a man of no eminent Houſe, but become remarkable for his valour in the War, which Theodorich made againſt the Gepidæ. Theodatus having the news, fled to Ravenna, whither the new King ſent after him one Optaris, a Goth, (whom Theodatus had diſobliged by hindring him from the marriage of an handſome and rich Maid he loved, by perſuading her to marry another man) with orders to bring him either alive or dead. To gratify his own malice, as well as the jealouſie of Vitigis, he ſo hotly purſued him, that he overtook him on the way; and being laid along on his back, killed him like a Beaſt ordained for ſacrifice, as the Hiſtorian expreſſeth it, after he had reigned three years. Such was the end of this covetous, ingratefull, fickle and imprudent Prince, who in old Coins is called Theodahathus, with a threefold aſpiration according to the pronunciation of the Goths.

Vitigis choſen King by the Goths.

And Theodatus murthered.

Vide Bar. Annal. ad Ann. 534, & 536. Tom. 7.

92. Vitigis to improve the advantage got by the death of Theodatus, impriſoned his Son Theudegiſclus, marcht for Rome, and thence, having not things yet in readineſs, to Ravenna, whence he thought he might beſt begin the War. Before his departure from Rome, he laboured much with Silverius the Biſhop, the Senate and People to be true to the Gothick Nation, putting them in mind of Theodorich's Reign, binding them with the ſtrongeſt Oaths imaginable, and taking moſt of the Senatours as Hoſtages along with him. Having left a Garriſon of four thouſand men in Rome, and being come to Ravenna, he there by force married Mataſuntha, the Daughter of Amalaſuntha (a Virgin more beautifull than her name expreſſeth her) to ſtrengthen his Intereſt by ſo near alliance with the Bloud of Theodorich; then from all Parts did he aſſemble the Goths, and put them into a poſture; thoſe in Gall onely excepted, for fear of the Franks, who he thought would certainly overrun both Italy and Gall, if he with his Army ſhould march for Rome. Therefore conſidering how he ſhould be utterly unable to graple with the Romans and them at the ſame time he called his Officers together, and perſuaded them to draw the Franks to their ſide, by giving up to them that part of Gall which Theodorich and his Succeſſours had hitherto poſſeſſed, with a certain ſum of money. The Princes of the Franks, Childebert, Theudebert and Clotarius divided the Countrey betwixt them, and took the money, entring into confederacy with the Goths, and covenanting to ſend them aid; onely having promiſed the Emperour to doe the ſame with him, they could not enter into an open war with him, therefore they would ſend them Wittichis vulgo Vitigis, ſapiens & fortis. Grot. Theud-giſil, Populorum comes.

Mate-ſchuente, Mediocris pulchritudo.

Vitigis draws the Franks to his Party.

them Succours, not Franks, but of the Nations ſubject to them. Beliſarius in the mean time put Garriſons into Naples and Cumæ, the onely ſtrong Places in Campania, and ſet all things in order for his march to Rome; which the Citizens underſtanding, and fearing the Torture of the Neapolitans, reſolved to receive the Emperour's Army, perſuaded to it by Silverius the Biſhop eſpecially, notwithſtanding the Oaths formerly made to Vitigis. By one Fidelius, who had formerly been Quæſtor to Athalarick, they invited him to come and take poſſeſſion of their City; in compliance with which offer, he led on by the Via Latina, leaving the Via Appia on his left hand. This Via Appia, or Appian High-way, ſo called from Appius the Conſul, who had cauſed it to be made nine hundred years before, reached five days journey from Rome, to Capua. A thing worthy of ſpecial remark, being broad enough for two Carriages to paſs a-breaſt, paved with Stones all of the Millſtone Quarry, and exceeding hard, which he had procured from foreign Countries. They were ſmooth wrought, equal, and ſo cloſe faſtned, yet without any Braſs, or other ligament, that one would have thought them all of the ſame piece, or grown together. After ſo long a time wearing by Beaſts and Carriages, there was not the leaſt chink or hole made in the Pavement, nor any one Stone broken, or worn out; nay that had as much as loſt its ſhape and ſplendour in the days of Procopius.

The Via Appia.

Beliſarius enters Rome.

Procopius de bello Gothico, lib. 1. Euagrius, lib. 4. c. 18.

93. In the eleventh year of Juſtinian's Reign, on the ninth or tenth day of December, A. D. DXXXVII. full ſixty years after it had been taken by the Heruli, and the thirty fourth after its captivity by the Goths, was Rome retaken by Beliſarius, who entring it at Porta Aſinaria, at the ſame time the Gothick Garriſon iſſued out at the Porta Flaminia, being not able to make any conſiderable oppoſition. The Keys, together with Leuderis the Governour, who ſtaid behind, he ſent to the Emperour, and then applied himſelf to the repairing of the Wall, and other Fortifications, wherein he was very much commended, both for his skill and induſtry. But the Citizens murmured much, and wondred that he ſhould look upon Rome as a place fitted for a Siege, being neither ſituate upon the Sea, nor having Walls (which were huge in compaſs) at all convenient for making defence, nor ſeated upon any Rock or Mountain naturally fortified, but in an open Champion, liable to all aſſaults. Yet ſtill did he prepare for a Siege, ſtoring up Corn in Granaries, which he cauſed to be tranſported out of Sicily, and compelling the Romans, though ſore againſt their wills, to bring in all the Grain which their Farms afforded, with other things neceſſary for humane life. The Inhabitants of Calabria and Apulia had before this time, both in the Mediterranean and Maritime Coaſts, ſubmitted themſelves to the General, which example Pitzas a Goth, now following, ſurrendred half Samnium, lying upon the Sea, with the Goths inhabiting as far as the River which divides the Countrey, thoſe on the other ſide refuſing to be guided by Pitzas, or to give up themſelves to the Emperour. Beliſarius having taken in thoſe Places with all the territory of Rome to the Tiber, and having put it into a very good poſture, ordered Conſtantianus to take in the Cities of Tuſcany. He had ſurrendred to him Spoletum and Peruſia, with other Towns; at which time one Beſſas, a Goth, but of the Emperour's Party, and an excellent Souldier, took in Narnia. An Army ſent to Vitigis he deſtroyed almoſt every man; after which this Gothick King would not ſtay any longer at Ravenna; but ſending Forces to recover Dalmatia, prepared for a march againſt Beliſarius with no fewer than a hundred and fifty thouſand men. For hearing how ſmall his Army was, it repented him that he had left Rome; and therefore now in great anger and diſdain, he reſolved to return thither, fearing nothing but that Beliſarius would run away.

94. Beliſarius indeed, hearing that the whole power of the Goths was coming upon him, could not but be much concerned, having ſo unequal a number to make reſiſtence; and he durſt not abandon the Places of Tuſcany, by calling back his Forces, leſt by poſſeſſing them the Goths ſhould block up Rome. He ſent orders to Beſſas and Conſtantianus to leave competent Garriſons in them, and then come to him, which Conſtantianus ſpeedily did; but Beſſas ſtaying longer to ſettle Narnia, (a City diſtant about forty four miles from Rome, ſituate upon an high Hill, near the River Narus, over which it had a Bridge, with the higheſt Arches Procopius ever ſaw, and from which it received its name, being called by Livy and Pliny Nequinum; concerning which Tully wrote that dry weather made it dirty, and rainy weather duſty) fell upon the Forerunners of the Goths, of which he routed and killed a great number; then being preſt upon by their multitudes, he retired into Narnia; and leaving therein a Garriſon, came and brought news to Rome that the Enemy would ſpeedily be with them. Vitigis would not ſpend time upon the

Sect. 1.

Towns in Tuſcany, becauſe they were well provided, and out of a vehement deſire to take Beliſarius before he ſhould run away. Within a mile and three quarters of Rome, Beliſarius had upon the Bridge of Tiber built a Fort, and therein placed a Garriſon to give the Enemy ſome ſtop, till the Romans might bring in ſufficient Proviſions, and till ſuch time as he could receive from the Emperour thoſe additional Forces he expected; for he conceived that the Goths repulſed here, could not paſs by any other Bridge in twenty days, and to get Boats together would require a longer time. He thought fit alſo to incamp ſome of his men near the Tiber to hinder the Enemies paſſage, and make ſome trial of their Courage. But thoſe that watched upon the Bridge affrighted with the multitude of the Goths, fled by night into Campania, and the day following the Enemy brake down the Gates, and paſſed over without oppoſition, till Beliſarius met with them unawares, who knowing nothing of what had happened, marched with a thouſand Horſe toward the Bridge to view the Ground where he might beſt incamp his Souldiers. At this time, however formerly cautious, he ventured himſelf farther than the nature of his place, and the preſent poſture of Affairs required, fighting in great danger at the head of his men. By ſome Fugitives he was made known to the Enemy, who, neglecting all others, ſhot at him alone, and laid at him with their Swords and Lances. He gallantly demeaned himſelf, killing all within his reach; but had undoubtedly periſhed, had not his Lanciers and Targetiers ſhewed that day unparallell'd valour, holding their Shields before him, receiving all the Arrows, and thruſting off the Multitude by main ſtrength. He loſt at leaſt a thouſand on his part; and amongſt them, many of the choiceſt of his Retinue, yet he himſelf was neither wounded nor ſhot, though the Controverſie of the day was onely about his own Perſon.

A great Action betwixt Beliſarius and the Goths near Rome.

95. In concluſion, the Goths were routed, and driven to their Camp, which when they had entred, they made head againſt the Purſuers; and their Foot being freſh, eaſily repulſed them. The Romans finding no acceſs here, and perceiving another Party of Horſe to make toward them, retired to an Hill, whence they were forced down, and purſued by thoſe they had lately chaſed to the very Gates of Rome. Here they were in greater diſtreſs than ever; for thoſe within, fearing that the Goths would enter pell mell with them, would not open the Gates, though the General himſelf called and cried to them, whoſe Face they could not diſcern in the duſk of the evening, being alſo beſmeared with bloud and duſt, and his voice was as little diſtinguiſhed, becauſe they had taken it for granted that he was dead from the report of ſuch as firſt of all ran away. They were driven up into a narrow room, and violently charged, which put Beliſarius upon a ſudden and bold reſolution, to incourage his men, and to give the onſet upon the Purſuers, who were much diſordered; and his deſign ſo far took, that the Goths imagining this could not happen, except thoſe within the City ſallied out alſo upon them, in a fear ran all away, Beliſarius not ſuffering his Souldiers to give the chaſe, but procuring as ſpeedy entrance into Rome as poſſible. A day or two following was the City half incompaſſed by the Enemy, who lying on both ſides of Pons Milvius, and thereby having free acceſs to the River, made war in what part he pleaſed. The Aqueducts, fourteen in number, being moſt ſtately Brick-works, ſo deep and broad, that a man might eaſily enter them on horſeback, they broke and rent in pieces, to cut off the water from the Town. On the other ſide, Beliſarius omitted nothing becoming a prudent and wary Governour for defence of the Place. To ſupply the defect of water now wanting to the Mills, he cauſed ſtrong Cables to be drawn croſs the River, and faſtned on both ſides near the Bridge, being ſtretched out ſo as to be very ſtiff. To theſe Cables he tied Boats at two foot diſtance, where the ſtream ran ſtrongeſt through the Arches, and placing in each Boat a Mill-ſtone, hung the Engine, which was to turn the Mill, betwixt the Boats. Beneath theſe, in the ſame manner, he cauſed other Boats to be tied at a proportionable diſtance, fitting them alſo with the like Engins, whereby the Mill-ſtones were ſet on work, and the City was abundantly ſupplied. The Goths informed of this Device, caſt Trees and dead Bodies into the River, that being carried down the ſtream, they might break, or at leaſt diſorder the Engins; but for this Beliſarius invented a ſufficient remedy, by drawing Iron Chains before the Bridge, which not onely ſhould intercept what ever could annoy the Mills, but to prevent the entrance of the Enemy that way into the City. To provide alſo againſt any ſurprize by ſuch clandeſtine entrance, he fortified the Aqueducts for a good ſpace, where they opened themſelves into the City. As for the Common-ſewers, he needed not ſecure them, becauſe they had all their Mouths into the River.

They beſiege him in Rome.

96. Notwithſtanding, the Inhabitants of Rome not uſed to want and hardſhip, bore the Siege and reſtraint of their liberty with great impatience, aſſembling together in a tumultuous manner, and railing at Beliſarius. This being underſtood by Vitigis in the Camp, to exaſperate them the more, and drive them into a perfect mutiny, he ſent into the Town certain Meſſengers, who in preſence of the Senate and Commanders of the Army ſhould upbraid the General with temerity and preſumption; and vaunting much of the power and bounty of their King, offer to him and his Army a ſafe retreat, and free paſſage both for themſelves and their Goods. But the awe and reputation of Beliſarius eaſily overweighing all his Arguments; and perceiving the man was not to be frighted, he reſolved to aſſault the City. For this purpoſe he cauſed to be made Towers of wood, equal in height with the Walls, and ſet upon Wheels to be drawn to and fro upon occaſion. He provided himſelf of many Scaling Ladders, and of four battering Rams, of which Engine, becauſe we have not formerly ſpoken, we ſhall here preſent the Reader with ſuch a deſcription of it, as we have it from Procopius. Into four wooden Poſts of equal ſize, and oppoſite to each other were morteſſed eight croſs Beams, four above, and as many below, reſembling a Room of quadrangular figure, which inſtead of a Roof and Walls, was covered with Hides, both that it might be eaſier of carriage, and better defend thoſe that were within it from any violence. Within the Engine was hung another croſs Beam with looſe Chains, the upper end whereof was ſharpened, and armed with Iron in ſhape of an Arrows head, and ſometime fourſquare, reſembling an Anvil. This Engine was mounted upon four Wheels, faſtned to the four upright Beams, requiring fifty men at leaſt to move it, who having ſet it to the Walls, drew back the looſe Beam with Pullies, and then let it go again with ſuch violence, that by its reiterated ſtrokes it eaſily broke down and demoliſhed whatever ſtood within its reach; having the name of a Ram from the end of the ſaid Beam which reſembled the Horns of that Creature.

A battering Ram deſcribed.

97. Beliſarius ſtudying the beſt ways and methods how to make defence, placed upon the Towers another ſort of Engins called Baliſtæ, to keep off the Beſiegers. Theſe were made in form of a Bow, having on the nether part a moveable Hook, lying upon a ſtreight piece of Iron. Having bent the Armes or Horns of the Bow with a Cord from the Hook or Nut, they let fly the Arrow, which was but half as long as thoſe of the ordinary ſort, but four times as thick, having no Feathers to facilitate its flight, but certain thin pieces of Wood, which being fixed to its ſides, together with an head of Iron ſuitable in bigneſs, gave it the perfect ſhape of an Arrow. The Bow being bent with Pullies, the Nut drew back, and then out flew the Arrow with ſuch violence, that it would reach twice as far as another; and if Tree or Stone ſtood in its way, down it went moſt certainly; which force and ᵃ ſtrength of ſhooting gave it the name of Baliſta. Upon the Battlements of the Walls was another ſort of Engine placed for ſlinging of Stones, which they called Wild Aſſes; and at the Gates ſuch as they termed Wolves, made after a faſhion which ſomething reſembled Portculiſes. Upon the ground they erected two Beams which reached as high as the Battlements. On theſe they laid wrought pieces of Timber chequer-wiſe, ſome ſtreight, and ſome acroſs, joining them ſo together, that the diſtances betwixt the pieces ſerved for holes, or open places. Upon each joint ſtuck a piece of Wood, pointed like a thick Spur. They faſtned the croſs Timbers to other Beams but half ſo long, and from the top reaching but half way down; then laying the Beams flat-long upon the Gates; when the Enemy approached, they drew a little down the higher Beams, which then falling flat with the wooden Spurs upon the Aſſailants, ſlew without fail all they lighted on. Such were the preparations Beliſarius made for defence of Rome.

A Baliſta.

ᵃ Ὅτι βάλλει μάλιστα.

Other Engins, as Wild Aſſes,

Wolves

prepared by Beliſarius for defence of Rome.

98. His Baliſtæ did ſuch execution, both upon men and the Oxen which were to draw the Engins to the Walls, that the Goths having made an aſſault on the 18th day of the Siege, were forced to retire from the Porta Beliſaria. But Vitigis, though here repulſed, left a good part of the Army to divert the General, by plying the Battlements with Shot at a diſtance, and reſolved to attacque another Part called the Vivarium, or Park, lying near the Porta Prænestina, where the Walls were moſt aſſaultable. Another Party of Goths gave the onſet at Porta Aurelia, without which ſtood Adrian's Tomb, a Place but ſlenderly guarded, both becauſe Beliſarius thought there was no great need of it, the Wall being ſtrong in this part, and the River running under it; and the Emperour's Army being but five thouſand, at the beginning of the Siege he was conſtrained to diſtribute his men to the moſt neceſſary Places. The Aſſailants being covered by the Porticus, which then reached to Saint Peter's Church, were not diſcovered by the Defendants, till they were got very near, which rendred the Baliſtæ of the Romans uſeleſs; and from the ordinary Arrows they ſecured themſelves with their Leather Bucklers, which much reſembled the Perſian Targets. Preſſing hard forward, and plying the Battlements with their Shot, they had almoſt incompaſſed the Tomb, and were ready to ſet to their Ladders, which ſo far diſcouraged the Beſieged, that they deſpaired of reſiſtence, till they took a reſolution of tumbling the Statues and great Stones which ſtood upon the Tomb, on the Enemies head, who was hereby forced to give ground, and then the Romans taking courage, repelled them without much labour. They attempted alſo Porta Pancratiana upon the River, to no purpoſe; but that Place, which of all others had been moſt for their deſign, they utterly neglected. This was a part of the Wall betwixt the two Gates, Flaminia and Pinciana, which had of a long time been broken down half way from the top; and Beliſarius at his firſt coming went about to repair, but the Romans hindred him, alledging that the Apoſtle Peter, whom above all they reverenced, had promiſed to protect the Place. And their expectation, ſaith our Authour, did not deceive them; for the Enemy, during all the Siege never approached it, to the great wonder of the Defendants. And no man ſince that time hath been ſo bold as to repair it, the Wall remaining in the ſame condition, and broken as formerly.

99. In the mean time Beſſas and Peranius being hotly charged by Vitigis at the Vivarium, or Park, ſent for Beliſarius. Long before this time the Romans perceiving the ground here to be flat, and the Wall decayed, had compaſſed it with a Flancker, not onely for defence and ſafety, but for pleaſure, as keeping of Lions, and other wild Beaſts, whence it had its name. It had no Battlements, nor any other Fortification; and therefore Vitigis ordered his Engins to be brought hither, and doubted not, but if he could break through the Flancker into the Park, to carry the City, the Walls within being of no moment at all. Yet did Beliſarius ſuffer them to break in, and then ſending Cyprianus upon them (who did great execution by reaſon of the ſtraitneſs of the Paſſage whereat they entred) ſallied out againſt the Goths with his whole Army, ſet fire to their Engins, and charged them with ſuch violence, that he put them to flight, having taken care that at Porta Salaria ſhould at the ſame time be made another Sally; ſo that as they ran from one place, they were unexpectedly received at another; and being both aſſailed by the Purſuers, intercepted by others that lay in wait for them, and plied with continual Shot from the Battlements, thirty thouſand of them were ſlain, and more wounded, the buſineſs laſting the whole day. This Succeſs exceedingly incouraged the Defendants, but the General knew this would not doe the work. For the Goths were ſtill twelve thouſand ſtrong; and Vitigis, he doubted not, underſtood ſo far his Intereſt, as to dread being baffled in this his deſign. Knowing that the Siege was like to continue long, he wrote to the Emperour for new ſupplies. The uſeleſs Multitude he ſent out of the City, ſome into Campania, ſome into Sicily, or elſewhere, as they could be beſt diſpoſed of; and becauſe his Souldiers were ſo few, that all parts of the Wall could not be guarded, and they muſt needs be ſpent with continual duty, he liſted the poor Artificers who had no means of ſubſiſtence left them, and mingling them with the Souldiers, allowed them daily pay, whereby he provided both for the indigent Inhabitants, and the relief of his ſick and wounded men. Having ſome ſuſpicion that Silverius the Roman Biſhop practiſed to betray the City, he ſent him away into Greece, and ſoon after placed Vigilius in his Chair. Upon the ſame account he baniſhed certain Senatours, whom after the retirement of the Goths he recalled. Fearing deſigns upon the Gates, he broke the Keys twice a month; every night he changed Sentinels, as alſo their Officers who walked the round, with the names of the Sentinels in writing, having orders to place new ones where they found any miſſing; and the day following to produce ſuch as had made default to receive their puniſhment. He cauſed Muſicians to play all night upon the Battlements. And ſent out Moors to lie with Dogs about the Ditch, to diſcover ſuch as came toward the Walls.

Beliſarius makes very ſucceſsfull Sallies.

Vitigis putteth to death Roman Senatours.

100. Vitigis finding himſelf overmatched, broke out into a rage, and cauſed all the Roman Senatours, whom at the beginning of the War he had brought to Ravenna, to be put to death, two onely excepted, Gerbentius, and Reparatus (Brother to Vigilius, Biſhop of Rome) who having timely notice of it, withdrew themſelves into Liguria. Perceiving that the Beſieged had free paſſage and traffick, as well by Sea as Land, he reſolved to take in Portus, or the Roman Haven, lying at thirteen miles diſtance, at the Rivers mouth; and this he eaſily did, the Place having none to defend it, although three hundred men would have made it good, by reaſon of its ſtrength: but Beliſarius wanting Souldiers to defend Rome it ſelf, could not poſſibly ſpare any Garriſon for it. When it was but a little too late, about twenty days after came a ſupply from the Emperour of ſixteen hundred Horſe, under command of Martinus, and Valerianus, moſt Hunnes, Slavonians and Antæ, ſeated beyond the River Danubius. With theſe he reſolved to make war upon the Enemy, and ſo managed his buſineſs with that induſtry and rare ſagacity, that in three gallant Sallies he killed about four thouſand Goths, and a little after cut off near a thouſand more, whom their King, in imitation of Beliſarius his conduct, had ſent at two ſeveral times towards the Walls, by ſuch ſmall Forces to indamage the Beſieged. Vitigis, beſides the inequality of the match betwixt him and Beliſarius, had this great diſadvantage, which, though the other underſtood very well, he never conſidered. Almoſt all the Romans, and the Auxiliary Hunnes were Archers on horſeback. The Gothick Horſe uſed onely Lances and Swords, and all their Archers fought on foot, incircled with their heavy armed men. Hence it came to paſs that their Horſemen, unleſs they came to hand-ſtrokes, could doe no ſervice, but were eaſily ſhot and ruined, and their Foot could not make incurſions againſt the Enemies Horſe. The Goths feeling the effects, though they underſtood not the cauſe, would no more approach the Walls, nor purſue the Enemy any farther than to drive them from their Trenches. The Romans on the other ſide were elevated with their proſperity, and grew ſo reſolute and gay-humoured, that ſcorning to carry their buſineſs as formerly by ſallies and ſurprize, they would have the War managed in a brave and open way, and longed to come to a general Battel.

101. Beliſarius, knowing well what odds there were againſt him, could not approve of any ſuch deſign, till wearied with the exclamations, both of Citizens and Souldiers, at length he reſolved upon a Battel; yet ſo as he would begin with Excurſions. He often attempted this way, but without ſucceſs, which made him fully determine to fight openly; and the Goths being informed by Fugitives of his deſign, were not a little pleaſed, being quite out of heart, by reaſon of his ſtrategems, and hoping not to find him the ſame man in a pitcht and open Battel. Having prudently ſignified to his men the change of his Reſolution, and exhorted them ſo to ſtand by him therein, that they might render proſperous that courſe by their valour, upon which their courage and forwardneſs had put him, he led out his Army at the two Gates, Pinciana and Salaria. He ordered Valentinus, a Commander of Horſe, to paſs by Porta Aurelia into Nero's Fields, with a ſmall Party; and there to make onely a countenance of fighting, and keep the ſtrong Body of Goths, which lay in that place, from paſſing the Bridge of Milvius (which ſtood at a diſtance from the City) and relieving their Fellows. This diviſion he took to be of the greateſt importance; and therefore not daring to mix the new Volunteers, who were moſt of them Artificers, and utterly unpractiſed in matters of this nature, with the reſt of his Army, for fear of diſorder; he aſſigned them a Poſt without Porta Pancratiana, beyond the Tiber, hoping that the Goths in Nero's Fields would be ſo apprehenſive, both of them and Valentinus his Troops, that they would not dare to quit their ſtation, to join themſelves with the reſt of their Army. He reſolved to fight onely with Horſe, becauſe moſt of his Foot had got Horſe from the Enemy, and were expert Riders, his Infantry was inconſiderable, both for number and courage, and not able to form any conſiderable Battalion; he would therefore place them near the City-ditch, to receive the Horſe, in caſe of a defeat, and to repulſe the Enemy. But Principius, one of his Guard, and Tarmutus, Brother to Ennes, Captain of the Iſaurians, laid before him how great an inconvenience it would be to want his Foot, and to put an affront upon the Roman Infantry, which in all Ages had born the brunt of War, and had indeed cut out the way by their Swords to that greatneſs of Empire, to which that State had arrived. All the miſcarriages of this War they caſt upon the Commanders, and begged leave that they on foot might now ſupply their places, reſolving to ſtand the ſhock of the great Multitude of the Barbarians. The General at firſt denied the motion, both out of reſpect to their Perſons, and the Infantry it ſelf, which he knew muſt be brought into extreme danger. At length, at their importunity, he yielded that ſome few Foot, being placed at the Gates, upon the Battelments, with the common People, and about the Engins, the reſt ſhould be commanded by thoſe two Officers, but ſtand in order behind him, leſt by apprehenſion of danger, they ſhould put the Army into any diſturbance; and that receiving ſuch Horſe as were routed in ſeaſonable time, they might reſiſt and repell the Purſuers.

Beliſarius provides for a pitcht Battel, being conſtrained by his Souldiers and the Citizens.

102. Vitigis put his whole Army into a readineſs, and ordered certain Troops, under command of Marcias, to keep Nero's Fields, and continue Maſters of the Bridge. Having excited his men to animoſity, by propounding to them the ſad

Sect. 1. Pattern of the Vandals in Africk, he placed his battalions of Foot betwixt the wings of the Horſe, and both near the Camp, that in caſe of a rout they might have the farther to purſue, and doe greater execution; for if they could but once come to hand-ſtrokes, he little doubted to overpower the ſmall numbers of the Enemy. Yet at firſt the Romans had the better, the Goths falling thick by the Shot, but ſuch were their numbers, that they could not be miſſing; and Beliſarius his men now fully perceived that their valour, how great ſoever, was far inferiour to the conduct and wiſedom of their General, whom, though they had in a manner conſtrained to this way of fighting, yet now they thought they ſhould doe bravely enough, if they onely puſhed on the Fight as far as the Intrenchments, and having done ſome execution, could retire into the City with the firſt fair pretence. In Nero's Fields the Romans fell ſuddenly upon the Goths, and terrified them ſo with their multitudes, that they fled in diſorder to an Hill, for they took them all for Souldiers, and armed, though moſt of them were nothing leſs, a great number of Seamen and Slaves being alſo mixed with them. And they ſpeedily made it appear how the Goths had miſconceived of them, falling into confuſion, and growing deaf to all the directions of Valentinus their Captain. They ſuffered the Goths quietly to retire, neither would they paſs over the Bridge to the aſſiſtence of Beliſarius, nor by breaking it down, cut off the paſſage of the Enemy, by which means they might have eaſily gained the day; but applied themſelves wholly to rifling and pillage. The Goths viewing them for a time, when they could once believe their own eyes, and perceived how madly they neglected their opportunity, fell with great violence down upon them, and eaſily routed them, being thus intent upon their plunder. In the mean time, the Roman Forces, at the Goths Intrenchment, were much diminiſhed and weakned, though fewer fell on their Side than the other, by reaſon that the diſproportion was ſo great betwixt the two Armies. The Barbarian Horſe ſeeing their advantage charged the Enemy with their Lances, who not abiding the ſhock, retired to their Foot, which neither enduring the charge, both Horſe and Foot ran away, with the Goths at their backs, the whole Army being abſolutely routed. By the means of Principius and Tarmutus, the Foot, and moſt of the Horſe eſcaped with greater eaſe; for they ſcorning to fly, ſtill bore upon the Enemy, and fought with admirable reſolution. Principius was cut in pieces, together with two and forty of the Foot. Tarmutus, when he was even quite ſpent, was reſcued by his Brother, and recovered the Gates, but there fell down in a ſwoun; and being carried in upon a Target, ſurvived but two days, leaving behind him immortal honour. The Romans within fearing Enemies and Friends might enter pell mell into the City, tumultuouſly ſhut the Gates againſt the flying Souldiers, who in this diſtreſs leaped over the Ditch, and ſtood trembling, with their backs to the Walls, unable with their broken Lances and Bows to keep off the Goths, who were ready to leap over to them; till ſeeing numbers of common People and Souldiers appear upon the Battlements, after ſome reviling Language, they deſpaired of ſucceſs, and ſo retired.

The Roman Army routed.

103. The Roman Souldiers, taught by this leſſon of experience what they refuſed to learn from the Precepts of their General, were now well ſatisfied that there was no ingaging with their whole Army, and therefore skirmiſhed, as formerly, with their Horſe lined with Foot, which marched by the Saddle ſkirts, and ever had the better of the Barbarians, though they uſed the very ſame manner of fighting. Many gallant Acts were performed by ſeveral of the General's Life-guard, and others; with which the time was ſpent, till he underſtood that a ſupply of money was already arrived in Italy, which how he ſhould get into the City undiſcovered by the Enemy, muſt now needs be both his great ſtudy and deſign. He led out his whole Army, as if he was fully bent upon a battel, which amuſed the Goths, and cauſed them to unite together, whereby they were diverted from the Place where he had appointed the Treaſure, with its Convoy, to enter. But they could not live upon money. Both Famine and Plague raged ſore in the City the Summer following, which ſo much overcame the patience of the Citizens, that they importuned Beliſarius to come to another Battel, and promiſed that not one of them would be abſent from it. He quieted them by proteſting that ſuddenly they ſhould have Supplies from the Emperour, telling them, that an Army was coming ſo big, that not one Province of the Empire but contributed to it, and ſuch a Fleet was already arrived, as no Roman Eyes had ever beheld the like, for it covered the Shores of Campania, and much of the Ionian Gulf it ſelf. And it being reported, indeed, that the Emperour would ſend Forces to Naples, he diſpatcht thither Procopius the Hiſtorian, both to head the Souldiers, to freight Ships with Corn, and with a ſufficient Convoy to bring them to Oſtia. Taking more heart from this and other incouragements, Procopius de Bell. Gothic. lib. 2.

Beliſarius in a manner beſieges the Beſiegers.

ments, he not onely reinforced his own Garriſon, but by ſeizing on the neighbouring fortreſſes, and the ſeveral Avenues about the Town, intercepted the proviſions which came to the Goths, and in a manner beſieged the Beſiegers.

Succours arrive from Conſtantinople.

104. From Conſtantinople, at length, arrived at Naples three thouſand Iſaurians, at Hydrus, or Otranto, eight hundred Horſe Thracians, beſides one thouſand Horſe more, and three hundred already had reached Rome, by the way of Samnium and Via Latina. In their march through Campania, they joyned to them five hundred men newly levied there, and coaſted along the Sea-ſhore, having many Waggons with them, wherewith to fortifie themſelves if occaſion ſhould be, beſides the convenience of carrying Corn and other Proviſions: Some Troops they ſent by Sea to meet and joyn with them at Oſtia. Beliſarius having Intelligence of their motions, had reaſon to be concerned leſt the Goths by their multitudes ſhould intercept and cut them off, and therefore had recourſe to his ſeldom failing Strategems. At the beginning of the War he had cauſed to be rammed up with ſtones the Gate called Porta Flaminia, not finding it ſo convenient for Sallies, and leſt the Enemy ſhould make advantage of that weak place and force the City. From this Gate he now cauſed the ſtones to be removed in great ſecrecy, and there placing as covertly as might be the greateſt part of his Army, ordered certain Forces to iſſue out at another Gate, and after ſome ſhort Skirmiſhing, to counterfeit a flight, and draw down the Goths to the Flaminian Gate, whence he Sallied unexpectedly with his whole Power, and did great execution. By theſe diſaſters their Courage was now quite broken; they ſaw they had to doe with a Captain, who as well in downright Valour, as ſagacity and ſtrategems could not be matched; they themſelves inſtead of Conquering the Beſieged by Straits and difficulties, were pinched with Famine, being excluded from all Proviſions, and what by the War, and what by the Plague and other Calamities, were reduced from many thouſands to a far inferiour number. But when they heard of the Forces arrived from Conſtantinople, the number and power of which fame had increaſed beyond their due proportion, they then conſulted about a Retreat, and how with beſt advantages of honour and ſafety they might retire. They ſent three Commiſſioners into the City with inſtructions to inſiſt upon the violence and force which Juſtinian by this Invaſion had put upon them, being the rightfull owners and Poſſeſſours of Italy, ever ſince Zeno the Emperour had paſſed that Countrey over to Theodorich, when he put him upon making War with Odoacer and the Heruli. By the Mouths of theſe men they boaſted, that they had maintained the Commonwealth and Laws, in as great freedom and vigour as ever did any Emperour. That there had not been any one new Law made by Theodorich, or any of his Succeſſours written or unwritten. And as for Religion, that they had not at all infringed the liberty of Conſcience to the Italians, nor violated the privileges and immunities of the Roman Churches. In a word, that all preferments had been conferred upon Romans, not a Goth being advanced to any place of Note, particularly they had given way that the Roman Conſulſhip ſhould yearly be conferred on Romans by the Eaſtern Emperours.

The Goths ſend to treat.

105. Beliſanius denied utterly, that Zeno had conferred the Dominion and Sovereignty of Italy upon Theodorich, though he was content to employ him againſt the Uſurpation of Odoacer. He inveyed againſt the ingratitude of that King, who never thought himſelf of reſtoring that Countrey to the true and undoubted Lord, and told the Meſſengers, they muſt not think he could give away the Emperour's Provinces. They then offered to quit Sicily, which they knew to be very commodious for the bridling of Africk. He anſwered that the Emperours had alſo quitted Brittain, an Iſland much larger than Sicily, and left it to the Goths, out of a principle of bounty and gratitude, to ſuch as well deſerved of them, and therefore he could not account this of theirs to be ſo great an Offer. They then mentioned Campania and Naples, and the payment of an Annual Tribute, but ſtill his anſwer was, that he had no other Power or Commiſſion than to repoſſeſs the Emperour of what was his own; and therefore as the laſt remedy, they deſired they might have liberty to ſend to the Emperour himſelf, and that he would think of ſome reaſonable time of Truce for that purpoſe. To this he replied that he was not averſe, and after ſeveral meetings, at length a Ceſſation, and exchange of Hoſtages was agreed on, the Ceſſation to continue three Months till Ambaſſadours might be diſpatcht for the Emperour's Reſolutions, who ſhould return home in ſafety though the truce were broken, by default of either party. During this Negotiation, the Romans had time and opportunity to receive in the ſupplies of Men, Money, and Proviſions lately mentioned. They continued Maſters at Sea, and for that reaſon the Goths were more and more ſtraitned of Proviſions, and con-

Beliſarius gives them leave to ſend to the Emperour.

Sect. 1.

ſtrained to abandon Portus, and ſeveral places and Poſts which they had taken up about the City, the better to block it up. Theſe places Beliſarius cauſed inſtantly to be ſeized and Garriſoned by his own men, which lying at ſome diſtance and in a Circle, the Beſiegers perceived themſelves now plainly beleagured, and being impatient thereof, ſent to expoſtulate with the General, and to demand a ſpeedy reſtitution, as having onely upon ſome occaſion withdrawn their men, and not expected the places would be ſo ſurprized. The cauſe of their quitting them being ſo notorious, he onely laughed at their pretext, and then they began to be jealous of each other.

106. He neverthelefs proſecuted his Deſign to the utmoſt, and made the beſt advantage of all occurrences. Finding Rome ſufficiently provided of men, he ſent out the ſupernumeraries into the Countrey to be as a flying Army, to catch at opportunities, either of doing ſome thing notable againſt the Beſiegers, in caſe the truce ſhould be broken, or ſeizing ſuch places as they might conveniently attack. Greater hopes ſtill attended his affairs, for about this time came Datius Biſhop of Milan, with ſome of the principal Citizens, promiſing him to reduce not onely that City to the obedience of the Emperour, but all Liguria with it; yet all felicities have their inconveniences attending, there is nothing abſolutely good in this World, the beſt men, if not the beſt gems, have their flaws and imperfections. Though Beliſarius underſtood all the arts of a General, was perfectly practiſed in the myſtery of Fencing, knew his guard, and as well how to keep off all the violent aſſaults, as undermine and obviate all the cunning attempts and ſecret plots of his Enemies, yet he either ſuffered himſelf to be ſurprized by paſſion, or deluded by feminine inſinuations. There was one Præſidius a Roman Citizen of good Quality, who dwelling at Revenna, upon great diſpleaſure conceived againſt the Goths, withdrew himſelf privately from that City, at ſuch time as Vitigis marched toward Rome, communicating his Deſign to none, nor taking money or any thing elſe with him, but two ſhort Swords, the Scabbards of which were ſet with much Gold and pretious Stones. When he was come as far as Spoletum, Conſtantinus then happening to be there, upon notice given him of the Swords, ſent Maxentiolus one of his Guard, and took them from him by plain force. He was much grieved and offended at the wrong, and haſted to Rome to complain to Beliſarius; but the Siege and all the difficulties thereof coming on, he held his peace till this time, when he thought the dangers were well over. Making now his complaint, the General reproved Conſtantinus, and adviſed him to waſh his hands of ſo foul an Imputation, but he put it off with a Jeſt, and onely drolled with the man whom he had wronged. Præſidius hereby inraged, and meeting Beliſarius as he rid through the Forum, took his Horſe by the Bridle, and with ſome clamour demanded, whether it was the Emperour's Law that a poor ſupplicant flying to Rome for refuge from Barbarians, ſhould be robbed of what he had about him. For all the threats of the Guard, he would not let go the Bridle till the General had promiſed him, that the Scimitars ſhould be reſtored.

107. The next day Beliſarius ſent for Conſtantinus and other Officers, and laid his Commands upon him to reſtore the Swords; to which he anſwered, that he would ſooner caſt them into the Tiber. The General growing angry, askt him if he thought not himſelf to be under his Command, to which he replied, that in other things he would obey him, becauſe ſuch was the Emperour's pleaſure, but that which he now Commanded, he would never doe. Beliſarius at this called in his Guards, which being perceived by Conſtantinus, he asked if it was to kill him. The General ſaid no, but to compell Maxentiolus to reſtore the Swords, which he had taken from the man and given unto him. But he concluding it was to kill him, thought to ſell his Life at a dear rate; and drawing a ſhort Sword, made a paſs at Beliſarius, who by ſtepping back, and imbracing Beſſas that ſtood next him, avoided the danger. Yet ſtill in a rage he made at him, but two others of the Commanders laid hold of his hands, and drew him back till the Guard came in and wreſted the Sword from him. Then and there they hurt him not, out of reſpect to the preſence of the Officers, but carrying him into another Room, there killed him by Command of Beliſarius, who in this one thing, ſaith our Hiſtorian, offended againſt the Laws of Piety and his own Inclinations, being otherwiſe eminent for his moderation towards all men. This Procopius wrote and publiſhed in the life-time of Beliſarius, but in his ſecret Hiſtory as they call it, he gives us another account of this tragical Act, and makes the deſign of it more private and deep laid, and impious above meaſure. The Reader muſt therefore know, from another pretended Treatiſe of our Authour, that Antonina the General's Lady, was very vitious of her Body, and by her Domeſticks was diſcovered to be frequently naught with Theodoſius Beliſarius cauſeth Conſtantinus to be killed.

Vide Procopii Ἀνέκδοτα pag. 2. 3. Edit. Alemanni Ludg. 1623.

a young man, whom ſhe and her Husband had Chriſtned juſt as they departed from Conſtantinople, and carried along with them in their expedition into Africk. Their ſecret practices being made known to Beliſarius, he gave order to ſome of his Guard to kill him, but he having notice thereof, fled away to Epheſus, for thoſe about the General choſe rather to let him goe, than incur the indignation of Antonina, knowing their Maſter to be ſo fickle and uxorious, that there was no heed to be taken of his Reſolutions. And ſhe ſo plied him with her Language, and cunning inſinuations, that he was content to believe that ſhe was wronged, to recall Theodoſius and to give up into her hands her Accuſers, whom, as the report went, ſhe firſt puniſhed by cutting out their Tongues, and then ſhe cauſed the wretched Creatures to be cut in pieces, put in ſacks and caſt into the Sea. Now it ſo happened, that amongſt others who pitied the Caſe of the General, Conſtantinus was much concerned for him, and let fall this expreſſion, that had it been his caſe, he would rather have indeavoured the deſtruction of the Woman, than of the young man. The words being carried to Antonina, ſhe conceived implacable malice againſt him, but kept it cloſe, that ſhe might the better find out a convenient opportunity to vent it. At length ſhe took this advantage, and ſo followed it on, that when Conſtantinus had elſe been eaſily pardoned for that wherein he had offended Præſidius and Beliſarius, ſhe procured him to be made away, to the General's great diſhonour, who incurred thereby much diſpleaſure, both with the Emperour and his Nobility. For this Conſtantinus, or Conſtantianus, was Maſter of the Horſe to Juſtinian, was a man eminent for good Conduct, both in affairs of Peace and War, having done extraordinary good Service in Dalmatia, Libania and ſeveral other places. But he was to have a miſchief, as Procopius obſerves, and this, if we could believe the Authour of the Appendix to Marcellinus his Chronicon before that grave Writer, happened to him not at Rome but in Campania. Vide Baron. ad h. Ann.

108. However, we muſt return from this his Tragedy to that City, on which we ſhall now find the Goths to have a Deſign, notwithſtanding the Truce. They let down ſome Souldiers into an Aqueduct to diſcover, if there was any paſſage by it to be made into the Town, and they found their way clear and direct into the midſt of the City, where in ancient times an Aſcent had been made into the Palace; and Beliſarius in the beginning of the Siege, had providently raiſed a Work to damm up the Cave. Finding here a full ſtop, they returned and made a report to Vitigis of their Adventure. In their paſſage up the Vault it happened, that at a certain place not far from the Walls, there being a breach in the Arch, one of the Sentinels ſaw light, which he diſcovered to his Fellows, but they made nothing of it, concluding it to be the eyes of ſome Wolf, which in ſo dark a place ſhewed like Fire. But the ſtory going from one to another, at laſt it came as a matter of news to the General's ear, who moſt wiſe and cautious, thought fit not to ſlight ſuch an hint as that might prove, but cauſed ſome of his men to enter the Aqueduct, who found therein ſcattered Lamps, droppings of Torches, and other things which ſufficiently manifeſted who had been lately there. He placed ſo ſtrong a Guard upon the Aqueduct, that the Goths perceiving it, knew they ſhould but looſe their time in any more attempts of that nature, and therefore reſolved upon a general Aſſault, and at Dinner time came on, on a ſudden, with their Scaling Ladders at Porta Pinciana. But their approach was not ſo ſecret, but that it was timely enough diſcovered by Ildegerd, whoſe turn it was then to Command the Watch, who finding them in diſorder by reaſon of the hurry, more couragiouſly charged them; and the Alarm being given through the Streets, the Romans flocked to the Walls, and ſo the Aſſailants were driven back, and forced diſgracefully to quit their enterprize. Vitigis ſtill had another Deſign: The Walls to the River were ſlightly Built, the ancient Inhabitants having there truſted to the natural Fortification of the Tiber, upon which account alſo that part of the City had at preſent no conſiderable Guard. He corrupted two Romans dwelling about St. Peter's Church, to carry a Veſſel of Wine to the Sentinels about the Evening, and there ſitting drinking with them till about Midnight, to put into their Cups a certain ſleepy Drug, which when it had had its perfect Operation, they were to give the ſignal to the Goths on the oppoſite Shore, who paſſing over to ſcale the Walls, that they might better doe their Work, he put his whole Army in a readineſs to Storm the City. But one of thoſe men diſcovered the Plot, and his fellow who had the Drug about him, being firſt tortured and forced to produce it, had his Noſe and Ears cut off, and then ſet upon an Aſs, was in that manner ſent into the Camp of the Goths, who acknowledged the hand of God in detecting and preventing all their Councils, which tended to the taking of the City.

The Goths having attempted in vain, to enter Rome by an Aqueduct, are repulſed in a deſigned Attacque.

Diſappointed in their Plot upon the Sentinels.

109. In the mean time, the deſign which Beliſarius had in ſending out his ſupernumerary Forces upon other places of Italy, took well enough. John, who Commanded them, waſted all Picenia, overthrew and killed Ulitheus the Uncle of Vitigis, and ſeized on Ariminum, which being but a days Journey from Ravenna, the Goths (as he had rightly imagined) were much ſtartled at the report, and extremely fearing Ravenna, as alſo being in great want of proviſions, after they had ſpent one year and nine days in the Siege of Rome, about the Summer Tropick burnt up their Huts, and by day-break departed. Beliſarius, when the one half of them were got over the Bridge, iſſued out and fell upon the Rere, which though it made head ſtoutly againſt him, yet many were Slain, and many Drowned, by preſſing and crouding and falling into the River, with their Arms upon them. Vitigis put ſtrong Garriſons into all places in his Paſſage, and marcht towards Ariminum, which he reſolved by all means to recover. Beliſarius gueſſing at his deſign by his Intereſt, diſpatched away Ildeger, and Martinus with a thouſand Horſe to get before him, by taking ſome nearer way, and to cauſe John with his Troops to riſe from thence, and to place in their room ſome Foot, which he ordered to be taken out of Ancona, a Town ſtanding upon the Ionian Gulf, two days Journey from Ariminum. For he conſidered that this Town, being onely Garriſoned by Foot, and no Commanders of Note in it, the Goths might poſſibly deſpiſe it, as a work of no Maſtery or advantage, and if they ſhould Beſiege it, that Proviſions would laſt longer for Foot onely, and that John's flying Body of two thouſand Horſe, would doe good Service againſt them, and poſſibly force them to raiſe their Siege. Ildeger and Martinus did as they were injoyned, eaſily preventing the Goths, who by reaſon of their Multitudes and want of Proviſions, marcht ſlowly and out of their way; beſides, they durſt not come near the Via Flaminia, becauſe that Narnia, Spoletum and Peruſia were at that time held by the Romans.

Οὐλίθεος, Welithe, benè familiatus.

They raiſe their Siege.

110. In their way, Martinus and Ildeger took Petra, a Caſtle ſtanding upon a Rock, almoſt inacceſſible by reaſon of its ſteepneſs on one ſide, and a ſwift unfordable River running by the other. They took the Souldiers out of Ancona, and brought them to Ariminum, but John would not forſake the place, and detained four hundred men Commanded by Damianus. The City was inſtantly Beſieged by Vitigis, who thought to doe his work by a wooden Tower, made higher than the Walls, which he would not have drawn by Oxen, as that of Rome had been, but born by men within it, who carried alſo a broad ſcaling Ladder wherewith the Souldiers ſhould mount the Battlements. They carried it ſo near the Walls, that there was onely a ſmall and inconſiderable trench betwixt them; but reſting themſelves by Night, and not fearing any oppoſition, John with a Company of Pioneers iſſued out, and inlarging the Trench, caſt up the Earth toward the Town, and made therewith ſuch a rampart that rendred the Engine uſeleſs the following day; for though Vitigis cauſed the Ditch to be filled with Faggots, yet the weight of the Turret ſo preſſed them down, that they could not move it over them, and attempting to draw it back, John ſallied out upon them, and an hot Fight began, ſo that the Goths hardly at laſt, and with great loſs brought back the Turret to their Camp, reſolving to make no more Aſſaults, but lie ſtill and ſtarve out the Enemy, whom they knew to be in great want of Proviſions, and utterly at a loſs how to come by any. In the mean time, Beliſarius had his mind intent upon another quarter of Italy, ſending a thouſand men under Command of Mundilas towards Milan, if poſſible to get that City into the Emperour's hands, at leaſt to transfer the Seat of the War into the Enemies Countrey. They took Milan without oppoſition and all Liguria, or the Countrey round about it, which when Vitigis underſtood, he diſpatched thither, with an Army, Uræas his Siſters Son, and ſolicited Theodebert King of the Franks for aſſiſtence, who would not ſend him any of his own Subjects, for fear of diſguſting the Emperour, but procured him ten thouſand Burgundians, who pretended to come of their own accord. With them the Goths unexpectedly beſieged Milan, and ſo ſtraitned the Romans within, that in a little time they wanted Neceſſaries. Mundilas had alſo, by Garriſoning ſeveral other Towns thereabout, ſo leſſened the numbers of the Souldiers, that the Townſmen were forced to Watch in their turns. So the Winter ended together with the third year of the War.

Vitigis beſieges Ariminum.

Οὐραΐας, Warjaag, Belli quæſitor.

Uræas the Nephew of Vitigis beſieges Milan.

111. About Midſummer following, Beliſarius reſolved to leave a ſmall Garriſon in Rome, and march againſt Vitigis. In his way he took in Tudera and Cluſium, and received Intelligence that Narſes an Eunuch, the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, a man Valiant above the condition of Eunuchs, was from Conſtantinople arrived in Picenia. He brought with him five thouſand men, commanded in ſeveral Regiments, Narſes the Eunuch comes from Conſtantinople with another Supply.

The Heruli who.

Quarrel with the Lombards.

ments, by Juſtinus General of Illyrium, and another Narſes an Armenian, formerly mentioned, beſides two thouſand Heruli led by Viſigandus, Aloethes and Phanetheus. The ancient Seat of theſe Heruli was beyond the River Danubius. They worſhipped many Gods, whom they thought they pleaſed by humane Sacrifices; moſt of their other Cuſtoms being alſo different from the practices of the reſt of the World. The Aged and Sick amongſt them, were not ſuffered to ſtay the time which nature or the Diſeaſe had determined, but were upon their own deſires, put upon a pile of Wood and thereon killed, by any Herulian except one of their own Kindred, for their Relations were not permitted to have any hand in their Death. This done, Fire was ſet to the Pile, and when the Body was Burnt, the remaining Bones were gathered together and Buried. If the man was Married, his Wife was to ſtrangle her ſelf at his Monument, or elſe be ſubject to perpetual infamy and reproach. This People in time ſubdued all Nations about them, and forced them to ſubmit to the Yoke, amongſt which were the Lombards, who had e'er this, imbraced the Chriſtian Religion. Contrary to the former practice of Barbarians, they made theſe Lombards pay Tribute, either out of Oſtentation, or a greedy deſire of Wealth. When Anaſtaſius the Emperour Reigned, they continued quiet for three years, having none upon whom they could juſtly exerciſe their Valour, but then out of impatience of reſt and idleneſs, they reviled Rodulphus their Prince, as lazy and effeminate, who inraged by their reproaches, reſolved to make War right or wrong, and the ſtorm muſt fall upon the Lombards. There being not the leaſt pretext of any miſcarriage alledged for this Invaſion, they ſent to expoſtulate with him, offering to pay the laſt peny of their Tribute if any were behind, and rather than not to have Peace, to purchaſe it with an inlargement of their former Contributions. He diſmiſſing the Ambaſſadours with ill looks and worſe Language, they ſent to him the ſecond and third time, and when they could nothing prevail, they proteſted that if he would without any cauſe make a War, they muſt and would with their utmoſt force oppoſe the Invaſion. And herein they appealed to Almighty God, as an indifferent Umpire, the leaſt of whoſe Aſſiſtence they ſaid was able to overbalance the greateſt power of Earthly Potentates.

Being beaten, they changed their Seats.

Anaſtaſius admits them.

112. The Heruli deaf to all ſuch Religious Language, and placing their truſt in the greatneſs of their numbers, proſecuted their Deſign, and reſolved ſpeedily to come to a Battel. Their expectation failed them; for many of them were Slain upon the place, together with Rodulphus their King, and the reſt betaking them to their Heels, were almoſt all cut in pieces; for that the reſidue not able to protect themſelves, who had lately ſought the Deſtruction of others, were forced to quit their ancient Seats, and wandred up and down the Countries, lying upon the Danube, till they came at length to the place which the Rugi inhabited, before ſuch time as they paſſed with the Goths into Italy. The ground was very waſte and barren, ſo that they were forced hence by Famine, and journeying on ſate down near the Gepidæ, who at firſt received them as humble Suppliants, but afterwards offered them many Indignities, raviſhing their Wives, and driving away their Cattel, with which at laſt being tired, they paſſed the River, reſolving to try the Courteſie of the Romans. Anaſtaſius knowing the ground not to be ſufficiently planted, was content to admit them, and there for ſome time they lived, till by committing ſeveral Inſolences againſt the Romans, they incurred his Indignation, and drew a War upon their own heads, wherein moſt of them periſhed, as the reſt had certainly done, but that they betook themſelves to prayers and intreaties begging their Lives, and offering them to the Service of the Empire, to which yet they proved not uſefull in the leaſt degree. Juſtinian coming to the Government, for all this, was kind to them, giving them a good Countrey to Inhabit with other things, and making them his Friends and Aſſociates, perſwaded them to become Chriſtians. Upon this they grew civiler, governing themſelves according to the Laws of Chriſtianity, for the moſt part, and ſerving the Romans in their Wars according as the nature of their League and Alliance required. Yet they retained their former perfidious, and covetous principles, which they accounted no diſgrace at all. Of beaſtly luſt they knew no bounds nor meaſures, not confining themſelves to the uſe of mankind, of whether ſex ſoever, but extending their extravagant appetite to other ſorts of Animals. The truth is, ſaith Procopius, in wickedneſs they exceed all other Nations, and moſt commonly pay dear for the pravity of their diſpoſition.

113. Some few of them continued in their fidelity to the Romans, the reſt revolted upon this occaſion. They put to Death Ochon their King, for no other reaſon at all, but becauſe they were reſolved no more to live as Subjects. Indeed he had been Maſter before, but of a mere Title, enjoying nothing of Royalty but the Name, for all ſorts would ſit and Eat with him, and as oft as they pleaſed, put affronts and indignities upon him; this being the moſt ſilly and light of all Nations, upon the face of the Earth. But they had no ſooner committed, but they repented of that horrid Act, finding Anarchy more burthenſome than Monarchy, and an abſolute neceſſity of having ſome one to Command and rule them. After much time ſpent in debates, they reſolved to ſend for one of the bloud Royal, from the Iſland of Thule, by which name Procopius calls and deſcribes the vaſt continent of Scandia, being as it appears in Maps, of the form and faſhion of a Peninſula. For when they fled their Countrey, after the Defeat received from the Lombards, ſome of them, as was ſaid, ſeated themſelves in Illyrium, others would not paſs the Danube, but choſe rather to plant in the utmoſt borders of the habitable World, and under conduct of many of the bloud Royal, making their way through the Countries of the Slavi, Varni, Danes, and others, at length arrived at the Ocean, over which they paſſed into the Iſland of Thule, as the Hiſtorian will have it, who ſpends time in a deſcription of the place, which can agree with no other Countrey than that of Scandia. But the Meſſengers fetching one of the Bloud from this place, he died by the way, which forced them to return back, and bring another whoſe name was Todoſius. But he being long upon his Journey, ſuch Heruli as lived about Singedon, conceiving that the Emperour might be offended, if they made choice of a King without his advice and approbation, ſent and deſired him to name the man, who preferred to the place one Suartas of that Nation, that had lived long at Conſtantinople. Him they received and obeyed for ſome time, till they had news of the approach of Todoſius, againſt whom as his Rival, he led them out, but when they were come within a days Journey, they revolted from him to the new Comer, and he was glad to fly for his Life to Conſtantinople. The Emperour conſulted how he might provide for his own Honour in his reſtitution. The Heruli not ignorant hereof, betook themſelves to the Gepidæ, and this was the occaſion of their Revolt.

Vide Camdenum in Brit.

The Armies of Beliſarius and Narſes joyn.

114. But to our purpoſe, the Armies of Beliſarius and Narſes joyned together at Firmum, a City ſtanding on the Adriatick Coaſt, where they conſulted by what ways and methods they ſhould manage the War. If they ſhould go to the Relief of Ariminum, it was feared that the Enemy from Auximum would fall upon their Backs, and haraſs the Countrey inhabited by Romans. On the other ſide, it was thought hard to ſuffer the Beſieged to periſh for want of Neceſſaries. The Officers generally expreſſed much indignation againſt John, for having through raſhneſs, and a thirſt after Wealth, caſt himſelf into ſo great a danger, and diſobeyed the orders received from Beliſarius. But Narſes who loved the man above all things, for fear he ſhould miſcarry, preſſed the General earneſtly to march to Ariminum, whence in the nick of time as it fell out, Letters came from John, intimating that without Succour, he muſt neceſſarily yield the place within ſeven days. Beliſarius found himſelf ſurrounded with difficulties, being either to looſe Ariminum, or in all probability to ſuffer the Towns about Auximum to be Burnt and deſtroyed, and his own Army flancked and diſtreſſed in caſe of a Battel. To provide therefore againſt both inconveniences, he left Aratius with a thouſand men by the Sea ſide, to be a check upon the Enemy in Auximum, with expreſs Command, not to fight but in their own defence. He ſent ſome Forces by Sea, under the Conduct of Ildeger, with orders to Sail directly for Ariminum, and to Land near the Foot, which he would have march by the Sea ſhore, under the Command of Martinus. And giving them directions to make many Fires when they came near the Enemy, to amuſe him with a falſe apprehenſion of their numbers; he with Narſes and the reſt of the Army, marcht at a diſtance from the Sea by the Mountains, reſolving not to come to a pitcht Battel, both becauſe his numbers were ſhort, and the Goths were grown deſperate upon their misfortunes. But the diviſion of his Forces, and the Strategems he uſed, had their wiſhed effect. For, ſome ſtraglers of the Goths lighting by chance upon a party of his men, and ſeeing others appear upon the Mountains, reported that he was at hand, with an innumerable Army. They prepared for a Battel, expecting him toward the North of Ariminum, and ſtill having their eyes on the tops of the Mountains. But by Night, when they were about to take their reſt, appeared the Fires, ſome ſeven miles off to the Eaſtward, kindled by Martinus, which caſt them into a terrible fear, apprehending that the next Morning they ſhould be ſurrounded; then by Sun riſe, they ſaw a great Fleet coming, which ſtruck them with conſternation, made them altogether deſperate, and deprived them of all power of Conſultation, ſo that they neglected all Commands, being onely intent upon truſſing up their Baggage, and thoughtfull how they might quit the Siege, and get into Ravenna with whole skins. Much of their Baggage they left behind, flying in ſuch diſorder and tumult, that had not the Beſieged been heartleſs with their miſeries, and feeble for want of Bread, they might eaſily have cut them in pieces, and made an end of the War.

115. After this ſucceſs, jealouſies began to ariſe betwixt Beliſarius and Narſes, whoſe Followers flattered him by extolling his Power and Parts, and fomented the difference by perſuading him that it was far below him to fight under the Standard of any General. Beliſarius aware of it, ſought to divert his humour by Action; and in an Aſſembly of Officers, diſcourſed much about the ſecurity and inſolence which ever attend good fortune. He propounded to their conſideration how ſtrong an Enemy they had ſtill to deal with. That Vitigis was in Ravenna with many thouſands; that Vrœas ſtill beſieged Milan, and held all Liguria at his devotion; in Auximum was yet remaining a great and gallant Army; and ſeveral other Places the Goths held, as far as Vrbiventum, a City not far diſtant from Rome, each of which was able enough to contend with the Emperour's whole Power. He aſſured them their late ſucceſſes had neither happened for want of men, nor courage on the ſide of the Goths, but that they had been overreached and tired out with variety of Strategems. His opinion therefore was, that part of the Army ſhould be ſent into Liguria and Milan, and the reſt march to Auximum, and wait ſuch opportunities as Providence ſhould preſent. Narſes excepted againſt this, that the reſt of the Army ſhould be confined to Auximum, alledging that the Goths from Ravenna would fall upon them, and that being charged on both ſides, and wanting Proviſions, they muſt neceſſarily periſh. He told him he was not againſt his going to Auximum with a Party, in the mean time the reſt would fall upon Æmilia (or Lombard Ciſpadana, reaching from the City of Aſt to Parma) not doubting to give a good account of it, and ſo to alarm thoſe in Ravenna, that Beliſarius ſhould bring Auximum to what Terms he pleaſed, all relief being thereby cut off. Beliſarius dreading nothing more than the diviſion of the Army, for he judged the Emperour's Affairs would thereby abſolutely miſcarry, produced the Letters of Juſtinian, by which it appeared, that he had not ſent Narſes into Italy to command his Forces, it being his pleaſure that Beliſarius ſhould have the ſole Command thereof, and the reſt of the Officers obſerve his orders in all things concerning his ſervice, and the good of the State.

Beliſarius and Narſes differ.

116. Narſes took hold of the laſt words of the Letter, affirming that the General did now adviſe contrary to the good of the State, and therefore they were not obliged to follow his directions. Hereupon Beliſarius ſent Peranius with a Party to beſiege Vrbiventum, and he himſelf led the reſt of the Army againſt Vrbinum, a City diſtant from Ariminum a days journey, and ſituate upon a round high Hill, not craggy, but unſafe to mount, by reaſon of its ſteepneſs, and nearneſs to the City, onely to the North lies an entrance in the plain ground. Narſes and John followed him, but encamped ſeverally at the foot of the Hill, and e'er long perſuading themſelves that the Town was not to be won, becauſe John had formerly in vain attempted it, they roſe by night, and notwithſtanding all the motives the General could uſe, went away with part of the Army to Ariminum. For all this Beliſarius reſolved to proceed, though the Beſieged, ſeeing half of the Forces riſen and departed, were much elevated, and he prepared for an Aſſault; when his buſineſs was done otherwiſe to his hand, by reaſon that the onely Fountain they had in the City dried up of it ſelf, and in the ſpace of three days ſo failed, that the Goths were conſtrained to drink water and mud together. Upon the approach of the Aſſailants, the Beſieged yielded to Terms of Indemnity, which were readily granted, although the Romans knew nothing of the Fountain, and thought the terrour of their Arms had alone procured the Surrender. Narſes lying ſtill in Ariminum, was amazed at the ſucceſs, and ſenſible of ſome reflexion upon himſelf, and his Companions, ſent John with the Army againſt Ceſina, which he finding impregnable, went, and took in by ſurprize an ancient City called Forum Cornelii, and afterwards recovered all Æmilia, the Goths avoiding all Ingagements. Beliſarius having taken in Vrbinum, conſidered that the Winter Tropick approached, and therefore thought it not expedient to go againſt Auximum, the ſiege of which he knew muſt be long; for the Town of it ſelf, by reaſon of its Situation, was not to be forced, the Goths within it were many, and of the beſt, and having had time enough to provide for the worſt, they had foraged the Countrey, and brought in great quantity of Proviſions.

Narſes parts from the other.

Beliſarius beſieges Urbiventum.

117. He ordered therefore Aratius to winter in Firmum, to hinder the Incurſions of the Goths; and underſtanding that the Garriſon in Urbiventum was ſlenderly provided, he marched thither, hoping that upon ſight of his Army they might yield the Place. Nature it ſelf had made the Town impregnable, being built upon an Hill ſtanding alone in a Valley, plain at the top, but toward the bottom craggy, and ſo incompaſſed with Rocks, that there was no need of Walls, or other Fortifications; for there was but one way to the City betwixt theſe Rocks, which being guarded, the Inhabitants feared no Attacque at any other part, conſidering that where the way lay into the Town, a large and unfordable River took up all the ſpace betwixt the Hill and the Rocks. So that there was onely a ſmall Block-houſe at the ſaid Paſſage, and a Gate, which the Goths diligently watched. But Beliſarius begirt the Town, hoping, by advantages he ſhould make of the River and otherwiſe to ſtarve them out. They were indeed very barely furniſhed, yet they indured beyond expectation when their Proviſions failed, which they had ſo huſbanded, as onely to keep life and ſoul together, feeding upon Hides and Skins ſoaked in water, and upon vain hopes ſuggeſted to them by Albilas their Governour, a man of great reputation amongſt the Goths. But the Famine not onely raged within the Walls of this Town; for, the Summer following, the Corn in theſe Parts grew not in ſuch quantity as formerly, being neither covered with the Plow nor Harrow, but lying upon the ſurface of the Land, which yielding but a ſmall crop, this alſo was loſt for want of reaping; for it ſhed, and never grew again. In Tuſcany the Mountaneers fed upon Acorns, which bred all ſorts of Diſeaſes amongſt them. In Picenia died for want of bread fifty thouſand Roman Husbandmen, and more in other Parts. Procopius, who was an Eye-witneſs, thus deſcribes their Countenances, and the manner of their deaths. They grew firſt lank and pale, choler prevailing (by reaſon of the natural heat its preying upon, and torrifying the humours, without any freſh ſupply) ſpread a yellowiſh and wan complexion about their Bodies. As the Diſeaſe increaſed, and moiſture decayed, the Skin became like to a tanned Hide, as it ſeemed, cleaving to the Bones. Afterwards they grew as black as Links much burnt; their Countenances were ghaſtly and ſtaring, like Mad-men. Famine made not an end of all, many periſhed by ſatiety and much eating; for the natural heat being conſumed, together with that which nouriſhed and maintained it, if they fed to ſatisfaction, and not by little and little, as new born Children, they overpowered it, and not able to digeſt, preſently died. Sometimes Famine ſo overcame Nature, that they fed upon one another. Two Women about Ariminum were reported to have eaten ſeventeen men, killing them as they ſlept, and were by the eighteenth diſcovered, and by him ſerved in the ſame kind. Many ſtooping to eat Graſs, and not able to pull it up, fell upon their Hands, and died with ſome of it in their Mouth. There was not the leaſt thought of Burials. Such ravenous Fowls as fed on dead Bodies would not touch theſe Carkaſſes, there being no Fleſh to allure their Appetites. So grievous was the Famine.

A grievous Famine in Italy.

118. At this time Milan was beſieged by the Goths, under the Command of Uræas, which Beliſarius underſtanding, ſent Martinus and Uliaris to the relief of that City. They coming as far as the River Poe, a days journey from Milan, there encamped themſelves, and though ſolicited by their diſtreſſed Friends, ſtill loitered and deferred their paſſage, and at length excuſed themſelves to the General by Letter, pretending that the Goths in Liguria were too ſtrong for them, being aſſiſted by a Multitude of Burgundians; and upon this account the Army feared to paſs the River, with which they could doe no other than comply. Upon the receit of this Letter Beliſarius commanded John and Juſtinus to join with Martinus, which they refuſed flatly to doe, except they received orders from Narſes, to whom then he wrote, deſiring that the Emperour's buſineſs might not be indangered by their mutual Emulations; and Narſes was ſo moved, as to write to them to doe what the General had enjoined. But during theſe delays and tergiverſations, the Beſieged were infinitely diſtreſſed by Famine, forced to feed on Dogs, Rats, Mice, and ſuch like Creatures. The Goths offered Mundilas and his Souldiers Terms of Indemnity, but reſolved to deſtroy the Ligurians, which reſolution ſo moved the Governour, that calling his men together, he earneſtly endeavoured to diſſuade them from yielding; inciting them by arguments drawn from honour and valour, to make a luſty ſally upon the Beſiegers. But they were deaf on this Ear, and yielding the City upon the Conditions offered, were made Priſoners together with Mundilas. The Goths demoliſht the City, put all men of ripe age to the ſword, to the number of three hundred thouſand, the Women they made Slaves, and gave to the Burgundians as a reward. Reparatus, a Prefect, they cut in pieces, and caſt him to the Dogs.

Milan yielded to the Goths.

Dogs. Bergantinus onely with a few more eſcaped; and paſſing into Dalmatia through Venetia and other places, at length brought news of the diſaſter to the Court. The Goths making uſe of their good fortune, took in other Towns by compoſition, and reduced ſpeedily all Liguria. Martinus and Uliaris with ſhame and diſgrace enough, returned toward Rome with their Forces.

119. Beliſarius knew nothing of what had paſſed till the Winter was over, and that he marcht with his Army into Picenia. Uliaris then he baniſhed his preſence; and the whole matter he wrote to the Emperour, who yet would puniſh no man: Narſes recalled. but underſtanding how great differences had been betwixt Beliſarius and Narſes, he recalled Narſes, and gave to Beliſarius as abſolute command as ever. Vitigis was ſenſible, as well of the effects of this prudent reſolution, as the diſpoſition of Beliſarius, who, he concluded, would the next Spring come againſt him in perſon to Ravenna. Now did he conſult, as in a deſperate condition, what might be the moſt proper way and method for redreſs of ſo impendent an evil. Of the faithfulneſs of the Germans (or Franks) they had had too freſh experience, wiſhing onely they might continue Neuters. Varis, King of the Lombards, as allied to the Emperour, declined all Overtures. And therefore, as he was adviſed by his ancienteſt and wiſeſt men, he ſent Ambaſſadours to Choſroes the Perſian King, to perſuade him to invade the Roman Territories, concluding, that if Juſtinian had ſuch an Enemy at his back, he would give him ſufficient diverſion, and he muſt needs recall his beſt Captain, and make peace with himſelf and his Goths in the Weſt, the better to attacque his Eaſtern Aſſailants. Thus indeed it came to paſs; but in the mean time Beliſarius following his preſent Inſtructions, and the courſe of his Fortunes, reſolved if poſſible to take in Auximum and Fæſulæ; and then having cleared his paſſage, to ſet upon Vitigis in Ravenna. Having appointed ſufficient Forces to beſiege Fæſulæ, he himſelf with eleven thouſand men ſate down before Auximum, the Metropolis of Picenia, ſtanding at ten miles and an half diſtance from the Adriatick Sea, and from Ravenna ten miles above three days journey, ſituate upon an high Hill, without entrance on any plain ground, and conſequently not approachable by any Enemy. Belli annus 5. incipit.

Beliſarius beſieges Auximum. 120. Beliſarius beſieged the Town, diſtributing his men into ſeveral Quarters; and notwithſtanding their Ambuſhes, and ſome venturous things they attempted, yet the Beſieged were driven into ſuch ſtraits, that they ſent to Vitigis, whom they threatned with a ſpeedy ſurrender of this Place (which he accounted the Key and Fortreſs of the Countrey) in caſe they had not ſudden recruits. He promiſed them relief with no leſs than his whole Forces, but upon better conſideration, when he had elevated them with vain hopes, he lay ſtill in his Quarters, doubting indeed, leſt John with his Troops ſhould fall upon his back, but more diſcouraged by the failing of Neceſſaries; for he knew not any way to ſupply the Army, the Romans being Maſters at Sea, and fetching their Proviſions from Sicily and Calabria, which they landed at the Caſtle of Ancona, whilſt the Goths groaned under the want of Neceſſaries. Hereupon they again earneſtly ſolicite Vitigis for relief, who orders Uræas with the Goths in Liguria, to go to their aſſiſtence, promiſing that he himſelf would follow with his whole power to raiſe the Siege. Uræas paſt the Poe, and ſate down at the diſtance of ſeven miles from the Roman Camp, thinking it ſufficient to doe thus much without hazarding a Battel, which if they ſhould loſe, they ſhould, he knew, endanger all: and the Romans were no whit eager of the fight, judging it enough to keep their new-come Enemies from joining with the Beſieged. In the mean time, whilſt theſe two Nations haraſſed and weakened each other; a third was aware of the effects of their quarrel, and ſeeing them ſo far ſpent by their mutual hoſtilities, that they had rendred themſelves in all probability incapable of reſiſtence, reſolved to attacque both, and decide the controverſie by removing the occaſion of their diſpute. Theſe were the Franks, who repining after ſo many glorious Precedents of their Forefathers, ſo ſit idle at home, conceived now they had a fit opportunity of making themſelves Maſters of (at leaſt) a conſiderable part of Italy.

The Franks invade Italy. 121. Forgetting their late oaths and obligations, both to Romans and Goths, as being, in the judgment of Procopius, the moſt faithleſs of all men, they invaded Italy with an Army of an hundred thouſand men under conduct of Theodebert. Of theſe, ſome were Horſemen, and attended their Kings: the reſt Footmen, uſing neither Bows nor Lances, but a Sword, a Shield and a Battel-axe, the Iron whereof was broad and two-edged, and the handle as ſhort as the hilt of a Sword; this at the firſt charge upon the ſignal given, they caſt from them, and therewith breaking the Shields of their Enemies, did great execution. When the Goths perceived them to have paſſed the Alpes into Liguria, they much rejoiced, concluding that theſe ſame men, they had ſo often courted and tempted by money and other offers in vain, had now unbethought themſelves, and were come to their aſſiſtence. And ſo long as they continued in that Countrey, they committed no hoſtile Action, nor gave any cauſe of jealouſie, that they might quietly and ſecurely paſs the Poe, which they did at Pavia, ſo free from oppoſition, that the Goths gave them much aſſiſtence in their march. But having made themſelves Maſters of the Bridge and Paſſage, they inſtantly ſeized on their Wives and Children, which they caſt into the River, as the firſt fruits or ſpoils of the War; for though they had taken upon them the name of Chriſtianity, yet theſe Barbarians, as the Hiſtorian telleth us, in his days ſtill continued many heatheniſh and ſuperſtitious practices, as amongſt the reſt humane Sacrifices, wherewith, and by other ſacrilegious, rather than ſacred, means and methods, as he obſerveth, they were wont to make a gueſs of what was to come. The Goths in great fear fled into the Town, and the Franks or Germans, as Procopius calls them, paſſed by directly to their Camp, where at firſt they were, upon the ſame ſurmize, kindly received; till laying about them with their Axes, and beginning to doe miſchief, they were preſently diſcovered by the Goths, who then took them to their heels, and fled by the Roman Camp into Ravenna. The Romans ſeeing them fly, could think no other, but that Beliſarius had routed them, and now gave the chaſe; therefore they took Arms, and reſolved to fall in with him. But for their offered aſſiſtence they found themſelves as badly treated as thoſe that fled, and being eaſily beaten, becauſe ſurpriſed, when they could not return to their Camp, they fled into Tuſcany, and ſent news of the Accident to their General.

Take the Camps of Goths and Romans.

122. The Franks thus became Maſters of both the Camps, where they found Proviſions ſufficient for their preſent ſupply. But they were come into an exhauſted Countrey, which afforded nothing but the fleſh of Oxen, and water from the Poe; not any bread, nor any thing, except that liquid Element to digeſt the fleſh, which caſt them into fluxes and dyſenteries, ſo that having no Medicines, nor other conveniences at hand, a third part of them are ſaid to have periſhed, and the reſt ſtaid in theſe Parts, not able to march any farther. In the mean time, Beliſarius hearing of this Invaſion, and how the Troops of John and Martinus were routed, began to ſuſpect the ſtate of his Affairs; and deſirous to divert the ſtorm from his own Army, which he knew could not but be very great, in caſe the Franks and Goths ſhould join together, he wrote to Theodebert, given him good words, and expoſtulating with him for the breach of theſe Articles, which he had moſt religiouſly ſigned, putting him withall in mind, that the Emperour's condition was not ſo weak, as to render him incapable of calling him hereafter to account. Theodebert ſomewhat moved with this Letter, more troubled at the opprobrious language of his men, who reviled him for ſuffering them to die like dogs in a deſolate Countrey, and moſt of all touched with a ſenſe of his preſent Eſtate, roſe up with all his Franks that ſurvived, and haſted home.

Beliſarius writes to their King.

He returns home.

123. Martinus and John returned with their Troops to prevent the Enemy his raiſing the Siege of Auximum, wherein the Goths heard nothing of the Franks retreat, but quite ſpent, and out of heart, by reaſon of the delay of aſſiſtence promiſed from Ravenna, thought once more, and for all, to importune Vitigis; and not being able to ſend any Meſſenger out of the Town, by reaſon of the ſtrict watch that was ſet upon them, they corrupted with money a Souldier in the Roman Army, who ſtood Sentinel to keep off the Inhabitants from cutting Graſs, the beſt ſupply of Victual they now had. To their Letter ſent by this Fellow, Vitigis returned a plauſible and kind anſwer, which ſo animated them, that they refuſed all offers made by Beliſarius. But finding they got nothing but good words, they ſent the ſecond time, declaring they ſhould not be able to ſtruggle with the Famine any longer than five days more, to which their King replied as formerly, holding them in ſuſpence with the like hopes. The Romans all this while were weary of the ſiege in a barren Countrey, and diſheartned at the obſtinacious humour of the Beſieged. Beliſarius ſecretly admiring what the thing ſhould be which thus held up their ſpirits, procured a Sclavonian, who, as the reſt of his Countreymen upon the River Iſter, was well practiſed in ſtealing Enemies, to catch one of the Goths that came out of the Town to gather Graſs, by whom the whole matter about the Sentinel was diſcovered; for when brought face to face, the Fellow (by name Barcenſiris, and a Beſſian by Nation) confeſſed all; and being by the General delivered up to his Companions to be puniſhed as they ſaw convenient, was burnt alive. Beliſarius ſeeing them ſtill hold out, thought he might poſſibly complete his deſign by demoliſhing a Conduit, which from the North-ſide of the Town, and near to the Walls, ſupplied them with water. A great conteſt happened about this Conduit, the Beſieged iſſuing out, and with all their force indeavouring to protect it, having the advantage of the upper ground, which they improved to the ſlaughter of their Enemies. But the Romans bore upon them ſtill, Beliſarius their General calling upon them, who whilſt he thus performed the office of a valiant Commander, had loſt his life, but that Vingatus, one of his Guard, perceiving the Arrow coming toward his Belly, put his Right hand between, and to his own great damage and miſery ſaved him harmleſs. For being wounded, and in great extremity of pain, he retired; and afterwards his Sinews were cut aſunder, and he loſt the uſe of his Hand. Yet did the Beſiegers ſo ſtoutly ply it, that they drove up the Garriſon within the Walls: but when they expected the fruit of this labour, and thought the Conduit to be broken down, they were deceived, the men that were ſet about it, not being able to force one ſtone out of it, ſo ſtrong and artificially was it built. Hereupon Beliſarius cauſed dead Carkaſſes, Lime and poiſonous Herbs to be caſt into the water; and reſolving to uſe no more force, attended to his Guards and Sentinels. For he doubted not in a ſhort time they would be ſtarved out, being in extraordinary great wants, and merely kept alive by expectation of relief from Ravenna.

Fæſulæ yielded.

124. The Garriſon in Fæſulæ at this time ſtruggling with the ſame miſeries, and deſpairing of ſuccour from that Place, yielded to quarter. Cyprian leaving a Party in the Town, brought the Inhabitants, with his Army, before Auximum, where Beliſarius ſhewed them to the Beſieged, thereby ſignifying what they were to truſt to, and how groundleſs were their hopes and expectations from their King. Conſidering of the matter, and how unable they were to hold out againſt the Famine, they offered to yield the Town on condition they might enjoy their lives and goods. The General was not averſe to it; but the Souldier oppoſed it, ſhewing his wounds, and recounting the labours and dangers he had undergone in the ſiege, of which, he affirmed the plunder of the Town to be the due and proper reward. At length the Romans, forced by the preſſing opportunity, and the Goths by the Famine, came to this accord, that the Souldiers ſhould have half the goods, and the Beſieged with the other half become Subjects to the Emperour, which was accordingly done, and the Town was immediately ſurrendred. Beliſarius having thus taken Auximum, haſted toward Ravenna with his whole Army. Both ſides of the River Poe he cauſed to be guarded, to hinder all importation of Proviſions, and ſo it happened, that the Goths, having procured much Corn to be brought down the River in Barks, the water ſuddenly failed, and thereby it became prize to the Romans, who having ſeized it, the River as ſuddenly recovered its former ſtream, and became navigable; an accident unheard of in ancient times; ſo that Providence it ſelf ſeemed to decide the Controverſie. The Kings of the Franks underſtanding how matters paſſed, could not endure to think of the Romans regaining their poſſeſſion of Italy, but deſiring to puſh for it themſelves, ſent Ambaſſadours to Vitigis, offering him ſpeedy Aid, on condition they might ſhare the Countrey with him. Beliſarius being aware of it, ſent alſo his Meſſengers, who ſo diſputed the buſineſs, and anſwered all the arguments of the Franks, that Vitigis, after long conference with his Nobility, diſmiſt the Ambaſſadours with a denial, and inclined to an Accommodation with the Emperour. For by that which had lately happened at the Poe, he ſaw what aſſiſtence and fidelity was to be expected from the Alliance of the Franks.

Auximum ſurrendred.

Vitigis rejects the offers of the Franks.

The Goths inhabiting the Alpes Cottiæ yield.

125. Now began the Romans and Goths to ſend Meſſengers to each other. But Beliſarius to make as ſure work of it as he could, and to bring them to his Conditions, by his Guards ſtill hindred the importation of Proviſions. Vitalianus, he ordered into Venetia, there to take in what Towns he could; and hearing that in the Magazine of Ravenna there was much Corn, he procured a Citizen for a ſum of money to ſet it on fire, and that with ſuch ſecrecy and expedition, that they within knew not whether to impute it to lightning, or deſign, but it drove them into irreſolution, and diſtruſt of one another, and made them conclude that God himſelf made war againſt them. At this ſame time ſuch Goths as inhabited the Alpes Cottiæ, which divided Gall from Liguria, under the command of Siſigis, yielded themſelves to one Thomas of the General's Retinue, ſent by him thither for that purpoſe. Juſt now was Uræas with four thouſand men, gathered out of Liguria, and the Alpes, marching to the relief of Ravenna, but underſtanding what Siſigis had done, retreated, and went to beſiege him and Thomas together. This coming to the knowledge of John and Martin, the Brother's Sons of Vitalianus, who then lay about the Poe, they haſted to their relief, ſurpriſed ſome of the Caſtles, and made Slaves amongſt mongſt others, many of the Wives and Children of Vræas his Souldiers, who perceiving they followed him to ſmall purpoſe, whilſt at home they loſt all that was dear unto them, ran away ſuddenly to John. So that Vræas could doe nothing there, neither could he relieve Ravenna; but retiring with a few Followers into Liguria, there lay ſtill, expecting better fortune.

Ambaſſadours from Conſtantinople with Terms, to which Vitigis yields.

Beliſarius refuſes to ſign the Treaty.

The Goths Nobility would declare him Emperour of the Weſt.

126. Things thus ſtanding at the Alpes, and Vitigis with his principal Goths being cloſe ſhut up in Ravenna, Dominicus and Maximinus arrived, both of Senatorian Rank, as Ambaſſadours from the Emperour, with commiſſion to make peace with Vitigis upon theſe terms; that he ſhould enjoy half the Revenue, and the Dominion of the Countrey beyond the Poe; the other half to be the Emperour's, with the reſt of Italy, which ſhould all be ſubject to him, and pay him tribute. Vitigis and his Goths moſt gladly accepted the Conditions, but Beliſarius fretted exceedingly, as thereby deprived of the glory of ending the War, and carrying Vitigis Captive to Conſtantinople, which he knew he could now accompliſh without much trouble. He flatly refuſed to ſign the Treaty, which made the Goths jealous that the Peace was fraudulently propounded, and raiſed the indignation of ſome of his Officers, who taxed him with a deſign to oppoſe the Emperour's ſervice, and to lengthen the War. Hereat netled, he called together the Commanders, and told them he was reſolved to ſtand to their determinations, who ſtill affirming that the Emperour's Inſtructions were the beſt, and that they were not able to ſubdue the Enemy by war, he made them expreſs it in writing, that they might not be able to deny it afterwards. But the Goths were now ſo pinched with famine, that they could hold out no longer. They were weary of Vitigis his government, yet ſcrupled to yield to the Emperour, fearing to be tranſported to Conſtantinople, and planted thereabout. The Nobility upon the whole matter, reſolved to declare Beliſarius Emperour of the Weſt, and ſent to him underhand, promiſing him all fidelity and allegiance. He being tied to Juſtinian by oath never to innovate, during his life, would not take the Empire without his conſent, and the name of an Uſurper he abominated; yet he reſolved to make uſe of this opportunity to facilitate his deſign, and therefore ſeemed to accept the offer. Vitigis perceiving the matter, commended the reſolution of the Goths out of fear, and animated Beliſarius, promiſing his aſſiſtence to remove all impediments out of the way.

He makes uſe of their offer.

He enters Ravenna.

127. Beliſarius keeping in his mind what had been concluded at the Council of Officers, leſt they ſhould mutiny, or make any ſtir, becauſe their Reſolution was not put in practice, now ſatisfied them that he could eaſily make Vitigis, and all his Goths, the Emperour's Captives, ſhare their Wealth, and recover all Italy to the Romans, which they earneſtly prayed him to effect. Then did he ſend to the Goths, willing them to perform their offer immediately; and being preſſed ſore with famine, they haſted away their Ambaſſadours, whom they commanded publickly to ſpeak of nothing of moment, but privately to take oath of Beliſarius, that he would not any way endamage the Goths, who ſhould enjoy the ſame privileges and immunities, as the Romans themſelves. As to other things, he ſwore in a certain form of words; but for the Empire, he ſaid he would give oath to Vitigis himſelf, and the Commanders. The Ambaſſadours not imagining he would refuſe the Soveraignty, which from their own inclinations, and the general temper of Mankind, they concluded that he deſired above all things, prayed him to accompany them into Ravenna. He ſent away Narſes, Aratius, Beſſas and John, to quarter in other Places, knowing them to bear him no good will, and alledging, that if they remained altogether, he could not poſſibly get ſufficient proviſions for ſuch a multitude of men. Then with the reſt of the Army did he enter Ravenna, and cauſed the Boats, laden with Corn, to be towed up into the Haven. Procopius, who beheld the entrance of the Roman Army into the City, tells us how by that ſight he was convinced, that Affairs are neither carried on by multitudes of men, by valour, or any other humane efficacy; but that there is ſome higher and greater Power which ſteers, governs, and directs the minds of Mortals thither where nothing can hinder the preordained ſucceſs. The Goths here had much the advantage both in power and numbers of men, ſince their coming to Ravenna, had not fought one Battel, nor received any accident, which could reaſonably make any impreſſion upon their Spirits; yet being ſubdued by thoſe that were fewer and weaker than themſelves, they counted it no ſhame to ſubmit to ſlavery and bondage. The Women, who had been made believe that the Enemy was more numerous, and that the Romans were more tall and gallant Perſons than they proved, when they ſaw the Souldiers enter, ſpit in the faces of their Husbands, and pointing at the Conquerours, upbraided them with their cowardiſe and indiſcretion.

128. Beliſarius diſperſed the Goths to their own Houſes, fearing no inſurrection, becauſe of the Army ſo near garriſon'd. Vitigis he kept in honourable reſtraint. The Treaſures of the Palace he ſeized, with intent to carry them to Conſtantinople, but ſuffered none of the Goths to be plundred, leaving them their Eſtates according to the Accord. Now ſeveral Towns were, by ſuch Goths as held them, ſurrendred into his hands; but in the mean time he was traduced to the Emperour, as deſigning to uſurp, who believed not the Accuſation; but the Perſian War preſſing, ſent for him to make an Expedition that way. The Goths hearing he was called home, at firſt made little reckoning of it, not believing he would be guilty of ſo much folly, (ſuch they accounted it,) as to refuſe the Kingdom ſo fairly offered; but afterwards ſeeing what preparations he made to be gone, and that he was in earneſt, thought it time, to lay their heads together. The cheifeſt of thoſe that Inhabited beyond the Poe, betook themſelves to Vræas the Siſters Son of Vitigis, whom lamenting ſadly their Condition, they deſired to take the government and conduct upon him, and lead them out upon ſome deſign, in the execution of which, at the worſt they ſhould but prefer a glorious Death before ignominious Slavery. As to action he agreed with them, but refuſed the Title of King, both becauſe being ſo near a-kin to Vitigis, his bad ſucceſs would make him deſpiſed, and he thought it not conſiſtent with good nature to intrude upon his Uncle. He propounded to them Ildebald the Governour of Verona, a man very well accompliſht, and of great Valour, whoſe Uncle Theudis King of the Viſigoths, would in all probability for his ſake, eſpouſe their cauſe and quarrel. Ildebald then was ſent for from Verona, inveſted with the purple Robe and proclaimed King, which done, he adviſed that Beliſarius ſhould be ſent to, and moved to put in execution what had been lately accorded, and after they knew his mind, that they ſhould enter into Action, and govern themſelves accordingly. Ambaſſadours are diſpatched away, who put him in mind of the late Agreement, blame him for not having performed his promiſe, reproach him for being a voluntary Slave, and preferring Servitude before Sovereign Authority, and provoke him by all arguments poſſible, to accept the Government, aſſuring him of the fidelity of Ildebald, who, as they ſaid, would willingly lay the purple at his feet, and ſalute him King of the Goths and Italians. But he contrary to their expectations, refuſed the Title, proteſting that during the Life of Juſtinian, he would not meddle with any ſuch matter; which after they had heard, they inſtantly departed, and made a report to thoſe that ſent them. Beliſarius having left the charge of Italy with Beſſas, John and ſome others, and ordered Conſtantianus to remove from Dalmatia to Ravenna, began his Journey towards Conſtantinople; the Winter ending, and with the fifth year of the War, the ſecond Book of the Hiſtory thereof written by Procopius.

Beliſarius called to Rome for the Perſian War.

Ildebald choſen King of the Goths.

Ildibadus potius Ildibaldus vel Hildibaldus. Teutonice Hildebald, eximie Audax, Ang. Highly bold.

129. Ildebald being ſecure of Beliſarius, whom he knew to be upon his Journey, according to the Council formerly taken, gathered together all the Goths and diſcontented Romans he poſſibly could, and ſeriouſly applied himſelf to his Buſineſs, which was no leſs than an endeavour for the recovery of the Dominion of all Italy. He ſet up with a thouſand men, and one ſingle Town in Picenum; but within a while all Liguria and Venetia came dropping in to him. And his game was the greater by reaſon of one Alexander a Logotheta or Auditor of Conſtantinople, who having ſcraped together abundance of Wealth, by informations againſt Souldiers, whom he accuſed to have defrauded the Treaſury; had raiſed much money for the Emperour, and from his clipping the Coin, had got the Nickname of Forficula or Sciſſers. Him after the recalling of Beliſarius the Emperour ſent into Italy, where ſetting up his Office in Ravenna, he called to account ſuch as never had been employed, cauſed many to pay what they never had received, and the Souldiers for all their wounds and hazards, he requited with ſlender accounts and empty Tickets. Hereby the Italians grew ill affected to the Emperour, and the Souldiers were ſo alienated and indiſpoſed to his Service, that they would not ingage their perſons in any conſiderable enterprize, all which mightily advanced the affairs of the Goths. Neither would the Commanders which Beliſarius had left to the defence of thoſe Parts much concern themſelves. Onely Vitalis who lay in Venetia, with a great number of Herulians beſides others, reſolved to try his Fortune with Ildebald, before his power ſhould grow to too great an height. A Battel was valiantly Fought near Tarviſium, where the Gothick King had the better of his Enemy, who having loſt moſt of his men, eſcaped and fled. This ſucceſs got Ildebald reputation, which he no ſooner had got, but as ſuddenly he loſt it, together with his Life. A pique ariſing betwixt his Queen and the Wife of Vræas, who deſpiſed her for her mean Habit and attendance, whilſt as yet her Husband enjoyed no Royal Revenue, Procopius Belli Gothici, lib. 3.

Alexander Forficula being ſent into Italy doeth much miſchief.

Ildebald beats Vitalis.

Kills Vræas,

Vilas Græce Οὐίλας, Teut. Willas, Voluntatis expers.

Is killed by Vilas.

The laſt year of counting by Conſuls.

Vide Baron. ad h. Ann.

venue, he ſo far concerned himſelf as firſt to accuſe Vræas of a deſigned Revolt, and afterward treacherouſly and ingratefully killed him, by which he incurred the reproach and diſpleaſure of the whole Nation. In this nick of time it happened, that one Vilas by Nation a Gepida , and of the Emperour's Guard , being Suitor to a very handſome Woman which he infinitely loved ; when he was abſent upon Service was deprived of his Miſtreſs by Ildebald, who either ignorantly, or upon ſome motive, gave her in Marriage to another man. Hereat inraged, he reſolved to gratifie both his own Malice, and as he thought the deſires of all the Goths, by ſending the King to another World. Watching his time, when Ildebald feaſted the Nobility, and according to the Cuſtome, was to be attended by his Guards , he got in amongſt them, and as the King reached his hand to a Diſh, and bowed with his face upon the Couch , he gave him a blow with his Sword upon the Neck with ſuch violence, that the Head fell off, the Meat being betwixt his fingers, to the great amazement of the Company. Thus ended the Winter , together with the ſixth year of the War , in the fifteenth year of Juſtinian's Reign, which is characterized by the Conſulſhip of Beliſarius Junior, without a Collegue, and is the laſt in the Faſti, to which the Note of any Conſulſhip is added , although there were Conſuls created after this time. But now it was the Emperour's pleaſure , that time ſhould be accounted and meaſured by the years of his Reign, and therefore by degrees he would antiquate the ancient Cuſtome, for which he hath incurred no ſmall diſpleaſure with Chronologers, although ſome caſt the blame upon Tribonianus the framer of his Laws. This was the DXLI year of our Lord, and the ſecond of Vigilius the Roman Biſhop.

Erarick choſen King of the Goths.

Erarick idem quod Ararick mutata vocali pro varietate Dialecti.

Totilas in voc. Al. Totila, Toutilo, Tot-las, morte liber. Athanaſius Græce.

Ex Totilas contractum Toto varie ſcribitur in voc. Al. Totto Tuto, Tuato, Tuoto, Tódo.

They kill him, and chuſe Totilas King.

130. The Goths were much diſcouraged at the Murther of Ildebald, upon whom, notwithſtanding his late miſdemeanour , they looked as a man able enough to have recovered the Dominion of Italy. Into his place was elected one Erarick, a Rugian by Birth, and a man of good reputation amongſt the Barbarians ; for the Rugians were a Gothick Nation alſo , though diſtinct from the reſt by government and manners, whom Theodorich united with their Countrey-men , and made them ſerve againſt the common Enemy ; but though their Service was in common, they mingled not in Marriage with thoſe of other Families, but preſerved their Name and Race in a Poſterity of the whole Bloud. The State being in trouble upon the Death of Ildebald, they procured Erarick to be made King, whom though the other Goths reſpected as a private perſon, yet they could not brook this new Stamp of a Royal Character, and grew diſcontented and out of order, the more experience they had of his government. At this time Totilas Nephew of Ildebald, a Perſon diſcreet, valiant and of great eſteem, Commanded the Goths in Tarviſium, and hearing of his Uncle's Death, ſent to Conſtantianus then lying in Ravenna, offering upon aſſurance of Indemnity to deliver up both the place and the men under his Command. Conſtantianus gladly accepted of the overture, gave Oath for performance of the Articles, and a day was appointed for the ſurrender of the Garriſon , when juſt in the nick of time the Goths, weary as was ſaid of Erarick's government, ſent to Totilas to tell him, that they now felt the miſs of his Uncle, and that they had their eyes upon himſelf as the fitteſt Perſon, not onely in reſpect of his Bloud, but for other reaſons to ſucceed him. He plainly tells them of the Agreement he had made with the Roman Commander, and that if before the day appointed for Rendition of the Town, they will kill Erarick , he will fully comply with their deſires. In the mean time, the Roman Army being very ſecure, and high upon the troubles and diſadvantages of their Adverſaries, neither drew together, nor had any deſign upon them. Erarick propounded the ſending of Ambaſſadours to Conſtantinople, for ſuch a Peace as formerly had been offered to Vitiges, that the Goths ſhould hold all beyond the Poe, and the Emperour the reſt of Italy. But he gave them ſecret inſtructions to pretend onely that Negotiation to which the Nobility had aſſented, and underhand to bargain for a good Sum of money, and the dignity of a Patritian, to deliver up all Italy , and lay down the Royal name and habit. The Ambaſſadours did as they were injoyned. But in the mean time , the Goths entring into new Councils, killed Erarick treacherouſly, after he had Reigned five Months, and Totilas took the government as they had agreed, being deſtined thereunto as a ſevere ſcourge againſt the Greeks now Warring in Italy.

131. Juſtinian having received the news of his promotion, and the Death of Erarick, ſharply reprehended his Officers, who thereupon aſſembled at Ravenna, and in a Council of War, it was agreed to lay Siege, firſt to Verona in Venetia, and having reduced that City to go againſt Totilas and Picenum. The Army twelve thouſand ſtrong, accordingly marched under the Command of eleven Officers, of which Conſtantianus and Alexander were chief, and being come within ſeven miles of Verona there incamped, for from that Town lye fair Champions, reaching as far as Mantua a full days Journey. Now did one Marcianus a Noble man, well affected to the Emperour, procure a Townſman of Verona to betray the place, and by one of the Watchmen the Gate was to be opened, and by Night the Roman Army to be received in. The Commanders thought beſt to ſend one of themſelves before, with a few to make good the Gate, and the reſt of the Army to follow without hazard. But all refuſed the danger, onely Artabanes an Armenian an excellent Souldier, the Captain of thoſe Perſians whom Beliſarius ſent to Conſtantinople, together with Bliſchames, after his taking the Caſtle of Siſaurium, gladly undertook it, and with an hundred men when the Gate was opened got into the Town. Some ſtood ſtill at the Gate and ſent for the Army, others mounting the Walls killed the Sentinels, all expecting the coming of their friends. But the Romans being come within five miles, there made an Halt. The Commanders diſputing about the Plunder of the City, and ſpent all Night in babling and conteſting about the Spoil. The Goths finding themſelves ſurprized, had run out at another Gate when Artabanes was entred, and retired to an high Rock not far from the Walls, whence one might have not onely a fair proſpect into the Champion round about, but alſo view all the Streets, and ſee what paſſed in the Town it ſelf. He ſtaying here all Night, in the Morning they diſcovered how ſmall an Enemy was within; and viewing the Army at a diſtance, ran in at the ſame Gate they had ran out at, and the Romans, not able to make good the place, fled to the Battlements, where they ſtoutly defended themſelves and did wonders, eſpecially, their Captain. By this time the Commanders had agreed about parting the Wealth of Verona amongſt themſelves, and led on towards the City, which when they found ſtoutly defended, and the Gates ſhut, they fairly Retreated, though their Companions called to them, and earneſtly deſired they might not be forſaken. Artabanes therefore and ſuch of his men as remained alive, ſeeing themſelves thus baſely betrayed, and deſpairing of Succour, leapt down from the Walls. He himſelf and thoſe that light upon plain ground eſcaped, but ſuch as fell on the Stones and Crags all periſhed. Having reached the Camp, he upbraided the Officers with their ill Conduct, and paſſing with them the Poe, came to Faventia a City diſtant from it about eighteen miles.

The ill Conduct of the Roman Captains.

132. Totilas hearing how matters ſtood, ſent for moſt of the Garriſon out of Verona, and with his whole ſtrength, which amounted to no more than five thouſand men, marched againſt the Enemy. The Roman Officers hereupon meeting in Council, Artabanes prayed them not to deſpiſe the deſperate and inraged Goths, though inferiour in numbers, but when they ſhould have half paſſed the River to Fight them, rather than ingage with their whole Body. But the Commanders fell on contradicting one another, as is uſual when they are equal in power, and ſtaying there did nothing at all. Totilas in the mean time having incouraged his men, and let them plainly ſee, that if this day they ſhould be beaten, they muſt not expect any more to Fight; cauſed three hundred to paſs the River, two miles and an half off to get behind the Enemy, and the Fight being begun, to gall them on their Backs. He with the reſt went over where he ſtood, without any oppoſition, and the Armies marching fair and ſoftly towards each other, one Valiaris a Goth, tall, valiant and of a ſtern Countenance, rode out of the Ranks, and challenged any Roman to a ſingle Combat. Artabanes accepted the Challenge and preventing the Goth, with his Lance ran him into the right ſide, who having his mortal wound, ſunk backward, but his Lance reſting upon the Ground, and at a great ſtone, kept him from falling. Artabanes not thinking he had his Deaths wound, ran him again into the Belly, and the head of Valiaris his Lance, which ſtood upright, lighting upon his Neck cut one of the Arteries, whence iſſued preſently abundance of Bloud, but he feeling no pain, gallopt back again to his Friends, and left his Adverſary dead upon the place. The flux of Bloud could not be ſtopt, ſo that he died the third day after, to the great detriment of the Emperour's Affairs, as well in that he could not be preſent at the Battel, as that the great hope of his future Services was thereby extinct. Whilſt he attended the cure of his Wound, without Arrow-ſhot the Armies joyned Battel, in the heat whereof, the three hundred Goths, as had been ordered, ſuddenly fell upon the backs of the Romans, who thinking them to be much more in number, than indeed they were, ran away for fear in great confuſion, with the Enemy at their heels, who killed many, took many Priſoners and all their Enſigns: a thing which had not happened (ſo Procopius obſerves) formerly to the Romans. The Commanders ſeverally rally as they could, with a few followers, made to the neareſt Towns, and there ſecured themſelves.

A ſingle Combat of which both miſcarry.

The Romans ſhamefully beaten.

133. Totilas without delay ſent Forces to beſiege Florence, which was then governed by John, who having little or no Proviſion for holding out, ſent to Ravenna, praying the Commanders he might be relieved. Hereupon a conſiderable Army was ſent, and upon rumour of its approach, the Goths raiſed the Siege, and removed to Micale a Town diſtant from Florence a days Journey, whither, the Romans having left a few men in the City, purſued them, and it was agreed, that ſome one of the Commanders ſhould ſuddenly ſet upon the Enemy, and the reſt to march after fair and ſoftly. The lot fell to John; but then again the Officers would not ſtand to the Agreement, ſo that he was conſtrained with his own Troops onely to ingage, and a ſharp Encounter followed, wherein he at length had the diſadvantage. Yet had the reſt come up in time, faln in with him and ſet upon the Enemy, the day had aſſuredly been their own; but an unlucky Rumour being ſpread, that John was killed by one of his own Life-Guard, the Army e'er it had joyned all ran away, not in Bodies, but every man ſhifting for himſelf. Many periſhed in the Chaſe, and they who eſcaped were ſeized with ſuch a pannick fear, that they ran on for many days, none purſuing them, till recovering the places where they thought to ſecure themſelves, there, as it were, they hid their Heads, none of them having the leaſt thought of turning again, but expecting ſeverely to be Beſieged. Totilas treated his Priſoners with ſuch humanity, that they willingly entred into his Service againſt the Romans. And then ended the Winter, together with the ſeventh year of the War.

Totilas takes ſeveral places and Countries.

134. Totilas improving his opportunities, took in ſeveral places, and marching through Tuſcany into Campania and Samnium, eaſily made himſelf Maſter of the ſtrong Town of Beneventum, which he diſmantled. Then with the greateſt part of his Army he laid Siege to Naples, ſending out the reſt to take in Cumæ, and other places where he raiſed a great Sum of money. By his civility to the Wives of ſeveral Senatours, which he therein ſurprized, he got great Reputation, and having reduced Bruttia, Lucania, Apulia and Calabria, both ſeized on the publick Tributes, and private Rents, bearing himſelf as abſolute Lord of Italy. Hereby the Roman Army receiving no Pay, was driven into great Neceſſities, and the Emperour contracted a vaſt Debt; the Italians betwixt them both were haraſſed and diſcouraged, and the Souldiers grew diſobedient to their Officers, and were very glad to lie idle in Garriſons. Conſtantianus held Ravenna; Rome, Spoletum, Florence and Peruſia were Commanded by John, Beſſas, Juſtinus and Cyprianus, being the places they had fled to. The Emperour was extremely troubled to hear how matters went, and diſpatched away with a good Fleet, and a conſiderable Army, one Maximinus with the Title and Character of Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, the better to govern the Officers, and ſupply the Army. He being a man altogether unpractiſed in War, and beſides that a Coward, and of a ſlow Nature, loitered upon the Coaſts of Epirus; Juſtinian after him ſent Demetrius as his Lieutenant, who had formerly Commanded the Foot under Beliſarius. He hearing how Naples was diſtreſſed, had a great mind to relieve it; but having with him but inconſiderable Forces, he Laded a number of Ships in Sicily, with Corn and other Proviſions, hoping to fright the Enemy, who hearing of an huge Navy, expected a great Army to come along with it. Had he directly made for Naples, he had undoubtedly frighted away the Beſiegers and done his work, but being afraid to put in there, he Sailed on for the Port of Rome, to gather up Souldiers, who being lately beaten by the Goths, refuſed to follow him againſt Totilas, ſo that he muſt either ſtay where he was, or undertake the expedition of Naples, with thoſe few he had brought along with him. Chuſing the latter Courſe, when Totilas had notice of his coming, he manned out many ſwift Pinnaces, which falling on him on a ſudden, as he lay on the Coaſt near Naples, amazed and defeated all his Fleet, took all the Ships and men aboard them, except ſuch as at firſt leapt into the Cock-Boats, amongſt whom was Demetrius himſelf. Maximinus being fairly advanced as far as Sicily, ſate ſtill at Syracuſe afraid of the War. The Commanders in Italy, eſpecially Conon the Governour of Naples, importuned him to come to their Succour, but ſtill he wore out the time, till fearing the Emperour's high diſpleaſure, and wearied with the Scoffs and Revilings of all men; he reſolved to ſtay himſelf and ſave one, but ſend the Army to Naples, under the Command of others. Now was it the depth of Winter, and the Fleet coming near Naples, ſo great a Storm took them, that the Seamen could neither uſe their Oars, doe any other work, nor hear one another. Doe what they could, they were driven upon the ſhore where the Enemy my lay incamped, who had ſo eaſie a game of it, that they ſunk Ships, and killed men as they pleaſed, without any reſiſtence. Some few eſcaped, the reſt were taken, together with Demetrius who was got aboard the Fleet.

Demetrius and Maximinus, lately ſent by the Emperour, ſhamefully defeated.

135. Him did Totilas lead with a Rope about his Neck to the Town Wall, where he compelled him to perſwade the Citizens to yield, by telling them that no farther Succours they were to expect, and all their hopes had periſhed with the Navy. Hereat the beſieged being grievouſly diſmayed, Totilas took the opportunity to give them good words, and offered to Conon and his Souldiers all Indemnity, in caſe they would preſently ſurrender the City, with all ſecurity of Perſons and Eſtates to the Citizens themſelves. Being extremely preſt with Famine, they accepted the offer, and notwithſtanding they had capitulated for thirty days time, to expect Succours, wherein no Hoſtility was to be exerciſed, yet urged by their neceſſities, they received Totilas within a while into the City; and preſently after the Winter ended with the eighth year of the War. Totilas carried himſelf not at all like a Barbarian toward the Neapolitans; fearing leſt the languiſhing people ſhould by ſudden eating their fill ſurfeit themſelves, he ſet Guards at the Gates, and Port, commanding no man to go out, and with a provident care gave them Food, more ſparingly than their ravenous appetites required, adding thereunto inſenſibly every day, and increaſing their allowance. Having thus reſtored them to their former ſtrength, he ſet open the Gates, and let go as many as would. Conon and ſuch of his Souldiers as refuſed to ſtay he Shipped, giving them liberty to Sail whither they pleaſed, who ſhaming to go to Conſtantinople, were bound for Rome, but the Winds being croſs, and not able to get off, they feared he would break the Agreement and doe them miſchief. But he on the contrary taking notice of their misfortune called them to him, cheared them up, and the Wind not ſerving for a long time, furniſhed them with Horſes, Waggons and Proviſions, and gave them a Convoy of Goths to Rome. The greateſt part of the Walls of Naples he demoliſhed, being inclined rather to finiſh the War at once by Battel, than draw it out at length, (which muſt make it very uncertain and hazardous,) and be ever Skirmiſhing with Artifices and Strategems.

Naples ſurrendered to Totilas;

Who carries himſelf with much gallantry,

136. Either to get him a great name, or, as he himſelf affirmed to his Officers, being very ſenſible how much his Nation by their vitious living, had incurred the diſpleaſure of Almighty God, he puniſhed Vice with all ſeverity. One of his Guard, though a Valiant and otherwiſe deſerving man, and the Officers made great Interceſſion for him, having raviſhed the Daughter of a Roman of Calabria, he put to Death, and gave his Eſtate to the Woman he had abuſed. In the mean time, the Roman Army acted all things quite contrary, leaving no inſolence unpractiſed againſt the poor Italians. The Officers lived riotouſly with their Miſtreſſes in the Garriſons, having the Souldiers diſobedient and full of all ſorts of diſorders. The poor Countrey-man groaned under both the Armies; the Goths taking his Lands, and the Romans his Goods, by both he was beaten like a Slave, and his Meat eaten out of his mouth. Conſtantianus troubled hereat, wrote to Juſtinian, proteſting his diſability to wage War with the Goths; the Commanders ſigning the Letter, which was no other than a plain and open confeſſion of their fear and cowardiſe. Totilas having now his mind upon the City of Rome, thought fit firſt to trie whether by Letter he could procure the Senatours to joyn with him, upbrading them much with the ingratitude they had ſhewn to the Family and Nation of Theodorich and Amalaſuntha, and exaggerating the wrongs they had received from the Greek Emperours and their Armies. John forbad the Senatours to anſwer him; whereupon he privately conveyed other Papers into the City, no body knew how, but they were poſted up by Night in the moſt remarkable places, and diſcovered in the Morning. The Arian Prieſts were ſuſpected, and turned out of Rome. And Totilas perceiving that this Artifice would not take, reſolved no longer to uſe fair means, but ſending part of his Army into Calabria to take in Otranto, he himſelf with the reſt of the Forces, went againſt the Towns lying about Rome. The News much perplexed the Emperour, who though the Perſian War lay heavy upon him, found himſelf neceſſitated to call back Beliſarius, and ſend him the ſecond time into Italy; the Winter now ending with the ninth year of the Gothick War. Before we fetch him out of Perſia, its convenient to ſee what he did there, and how matters ſtood in the Eaſtern parts, ſince the time we left them at the Peace concluded with Choſroes.

And Juſtice.

Matters ſo bad in Italy, as conſtrain the Emperour to call Beliſarius out of Perſia to ſend him thither again.

Anno Juſtin. 18.
Chriſti. 544.

137. After the Ratification of the Peace, the State of both Princes was endangered by ſeditious attempts; that of the Emperour by the Commotion of the Common ſort, called Nica, as we formerly ſhewed; and the other of the Perſian, by a Conſpiracy of Redeundum ad hujus Sect. paragr. 28.

certain

A great Conſpiracy againſt Choſroes defeated.

Procop. de bello Perſico lib. 1.

certain of his Nobility, after this manner. Choſroes himſelf was a man of a perverſe, unruly and turbulent Spirit, which made ſome of his ſtirring Subjects ſo weary of his Government, that they conſulted how to make another King, out of the Family of Cabades. Zames the next Heir, being by the Laws excluded, becauſe of a maim in one of his Eyes, they agreed to promote his Son, and that he as his Protectour, ſhould manage publick Buſineſs. But Choſroes had the Plot revealed to him, and ſent all the Conſpiratours to another World, with all the Male iſſue of Zames, one onely excepted, Cabades by name, who being foſtered by Adergudunbades the General, (whoſe Wife preſerved him, notwithſtanding the King's expreſs Command he ſhould be put to Death,) it coſt the old man his Life, after that the King came to know of it, though he had done excellent Service, and ſubdued twelve Nations under the Perſian Yoke. For his own Son revealed it, and, after his Father was treacherouſly Slain, as a reward ſucceeded him in his Office. Cabades being ſent out of the way eſcaped, and either he or one that uſurped his Name, came long after to Conſtantinople, and was, as the Grand-Child of that great King, honourably treated by Juſtinian. But the Emperour's affairs proſpering in Africk under the Conduct of Beliſarius, Choſroes and his Perſians were much vexed, repenting they had made a Peace, and thereby given liberty to the Romans ſo to increaſe their power. Choſroes by his Ambaſſadours in meriment, demanded his ſhare of the Vandal ſpoils, as having by the peace been a great procurer of the Conqueſt. Juſtinian thought it fitting not to diſoblige him by any harſh return, but ſent him a conſiderable preſent in money.

John the Uſurper Slain.

Idem lib. 2.

Choſroes envying the ſucceſs of Beliſarius breaks the Peace.

Egged thereto by the meſſage of Vitigis.

138. The Peace was indeed very ſeaſonable for the Emperour's affairs, and that in more reſpects than that of the African War or Conqueſt. For in the Eaſtern parts, not long after the Ratification, one John a Souldier of the Garriſon of Daras, revolted and ſet up for himſelf, which Uſurpation had certainly been very miſchievous, had the enmity continued betwixt the Perſians and Romans; but the Peace being made, Choſroes would not lay any new foundations of a Quarrel, by fomenting this Rebellion, and the Uſurper was Slain, when he had enjoyed his precarious Dignity not many days. Yet though he took no advantage of this Sedition, and digeſted indifferently the Conqueſt of Africk, his Concoction being furthered by the late golden Cordial he had received from Conſtantinople, when he heard of the ſucceſs of Beliſarius in Italy alſo, the Conqueſt of that Countrey would not down; he could now hold no longer, but he muſt find ſome ſpecious pretext or other to renew the War. He made uſe of Alamundarus the Saracen, who laid claim to a Countrey called Strata, ſituate to the South of Palmyra, bearing neither Trees nor Corn, but nouriſhing ſome flocks of Sheep. Arethas claimed it as belonging to the Romans, the Title he ſaid being ſufficiently made out by the name, and the teſtimonies of the oldeſt men then living; Alamundarus refuſed to diſpute about names, and alledged that the Inhabitants had anciently paid him Rent for Paſturage. Much time was ſpent in the Arbitration, during which Choſroes complained that Juſtinian had practiſed againſt his Crown, by indeavouring to gain from him Alamundarus, who had been importuned with offers of great Sums of money to revolt. He produced the Emperour's Letters written to Alamundarus, and affirmed that he had alſo written to the Hunnes, to invade the Perſian Dominions, who had ſent him the very Originals themſelves. When upon theſe pretences, true or falſe, he reſolved to break the Peace, he was thereto farther excited and incouraged by the Ambaſſadours of Vitigis, who, as we formerly hinted, hired two Ligurian Preiſts to undertake the Journey, and perſwade the Perſian that the day of the fall and ruine of the Goths would certainly be the Cave of his own Deſtruction. Not conſidering the intereſt of thoſe that ſent them, he reſolved to take their advice, and give a ſtop to the Emperour's growing power, at whoſe Succeſs and Conqueſts he every day more and more grudged; the Armenians and Lazians alſo ſtirring his gall, by diſcourſes concerning the inſufferable ambition of Juſtinian.

Stirs in Armenia.

139. Some unlucky accidents alſo happened, which much exaſperated the Armenians againſt him. One Simeones, who had delivered up Pharangium to the Romans, had begged of him ſome Armenian Villages in the heat of the War, and being not long after Slain, by ſuch as formerly poſſeſſed them, the Emperour gave them to Amazaſpes his Siſters Son, making him withall Governour of Armenia. Not long had he ſo continued, when one Acacius a follower of Juſtinian accuſed him of Confederacy and ſecret Intelligence with the Perſians, and having by his directions treacherouſly Slain him, was made Governour in his place. He was a man of a moſt wicked and ravenous diſpoſition, ſo haraſſing the Armenians by new Impoſitions, that not able to endure his Cruelty, they Conſpired together and killed him, which done, they ſeized on Pharangium. The Emperour hearing the news, ſends Sittas from Conſtantinople againſt them, and he makes a ſlow War, labouring by fair means to regain them; but for this being reproached by Juſtinian at the inſtigation of Adolius, the Son of Acacius, he endeavoured to gain to his Party the Apetians, a conſiderable People among them, the better to overcome the reſt. Upon aſſurance of indemnity they agreed to join with him; but it happened that the Inſtruments of the Agreement being ſent them, never came to their hands, and thereupon a jealouſly ariſing on both ſides, they prepared for battel, and the fight began very tumultuouſly by reaſon of the unevenneſs of the ground. He had rather the better, forcing his Enemies to retire; but being made known to them, and his Lance being accidentally broken, they bore back upon him, and ſlew him, being a man of a goodly preſence, and ſcarcely inferiour to any Commander of his time. Sittas being dead, the Emperour ſent Buzes to ſucceed him, and the Armenians ſeeing there was no hope of reconciliation, betook themſelves to Choſroes, to whom in many words they aggravated the ambitious purpoſes of Juſtinian, who troubled, as they ſaid, all the World with his Arms, and at the beſt onely reſerved but the Perſian Dominions for his laſt Morſel, when he ſhould have devoured all the Weſtern Countries. As incouragements, they told him, they had ſlain one of his two beſt Commanders: and as for the other, Beliſarius, they were very confident he was ſo jealous of his Military Glory and Intereſt, that he would not employ him. He liked well both of their Propoſitions and Reaſons, and having as ſtrong an inclination himſelf to the breach of the Peace, it was reſolved in Council to make war upon the Romans in the beginning of the Spring. This was towards the end of Autumn, and the thirteenth year of Juſtinian's Reign, wherein happened the great Famine in Italy we formerly ſpoke of.

Sittas ſlain.

The Armenians betake themſelves to Choſroes.

140. The Romans were ſurprized, not the leaſt ſuſpecting any breach of the Peace, hearing onely that Choſroes murmured againſt Juſtinian's Succeſſes in the Weſt, and breathed out his diſcontent in the charges lately mentioned. Yet a Comet which appeared at this time in Capricorn, at firſt about the length of a tall man, afterward much longer, with its Tail turned toward the Eaſt, the Sun being then in Sagittarius, much amazed them. Immediately after a great Army of Hunnes, paſſing the River Iſter, overrun all Europe, a thing ſometimes done, but never with ſuch miſchief as now it happened. From the Adriatick Sea, which Procopius calls the Ionian Gulf, they waſted all Countries as far as Conſtantinople; and having never formerly attempted any walled Town, took thirty two Caſtles in Illyrium, and deſtroyed Caſſandria (of which in Ancient times we have heard much under the name of Potidæa) which done, with one hundred and twenty thouſand Captives, and much Booty, they retired home. Afterward they did much more miſchief in ſeveral other Inroads. They forced their way over the Wall of the Cherſoneſus, ſlew many of the Inhabitants, and made Slaves of moſt of the reſt. Some croſſing the Strait betwixt Seſtus and Abidos, waſted Aſia Minor; others having ſpoiled Illyricum and Theſſaly, aſſaulted the Wall at Thermopylæ, where the Garriſon ſtoutly demeaned it ſelf, but they unluckily found the path up the Mountain, and entring Greece, waſted all except Peloponneſus, and ſo retired. Not long after, the Perſians breaking the Peace, openly infeſted the Roman Territories, at ſuch time as Beliſarius had ſubdued Vitigis, and brought him to Conſtantinople. Before the Invaſion, Juſtinian perceiving Choſroes to quarrel, and be much out of humour, ſent a kind of Remonſtrance to him by one Anaſtaſius, a prudent man, who had ſuppreſſed the Rebellion at Daras. Herein he anſwered the things laid to his charge, complained of Alamundarus his forraging the Roman Territories, and with much ſeriouſneſs laid before him the great inconveniences which follow ſudden and raſh reſolutions in point of War. Choſroes anſwered not a word, neither yet would he diſmiſs the Meſſenger.

A Comet.

The Hunnes overrun Europe.

The Perſians break the Peace.

Juſtinian writes to Choſroes,

141. But towards the end of Winter, and of the thirteenth year of Juſtinian's Reign, (for he was declared Emperour, together with his Uncle, the third day before Eaſter) he entred the Roman Territories with a great Army, holding on his courſe toward Syria and Cilicia, till he arrived at the City of the Surenians upon Euphrates. This Town, notwithſtanding his faith given to the Biſhop thereof for their indemnity, he moſt cruelly burnt to the ground; having killed moſt of the men, and made all the reſt Slaves, becauſe they had not yielded at the firſt ſummons, and for a terrour to others. Yet either out of covetouſneſs, or for the love he bore to Euphemia, whom being one of theſe Captives, and very beautifull he made his Wife, and infinitely doted on her, he yielded that upon ſecurity given for two Centenaries of Gold by Candidus, Biſhop of Sergiopolis, thoſe that remained, to the number of twelve thouſand, ſhould be ſet at liberty; although his mercies were ſo cruel,

Who invades the Roman Territories with a great Army.

Ἐκθρῶν δῶρα ἄδωρα.

Buzes runs away.

Germanus ſent into the Eaſt.

ſo cruel, or his kindneſs ſo empty and barren, that the greateſt part of them periſhed through the effects of thoſe miſeries they had already undergone. Now in a braving manner did he ſend away Anaſtaſius, willing him to declare to Juſtinian in what part of the World he left Choſroes, the Son of Cabades; and then marcht he forward. Buzes, who commanded all the Eaſt in the abſence of Beliſarius, underſtanding what had happened to the Surenians, ſeemed to buckle himſelf to a ſtrenuous reſiſtence, and gave good Council to the Inhabitants of Hierapolis, that in caſe of a ſiege, they ſhould neither with their few numbers ingage the whole Perſian Army, nor yet keep all their men in the Town, but guarding the City with a ſufficient number, lodge the reſt near at hand at the bottom of the Mountains, whence by their frequent Onſets, both upon the Enemies Camp and Foragers, they might either force him to raiſe his Siege, or make his Aſſaults uneaſie, and cut off from him all ſorts of Proviſions. This Council he gave, but meant never to practiſe any thing himſelf, going away ſpeedily with the choiceſt part of the Army, no man, either Friend or Foe, knew whither, nor what was become of him. Juſtinian hearing of the Invaſion, ſent away Germanus his Brother's Son in much haſte with three hundred men, and a promiſe that a great Army ſhould ſuddenly follow.

Choſroes gets much money from the Roman Towns.

About 31500 li. ſterl.

142. Germanus being come to Antioch, firſt applied himſelf to fortify the City, but perceiving his attempt to be vain for want of time, and that to begin, and not perfect, would but ſhew the Enemy which way to commence the War, he deſiſted from this enterpriſe; and when both he and the Antiochians conſidered that the promiſed Army came not from the Emperour, and that in all probability Choſroes would make for that City, they reſolved in Council to buy him off with money. To negotiate the buſineſs with him, they choſe Megas, Biſhop of Berrhœa, a prudent man, who could not with all his wiſe Reaſons charm the rude and unquiet humour of the King, but at laſt brought him to theſe Terms, that for ten Centenaries of Gold he ſhould quit all the Eaſtern Provinces. But before the Biſhop could fetch the Ratifications, he wreſted 2000 li. weight of Silver from thoſe of Hierapolis to ſave their City, and refuſed to accept of leſs than twice as much from the Berrhœans, becauſe their Walls were much weaker. They offered him the 2000 li. but as for more, they proteſted they could not pay him; and when he preſſed upon their City, they relinquiſhed it, and fled by night to the Caſtle, where being but one Spring, and that drank up by the Cattle, they preſently found themſelves in a lamentable eſtate. Megas could not with all his Rhetorick perſuade the Antiochians to the Agreement he had made with Choſroes, being kept off by Julian, the Emperour's Secretary, who was ſent Ambaſſadour to Choſroes, together with John, the Son of Rufinus, and forbad them expreſly to give money to the Enemy, or ſell the Emperour's Towns. Megas returning to Choſroes was much afflicted, finding him ſo cloſely beſieging his own Fellow-citizens; for they were reduced to the utmoſt extremity, the Perſian Army having entred, and ſeized the Town. He expoſtulated with him about his perfidious dealing in ſuch terms, and uſed ſuch arguments, cries, and intreaties, that aſſuring him they had no more money than the ſum they had offered, he procured the liberty of thoſe poor men. According to the Faith he had given them, they were ſuffered to goe whither they pleaſed, and amongſt them ſome of the Souldiers. But the greateſt part of theſe revolted to Choſroes, complaining of the ſad condition they were in, being behind in their pay for many years, and went with him afterward into Perſia.

Beſieges Antioch.

143. Choſroes perceiving from Megas that the Antiochians would part with no money, marcht thitherward, and encamping near the River Orontes, ſent to demand the ten Centenaries of Gold, which if he ſhould receive, he ſeemed willing to pack up, and be gone. Thither went the Ambaſſadours, betwixt whom and him paſſed much diſcourſe and expoſtulation to no purpoſe. The common and light ſort of People of Antioch from the Walls flouted and derided him, and almoſt had ſtoned his Interpreter, wherewith inraged, he reſolved preſently to give an Aſſault. The Wall being weakeſt at the top of the Hill, and the Places where the Beſieged were to fight being narrow, they tied long Beams together between the Turrets, and inlarged the ſtandings for more men to oppoſe the Aſſailants. The great breadth and height of the Rock commanded the Wall, and cauſed the Fight to be equal, as upon even ground, and here lay the diſadvantage of the Romans. Yet had they put out but three hundred men, poſſeſt the Rock firſt, and kept off the Enemy, in all probability the Town had not been indangered, the Barbarians having no means to aſſault, being beaten perpendicularly both from the Rock and Walls. But this being neglected, and conſequently the defence very difficult, and the ſervice hot at the Rock; when the Romans preſſed up to make reſiſtence, the Ropes which tied the Beams ſuddenly broke, and down they all fell. They who made good the Turrets, hearing the noiſe, imagined that the Wall was broken down, and ran away. Then did the old Souldiers take their Horſes, and rode to the Gate, giving out they were to receive Buzes and his Army. Thither ran alſo the Antiochians, Men, Women and Children, and preſſing out altogether, the Souldiers bore them down, and many were killed in the crowd. The Perſians ſet to their ſcaling Ladders, and mounted without any oppoſition, which made them fear ſome ſtrategeme, and take care how they deſcended through the Rocks and Precipices from the Hill: Choſroes eſteeming all things leſs than the taking of the City, gave the Souldiers fair leiſure to run, the Perſians pointing at them with their hands, and bidding them haſte and get away. When they ſaw them and their Commanders got out at the Gate of Daphne, they fairly deſcended into the midſt of the City.

The Defendants ill manage their matters.

144. Here at firſt they were encountred by ſome raſh young men, who laying at them with ſtones, and forcing them to change their place a little, ſeemed to themſelves to have the better, ſung their Pæan, and cried Juſtinianus Callinicus, as if indeed they had got the victory. In the mean time Choſroes ſitting upon a Turret by the top of the Hill, ſent for the Ambaſſadours to come to him, which being taken notice of by Zaberganes, one of his Commanders, he fearing a compoſition would be the product of a Conference, came to him, ſhewed him the preſent eſtate of the Antiochians, and diſſuaded him from yielding to thoſe who were already conquered, and had nothing but fury and deſperation to bear them up. Choſroes apt enough to be perſuaded, ſent ſome of his beſt men againſt them, but news was preſently brought that the work was done, and the Perſians were Victours, who ſo far improved the Victory, as neither to ſpare Sex nor Age. All ſorts of miſery fell upon the poor Inhabitants, the Perſian King ſhedding Crocodiles Tears, and pretending to be moved with pity and commiſeration, though he was the moſt falſe, perfidious and ſordid man alive. He commanded his men to make Slaves of ſuch Antiochians as ſurvived, and to take the ſpoil of the Town. He himſelf took out of the Church a vaſt Treaſure of Gold and Silver, cauſed many admirable pieces of Marble to be taken down, to be tranſported into Perſia, and then gave order to burn the City, the Church being preſerved through the great inſtance and importunity of the Ambaſſadours. But not onely did they burn the whole City (the Cathedral excepted, with ſome Houſes that ſtood towards a Corner, and joined not to other Buildings) but what was without the Walls, except the Church of St. Julian, and the Houſes about it, where the Ambaſſadours lodged, beſides the City Walls they wholly forbore. And thus periſhed the greateſt, the faireſt, the moſt populous, the richeſt and happieſt Roman City in the Eaſt, (whoſe beauty and magnificence appeared even in its very Ruins) by the moſt impious of all men living, which thing much ſtartled Procopius the Hiſtorian, though at laſt he reſolves all into the Equity and Juſtice of Divine Providence.

The City taken,

And burnt.

145. The Ambaſſadours, as they had reaſon, touched with a ſenſe of ſo ſad a ſpectacle, could not forbear to lay before him his perfidious dealing, to which he anſwered, and alledged ſome things ſpecious, and ſome things palpably falſe, to lay the load upon Juſtinian. After many Recriminations and Arguments, it was accorded that the Romans ſhould pay to him fifty Centenaries of Gold, and a perpetual yearly payment of five more, not in way of Tribute, but for guarding the Caſpian Gates, and quitting all pretences to Daras, and this colour Choſroes himſelf would put upon it. Hereupon no more Acts of hoſtility were to be committed, but receiving hoſtages for performance he was to depart ſpeedily into his own Countrey, whither other Ambaſſadours ſhould be ſent by the Emperour to treat and ſettle a laſting Peace. He accordingly retreated, but notwithſtanding the Truce, yet robbed ſeveral Cities in his march, wreſting from that of Apamea, which offered him 1000 weight of Silver, ten times as much, even all their Treaſures of Gold and Silver, which were very great; and from the poor City of Chalcis (diſtant ten miles and a half from Berrhœa) two Centenaries of Gold. Neither was he minded to return the ſame way he came, but to croſs Euphrates, and rifle Meſopotamia in his paſſage. Having croſſed the River near Obbane, he was very ambitious to become Maſter of Edeſſa, induced by a confident Tradition, then amongſt Chriſtians, that it was never to be taken, by reaſon of a certain Letter which our Saviour Chriſt was ſaid to have written to Agbarus, at that time Toparch of the Countrey, whereby he promiſed amongſt other things, that this City ſhould never be conquered by Barbarians. The Epiſtle, if we may believe Procopius, they ingraved upon their Gates for a defence; and when Choſroes had lodged his Army three miles off, and by break of day marched towards Edeſſa, they went out of their way ſo far, that the

An agreement.

157500 li.

15720 li. Sterl.

Choſroes robs Cities in his Retreat.

next night they lodged in the ſame place, and this happened twice unto them. At length, when with much adoe he had got to the Town, his Chops, as it was reported, ſwelled with Rheum, which ſo much aſtoniſhed him, that he reſolved not to attempt the Place; but he ſent his Interpreter, and demanded money of them. They ſent him word, that of their City they had no fear; but to prevent the waſting of their Towns and Villages, they would give him two Centenaries of Gold, which he received, and in this matter kept the Agreement.

146. Now came Letters from Juſtinian agreeing to ratify the Treaty between him and the Ambaſſadours, whereupon he diſcharged the Hoſtages, and prepared for his Retreat. He condeſcended that the Antiochian Captives ſhould be ranſomed, and the Citizens of Edeſſa, to their great commendation, offered whatever they had toward ſo pious a work; but the Deſign was croſſed by Buzes, who expected to raiſe ſome profit out of it. But Choſroes, notwithſtanding the Emperour's Letters, and his full Agreement, yet could not forbear pilling the Countrey in his paſſage; and being come to Daras, he fairly laid ſiege to it. He ſprung a mine, and had undoubtedly taken it, but that the thing was diſcovered ſeaſonably by a man (or more than a man, ſaith the Hiſtorian) who coming from the Perſian Camp, ſeemed to gather up the ſcattered Arrows, and warding with his Shield, as if he jeered thoſe upon the Battlements, told them where their danger lay, and bad them carefully provide for their ſafety. Then did the Beſieged by a croſs Mine defeat the purpoſe of their Enemies, which Choſroes perceiving, and ſeeing there was no hope of taking the Town, capitulated for a thouſand pound weight of Silver, and Juſtinian proteſted the Peace to be broken. went his way. Juſtinian, by this attempt upon Daras, proteſted that the Peace was broken, and refuſed to ſtand to the Ratification. Choſroes in Aſſyria, a days journey from Cteſiphon, built a City, wherein he beſtowed the Antiochian Captives, and called it Antioch of Choſroes. He maintained them at the publick charge, not like Captives; gave them the name of Baſilici, as exempt from the juriſdiction of all Magiſtrates, except the King; built them a publick Bath, a Cirque, and furniſhed them with other delights, bringing from Antioch and the neighbouring Roman Choſroes builds a City call'd Antioch of Choſroes. Cities Charioteers and ſkilfull Muſicians. If a Roman Captive fled hither, and was challenged for a Kinſman by any of the Inhabitants, he might not be taken thence by his Maſter, of what quality ſoever he was. At this time Beliſarius received orders to return to Conſtantinople, where having wintred, at the beginning of the Spring he was ſent General againſt Choſroes, with the Officers that accompanied him out of Italy. Of his Gothick Priſoners Vitigis ſtaid at Conſtantinople; the reſt ſerved with him againſt the Perſians, and to what purpoſe we ſhall ſhortly ſee.

147. Whilſt Beliſarius made haſte to prevent any new Invaſion of Choſroes, he in the mean time led an Army into Lazica, being invited by the Inhabitants upon this occaſion. The Lazians, who firſt dwelt in Cholchis, were ſubject to the Romans; not to payment of Tribute; but when their King died, the Roman Emperour was wont to ſend to his Succeſſour Enſigns of Majeſty. They guarded the Marches of the Countrey, and hindred the Hunnes, their Neighbours, from invading the Roman Territories; receiving for this no money, nor Souldiers; nor ſerving in the Emperour's Wars, onely they traded with his Subjects of Pontus, bartring their Native Commodities, as Skins, Hides and Slaves, for Corn, Salt, and other things which their Countrey wanted. But upon account of Gurgeres King of Iberia, there being ſome Roman Forces lodged in Lazica, they were very unruly, and Peter their General was ſo rapacious, as very much diſcontented the People. This was in the time of Juſtin; and when Juſtinian came to the Government, he ſent ſeveral Commanders into Lazica, and at laſt John Tribus, a man raiſed from mean condition, and advanced to this Command onely for being the wickedeſt of all men, and a moſt fit perſon, by right or wrong, to raiſe Money. He perſuaded the Emperour to build a Town upon the Sea, which was called Petra, wherein he Lorded it, and tyranniſed over all the Countrey; for he prohibited Merchants to import Salt, or any other Wares to the Lazians, ſetting up a Monopoly, and ſelling to the People at what rates he liſted. Upon this account, and by reaſon of the unuſual burthen lying upon them from the Roman Army, they were much diſcontented, and at laſt The Lazians revolt to Choſroes. reſolved not to endure it, but revolt unto the Perſians. There was no need of uſing many Arguments to Choſroes, to accept the protection of them, though their Ambaſſadours inſiſted upon the convenience he would have of infeſting the Roman Territories by Sea; the onely difficulty lay in the unpaſſableneſs of the Countrey. But they told him, that by cutting down Trees, and caſting them into the ill Places, the way might be made eaſie enough for his Forces to march, and they themſelves promiſed to be his Guides, and to work in the head of the Army.

148. Charging then the Ambaſſadours not to make known their Negotiation, he gathered together a great Army, not revealing his Intent to any but his moſt inward Counſellours, and pretending a Journey into Iberia, where a Nation of Hunnes was reported to invade the Perſian Confines. And he had this advantage by his ſecrecy, that the Spies which Beliſarius ſent into Perſia aſſured him there would be no invaſion of the Roman Territories, the King being ingaged in a War with the Hunnes. But Beliſarius, believing there would be no invaſion by Choſroes, reſolved to take the advantage which the pretended Hunniſh War would afford him, and to enter Perſia with a conſiderable Army. All his Officers concurred with him, onely Reguithancus and Theoctiſtus, Commanders of the Forces in Phœnicia Libani, though they approved of the Invaſion, yet feared in their abſence that Alamundarus the Saracen, would forrage Phœnicia and Syria, and that the Emperour might be offended with them for neglecting their charge. Hereupon they hung back, and refuſed to join in the Expedition; but Beliſarius told them, they imagined that which would not be; for in Summer, for two months of that Seaſon, the Saracens intended Religion, onely buſied themſelves in the Service of their God, and made no Inroads; but in caſe there ſhould be occaſion, he promiſed to diſmiſs them and their Troops within two months, and commanded them to march along with him.

Choſroes comes into Lazica.

Choſroes by this time taking that courſe the Ambaſſadours had directed him, paſſed through Lazica without interruption, and came into the middle of the Countrey, where the Poets feign the Story of Jaſon and Medea to have been acted. Here Gubazes, King of the Lazians, came and adored him as his Liege Lord, ſurrendring, together with himſelf, his Royal Palaces, and the whole Countrey into his hands, except Petra, which John Tzibus held with a Roman Garriſon. Choſroes ſent a Party under command of Aniavedes, to ſurprize this Town, but by a Strategem of John, who unexpectedly iſſued out upon him, when he thought there had not been a Souldier in the Town, ſo ſilent they were, he was beaten back; at which the King inraged, ſome ſay, crucified Aniavedes, then with his whole Army he begirt the Town, and after John was killed with a ſhot, by a Mine made the narrow entrance into the City paſſable, and the Romans affrighted, yielded upon compoſition for their Lives and Eſtates. Choſroes finding in Petra much Wealth belonging to John, was, contrary to his wonted humour, therewith ſatisfied; and not ſuffering the Goods of the Romans to be toucht, permitted them to live and mingle with the Perſian Army.

Takes Petra.

Beliſarius faceth Niſibis.

149. Beliſarius hearing nothing of theſe Matters, marched with his Army towards Niſibis, which he faced and skirmiſhed with a Party that ſallied out againſt him. The Perſians ſlew fifty of the Romans, and took the Enſign of Peter, General of Armenia, who had a particular Poſt aſſigned him; but Beliſarius coming in to his relief, beat them back within their Walls, killing one hundred and ten of them; and though they ſet up the Enſign as a Trophy on their Walls, and braved the Enemy, yet durſt they ſally no more out of their Fortifications. Having no hope to take Niſibis, he marcht on to a Fort called Siſibranum, full of Inhabitants, beſides eight hundred of the choiceſt Perſian Horſe, commanded by Blechames, a Perſon of great quality. But having not laid in any Proviſions, they were prevailed with by promiſes and fair words to yield.

Takes Siſibranum.

The Inhabitants being Chriſtians, and anciently Romans, the General treated with all fairneſs and civility; the Perſians, with Blechames, he ſent to the Emperour, who cauſed them to be tranſported into Italy againſt the Goths. E'er this Caſtle was taken and demoliſhed, he conſidered there was no marching any farther; and reſolved to ſend Arethas with his Saracens, being men unfit for Aſſaults, but excellent Plunderers, with ſome of his beſt Souldiers commanded by John and Trajan, to enter and haraſs Aſſyria. They paſſed the River Tigris, and finding good Pillage, ranſackt many Towns, and got great Wealth, of which Arethas fearing he might be deprived by the Romans, refuſed to return to the Camp, as he had been ordered, and cauſing a report to be ſpread of a great Army at hand, at the Rivers ſide, adviſed John and Trajan to return ſome other way into the Roman Territories. The Army of Beliſarius hearing nothing of theſe Forces, were diſtracted in their thoughts. The Heats were ſo great, that the Souldiers, eſpecially thoſe of Thrace, could not endure them, ſtirring much, and lying in cloſe Cabbins, ſo that a third part of them lay half dead of Fevers. All earneſtly deſired to return, and Reguithancus and Theoctiſtus now alledged, that the conſecrated Time of the Saracens being at an end, the Towns of Libanus and Syria would become a prey to Alamundarus.

He and Choſroes both retreat.

It was reſolved therefore in a Council of War to make a ſpeedy retreat. Choſroes in the mean time having taken Petra, had the news of Beliſarius his Invaſion, and what Arethas had done beyond Tigris. Leaving therefore fore a Garriſon in Petra, he marched back into Perſia, with the reſt of his Army, his Priſoners and booty. Beliſarius was ſent for by the Emperour to Conſtantinople, and there ſpent the Winter.

In Spring Choſroes makes a third Invaſion.

150. In the beginning of the Spring, Choſroes invaded the Roman Territories the third time with a great Army. Candidus Biſhop of Sergiopolis, having not kept his word with him, he Impriſoned and tortured, whereby he procured much Treaſure out of the Church, but beſieged the City to no purpoſe. Being come into Comagena (or Euphrateſia,) he neither foraged the Countrey, nor took Towns as formerly, but reſolved to make a farther Journey, and paſs directly for Paleſtine; for, hearing this Province was very fertile and well Inhabited, he longed to take the ſpoils thereof, and eſpecially of the Treaſures of Jeruſalem. The Romans in his paſſage made no reſiſtence, thinking it ſufficient that they ſecured themſelves in their Garriſons. Juſtinian hearing of the Invaſion, again ſent away Beliſarius, who paſſed by Poſt with great ſpeed into Comagena. Juſtus the Emperour's Brother's Son, with Buzes and ſome other Officers were got into Hierapolis, and ſent for Beliſarius to come to them; but he liked not their advice, and went to Europus a Town Situate upon Euphrates, where he fell to levying of an Army, and called the Officers away from Hierapolis. Choſroes hearing he was come hither, marcht no farther but diſpatcht Abandanes one of his Secretaries to him to complain that the Emperour had not ſent his Ambaſſadours to ratify the Treaty. Beliſarius having notice of his coming, choſe out ſix thouſand of the goodlieſt of his men, as if he would ſend them out to hunt. He ordered Diogenes one of his Lanciers, and Adolius the Son of Acacius an Armenian, and one of thoſe Officers near about the Emperour, which the Romans called Silentiarii, being alſo at preſent Captain of the Forces in Armenia, to skirt along the ſhore of Euphrates, and at times to make ſhew of paſſing the River and invading the Countrey. He himſelf when the Ambaſſadour was at hand, retired to his Pavilion made with Boards according to the cuſtome, that he might ſeem to be in a poor Town without Proviſions. On the one ſide of the Pavilion ſtood the Thracians and Illyrians, behind them the Goths, next the Herulians, and then the Vandals and Moors. They took up much ground, not ſtanding ſtill but walking at a diſtance, and lookt careleſly and confidently upon the Ambaſſadour. None had his Mantle on, but Linen Coats like Women girt about them, holding in their hands an Horſemans whip. For Arms, ſome had Swords, ſome Battle Axes, others Bows onely, looking like Hunters that gave the chaſe to wild Beaſts.

151. The Ambaſſadour coming to Audience, ſaid it was a foul Indignity, that Cæſar (ſo the Perſians called the Emperour,) had not ſent Ambaſſadours about the Articles, and that thereby his Maſter was conſtrained to enter the Roman Territories in an hoſtile manner. Beliſarius with a ſmiling countenance, and a look altogether void of trouble or fear, anſwered that Choſroes made War quite after another manner, than other Princes uſed, who firſt were wont to demand their right, and if they were refuſed, then betook themſelves to Arms; whereas he being firſt entred into the Bowels of the Empire, did not ſhame to talk of Peace; and with this he diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadour. Abandanes returning, perſwaded his Maſter to lay down his Arms and be quiet, for he had light upon a Captain, the ſtouteſt and the wiſeſt in the World, and upon ſuch Souldiers, as eye never beheld the like, whoſe order and demeanour he could never ſufficiently admire. Beſides he told him, the match betwixt them was very unequal; for if he overcame, he ſhould but vanquiſh a Slave of Cæſar's, but ſhould he be defeated, he ſhould get infinite diſhonour to himſelf and his Houſe. If the Romans ſhould be beaten, they might eſcape into their Fortreſſes, being in their own Countrey; but if his Army ſhould be worſted, not one would eſcape to carry the News into Perſia. Choſroes moved by theſe reaſons, had a mind to go home, but march back again through the Wilderneſs he could not, his Proviſions failing: he knew the paſſages of the River to be Guarded, but in concluſion thought it beſt, though with hazarding of a Battel, to get over the River, and to make his Retreat through a plentifull Countrey.

Beliſarius by his cunning, cauſes Choſroes to retreat.

152. Beliſarius knew well that one hundred thouſand men could not ſtop his paſſage, much leſs could he doe any thing effectually with his ſmall Numbers. Now he concluded it better policy, to make him a Bridge than to hinder his Deſign, and therefore fearing that Diogenes and Adolius might interrupt his quitting the Roman Territories, he ſent them orders to forbear, and ſo Choſroes ſpeedily making a Bridge, paſſed with his Army over the Euphrates. This was done with much eaſe, for the Perſians had ever ready in their marches great Iron hooks, wherewith faſtning long Timber together, they could make a Bridge with great Expedition. Being got on the other ſide, he ſent to tell Beliſarius that he had gratified the Romans by his Retreat, but he expected Ambaſſadours from them immediately. Beliſarius alſo went over the River, and ſent to Choſroes to commend his Reſolution of Retreating; he promiſed that Ambaſſadours ſhould ſpeedily be diſpatched after him from the Emperour to finiſh the Articles accorded, and he deſired him that in his paſſage, he would treat no otherwiſe than as friends the Roman Subjects. This he promiſed, on condition he might have ſome Principal man for Hoſtage, and accordingly Beliſarius ſent him from Edeſſa, John the Son of Baſilius, though ſore againſt his mind, being the chief man of that City, both in reſpect of Birth and Fortune. But e'er the Hoſtage could reach him, he neglected the agreement, and in his way not able to bridle his humour took Callinicum, wherein were none to defend it. For their Walls being juſt at this time in mending, and therefore part of them down, upon report of his approach, the wealthier ſort carried out their goods, and retired to other ſtrong places. The reſt with many Peaſants that flocked thither continuing in the Town without any Garriſon, he made Slaves, and laid the City even with the ground. Shortly after receiving John the Hoſtage, he retired into his own Countrey. The Armenians who had revolted to Choſroes, took aſſurances from the Romans, and with Baſſaces went to Conſtantinople. Thither alſo was Beliſarius ſent for, being, and that worthily, highly admired and extolled by all men; for, this action of ſending away Choſroes ſeemed to ſurpaſs his Triumphs, over both Vitigis and Gelimer. Certainly it was a matter of great moment, when the Romans were terrified and hid in their ſtrong holds, and Choſroes with an huge Army was in the midſt of their Countrey, for a General, coming Poſt from Conſtantinople, to incamp with a few in the very face of the Enemy, to ſtop his paſſage, and then either frighting him with his good Fortune and Valour, or deceiving him by Art, to make him in effect run away, and really to deſire and exchange Peace for War, after a tedious and fruitleſs expedition. This his proſperity, which ſeemed hitherto conſtant and unmatchable, the Emperour reſolved farther to try in the War of Italy, where things at this time went very ill, upon what occaſion we ſhewed e'er our pen left the Hiſtory of that Countrey. Though his fortune now began to change, and ſhew the fickleneſs of her own nature, with the lubricity of all humane greatneſs and excellency, yet having followed him in his proſperous Eſtate, we ſhall not leave the conduct of ſo great a Captain, in his adverſe Condition, but accompany him into that Countrey, and leave Choſroes a while to ruminate upon his late great Atcheivement. But here in our Journey we had like to have been prevented by a ſad accident, which being more deſtructive than War it ſelf, had almoſt effected a Peace by taking away the Perſons, and conſequently the quarrels of both parties.

The King takes Callinicum in his paſſage, and demoliſheth it.

Beliſarius deſervedly admired.

153. This was a Plague which almoſt conſumed Mankind, of which Procopius concludes there was no other cauſe, than the immediate hand of God himſelf. For it neither came upon one part of the World alone, nor in one ſeaſon of the year, whence ſubtile wits (as he ſaith) might fetch pretenſions. It afflicted the whole World and all Conditions of men, though of never ſo contrary a nature and diſpoſition, ſparing no Conſtitution nor Age. The difference of men as to their places of Dwelling, Diets, Complexions, Inclinations or any other thing did no good in this Diſeaſe. Some it took in Summer, ſome in Winter, and others in other ſeaſons. It began amongſt the Ægyptians of Peluſium, and ſpred to Alexandria with the reſt of Ægypt one way, and the other to thoſe parts of Paleſtine which border upon Ægypt. From thence it travelled to the utmoſt bound of the world, as by ſet Journies and Stages, making deſtruction its onely buſineſs, and ſparing neither Iſland, Cave, nor top of Mountain where mankind inhabited; for if it leapt over a Countrey, returning afterward, it left it no cauſe to rejoyce above its fellows. It began ſtill at the Sea Coaſt, and thence went to the inland parts. In the ſecond year of its Progreſs, it arrived at Conſtantinople about the middle of the Spring, where it was the fortune of Procopius then to reſide. Apparitions of Spirits in all ſhapes humane were ſeen by many, who thought the man they met, ſtruck them in ſome part of the Body, and ſo ſoon as they ſaw the Spirit, they were ſeized with the Diſeaſe. At firſt when they met them, they repeated Divine Names, and fled into Churches to no purpoſe. Afterwards they were afraid to hear their friends call them, locking themſelves up in their Chambers and ſtopping their Ears. Some dreamed they ſaw ſuch ſights, others heard a Voice tell them, they were inrolled in the Number appointed to die. But moſt without warning became feveriſh ſuddenly. Their Bodies changed not colour, nor were hot, the Fever being ſo remiſs till Evening, that neither the Patient nor Phyſician, by his Pulſe could apprehend prehend any danger. Yet to ſome the ſame day, to others the next or many after, aroſe a Bubo both in the Groin, the Armeholes, under the Ear and in other parts. Thoſe were the general ſymptomes which happened alike to all the viſited Perſons.

A dreadfull Plague.

154. There were others different, whether ſo made by the diverſity of Bodies, or the will and pleaſure of him that ſent the Diſtemper, our Authour cannot ſay. Some were ſeized with Drowſineſs and Slumbring, others with a ſharp diſtraction. The Slumberers forgot all things, if they were lookt to, ſome would eat, ſome that were neglected ſtarved to death. Thoſe that were diſtracted were vexed with Apparitions, crying out there were men to kill them, and running away, being ſo troubleſome and unruly, that their Keepers were pitied as much as they themſelves. No Phyſician or other caught the Diſeaſe by touching ſick or dead Bodies; many ſtrangely continuing free, though they tended and buried infected Perſons, and many catching it they knew not how, and dying inſtantly. Many leapt into the Water, though not for thirſt; and many into the Sea. Some without ſlumbring or madneſs had their Bubo gangreen'd, and died with extreme pain, which doubtleſs happened alſo to thoſe that had the Phrenſie, though being not themſelves they underſtood it not. Some Phyſicians hereupon conceiving the venome and head of the Diſeaſe, to lie in thoſe Plague ſores, opened the dead bodies, and ſearching the Sores, found an huge Carbuncle growing inward. Such whoſe bodies were ſpotted with black Pimples the bigneſs of a Lentile lived not a day. Many died of vomiting Bloud. Some that were given over by the moſt eminent Phyſicians, unexpectedly recovered, others, of whoſe recovery they thought themſelves ſecure, ſuddenly periſhed. No cauſe of this ſickneſs could be reached by man's reaſon. Some received benefit by Bathing, and others it hurt. Many died for want of Cure, and many eſcaped without it; in a word, no way could there be found of preſervation, either by preventing the ſickneſs, or maſtering the Diſeaſe, no cauſe appearing either of their falling ſick, or of their recovery.

155. Women with Child which were viſited, certainly died, ſome miſcarrying, ſome fairly delivered, and periſhing with their Children; three Women onely were ſafely brought to Bed and recovered, their Children dying, and one died whoſe Child had the hap to live. Such as had their Sore great and running plentifully eſcaped; the violence of the Carbuncle being thereby aſſwaged, and this was the moſt certain ſign of health. Such whoſe Sores ſtaid as they firſt aroſe, underwent the miſerable Accidents formerly mentioned. Some had their Thighs withered, when the Sores roſe upon them and did not run. Some eſcaped with diminiſhed Tongues, and lived ſtammering or uttering ſounds without diſtinction all their days. In Conſtantinople this Peſtilence laſted four months, raging three months with all extremity. In the beginning few died more than uſual. Then it growing hotter and hotter, it came to five, and at laſt to ten thouſand and more every day. At firſt they buried their Dead carefully, but at length all came to Confuſion, and many lay long unburied. Servants were without Maſters, Rich men had none to attend them. In the afflicted City was little to be ſeen, but empty Houſes, no Trade going, nor Shops open. The Emperour was much concerned as he had reaſon, and committed the overſight of the poor to Theodorus, one of the Referendarii that ſubſcribed the Emperour's anſwers to Petitions, who to thoſe that were in want diſtributed money out of the Treaſury. To theſe paſſages Procopius adds, that many out of fear left their bad courſes of Life, and conſecrated themſelves to God; and many when the danger was over, fell to their old deſpiſing of God again, and ſo he ends the deſcription of this Peſtilence, which though it continued but four months at Conſtantinople, yet Euagrius, who both himſelf and his Family was viſited with it, tells us, it laſted the ſpace of two and fifty years, prevailing ſo much, that it deſtroyed in a manner the whole World. Seeing then that it outlived Procopius, no wonder if in ſo long a time, and ſo various Climates and Countries, it changed its Symptomes, and varied ſomething from thoſe accidents which fell out in his days. Yet the deſcription of Euagrius differs very little from that of his. He affirms that in ſome things, it reſembled the Plague of Athens, deſcribed by Thucydides, and in other reſpects was far unlike it. That it began in Æthiopia as the other did, but exceeded all that ever were before it, and conſidering how long a time it raged, and flitted up and down, he admires that Philoſtratus ſhould wonder at the Plague which happened in his time, becauſe it continued fifteen years together. But whereas the Hiſtory of Procopius was ſufficiently known to the World, and particularly to Euagrius himſelf, who has taken, as all learned men know, much out of it, its a greater wonder he ſhould ſay, that the Hiſtory of this Plague

Vide Euagr. Hiſt. lib. 4. c. 28.

Plague was not penned till the time that he undertook it; for we cannot in the leaſt imagine but it was the ſelf-ſame Plague they both ſpeak of. Never any Plague was ſo like it, as that dreadfull one in the time of our Edward the Third. It began, as may be gathered from Procopius, not in the tenth, as ſome have written, but about the eighteenth year of Juſtinian's Reign, the third after the Conſulſhip of Baſilius, the third of Totilas, the DXLIV. of our Lord, and the ninth of the Gothick War in Italy, to which we muſt, after this digreſſion, now return.

Beliſarius ſent again into Italy.

Redeund. ad hujus Sect. paragr. 129.

Totilas takes Tibur.

The Iſauri depart home from the Romans.

The Romans receive a loſs.

156. Beliſarius being deſigned to give a check to the Arms of valiant and proſperous Totilas, levied with his own Money Volunteers in Thrace, and in conjunction with Vitalius, General of Illyrium, raiſing about four thouſand men, came to Salonæ, determining to go to Ravenna, and thence raiſe the Siege, for the Enemy lying in Campania and Calabria, there was no landing near Rome either with ſecrecy or ſecurity. He reinforced the Garriſon of Otranto by freſh men well ſupplied, taking out the old, who were half ſtarved. In the mean time Totilas took Tibur, and put all the Townſmen to the Sword, together with their Biſhop, the manner of whoſe death, Procopius tells us, he would conceal, leſt he ſhould leave to Poſterity Monuments of Inhumanity. But the Goths being now Maſters of this City, which was ſituate fifteen miles above Rome, and commanded the River, the Romans could not import any more Proviſions out of Tuſcany. Beliſarius came with his Fleet to Ravenna, where in vain indeavouring to draw over to him the Souldiers of Totilas, he ſent a Party into Emilia to attempt ſome of the Cities of that Countrey. The Iſaurians now left the ſervice, and went home, excuſing themſelves to the Emperour by their want of Pay, and an Invaſion which the Hunnes had made into their Territories. Totilas not ignorant hereof, ſent ſome Forces to drive the Romans out of Emilia, but they were worſted by Beliſarius his Troops, who then reinforcing Auximum, which the Goths had beſieged, two hundred of his men were ſlain by an Ambuſcado, and all their Arms and Baggage were loſt; for when upon conſideration of their diſability to match the Beſiegers, and that by ſtaying, they did but conſume the Towns Proviſion, and make it more liable to be taken, they reſolved to depart, their Reſolution was made known by a Renegado to the Enemy. Piſaurus a ſmall Town upon the Gulf betwixt Auximum and Ariminum, Beliſarius fortified, which Totilas having attempted to ſtorm, but to no purpoſe, returned to the ſiege of Auximum, where the Romans kept cloſe within their Walls. Finding both by eſpials and his demeanour that Beliſarius was not able to fight him, he fell upon other ſtrong Towns, blocking up Firmum and Aſculum in Picenia; and ſo ended the Winter with the tenth year of the War, written by Procopius.

Beliſarius ſends for a new Army.

Totilas beſieges Rome.

157. Beliſarius being moſt concerned for Rome, ſent Artaſiris a Perſian, and Barbation a Thracian, two of his Life-guard, to defend it, together with Beſſas the Governour at preſent, and ordered them, in caſe they were beſieged, to make no Sallies at all. Being utterly unable to relieve the beleagured Towns, he ſent John to Conſtantinople, taking of him an oath for his ſpeedy return, and to importune the Emperour to ſend a new Army, and ſufficient ſupplies, for the old Souldiers were quite out of heart, by reaſon of the want of their expected Pay for ſo long a time. The ſubſtance of theſe things he ſignified to Juſtinian in a Letter, which though they were ſufficiently pungent, yet they moved the Court very little, and John ſtaid long at Conſtantinople, where he married the Daughter of Germanus the Emperour's Nephew by his Brother, and was ſo taken up with his Bride, that he minded none of thoſe Matters for which he was ſent. In the mean time Totilas took in ſeveral Towns in Tuſcany and elſewhere; and having in vain attempted Peruſia, though he procured Cyprianus the Governour to be treacherouſly murthered, departed towards Rome, which he cloſely beſieged. During the Leaguer he did no damage at all to the Husbandmen of Italy, letting them ſecurely till their Ground; onely the publick Revenue or private Rents he took to his own uſe, and thereby ſufficiently provided for his Army, while the Beſieged laboured under all ſorts of miſeries. For after a brisk ſally made by Artaſiris and Barbation againſt the mind of Beſſas, wherein having faln into an Ambuſcado of the Enemy, they loſt moſt of their men, and hardly eſcaped themſelves with their lives, the Famine began to grow ſore in the City, no Victuals being imported either by Land or Sea. For the Goths, after they had reduced Naples, ſcoured the Seas by a Fleet of Barks, and ſurprized all Veſſels in the way from Sicily to Rome. Totilas having men enough to ſpare, ſent an Army into Emilia, and laid ſiege to Placentia, a City ſtanding upon the Poe, and onely continuing in obedience to the Romans.

158. Beliſarius by this time repented his coming to Ravenna, upon the perſuaſions of Vitalius, where being ſhut cloſe up, he gave ſufficient ſcope to the Goths to advance their Affairs, Providence indeed turning all his Councils and indeavours to the contrary end. Fearing not onely the loſs of Rome, but all the reſt, and not able with ſo ſmall an Army to relieve them, he once reſolved to riſe and ſurprize ſome Places near the City, whence he might in certain junctures of time be able to afford the Beſieged ſome ſuccour. Yet committing Ravenna to the care of Juſtinus, he marched through Dalmatia to Epidamnus, and thence writing Letters of a freſher date to the Emperour, expected in return an Army from Conſtantinople. At length came a number of Souldiers, partly Romans, partly Barbarians, under conduct of John the Nephew of Vitalianus, with whom were joined in Commiſſion Iſaac the Armenian, Brother to Aratius and Narſes. Narſes alſo the Eunuch, whom he had ſent to the Herulian Princes upon the ſame account, brought many of that Nation along with him, who were commanded by Philimuth and others, and in their march did the Romans a very great ſervice by adventure. For meeting by chance with a multitude of the Sclavi, who having paſſed the River Iſter, plundred all the Countrey, and took a great number of Captives, they had the courage to fight them; and though inferiour in numbers, beat them out of the Field, reſcued the Priſoners out of their hands, and ſent them home. Beliſarius in the mean time ſent Valentinus, and Phocas an expert Souldier, one of his Life-guard, to relieve Rome, which from Portus they attempted to no purpoſe, as alſo did Vigilius the Roman Biſhop from Sicily, who ſending ſome Ships laden with Corn to relieve the City, they all fell into the Enemies hands. And ſo ended the Winter and the eleventh year of the Gothick War, written by Procopius.

Placentia yielded to the Goths.

159. Vigilius the following Summer was ſent for by the Emperour to Conſtantinople. Placentia was by famine (which conſtrained the Beſieged at length to eat one another) forced to ſurrender upon compoſition. Rome was well nigh brought into the ſame extremity, though the poorer ſort were very much ſupported by the liberality of Pelagius a Deacon of that Church, who having dwelt long in Conſtantinople, in the grace and favour of Juſtinian, was grown very rich; and being newly come to Rome, ſpent moſt of his Riches upon ſuch as were in want by reaſon of the Siege. He alſo at the deſire of the Romans undertook to plead their Cauſe before Totilas, who received him very gratiouſly, but diſmiſſed him without any ſatisfaction in relation to his Meſſage. Herewith the Beſieged were utterly diſcouraged, and the Famine growing ſore upon them, though the Souldiers Victual was not yet all ſpent, Multitudes flocked to Beſſas and Conon weeping, and bitterly lamenting their condition, and praying them either to give them Food, to let them go, or elſe kill and diſpatch them out of the way. The Officers anſwered, that to ſupply them with Victuals was impoſſible, to kill them was impious, and to let them go unſafe; but they cheered them as much as they could, and put them off with great aſſurances of Beliſarius and an Army from Conſtantinople. The Famine grew every day more unſupportable. Beſſas and Conon having laid up great quantities of Corn for the Garriſon, at firſt retrenched their own allowance, and ſold to the Richer ſort at huge rates; as for example, a buſhel of Wheat for ſeven golden Staters. The meaner ſort not able to reach ſo high, paid a fourth part, and the Buſhel was fill'd up with Bran, which their Stomachs were able enough to digeſt. An Oxe was ſold at fifty Staters. He thought himſelf no mean man that could get a dead Horſe to feed on. The Multitude fed on Nettles growing near the Walls, and amongſt Rubbiſh, which they firſt boiled to prevent ſtinging. Such as had Purſes at firſt to go to the Rate of the Wheat and Bran, when they failed, purchaſed it with their Houſhold-ſtuff, till all the Corn being ſpent (ſave a little preſerved by Beſſas) and Money failing, they all betook themſelves to Nettles. There not being enough of this to fill their Bellies, much leſs to ſupply the neceſſities of Nature, they pined away, their Skins grew pale and wan, and they looked like ſo many moving Ghoſts. Many chewing Nettles, fell down and died with them in their Mouths as they went along. They forbore not one another's Excrements; and many, when Dogs and Rats failed them, killed themſelves. Afterward the Commanders, ſeeing things reduced to this extremity, for Money, ſuffered ſuch as would, to go out of the City. Some few ſtaying behind the reſt, fled whither they could; but moſt of them were ſo weak, that they died on Shipboard, or elſe upon the High-ways. Such as the Enemy caught, he failed not, though not out of any compaſſion, to rid out of this miſerable life. To ſuch a dreadfull condition was reduced the State of the People and Senate of Rome.

A grievous Famine in Rome.

160. Beliſarius moved with this ſad Calamity, failed from Epidamnus unto Portus, giving in charge to John to march through Calabria; and having cleared thoſe Parts of the Goths, which were not very many, to meet and join with him about Rome. But John having done ſome execution upon ſeveral Parties in his paſſage, durſt not venture to paſs by Capua, though it had no more in it than three hundred men, and he had at his heels the choiceſt of the Roman Army, ſo ſtrong were his fears of being ſurrounded by the Goths. Therefore did the General, fearing ſome deſperate Reſolution of the ſtarving Romans, ſtudy ſome means to victual the City, which he had not Forces enough to relieve by fight. Upon the Tiber, about eleven miles below Rome, where the Chanel is narroweſt, Totilas had laid a Bridge of Planks, and at either ſide built wooden Towers, and put good Garriſons into them to hinder the paſſage of Barks up to the City.. Beliſarius therefore tied two Barks together, upon which he raiſed a Tower of Wood, higher than thoſe the Enemy had made at the Bridge; and lancht into the Tiber two hundred Pinaces, the ſides of which were full of Loop-holes to ſhoot at the Enemy. Aboard the Pinaces he put Corn and other Proviſions, and towards the River's mouth, in places of advantage, laid Horſe and Foot by either Bank, to hinder the deſigns of the Enemy upon Portus. This Garriſon he committed to the care of Iſaac, together with the charge of his Wife, and what other things he had there, expreſly charging him not to ſtir, though he heard Beliſarius were ſlain, but to keep cloſe to his Guard, that upon any ill Accident there might be a place of retreat; for other Forts in the Countrey there were none, all the reſt being in the hands of the Enemy. He himſelf conducted the Pinaces, and cauſed the two Barks with the Turret to be towed after; on the top of which he put a little Boat, full of Pitch, Rozin, Brimſtone, and other combuſtible matter. That theſe his Devices might better ſucceed, he had the day before ſent order to Beſſas to make a general Sally, and alarm the Enemies Camp.

Beliſarius attempts to relieve Rome with Proviſions.

161. Beſſas making great gain of the Corn which had been laid up for the Souldiers, was not willing the Siege ſhould be raiſed, and therefore neglected both theſe and former orders. But Beliſarius rowed up the ſtream, which ran ſtrong againſt him; the Goths all this while lying quiet in their Trenches. Near the Bridge he found an Iron Chain croſs the River, which, after he had killed ſome, and frighted away the reſt who made oppoſition, he eaſily removed, and paſſing on to the Bridge, fell preſently to work. The Goths from their Towers valiantly defending themſelves, he cauſed the Barks with the Turret to be rowed near to the Enemies Tower, which ſtood in the water by the way from Portus. Then was the Cockboat ſet on fire, and ſhoved down juſt upon the ſaid Tower of the Enemy, which inſtantly fell afire, and burnt with it ſelf two hundred Goths, together with their Officer, one of the valianteſt of their Nation, the Roman Souldiers in the mean time plying with Shot ſuch as came from the Gothick Camp to the relief of their Fellows, ſo thick, that being amazed at the Accident, they ran all away. They laid hands on the Bridge, and had ſuddenly pulled it down, and gotten into Rome, none oppoſing, but that Fortune now ſhewed her fickleneſs, and ſome envious Dæmon plotted the ruine of the Roman Affairs, in the opinion of Procopius. The good Succeſs of the Romans at the Bridge had the ill luck to be too ſoon reported at Portus, which tickled ſo much Iſaac the Governour, that not able to hold, he muſt needs have a ſhare in the honour; and forgetting or ſlighting the Commands of the General, went haſtily to the other ſide of the River where Oſtia ſtands, and with an hundred Horſe of the men left him by Beliſarius, charged the Enemies Quarter, commanded by Roderick a skilfull and valiant Souldier. Surpriſing the Goths, he wounded many beſides Roderick himſelf; and they ſuſpecting more to be coming, or rather on purpoſe to draw him on into danger, quitted their Quarter. For Iſaac having entred the Trenches, and falling to pillage, the Goths returned upon him, killed many, and took himſelf and others Priſoners. The news being carried to Beliſarius by ſome Horſemen, that Iſaac was taken by the Enemy, aſtoniſht thereat, and never inquiring the manner, but thinking Portus and his Wiſe to be loſt, and all ruined, by reaſon that now the Army had no Fortreſs to retire to, he had not a word to ſay, a thing which to him before had never happened. Immediately he drew back his Forces, meaning to charge the Enemy unprepared, and by all means to recover the Place.

His Deſign fruſtrated.

Ῥουδερίχος, Roderich, quiete pollens: Alibi & in voce Al. Rodericus, nomen etiamnum Hiſpanis ex Gothico frequens.

162. Coming to Portus, and there perceiving as well the precipitancy of his own Councils, as the Raſhneſs of Iſaac, the thoughts thereof ſo tormented him, that through perturbation of mind he fell into a Fever, which afflicted him a long time, and brought him to deaths door. Roderick died of his wounds within three days, which ſo incenſed Totilas againſt Iſaac, that out of revenge he put him to death. In the mean time Beſſas drives a great Trade within Rome, hunger and neceſſity raiſing his Market to ſuch a pitch, that wholly taken up with the thoughts of his profit, he totally neglected his Charge, ſo that the Souldiers were negligent, the Sentinels ſlept ſecurely, none ever viſiting them, calling them to account, or going the Through trouble of mind, he falls into a fever.

Beſſas baſely covetous.

the Round, as was uſual; and the Citizens almoſt ſtarved, refuſed to keep any watch. Matters ſtanding thus, four Iſaurians being Sentinels near Porta Aſinaria, ſlipt down the Walls by Ropes tied to the Battlements, late at night, when their Fellows were aſleep, and coming to Totilas, undertook to receive his Army within the City. He ſent them back loaded with promiſes, and with them two Souldiers, who found all things in repoſe and ſecurity, and accordingly made their report of the eaſineſs of the Enterprize, yet would he not truſt to it, fearing ſome treachery in the Iſaurians, who not many days after came to him again, and ſo urged him to the buſineſs, that he ſent two other Souldiers with them. Theſe examining all exactly, made ſuch a report as agreed with the former; but in the mean time ſome Goths were taken by the Roman Scouts, who being brought to Beſſas, acquainted him with the hopes of Totilas to have Rome betrayed into his hands by Iſaurians. Yet did both Beſſas and Conon make ſlight of the Advertiſement; and the Iſaurians coming the third time to Totilas, and he ſending others, and one of his own Kindred with them, and they reporting ſtill the ſame thing, he reſolved upon the Enterpriſe.

163. The ſame night therefore he ſilently armed his Forces, and led them to Porta Aſinaria. Four Goths ſtrong and valiant he appointed to mount the Battlements with the Iſaurians, who being got into the Town, went to the Gate, and not meeting any body, with their Battle-axes cut in two the Timber Poſts upon which the Gates hung, and wrenched off the Iron-work and Locks, which being done, they opened the Gates, and received in Totilas with his Army. Totilas to provide againſt all Ambuſhes, ſuffered not his men to ſcatter abroad, but drew all up to one place. Upon the Alarm the City was preſently in a tumult. Moſt of the Roman Souldiers ran out with their Commanders at another Gate. Some of them took ſanctuary with the Townſmen in Churches. Of the Patritians, Decius, Baſilius, and ſome others, having Horſes, fled with Beſſas. Maximus, Olybrius, Oreſtes, and others, fled to Saint Peter's Church. Of the common ſort remained but five hundred men, who took ſanctuary alſo; the reſt were either fled or ſtarved. Totilas in the morning, fearing no Ambuſh, went to Saint Peter's Church to prayer, his men in their way killing about ſix and twenty Souldiers, and ſixty Commoners. Thither being come, Pelagius the Deacon, with the Goſpels in his hands, came a Suppliant to him: Crying out, O ſpare, my Lord, your own People. Totilas ſcoffed at him at firſt, but won with his importunate Supplications, forbad his Goths to kill any more, but gave them leave to plunder the City, reſerving the choiceſt of the Pillage to his own uſe. Much Wealth was found in the Houſes of the Patritians, but the moſt conſiderable was the Treaſure of Beſſas, which by his covetous exactions he had heaped up for Totilas. Many Senatours, and Ruſticiana the Widow of Boetius, and Daughter of Symmachus, a moſt pious and charitable Matron, went begging their Bread of their Enemies, wandring from door to door, and craving ſuſtenance without bluſhing. The Goths indeavoured to put her to death, for bribing the Roman Commanders to break down the Images of Theodorich in revenge of her Husband's and Father's deaths, but Totilas preſerved both her and all other Women from the cruelty and inſolence of the Souldiers, to his great honour and reputation. But thus was Rome taken, and handled by the Goths in the twelfth year of the War, the ſixth after the Conſulſhip of Baſilius, the one and twentieth of Juſtinian's Reign, and the ſixth of Totilas, A. D. DXLVII.

Rome ſurpriſed.

164. Totilas perceiving his men to be elevated with their good ſucceſs, made a ſober diſcourſe to them, wherein he ſhewed, how according to the juſtice and moderation of their Actions, both the one ſide and the other had hitherto riſen and fallen, gone down the wind, and proſpered. The Roman Senatours he reproached with ſome bitterneſs, that having received ſuch benefit from the Gothick Kings, been employed in all Offices, managed the whole State, and inriched their Families, they had carried themſelves ſo ingratefully to their Benefactours, and betrayed their own Intereſt by bringing Greeks into their Countrey. For whereas they had never received any hurt from the Goths, but abundance of good, he affirmed they never could boaſt of any benefit from Juſtinian, except it were their being deprived of almoſt all Commands, called to account for their Arrears, even the Treaſury of the Goths, and paying their Tributes in times of War as well as Peace. He objected many things, carrying himſelf as angry Maſters are wont to do towards their Slaves, for ſuch he told them they muſt account themſelves; yet at the interceſſion of Pelagius, when they ſtood ſilent before him, he promiſed them pardon, and let them go. But to Juſtinian he ſent the ſaid Pelagius, with Theodorus a Roman Oratour, as his Ambaſſadours, threatning, if the Emperour would not imbrace Peace, to lay Rome flat with the ground, to kill all the Senate, and bring the War into Illyrium; by Totilas ſends to Juſtinian.

by Letters he propounded to him the example of Anaſtaſius and Theodorich their reigning peaceably together; offering, in caſe he would doe the like, to own him for his Father, and that he ſhould have the Goths his Friends and Allies againſt whomſoever he pleaſed.

165. To this Juſtinian onely anſwered, that he had made Beliſarius his General and Vicegerent, with abſolute authority, who had full power to manage all things of that nature as he pleaſed. During the Voyage of the Ambaſſadours, Totilas in vain attempted to open the paſſage into Lucania, the Straits being guarded by Tullianus, who had levied ſome Peaſants in that Countrey, and had three hundred Antians left him by John, who of all Barbarians were moſt proper to fight in a faſtneſs. Totilas inraged at this repulſe and defeat of his men, reſolved to demoliſh Rome, leaving part of his Army in ſome Town thereabout with the reſt to go againſt John and the Lucanians. He threw down a third part of the Walls, or thereabout, was ready to ſet fire to the faireſt and moſt eminent Buildings, and had nothing more in his thoughts than to make the Seat of Rome a Paſture for Sheep; when Beliſarius advertiſed, ſent a Meſſage to him, and by Letters diverted him from his purpoſe. He inſiſted much upon the Majeſty and Grandure of this Ancient City, which having been raiſed to this pitch of greatneſs by the vertue and induſtry of ſo many Ages, Poſterity could not but look upon him that deſtroyed it as an Enemy to Mankind, depriving them of the Pattern and Spectacle of the worth and gallantry of their Anceſtours. Should he prove victorious, he told him, he would by demoliſhing Rome, ruine not what was another's, but his own, being the goodlieſt Poſſeſſion in the World; whereas, in caſe he was worſted, by preſerving it, he ſhould obtain abundant thanks from the Conquerour; but by deſtroying it, deprive himſelf of all pretence to mercy and favour. In concluſion, that he would get nothing by it, but a fame in the World, ſuitable to ſuch a proceeding which now attended his Reſolution herein either way; foraſmuch as whatſoever the Actions of Princes be, ſuch muſt neceſſarily be the Name and Reputation they muſt bear from them.

Who refers all to Beliſarius.

Totilas thereupon purpoſes to deſtroy Rome.

Beliſarius by Letter diverts him.

166. Totilas upon often peruſing the Letter, and ſeriouſly conſidering the Advice, forbare doing any farther harm to Rome; and ſignifying his determination to Beliſarius, diſmiſt the Meſſengers. Moſt of his Army he cauſed to incamp at Algidum, fifteen miles to the Weſtward of the City, to keep Beliſarius faſt in Portus; with the reſt he himſelf marched againſt John and the Lucanians. Not a man did he leave in Rome, leading ſome Senatours with him, and ſending the reſt, with their Wives and Children into Lucania. John hearing of his coming, retired into Otranto, after whoſe departure, the Husbandmen were directed to manure their Grounds as formerly, which were now declared to belong to their old Landlords. Tullianus alſo ran away, and his three hundred Antians betook themſelves to John's Army; ſo that all on that ſide the Gulf, Otranto excepted, became again ſubject to the Goths, who grown bold, and ſtragling abroad in ſmall Parties, John's Forces killed many of them, which cauſed Totilas to unite his Army about Mount Gargarus, almoſt in the middle of Apulia, where he incamped in the very Intrenchments of Hannibal. In the mean time Spoletum was retaken by the means of Martianus a Roman Souldier, who counterfeited himſelf a Fugitive; and John ſeizing upon Tarentum, fortified it by a Ditch cut through the Iſthmus. Totilas ſurprized Acherontis, a ſtrong Caſtle of Lucania, upon the Confines of Calabria, into which he put four hundred men, then led he his Army toward Ravenna, leaving a Party in Campania to look to the Senatours thither confined.

167. But Beliſarius hearing how Totilas had quitted Rome, burnt with a deſire of once more poſſeſſing himſelf of that City, and leaving a ſmall Garriſon in Portus, went thither with the reſt of his Army, and a full reſolution to hold it. Not able in a ſhort time to repair the great breach made by Totilas in the Wall, he heaped Stones rudely one upon another without any Morter, onely to give it the form and ſhape of a Wall, but without it pitcht good ſtore of Stakes, having formerly made a Ditch round about, as was ſaid before; And the whole Army labouring chearfully, the Work was finiſhed in five and twenty days. The Romans out of the Adjacent Countrey flocked thither, as well out of love to the Place, as to be ſupplied with Victual, which in abundance was imported by Beliſarius up the River. Totilas at the News went inſtantly back to Rome, not fearing to recover it; for the Gates he had broken down, were not yet ſet up for want of Artificers. But where the Gates had ſtood, Beliſarius placed ſome of his beſt Souldiers, commanding the reſt from the Walls to oppoſe the Aſſailants. And that they did with ſuch courage, that the Goths, who hoped to take the Town at the firſt onſet, finding the buſineſs difficult, grew angry, and their anger made them more reſolute and venturous.

Beliſarius again fortifies Rome as well as he can.

Totilas returns againſt it.

Neceſſity alſo conſtraining the Romans to be Valiant, the Fight was hot, and continued from Morning to Night, which being come, the Goths who had received great loſs, returned to their Camp, and dreſſed their wounded men. The beſieged kept Guards upon the Walls, and cauſing their beſt men by turns to watch the Gates, pitcht before them many Tribuli or Murices, which were made after this faſhion. Four Iron ſprigs of equal length, they faſtned together in ſuch a form, that their right lines made a triangle every way. Theſe they caſt upon the Ground, and three of them ſtuck faſt; the other ſtanding upright, hindered the approach of Horſe and Men, and if by chance they were turned over, the point that ſtood up before, pitched into the Ground, and another got up in its ſtead, hindring thus a charging Enemy.

After many Aſſaults draws off.

Beſieges Peruſia.

168. Totilas the day following, aſſaulted Rome the ſecond time, but receiving the worſt, the Enemy ſallied out upon him, and killed many of his men; and many days after though he had made great preparations, he had the ſame fortune, and was forced to draw off to Tibur, breaking down the Brides upon the River, that the Enemy might not fall upon his Rere, onely that called Pons Milvius, he could not demoliſh. He cauſed to be rebuilt the Caſtle of Tibur, which formerly his Countreymen had demoliſhed, and kept himſelf for ſome time quiet within it. Beliſarius in the mean while ſetting up the Gates at his eaſe, which he lined with Iron, and once more ſent the Keys to the Emperour, with which paſſages ended the Winter, together with the twelfth year of the War. The Goths, who had formerly magnified their King, eſteemed his Valour, admired his fortune, and accounted themſelves happy in their Choice, upon this little misfortune and want of ſucceſs, began to be quite altered in their thoughts and demeanour towards him, reproaching him licentiouſly for his unadviſedneſs, in not demoliſhing all Rome when he took it, or in not keeping it himſelf, but thus ruining what they had effected with much time and labour. Having ſent Forces to beſiege Peruſia, and the Siege wanting ſome aſſiſtence, when he purpoſed with his whole Army to march thither, they received his Directions repiningly. This put him upon an Apology, wherein he ſhewed the viciſſitude of all humane things, the inconſtancy of Fortune, eſpecially in matters concerning War, and proved that his want of ſucceſs, was the product of his diſaſtrous Stars, not the effect either of his Neglect or Ignorance. From theſe and ſuch like Topicks he ſo framed his Diſcourſe, that he perſwaded them to undertake the Enterprize of Peruſia, and ſate down before it. As the Goths thus ordered their matters, John who had beſieged the Caſtle of Acherontis, departed ſuddenly from before it into Campania, and there ſet at liberty the Senatours and their Wives, ſending them into Sicily. And he routed a party of four hundred Goths, he accidentally met at Capua, whom Totilas ſent to prevent that which he accompliſhed upon the Senatours.

John eſcapes his Hands.

169. Totilas inraged to be thus robbed of his prey, muſt needs be revenged upon John, and marches preſently upon the News againſt him, over Mountains and through by-ways to avoid his Scouts, and by Night he ſet upon him contrary to the true Maximes of War, which plainly ſhew it to be the beſt for a ſtronger Army to make an open Fight. He was ten to one in numbers, and might eaſily have taken them all as in a Net, but upon the alarm, they moſt of them ſlipt away by the advantage that darkneſs afforded them, and with loſs of ſcarcely one hundred men eſcaped with their Leader to Otranto. Things ſtanding thus in Italy, the Emperour, upon the importunate Letters of Beliſarius, ſent about one thouſand four hundred men in ſeveral parties, and under ſeveral Officers, and wrote to him that he was to expect a great Army in Calabria, wherewith he would have him give the Enemy Battel. Hereupon he pickt out of his men, ſeven hundred Foot, and two hundred Horſe of the choiceſt, and leaving the reſt to Conon, to guard the places about Rome, departed for Sicily, thence intending to put in at Tarentum. But making for this place, by contrary Winds and Storms, he was conſtrained to come to Anchor in the Haven of Crotone, to the Eaſtward of the Bay. (Thurium being on the North, and Tarentum ſtanding about the middle,) and there to ſtay with his Wife and all the Foot intending to ſend for John's Army. His Horſe he Commanded to march higher into the Countrey, and Quarter there where the Mountains of Lucania reaching into Brutia, and meeting at a ſtrait make two narrow Paſſages, the one called in Latine Petra Sanguinis, and the other Labulla, neighbour to which was Ruſcia the Arcenal of the Thurians, and ſeven miles and an half above it a ſtrong Caſtle, built by the ancient Romans, which the Goths had a little before poſſeſſed, and therein placed a ſtrong Garriſon. The Horſe being hither ſent, that they might better get Proviſions, and keep off the Enemy in faſtneſſes, met Forces ſent by Totilas to relieve that Caſtle, which they utterly defeated killing above two hundred. The News hereof being brought to Totilas by thoſe that eſcaped, he alſo underſtood of the ill government, and careleſs demeanour of the late Victors, for they neither lay together in one Body, nor kept Guards upon the two paſſages, but elevated with their ſucceſs lodged ſecurely far aſunder, and all the day ſtragled for Proviſions, without ſending abroad their Scouts, or adviſing upon any courſe of ſafety. Totilas therefore with three thouſand choſen Horſemen, comes ſuddenly upon them, and eaſily amazed and defeated them, whereat the Romans were much creaſt-faln, having ſet their hopes upon theſe, as being extraordinary good men. Beliſarius having News of the Defeat, and that the Goths would ſuddenly be with him at Crotone; in great grief ran to his Ships, weighed Anchor, and with a fair wind came the ſame day before Meſſina in Sicily, diſtant from Crotone eighty ſeven miles, ſtanding right over againſt Rhegium.

The Sclavi paſs the Danube.

Ægypt overflown by the Nile.

The Porphyrion taken.

Totilas beſieges Ruſciana.

170. About this time, a mighty power of the Sclavi paſſed the Danube, and did infinite miſchief in Illyrium, peircing as far as Epidamnus, killing and captivating all they found, and ſpoiling the Countrey. They took many Caſtles none defending them, and roved up and down without Controll; the Commanders of Illyrium waiting ſtill upon their Motions, with fifteen thouſand men, but not daring to come near them. The ſame Winter were many terrible Earthquakes in Conſtantinople and elſewhere, all by Night, but no hurt was done. But the River Nile ſwelled eighteen Cubits, and overwhelmed all Ægypt. In the Countrey of Thebais, and the upper Grounds, the Waters abated in ſeaſonable time, but retired not at all from the lower, but covered them all the Seed time, a thing which had never before happened, as Procopius affirms. To ſome places the water returned again, and rotted the Seed put into the Ground, during the abatement, ſo that moſt of the Cattle periſhed for want of ſuſtenance. The great Whale was now alſo taken by the Conſtantinopolitans, called Porphyrion, which, at times, for the ſpace of above fifty years, had infeſted them, drowning Ships and forcing Mariners through fear upon great Inconveniences. Juſtinian had attempted many ways to take the Monſter, but ſtill unſucceſfully. Now ſhe purſuing a great number of Dolphins, which came up the mouth of the Euxine, as far as the River Sagaris, and following her Prey too near the ſhore, fell into the Mud, where tumbling and ſtrugling, ſhe farther intangled her ſelf, and the People of the Countrey coming upon her, hewed her with Axes, but not able to kill her, with great Ropes drew her aſhore, where they found her thirty Cubits long, and ten broad, and ſome preſently fell of eating her, and others pickled her up. The news of this Whale added to that of the Nile, and the Earthquake, gave great occaſion of diſcourſe to the Conſtantinopolitans, amongſt whom was no talk now, but of ſtrange things to come portended by theſe Prodigies. Whatever they ſignified as to the future, for the time paſt the Overflowing of Nile had cauſed much Calamity, and the killing of the Fiſh, according to common apprehenſion, was the riddance of a great miſchief; though ſome ſaid it was not the Porphyrion it ſelf, but ſome other Whale. In the mean time, Totilas in Italy unconcerned at thoſe Prodigies, and rather Propheſying good to himſelf, than any harm by them, underſtanding that the Romans in Ruſciana were ſcarce of Proviſions, ſate down cloſe by it, hoping to maſter it e'er it could be relieved. And thus ended the Winter, and the thirteenth year of the War, written by Procopius.

171. The Emperour now ſent two thouſand Foot into Sicily, and commanded Valerianus inſtantly to repair to Beliſarius. Paſſing the Gulf, he found him at Otranto with his Wife Antonina, who then Sailed to Conſtantinople, to obtain from Theodora the Empreſs, better Supplies for her Husband; but ſhe found her dead, having lived in that ſupreme Dignity the ſpace of one and twenty years, concerning whoſe Actions and demeanour we ſhall have enough to ſay, when we come to the Character of her Husband. Beliſarius ſent for John to Otranto, and with him and Valerianus having got a Fleet together, Sailed to the relief of Ruſciana. The Garriſon had capitulated to yield up the Caſtle by Midſummer, provided they had no hurt done them, in caſe they were not ſuccoured in the mean time, but now diſcerning the Fleet, they took courage and refuſed to yield, though the day aſſigned was at hand. But the Coaſt having no harbour, a Storm diſperſed all the Ships, and in the Haven of Crotone they all met and made for Ruſciana again. The Goths from the ſhore were ready to oppoſe their Landing, which ſeeing they durſt not come nearer, but lay at hull off in the Sea, and at length deſpairing, tacked about to Seaward, and came again to Anchor in the Haven of Crotone; where they reſolved in Council that Beliſarius ſhould make for Rome and Victual it as he could, and that

John

Sect. 1.

John and Valerianus ſhould go into Picenia to hinder the beleaguring of the Towns there, hoping to draw Totilas alſo toward them, and ſo by a kind of Revulſion, to raiſe the Siege of Ruſciana. John with a thouſand men did accordingly; but Valerianus was afraid, and through the Ionian Gulf Sailed by Ancona, thinking to get that way more ſecurely into Picenia, and joyn with John. But Totilas raiſed not his Siege, ſending two thouſand ſelect Horſemen into Picenia to joyn with other Goths, and beat away the Roman Forces. Proviſions failing now the Garriſon of Ruſciana, he yet pardoned them all, except Chalazar who had formerly broken faith with him, and ſo received the Caſtle. Him he put to Death, cutting off his Hands and privy Members. The Souldiers that would, he received to equal Rank with Goths, and left them their goods, as his cuſtome was in all places. Such as would not, he diſmiſt, ſtript and unarmed, not deſiring any ſhould ſerve him unwillingly. Eighty of them quitted their goods, and went to Crotone. The reſt ſtaid; of whom the Italians had afterwards their goods taken away, but no hurt was done to their Perſons.

Takes it.

Beliſarius returns without honour to Conſtantinople.

172. Antonina finding the Empreſs dead, when ſhe came to Court, beſought the Emperour to recall her Husband, which ſhe eaſily obtained, the Perſian War ſorely preſſing Juſtinian. And ſo he returned to Conſtantinople without Honour, having in five years ſpace never marcht up into the land parts of Italy, nor made any expedition, but being all the while as in a perpetual flight, Sailing from one Sea Town to another, which gave the Enemy opportunity to captivate Rome, and all the reſt. And he now abandoned Peruſia the chief City of Tuſcany, which was taken by ſtorm whilſt he was on his way homeward. Thus the ſame men are not always the ſame as to external circumſtances, their own tempers and humours altering, and fortune as it were taking a delight to ſhew her power, in procuring them diſreſpect as well as honour, caſting them down, as well as raiſing them, and making them feel themſelves ſubject to her Sovereignty and Juriſdiction. Procopius our Hiſtorian in the Books he wrote concerning the Gothick War, modeſtly expreſſeth himſelf in this caſe of Beliſarius, laying the fault rather upon fortune than the man, thoſe Books being publiſhed abroad, whilſt Beliſarius and Juſtinian yet lived. But in the Anecdota, or ſecret Hiſtory, wherein with freedom enough, (if not more than enough,) he (or ſome body elſe,) publiſhed the defects and vices of thoſe great men, after their Deaths; he reprehends him for ſeveral miſtakes and willfull Errours. He confeſſes he had nothing allowed him out of the publick Treaſury, to the expence of this War, and yet charges him with extraordinary avarice and ſcraping. He accuſeth him of fleecing the Inhabitants of Ravenna, Sicily, and all others where he came, pretending to puniſh them for former faults, and their old Opinions: Lays to his charge, how being to animadvert upon Herodian, he required moneys of him, and uſed, to accompliſh his ends, ſuch continual threats, that the man wearied and afraid, renounced his Oath made to the Romans, and betaking himſelf with his Troops to Totilas, gave up Spoletum into the hands of the Goths. To his great uxorious humour, he aſcribes the grudges which happened betwixt him and John the Nephew of Vitalianus, and which exceedingly damnified the Emperour's buſineſs in Italy. For Theodora the Empreſs being inraged at John, for contracting a Marriage with Juſtina, the Daughter of Germanus the Emperour's Nephew, as the Hiſtorian concludes, gave private Orders to Antonina the General's Lady, to have him made away, ſo that he aware of this, and knowing Beliſarius to be ſo much the ſlave of his Wife, that he could not deny her any thing, durſt not come near him, nor give him any aſſiſtence in carrying on the War.

Ἐγένετο δὲ φιλοχρήματος ἐν τούτῳ τῷ χρόνῳ μάλιστα, καὶ κέρδους αἰσχροῦ ἐπιμελητὴς ἀκριβέστατος, ἅτε οὐδὲν ἐκ Βασιλέως κεκομισμένος, &c. vide Arcan. Hiſt. pag. 22.

173. What is farther objected againſt Beliſarius in that Work, we ſhall obſerve when we part for altogether with this Great General, and return to Procopius his Volumes of the Gothick Wars, where we ſhall find an account given us of ſome Conſpiracies againſt the Emperour's Perſon, at ſuch time as Beliſarius was upon his Journey. Artabanes, who ſlew the Tyrant Gontharis in Africk, had a great deſire to Marry Projecta the Emperour's Siſters Daughter, having already betrothed her, and ſhe indeed affected the Match very much, but not ſo much out of love to his Perſon, as in gratitude to a man that had revenged the Murther of her Husband Areobindus, and reſcued her a Captive, and ready to be thruſt into the loathed bed of Gontharis. Both conſenting, Artabanes ſent her to her Uncle, and being made General of Africk, deſired leave upon ſome pretences to return to Conſtantinople, hoping thereby to effect the Marriage, get many other advantages, and in concluſion, to put for the Empire it ſelf. The Emperour making another General in his ſtead, granted his requeſt, and he accordingly returned to Conſtantinople, where being a comely tall Perſon, and liberal, though of few words, he became loved and admired by the Citizens. The Emperour reſpected him with the beſt, made him General of his Forces in Conſtantinople, gave him the Command of all the Confederates, and farther graced him with the Title of Conſul. But here was the miſchief, he could not enjoy Projecta; for all this while he had a former Wife, his Countreywoman, whom he Married young, and had put off upon ſome ſlight pretences. And ſo long as his fortunes were a-making, ſhe ſate quiet at home, but now that he was grown famous for his Actions, and great in his Incomes, ſhe would no longer contain her ſelf, but made ſuit to the Empreſs to be reſtored to her Husband, which was effected ſore againſt his will. And Projecta was Married to John the Son of Pompey.

174. Artabanes inraged to have this return for all his good Services, ſo ſoon as the Empreſs was dead, preſently put away his Wife. It happened at this time, that the Emperour's Brothers Son was offended at him, for withholding from him and his Sons, an Eſtate left them by his Brother Boraides, and protecting againſt them, the Daughter of the Deceaſed, though her Father had onely left her ſo much as the Law compelled. There was alſo in Conſtantinople, one Arſaces an Armenian, of the race of the Arſacidæ, and kindred of Artabanes. Whom being Convicted of a Conſpiracy with Choſroes King of Perſia, Juſtinian onely puniſhed by ſome laſhes upon his Back, and making him ride through the City upon a Camel taking nothing from him, nor ſo much as Baniſhing him the Court. Yet hereat was he diſcontented, and deviſing how to be revenged, he took the occaſion to break his mind to Artabanes, knowing him to be much alſo out of humour. He upbraided him with poorneſs of Spirit, for ſuffering himſelf to be abuſed, and his Countrey burthened with a perpetual Garriſon and unuſal taxations, having formerly been Valiant, and forward to reſcue others, and pull down Tyrants. He told him there would be no difficulty at all in killing Juſtinian, who was wont to ſit up till Midnight without his Guards, diſcourſing with ſome old Prieſts, and buſie in diſquiſitions and endleſs in ſcanning the Oracles of Chriſtians; beſides his Kinſmen would not oppoſe, but rather joyn with him: Germanus and his Sons being wronged and diſobliged by him. Finding him yielding, he imparted the matter to one Chanaranges a Perſarmenian, an handſome Youth, but nothing ſerious, and having brought Artabanes and him together, promiſed to draw Germanus and his Sons into the Plot.

Artabanes and others Conſpire againſt Juſtinian.

175. Juſtinus, the Elder of them, who was but young, his Beard newly ſprouting, yet Valiant and ſharp witted, he deſired to meet him in a Church, where having taken from him an Oath of ſecrecy, he chid him for that, being the Emperour's neareſt Kinſman, he ſuffered Petty-fogging, and mean fellows to hold the greateſt Offices, whilſt Juſtinian deſpiſed both him and his Father, though a man that had attained to the height of Virtue, and ſuffered Juſtinian his Brother ſtill to lead a private Life, having alſo deprived them of the greateſt part of his Uncle's Eſtate, though left them by Will. Juſtinus was amazed, and flatly refuſed to joyn with him, affirming the ſame alſo in his Father's behalf, to whom he revealed the matter. Germanus acquainted with it Marcellus the Captain of the Palatine Guards, a man grave, auſtere, and of a rigid Life, who adviſed him not to reveal it as yet to the Emperour, leſt the Conſpiratours diſcovering it, Arſaces ſhould run away, and they be left utterly without proof, but he deſired that either he himſelf or ſome of his friends might hear their Diſcourſe. Accordingly one Leontius a man he could truſt, was placed by Germanus in his Dining Room behind the hangings, and he and his Son Juſtinus ſtaid in the Room, where they all heard Chanaranges plainly declaring the Conſpiracy, betwixt himſelf, Artabanes and Arſaces; and it was agreed that the Emperour ſhould not be killed till Beliſarius came to Town, who being now upon his way, in caſe they ſhould, after the deed done, make Germanus Emperour, would leavy an Army in Thrace and come againſt them, and they ſhould never be able to keep him off; But being in the Court with the Emperour, they might enter ſome Evening with their Daggers ſuddenly, and kill Juſtinian, Beliſarius and Marcellus altogether. Marcellus having this account from Leontius, yet forbare to report it to the Emperour, leſt by too much haſte he ſhould Ruine Artabanes. But Germanus fearing that which happened, to be ſuſpected for delay, revealed it to Buzes and Conſtantianus; and afterward Beliſarius being reported to be near at hand, Marcellus acquainted the Emperour with it, who cauſed Artabanes and his Complices to be committed to the common Priſon, and to be ſtrictly examined by ſome Principal Officers.

The Conſpiracy revealed.

Sect. I.

176. The Conſpiracy being manifeſt, and reduced into writing, the Senate was aſſembled in the Palace, where, notwithſtanding the Confeſſions of the Priſoners, yet Germanus and Juſtinus had been involved in the Crime, if the teſtimonies of Marcellus and Leontius had not cleared them, and Buzes alſo and Conſtantianus had not depoſed that Germanus had hid nothing from them, but demeaned himſelf as aforeſaid. So the Senate acquitted them as innocent, but the Emperour in his Chamber ſtormed, and was much inflamed againſt Germanus, for his ſlowneſs in the diſcovery, being ſeconded and ſoothed by two officious Officers, deſirous to ingratiate themſelves by the miſeries of other men; and the reſt ſtood amazed without ſpeaking a word; yielding by not oppoſing. Onely Marcellus by urging the truth vehemently, by taking all upon himſelf, and affirming that he diſcovered it more lately, becauſe he deſired more narrowly to ſearch into it, pacified the Emperour, and got great reputation by ſo ſeaſonable a virtue. Artabanes onely was removed from his Office, having no other harm, no more than the reſt who were reſtrained, but not diſhonourably, nor now in the common Priſon, but the Palace. Thus was the Emperour in danger in the Eaſt, and his Empire at the ſame time more than in danger in the Weſt, of which the Barbarians now were clearly Maſters; the Romans, who at firſt carried all before them, having after a vaſt expence of Bloud and Treaſure, loſt Italy, and ſtanding looking upon Illyrium and Thrace, ſhamefully waſted by their Barbarous Neighbours. In the beginning of the Gothick War, the Goths gave to the Franks all that part of Gall ſubject to them, being not in a condition to fight with both, which gift Juſtinian confirmed, that he might not be croſt and diverted by a War with that People; nor would the Franks have thought their Title ſure, if the Emperour had not put his Seal to the Act. Hereupon the Kings of the Franks got Marſeilles, (anciently a Colony of the Phocæans,) and became Maſters both of the Sea and the Maritime Towns. And now, ſaith he, they ſit in Arles beholding the Horſe-Races there, and Coyn Gold Staters out of the Mines in Gall, not with the ſtamp of the Roman Emperours, (as the cuſtome at this time was,) but with their own Images. Yet could not the King of Perſia though he Coined ſilver Money as he pleaſed, nor any other Barbarian King, put his own ſtamp upon a Gold Stater, yea though he was now, as much greater Maſter of Gold than the Emperour; For ſuch Coin they could not put away, though they traded with Barbarian Merchants. Moreover the Franks ſeeing Totilas prevail, ſeized the greateſt part of Venetia; the Romans having no power to reſiſt, nor the Goths to graple with both at once.

The Franks gain in theſe days.

The Gepidæ alſo Win.

Gepait cunctari pigros interpretatur Procopius, & Jornandes Gepidæ Gens è Scandinavia.

177. The Gepidæ alſo took Syrmium and almoſt all Dacia, ſo ſoon as Juſtinian had taken them from the Goths, and proceeded in making ſpoil of the Provinces, ſo that the Emperour made a ſtop of the Penſions paid them formerly by the Romans. To the Longobardi or Lombards, he gave Noricum and the ſtrong places in Pannonia, with other Towns and great Sums of money, who thereupon left their own Countrey, and ſeated themſelves by the Danube, near to the Gepidæ, pillaging Dalmatia and Illyrium as far as Epidamnus. The Heruli had alſo part of Dacia aſſigned them near the City Singedon, where inhabiting, they thence overran and ſpoiled both Illyrium and Thrace, notwithſtanding they received their full Penſions, without much attendance, and ſome of them ſerved the Romans in their Wars, and were ranked with the Confederates. But not long after, the Gepidæ, and the Lombards being too near Neighbours fell out, and a Day was appointed for a pitcht Battel between them. Both Thoriſin Prince of the Gepidæ, and Audonin of the Lombards, ſent their Ambaſſadours to Juſtinian for aid againſt this great and bloudy day. The Ambaſſadours on each ſide uſed many arguments, and Juſtinian after a long Conſultation, refuſed the Gepidæ, and ſwore a League with the Lombards to whom he ſent ten thouſand Horſe, and fifteen hundred Heruli. But the Gepidæ, underſtanding the Roman Army to be near, compounded the difference with the Lombards, and concluded a Truce without the Romans, who thereupon durſt neither go backward nor forward, but lay ſtill, and advertiſed the Emperour of their misfortune.

The Lombards.

And Heruli.

The Roman Army in a Nooſe.

178. But Vigilius Biſhop of Rome, and the Italians at Court, who were both many and powerfull, ſolicited the Emperour in behalf of their Countrey. Above all Gothicus preſſed him to it being a Patritian, and lately Conſul, who was newly come to Conſtantinople for this purpoſe. The Emperour gave them good words, and promiſed to take care of Italy, yet he ſpent moſt of his hours in Chriſtian Controverſies, and ſuch things as tended to the ſettlement of Church matters. Certainly at this time, his Affairs in that Countrey more and more went down the wind. For Totilas his Forces increaſed by an acceſſion of ſix thouſand men, brought to him to him by Ildiges, a Prince of the Lombards. And about the ſame time Ilauph, one of Beliſarius his Life-guard, revolted to him, by whom he was preſently ſent with a Navy and Forces into Dalmatia. There being thought as honeſt as formerly, and appertaining to Beliſarius, he had opportunity enough to doe miſchief, putting all the Inhabitants of Monecurus, a Sea-town near Salonæ, to the Sword, which having ſackt, he removed, and did the ſame to Laureata a Caſtle alſo upon the ſea. Certain Forces in Pinaces ſent againſt him by Claudianus, the Governour of Salonæ, he worſted, and forced them to quit their Veſſels, which he took in the Haven of Laureata, together with other Ships laden with Corn and Proviſions, which having done, and killed and ſpoiled all they found, he returned to Totilas: when the Winter ended, and the fourteenth year of the War, written by Procopius.

The Goths proſper in Italy.

179. Totilas all this while had his mind ſet upon Rome, whither now he removed, and beſieged it with his whole Army. Beliſarius had there left three thouſand of his beſt men, commanded by Diogenes, one of his Life-guard, a diſcreet man, and a good Souldier, who ſo ordered his matters, that the Siege was drawn out in length, for he diligently attended his Guards, valiantly repelled the many Aſſaults of the Goths, and by ſowing Corn within the Walls, prevented want of Victual, which they cut off from the City, now blockt up by their continuing Maſters of Portus. Had Juſtinian upon Beliſarius his return ſent another General with an Army, as he gave out he would, he might poſſibly have vanquiſht the Goths, Rome being in his obedience, and he having there an Army to join with his Succours from Conſtantinople; but though he commanded once Liberius, a Patritian, to be in readineſs, afterward he grew remiſs, and cooled again. Therefore Diogenes having no relief, after a long time ſpent in the Siege, ſome Iſaurians that watched at St. Paul's Gate diſcontented for their pay which had been wanting many years, and ſeeing the advancement of their Countrymen, who had formerly betrayed Rome to the Goths, came to a ſecret conference with Totilas, and agreed at a day aſſigned, to betray the City to him. He ſent ſome Trumpeters to ſound at another part of the Walls, which amazing the Defendants, when they ran to the ſuccour of that part, he at St. Paul's Gate was received in with his whole Army. Much ſlaughter there was in the City; and ſuch as ran out at other Gates in their way to the Centumcellæ, the onely Fortreſs the Romans had thereabouts, were cut in pieces by Ambuſhes laid beforehand for that purpoſe: ſome few hardly eſcaped, and Diogenes amongſt them; but not without having received an hurt. Yet Paulus a Cilician, formerly Steward of Beliſarius his Houſhold, afterward a Commander of a Party of Horſe, and now joined in Commiſſion with Diogenes in the defence of Rome, with four hundred Horſe made for Adrian's Tomb, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the Bridge leading to St. Peter's Church. He and his men valiantly repulſed the conquering and inſulting Enemy; and when they had no Proviſions left, and Totilas was reſolved to ſtarve them out, determined by charging the Enemy in a ſudden ſally to end their lives honourably, and by killing as many Goths as poſſible, to ſell them at as dear a rate as they could.

Totilas again takes Rome.

180. For a confirmation and ſeal of ſuch an agreement, they imbraced and kiſſed one another, as being all ready to periſh; whereof, when Totilas was advertiſed, fearing what might be the effects of ſuch a deſperate Reſolution, he ſent, and offered them either to quit their Horſes and Arms, and ſwearing never to ſerve more againſt the Goths, to return to Conſtantinople; or retaining their former Eſtates, Wealth and Privileges, to ſerve in his Army, in equal condition with the Goths. Though at firſt they choſe to go to Conſtantinople, yet afterward fearing Ambuſhes, aſhamed to travell on foot, and angry for want of pay, they gave their Names to the ſervice of Totilas; onely Paul, and one Minde an Iſaurian, deſired to be ſent into their own Countries; and Totilas commending them for fidelity and plain dealing, gave them Proviſions for their Journey and ſave conduct. The reſt of the Army having taken ſanctuary in Churches, and being in number about three hundred, upon aſſurance of Indemnity yielded to Totilas. He now reſolved neither to quit Rome, nor demoliſh any Part of it; but replant it with Goths and Romans together, and that upon this occaſion. He had lately asked in marriage the Daughter of the King of the Franks, who rejected his motion for this Reaſon, That he neither was, nor ever would be King of Italy, having indeed taken Rome, but not being able to keep it, becauſe he had demoliſhed part of it, and quitted the reſt to his Enemies. Now therefore he brought in Proviſions, and commanded to re-edifie what he had formerly broken down, ſent for the Senatours, and other, Romans, confined to Campania; held the ſolemnity of the Circenſian Games, and then prepared for a Voiage into Sicily. Yet he ſent and deſired Truce of the Emperour, offering that the Goths ſhould ſerve him in his Wars againſt any other Nation. But Juſtinian ſuffered not the Ambaſſadour to come to his preſence, and utterly rejected the Propoſition. Which having underſtood, he firſt thought fit to attempt Centumcellæ, and then having once maſtered it, to proſecute his intended Voiage into Sicily. But coming to treat with Diogenes the Governour, and finding the Garriſon reaſonably ſtrong; he was content, that according to their motion they ſhould ſend to the Emperour for Relief; and if none came, then to ſurrender the Town by a day prefixed, and thirty Hoſtages were given on both ſides. Raiſing then his Siege, he went for Sicily; in his paſſage attempted Rhegium, which holding out ſtoutly, he blockt it up with part of his Army, hoping to ſtarve them out. He ſent Forces alſo, and took the Caſtle of Tarentum; And at the ſame time Ariminum was betrayed to ſome of the Goths lying in Picenia.

Sect. 1.

Juſtinian neglects Italy.

The Sclavi make great Devaſtations.

181. Juſtinian moved at this his Succeſs, named Germanus, his Brother's Son, General in the War with abſolute Authority, and commanded him to be in readineſs; at the report whereof the Goths were troubled, Germanus having a great Name in the World, and the Roman Souldiers were much incouraged. But the Emperour, for what reaſon is uncertain, changed his mind, and appointed Liberius, a Citizen of Rome, for the ſervice; who accordingly made himſelf ready, expecting inſtantly to ſail away. But afterward Juſtinian again changed his Reſolution as to ſending him with a Land Army, and the Affairs of Italy were neglected, where alſo about this ſame time, Verus having headed many of the moſt valiant Roman Souldiers, was after much loſs defeated and ſlain. Now alſo a Party of ſome three thouſand Sclavi paſſing the Danube, and the River of Hebrus, parted into two Companies, and did much miſchief, defeating ſeveral of the Roman Commanders in Thrace and Illyrium, although they overmatched them in numbers. Asbadus, one of them, they took Priſoner, and burnt alive, having firſt cut thongs from the Skin of his Back. Though never before they had paſſed the Danube, nor foraged the Roman Provinces, now they pillaged and waſted all without controll, and took in Thrace and Illyrium many Caſtles, piercing as far as Topſerum, twelve days journey from Conſtantinople, being the firſt Sea-town of that part of Thrace. Coming before this Town, moſt of them hid themſelves in the Faſtneſſes adjoining. Some few of them alarm'd the Romans within, who thinking them no more than they ſaw, ſallied out upon them, at which the Barbarians ſeemed afraid, and ran away: But the Romans being drawn far from the Walls, the Ambuſhes roſe, thoſe that fled, now turned head, and charging them on all ſides, cut them in pieces. Notwithſtanding, the Inhabitants thus deprived of the Souldiers aſſiſtence, refuſed to yield, and reſiſted the Aſſailants as they could, powring down upon them boiling Oil and Pitch, and caſting down great Stones, by which means they ſeemed for a while to prevail and reſiſt the danger. But the Barbarians at length with ſhowrs of Arrows forced them from the Battlements, and with their Scaling-ladders took the City by aſſault. Fifteen thouſand men they killed in it, and having ſackt it, made the Women and Children Slaves, contrary to their former practice; for they had ſpared neither Sex nor Age, but killed all they met with ſince their firſt entring the Roman Territories. Hence came it to paſs that all Thrace and Illyrium were ſcattered with dead Bodies. They uſed no compendious way to ſend them out of this miſerable World. They killed them not with Swords or Lances, as was the uſual manner; but pitching Stakes into the Ground with ſharp ends upward, ſet the poor Wretches upon them at their Fundaments; then forced them downwards, and the Stakes up into their Entrails. Having alſo tied the Hands and Feet of their Priſoners to four Stakes, they knockt them on the Head with Clubs, and killed them like ſo many Dogs or Snakes. Others having ſhut up with ſuch Cattle as they could not drive into their own Countrey, they burned together without mercy. At laſt, drunk with Bloud, they were pleaſed to keep alive all they met, and both Parties returned home loaded with Wealth, and inriched with innumerable Captives.

Asbadus Haiſt-bode, celer Nuncius, A ſwift Meſſenger. Pro Bode poſtea irrepſit Francicum Meſſenger. Sed eſt hodiè in uſu apud Belgæ. Viator enim publicus dicitur Een Bode.

They take Topſerum by aſſault.

Their Cruelty.

Totilas waſtes Sicily.

Juſtinian makes his Nephew Germanus General againſt the Goths.

182. In the mean time Totilas waſted Sycily, having attempted Meſſina to no purpoſe. Thurincuth and Himerius having gallantly demeaned themſelves in Rhegium, when all their Victual was ſpent, yielded themſelves and the Caſtle by compoſition. The Emperour at the news of theſe Succeſſes, having revoked his Commiſſion to Liberius, who was an extreme old man, and no Souldier, ſent Artabanes for Sicily, remitting his Crimes, and making him General of the Forces in Thrace. His Nephew Germanus he now conſtituted General againſt the Goths, giving him no great Army, but money to raiſe one of good importance in Thrace and Illyrium; whence he ordered him to march for Italy, accompanied with Philimuth, Captain of the Heruli, and John the Nephew of Vitalianus, his Son-in-law, and General of Illyrium, where he reſided. Germanus had a great ambition to add the glory of recovering Italy to his former Reputation got in Africk, which he thought he might the more eaſily effect by means of Mattaſuntha, the Daughter of Amalaſuntha, and Grandaughter of Theodorich, whom after the deceaſe of Paſſara, his former Wife, he had married, ſhe being alſo now a Widow; for Vitigis, her former Husband, was lately dead. He more than hoped that the Goths would be aſhamed to lift up their hands againſt this Lady, out of reſpect to the memory of her Progenitors. To this Incouragement was added a great confidence he had in the ſtrength and affection of his Souldiers. For being very liberal in disburſing, not onely the Emperour's Treaſure, but his own private Money, he levied quickly and unexpectedly a very gallant Army. The beſt Roman Souldiers left their ordinary Commanders to follow him, though of ſundry Nations. Nay, the very Barbarians about the Danube, allured by his Fame, joined with him, and that not empty handed, but bringing with them good ſtore of Money. The Prince of the Lombards, particularly, ingaged to ſend him a thouſand men well armed. Now Report, as in all humane things elſe, making all this much more in Italy, the Goths were much afraid and troubled, eſpecially conſidering they were to make war againſt the Poſterity of Theodorich. The Roman Souldiers there, to his farther content, ſent him word they were ready to join with him; and taking courage, reſolved to keep their Towns for the Emperour's ſervice; nay, thoſe that were beaten in the defeat of Verus, and now ſtragled up and down, hearing that Germanus was upon his way, rallied in Iſtria, and expected his coming. Diogenes alſo being ſummoned by Totilas to ſurrender Centum cellæ according to their Capitulation, anſwered, that now that Germanus was declared abſolute General, he had no power; but he deſired him to ſend him back his Hoſtages, and he would reſtore thoſe given him by the Goths. So he carefully guarded the Town, expecting Germanus with his Army. And thus ended the Winter, together with the fifteenth year of the War, written by Procopius.

Who are thereat diſcouraged.

183. But more than all this, Germanus had a farther incouragement and Omen, as it might well be eſteemed, of his future Succeſs, while he was yet drawing his Army together, and exerciſing his Troops at Sardice, a City of Illyrium. For a number of Sclavi, greater than ever formerly had paſſed Iſter (or the Danube) foraged the Roman Territories as far as Nayſum; but hearing that he was appointed to oppoſe their Deſigns of ſacking Theſſalonica, and the Towns about it; and having formerly underſtood what, in the days of Juſtinus, his Great Uncle, he had done againſt the Antians their Neighbours (whom he ſo totally defeated in an Invaſion they had made, that he ſcarcely left one of them alive) and ſuppoſing him to have a very great Army, as being ſent againſt the Goths, they relinquiſhed their former Purpoſes, and departed over the Mountains of Illyrium into Dalmatia, not daring to appear in the Champian; ſo that he deſpiſing them, ordered his Army to be in readineſs within three days to begin the Journey into Italy. But here ſee the lubricity of humane hopes, proſperity and greatneſs, with the potent fate of the Roman Empire now in her decrepit Age. He ſuddenly fell into a ſickneſs and died, both a vertuous and valiant man, an excellent General, and a daring Souldier. In peace and quietneſs an earneſt Obſerver of Laws and good Government; an upright Judge, and ſo charitable, that he often lent great ſums without ſo much as talking of a penny Intereſt. In the Palace and Forum he was ſevere and grave; but at home and at his Table pleaſant, free and obliging: preventing, as much as in him lay, all diſorders at Court, and never ingaging himſelf in any of the Factions of Conſtantinople: a thing too much practiſed by other great ones. The Emperour much afflicted with this ſudden Accident, commanded Juſtin, one of the Sons, and John, the Son-in-law of Germanus, to lead the Army into Italy; who, foraſmuch as it was not poſſible in that ſeaſon to compaſs the Adriatick Gulf; and wanting Ships wherewith to croſs it, marched into Dalmatia, with intention to winter at Salonæ.

Germanus dies.

His Commendation.

184. Liberius, who, as it ſeems, had heard nothing of the Emperour's change of mind, nor theſe Alterations, with the Fleet under his command put in at Syracuſe, now beſieged by the Enemy, and forcing his way into the Haven, got his Army into the City. Artabanes making towards him through the Adriatick Sea, near the Coaſt of Calabria, met with a great Tempeſt, which ſcattered his Fleet, and overſet ſome of his Ships, that wherein he was imbarked ſpent alſo her main Maſt; and being abandoned to the Wind and Waves, after much danger, drove to the Iſland of Malta, by which means he was unexpectedly preſerved. Liberius within a ſmall time not able to fight with the Enemy, and ſtarved out of Syracuſe, ſtole thence into Panormus. Totilas in the mean while ranſackt all Sicily; and having got much Pillage, departed back into Italy, leaving four ſtrong Garriſons in the Iſland, thereto perſwaded by one Supinus a Roman of Spoletum and his Aſſeſſour, who being taken Priſoner by his Countreymen, they refuſed to diſmiſs him upon other terms, than that he ſhould perſwade the Gothick King to this Retreat, which he eaſily did, by frighting him with the approach of John and Juſtinian with a great Army. Thoſe two Commanders intended, by the beginning of the Spring, to march from Salonæ by Land to Ravenna, when the Sclavi, both thoſe who formerly foraged the Empire, and others, ſpoiled again with all liberty the Roman Provinces, whether hired by Totilas, to divert the Emperour from the Gothick War, as ſome ſuſpected, or otherwiſe led by a deſire of booty, and their own inclination to a Ravenous kind of life. They divided themſelves into three Parties, and were now grown to that height of Confidence, that they ſacked not the Cities, but Wintred in them as in their own, without all fear or ſuſpicion. The Emperour with the lateſt ſent an Army againſt them, Commanded by Scolaſticus an Eunuch of his Palace, which met with one party of them near Adrianople, a City Situate in the heart of Thrace, and five days Journey from Conſtantinople. The Sclavi loaded with booty, declined the fight, and incamped upon a Mountain, where the Romans beſieged them, till the Souldiers murmured at their Commanders for want of Proviſions, and delayed to ingage the Enemy. But being at length forced to ingage, the Battel was hotly fought, and the Romans were beaten; many of their beſt men ſlain, and the Commanders themſelves eſcaped narrowly, the Enſign of Conſtantianus, one of them, being taken in the Field. Now the Barbarians deſpiſing the Roman Arms proceeded in their courſe, and waſted the Countrey called Aſtica, which having never formerly been touched, afforded them good ſtore of booty. They ranged up the Countrey as far as the Long Walls, but one days Journey from Conſtantinople, but provoked the Romans to ſo great an height of Indignation thereby, that afterward part of them they routed, after much ſlaughter, reſcued great numbers of Captives, and recovered the Enſign of Conſtantianus. The reſt of the Sclavi, with the remainder of their booty departed home.

The Sclavi again waſte the Roman Provinces.

185. John the Siſters Son of Vitalianus, and Son in Law to the late Germanus, as was before hinted, paſt that Winter in Salonæ, with which the ſixteenth year of the Gothick War received its period. The Commanders in Italy expecting daily his coming, forbare all Action, and when in the Spring following, he reſolved to lead his Army againſt Totilas, he was countermanded by the Emperour, who ordained him to expect the coming of Narſes the Eunuch, whom he had made Captain General, with full authority in the War. Thus did Juſtinian by changing ſo often his Reſolutions, much hinder the progreſs of his own affairs, for Narſes his march was but ſlow, being oppoſed by ſome Hunnes in his paſſage, ſo that John might expect long enough, as he was Commanded, and be ſufficiently wearied with expectation. Therefore ſhall we leave him for the preſent at Salonæ, and giving time to Narſes to make his expedition into Italy, return again and viſit Choſroes, to ſee how he has behaved himſelf all this while, and what uſe he made of his ignominious Retreat into Perſia, beginning where we left at the time of the Plague, and the return of Beliſarius to Conſtantinople. We ſhall find him marcht Northward to Ardabigara, a Town in Aſſyria, and there repenting what he had formerly done, with purpoſe thence to invade the Roman Territories again, having incouragement, it ſeems, from the Oracle of this place; for here was a great Pyræum where the Magi kept a perpetual fire, which the Perſians worſhipped above all Gods, offering much Sacrifice, and conſulting it after their manner, in their affairs of greateſt Importance. But when he thought of War, he changed his Reſolution, hearing of two Ambaſſadours ſent from the Emperour to treat of Peace, of whom Conſtantianus fell ſick by the way, and the Plague at length came into Perſia. This put him upon a neceſſity of deſiring an Accommodation, and he accordingly ſent to Valerianus, praying that all hoſtility might be forborn, and the Ambaſſadours diſpatched away. But the Romans knowing well enough that his difficulties and ſtraits were their advantage, and hearing moreover that his Son conſpired againſt him, by order from the Emperour invaded Perſarmenia, with an Army of thirty thouſand men. Coming into Dubis, a territory eight days Journey from Theodoſiopolis, there in a Village ſeated in a narrow paſſage of a ragged Mountain, Nabades had fortified himſelf, who, with four thouſand men laid in Ambuſh, firſt put the Roman Army into Confuſion, and then drawing out his whole power, routed them, and made them all run away. The Perſians could not believe them ſo egregious Cowards, but ſuſpected ſome Ambuſhes, ſo that driving them out of the Faſtneſſes, they then turned head, not daring with a few to encounter ſo many in a Plain. But the Romans, (and eſpecially the Commanders,) thinking the Enemy ſtill purſuing, ran

Procop. de bell. Goth. lib. 4.

Juſtinian by often changing his Reſolutions, much indamages his own Affairs.

Redeund. ad paragr. 143. hujus cap. Sect. 1.

Procop. de bell. Perſico, lib. 2.

The Romans invading Perſarmenia ſhamefully beaten.

The effect of having many Commanders, and of diſorder.

ran without intermiſſion, urging their Horſes both with Whip and Voice, and caſting away their Arms in fear and haſte. In a word, ſuch a diſaſter the Romans had not formerly felt, and ſuch a running away it was, that ſcarce an Horſe overlived it, but died Hartbroken as ſoon as the courſe was ended. Many were ſlain, more taken Priſoners and made ſlaves, and ſo great a quantity of Arms and Baggage was left, that the State of Perſia rich before, appeared much richer by this victory. But ſuch are the effects of the equal power of many Generals, and the licentiouſneſs and negligence of an Army. For, the Commanders taunted one another, were careleſs of fighting, and fearleſs of dangers, attending onely pillage and rifling. They marcht confuſedly without diſcipline, nay without a watchword (as the uſual cuſtome is,) or diſtinction by any kind of order. The Souldiers not concerning themſelves, where they found their Officers void of all care and circumſpection, mingled with thoſe that attended upon the Baggage, and marcht as to ſome great booty ready prepared for them; which in concluſion ended in ſuch an entertainment as they had deſerved.

Choſroes invades Meſopotamia.

He falls upon Edeſſa.

186. Choſroes incouraged by ſo unexpected good fortune, when he could leaſt hope of any ſucceſs, the next year invaded the Roman Territories the fourth time, making an Inrode into Meſopotamia. But this Expedition ſeemed not made againſt man, but God himſelf, and had an iſſue ſutable to Irreligion and Impiety, though proceeding from a Paganiſh ſuperſtition. For in his firſt Invaſion, when he retired from Edeſſa without having any thing performed, he and his Magi were much diſcontented to be overcome by the God of the Chriſtians, whereupon he threatned and reſolved, to make the Edeſſenians Slaves, and to turn their City into a Paſture for Cattel. Being now come before the place, and diſappointed of his expectation at the firſt Onſet, being alſo, as ſome thought, troubled with a dream, or apprehending the diſgrace of miſſing Edeſſa twice, he thought preſently of ſelling his Retreat to the Inhabitants for money. Paul his Interpreter, procured a conference, wherein all the money they had in the Town being demanded, they refuſed to buy their ſecurity at ſo dear a rate, and the Commiſſioners he commanded to be gone in great Anger. The eighth day then of the Siege, he began to raiſe a Mount, the Foundation of which was a ſquare work of Trees cut down with the leaves on; over them was ſpread much Earth, and above lay ſtones in a rude unwrought manner, (his onely care being to raiſe the Mount ſpeedily,) putting between the earth and ſtones, peices of Timber to faſten the Work, and make it ſtronger. The Defendants at firſt did the Workmen much damage, but afterwad the Guards were ſo ſtrengthened, that none durſt approach, and the Perſians, by hanging upon Poles before the Labourers Clothes made of Goats hair, kept off both the fiery Darts and Arrows. The Romans, now afraid, ſent Meſſengers to the King, and with them one Stephanus a famous Phyſician, who had formerly done a cure upon Cabades, and had got a great Eſtate by him. He upbraided him, though in civil expreſſions, of ingratitude towards himſelf, telling him that Edeſſa could leaſt have expected ſuch cruel uſage at his hands, it being the place of his Nativity, who had formerly foſtered him, and by counſelling his Father to appoint him his Succeſſour, had been a principal Authour to him of the Empire of Perſia, and to his County of all thoſe miſeries it had undergone. Yet Choſroes flatly refuſed to riſe from thence, till the Romans had delivered into his hands Peter and Peranius his Father's Slaves, who now preſumed to bear Arms againſt him; or inſtead of this, paid him five hundred centenaries of Gold, or elſe would admit his Officers to ſearch the City, and thence to bring him all the Gold and Silver they could find within it. This he ſpake at random, not caring what he ſaid; for he expected with eaſe to take the Town. The Meſſengers finding his propoſitions impoſſible, returned much troubled. And the City, upon their report of his Demands, was filled with noiſe and lamentation.

187. The Mount in the mean time roſe to a great height, and went on apace. The beſieged in great perplexity ſent other Meſſengers becoming Sutors for the ſame things, but they were not regarded, but driven out of the Perſian Camp with ſcorn and deriſion. Their way then they thought was to raiſe their Walls higher toward the Mount; but herein they were not able to keep pace with the Perſians, and ſo gave it over. Then did they employ Martinus, (who with Peter and Peranius, two other Roman Commanders, lay in the Town,) to treat and conclude as well as he could for them; but the Perſians onely amuzed him with fair words, to ſpend time till they could bring their Mount to perfection. In the mean while, the Romans drew a Mine to the Enemies work, and left not till they came under the middle of the Mount, where being diſcovered, the Perſians croſs-mined on both ſides, to catch them in the middle. They perceived it, and there ſtopped up their Mine with Earth; then hard by made they a little hollow Room, where they laid dry Logs ſteeped in Cedar Oil and Aſſyrian Pitch. Theſe Logs, when the Perſians had ſent back Martinus, and were falling to work, did they ſet on fire, which burnt part of the Mount, and when they were burnt out, and ſpread not to the whole, they ſupplied ſtill the little Room with more. The ſmoak from the Mount appearing at Night, they prevented the diſcovery, by ſhooting ſmall Veſſels filled with burning Coals and fire Darts all over the Mount, and the Perſians thinking the ſmoak came from them, ran to quench them. But the fire prevailing at length, they were undeceived, and pittyfully crying, were ſhot and killed from the Walls. Choſroes in the Morning diſcovered the matter, and they all caſt on, ſome earth others water, which abated the ſmoak there; but preſently it brake out in another place more vehemently; the water alſo added force to the Sulphur and the Aſſyrian Pitch, ſo that the fire prevailed over it, and about the Evening following, the ſmoak was ſo high, that it was ſeen at Carræ, and other neighbouring parts. Then followed ſeveral Skirmiſhes upon the Mount, wherein the Romans ſtill had the better, till the flame roſe ſo clearly, that it forced the Perſians to abandon the Work.

188. Choſroes thus diſappointed of his hopes from the Mount, kept himſelf quiet for five days, and then reſolved to make an aſſault before it was light, to take the Enemy at advantage and ſurprize him. And his Deſign was not far from taking effect, for the Romans were all faſt aſleep, and the Perſians ſet to their Ladders and were mounting, when in the nick of time, they were diſcovered by a Peaſant who awakned the beſieged. Then they oppoſed the Aſſailants with ſuch vigour, that they drove them back to their Camp, and took up their Ladders they had left behind them. About Midnight, Choſroes had the ſame ſucceſs at the Great Gate, from which he was repulſed, and as the Romans were giving the Chaſe, Paul the Interpreter put himſelf amongſt them, and told them that Recimer was newly arrived, being ſent Ambaſſadour from Conſtantinople about a Peace. And he had indeed been four days in the Perſian Camp, but they concealed it from the beſieged, expecting the event of their Attempts, which if they ſucceeded well, they reſolved to come to no treaty at all; but in caſe they were beaten, as now they were, they thought they might come to it ſafely, the Romans having invited them. Upon demand of ſome to be ſent out to treat with Choſroes, the beſieged anſwered, they would within three days ſend Martinus, who at this time was ſick; which delay, the King ſuſpecting not to be ſincere, prepared for War, and commanded good ſtore of Bricks to be laid on the Mount. Then, after two days, did he with his Ladders and Engins begin another Storm, placing his Squadrons at every Gate, and behind them Saracens, who, when the Town was taken, ſhould lay hold on ſuch as ran away. The Romans not being aware of the Aſſault, and very few in compariſon of the Aſſailants, at firſt ſeemed to have the worſt, but what they wanted in numbers, they ſupplied in diligence, for none were idle, the men reſiſted Valiantly, the Peaſants themſelves did bravely, and the very Women and Children, together with Aged Perſons, did their part, ſome bringing ſtones to the Combatants, and others throwing down ſcalding Oil upon the Heads of the Enemy.

189. The Perſians finding this oppoſition refuſed to fight any longer, yet Choſroes in a rage with threats and ſome violence brought them on again, and with ſhouts and Engins they began a new Aſſault, with ſuch ſeeming alacrity, as if they would preſently enter. But the Courage of the beſieged again prevailed, who having repulſed Choſroes and his men, now hiſt at him, and dared him to a freſh Encounter, taking incouragement from ſome Sallies which had been made very ſucceſfully. The fight having laſted all the day, both ſides paſſed the Night unquietly, the Perſians being afraid of their Trenches, and the Romans providing ſtones and other things neceſſary againſt an Aſſault the next morning. Yet did not the Barbarians then come on, but the day following, a part of their Army animated by Choſroes, ſet upon one of the Gates, but were ſent back again with diſgrace to their Camp. Then did Paul the Interpreter call to the Walls for Martinus to treat an Accord, which being done, Choſroes received from the Edeſſenians fifty thouſand Gold Staters, and ſubſcribing the Articles, promiſed no more to infeſt the Romans, but ſetting his Paliſſadoes and other Works on fire, went home with his Army. About this time, Juſtus the Nephew of Juſtinian, and Peranius dying, the Emperour conſtituted Marcellus his Siſters Son, as yet but a youth, and Conſtantianus his Ambaſſadours to Choſroes, who having Audience in Aſſyria near Seleucia and Cteſiphon, they demanded reſtitution of places in Lazica, and a Ratification of the

He packs up and goes home.

the Peace. But the Perſian alledged, that a Peace would hardly be good without a Truce firſt concluded, during which by mutual concourſe and Communication, they might better underſtand one another , and firmly determine the perpetual Peace, which he alſo affirmed the Romans muſt purchaſe with money , and farther ſend him one Tribunus, with whom by a certain day he would conclude the Buſineſs. This Tribunus was a Phyſician, who having cured Choſroes of a great Sickneſs, he was much his friend and very gratefull ; The Emperour therefore ſent him, and with him twenty thouſand Staters of the money demanded. And ſo a Truce was concluded for five years, in the nineteenth year of Juſtinian's Reign , which was the eleventh of the Gothick War, at what time Rome was beſieged by Totilas, and Beliſarius expected ſupplies from Conſtantinople, A.D. DXLV.

The Quinquennial Collation.

Redi ad hujus Sect. paragr. 20. ubi de Alamund. & Aretha.

190. Shortly after, Alamundarus and Arethas had Wars with each other, without any aſſiſtence from either Perſians or Romans. In an Inrode Alamundarus took a Son of Arethas Priſoner, and Sacrificed him to Venus. From him was diſcovered how Arethas ſold the Emperour's Affairs to Choſroes. But Choſroes now rid of the War with the Romans, had his mind running upon Lazica, of which he had a great deſire to make himſelf Maſter, and that with good reaſon, for the Countrey he truly apprehended would be of manyfold uſe to the Crown of Perſia. Firſt, it would keep the Iberians in perfect awe , who in caſe of a Revolt would then have none to fly to, as formerly they had upon all occaſions. Then would it joyned to Perſia, not onely keep the Provinces thereof free from the Inrodes and devaſtations of the Hunnes bordering upon it ; but by this means , the King if he had a mind might oblige them to invade the Roman Territories, there being no Rampart againſt the Barbarians of Mount Caucaſus, but onely Lazica. In concluſion, Lazica would advantage the Perſians in a matter of no leſs moment than, by iſſuing from thence, to infeſt both by Land and Sea, the places upon the Euxine, to ſubdue Cappadocia, Galatia and Bithynia, and to ſurprize Conſtantinople it ſelf, for there would be no ſufficient Obſtacle in their way. Upon theſe important Conſiderations, he deſired to have Lazica, but was at a loſs how to compaſs it, having no reaſon to have any confidence in the Nation. For the Lazians were not formerly ſo diſſatisfied with the Romans, but they were much more diſcontented at the demeanour of their new Freinds the Perſians, who of all men had leaſt variety in their humours, their manner of Life being extremely ſtrict, their Laws hard of digeſtion , and their Commands intolerable. In reference to the Lazians , the difference appeared infinite, not onely in reſpect of humour and diſpoſition , but Religion alſo. The Lazians were Chriſtians, none more, but the Perſians quite contrary. And another thing yet diſordered them above meaſure. For no Salt being made in Lazica, nor Wine, nor other Native Commodities, all was Imported to them from the Roman Sea Coaſts, not for money, but in exchange for Skins, and Slaves, or other things wherewith they abounded. From which being now barred, they were highly diſcontented. Choſroes being ſo quick as to perceive it, conſulted upon ſome ſafe courſe for prevention, before they ſhould ſtir for an alteration ; and all conſidered, thought it moſt expedient to rid away Gubazes their King, to tranſport the Nation, and to plant their Countrey with Perſians and others.

Choſroes purpoſes to be Maſter of Lazica.

191. But that he might not be abſolutely idle and wanting to his Intereſt on the Roman ſide, but ſtrengthen himſelf in thoſe parts as much as poſſible ; he ſent Iſdigunas to Conſtantinople, ordering him under pretext of an Embaſſy, and the attendance of his Wife and two Daughters, with five hundred men to get into Daras ; to ſet ſome Houſes thereof on fire, which whilſt the Inhabitants ſhould be buſie to quench, they ſhould open the Gates, and receive in the Governour of Niſibis, who was ordered to be in readineſs with Forces concealed thereabout. But the matter was revealed by a Roman fugitive, and Iſdigunas failing in his Plot, proceeded on to Conſtantinople, where having acceſs to the Emperour, he had little to ſay, but delivering Preſents and Letters of Compliment, he was entertain'd with more grace, favour and charge, than ever Ambaſſadour had been known to be. For both him and his Interpreter Juſtinian admitted to his own Couch at Meat, whereas no man ever before, ſaw an Interpreter ſit at table with the meaneſt Governour ; And though he had no buſineſs, he was diſmiſſed with more reſpect than ever any Ambaſſadour, his Charges and Preſents coming to more than ten Centenaries of Gold. In the mean time, Choſroes driving on his Deſign for Lazica , ſent thither much Ship Timber, giving out it was for Engins, to ſtand upon the Walls of Petra. Then ſent he one Fabricus with three hundred choſen Men, and privately inſtructed to kill Gubazes, but he diſcovering his Errand to Pharſanſes, then in ſome diſgrace whom he expected to have an Aſſiſtant in the Work, he was ſo honeſt as to reveal the Juſtinian laviſh to his Ambaſſadour.

Sect. 1.

Sends aid to Lazica.

the Treaſon to Gubazes, who ſtood upon his Guard, and reporting to Juſtinian the preſent State of his Affairs, begged his pardon for what was paſt, and his preſent aſſiſtence to ſhake the Perſian Yoke from off his Shoulders. The Emperour was glad of the News, and ſent him eight thouſand men under Command of Dagiſthæus.

The baſe flight of Dagiſthæus.

192. Theſe Forces joyned with the Lazians, and beſieged Petra, which being Victualled held out a long time, againſt all their Aſſaults and Strategems. Choſroes much diſordered at the News, ſent to its relief a great Army of Horſe and Foot, under the Conduct of Mermeroes, whereof Gubazes having notice, wrote to Dagiſthæus to ſend Forces to ſtop the Paſſage beyond the Phaſis, and not to raiſe the Siege till Petra was taken. He himſelf with his own Army marcht to the utmoſt borders of Lazica, to fortify the Paſſage there; and having hired ſome Alans and Sabirians, to help to Guard his Countrey, he wrote to the Emperour for money, alledging that he was alſo in arrear to himſelf for ten years, being inrolled a Silentiary of the Imperial Palace. Juſtinian at firſt purpoſed to gratify him, but the matter was put off, and the money delayed to be ſent. And Dagiſthæus being a young man, and unable to manage a Perſian War, made no advantage of the opportunities which were offered him. For whereas he ſhould have ſent to the Paſſage moſt of his Army, and been himſelf preſent at the Action, he ſent, as if the buſineſs had been ſlight, but two hundred men, and did nothing upon Petra with all his Forces, where the Enemy within being at firſt not fifteen hundred men, and continually ſhot and ſlain at the Aſſaults, after as much Valour as ever men ſhewed, were reduced to a very few, and thoſe deſpairing and unable now lay ſtill. Had he made right uſe of his Mine, and put in due time fire to the Supporters, the Town had been taken, but he dallied with hopes from the Emperour to whom he wrote, urging him for rewards of Victory, and appointing what he and his Brother ſhould have after the taking of Petra. Nay, when part of the Wall was ruined, he neglected to enter the Town, but ſuffered himſelf to be amazed and fooled by Mirranes the Governour, who gave him fair words, and told him he would ſhortly ſurrender the Place. In the mean time, Mermeroes with loſs of a thouſand men, when the two hundred Romans weary of killing, had retired to the Mountains, entred the Paſſage; which Dagiſthæus underſtanding, without giving any direction to the Army, gallopt away toward the River Phaſis, (which firſt having the name of Boas, runs through the Countrey,) with all the Romans at his Heels. Leaving their Baggage for haſte, the Garriſon iſſued out and rifled it; but a thouſand Tzanians who had followed Dagiſthæus in the expedition but not in his flight, came in to the reſcue, and having beaten them back, they themſelves ranſackt the Roman Camp. Which done, they went to Rhizæum, and thence returned home by Athens, (a populous Town Situate in the Roman borders,) and ſo by Trapezond.

Mermeroes retires out of Lazica.

193. The ninth day after the flight of Dagiſthæus, Mermeroes with his Army came to Petra, where he found remaining of the Perſian Garriſon but three hundred and fifty men, whereof one hundred and fifty were onely ſound, the reſt were wounded and unſerviceable. Having hence occaſion enough to ſcoff, as he did, at the demeanour of the Romans, he had alſo much cauſe to rejoyce and triumph at the Valour of his Countrey-men, whom he found ſo ſelf-denying, and carefull of the intereſt of their Prince, that the ſurvivours had not caſt the Dead bodies from the Wall, but endured almoſt ſtifling with the ſtench, that the Enemy by ſeeing ſo many loſt, might not be the more incouraged to freſh Aſſaults. The Walls he carefully repaired as well as he could, and wanting Lime and other Materials, he filled with Sand the linen Bags, wherein his men had brought their Proviſions, and laying them inſtead of ſtones, made this ſerve for Walling. Then leaving three thouſand men for a Garriſon, not Victualled for any long time, with directions to proceed in the Repair of the Walls, he himſelf with the reſt of the Army, returned homeward. For though he had forced the Paſſage beyond the Phaſis, yet could he not incommode Lazica, being not able to croſs the River without Ships, which is ſo deep and broad, and ſo ſwift, that it enters the Sea a good way, (at leaſt it did in the days of Procopius,) unmingled with Salt water, Paſſengers taking up freſh there to their great convenience; beſides the Ships and many Fortreſſes on this ſide made landing very difficult. Moreover Juſtinian had at laſt ſent away the money promiſed to Gubazes, beſides a good Army, under Conduct of Recithangus a Thracian, very wiſe and an excellent Souldier, though it was not yet arrived.

194. Mermeroes quitting Lazica, went into Perſarmenia, and lay quiet in the Towns about Dubis. But having an eye ſtill to Petra, which he knew was very meanly victualled, he left five thouſand men with Fabrozas and other Commanders, who of the Proviſions they could get were to tranſport the greateſt part to Petra, and live upon the reſt. Theſe men incamped by the River Phaſis, on the fartheſt Confines of Lazica, ſtragling about for booty; Gubazes, who was aware of it, ſent for Dagiſthæus to come up to him. He endeavoured it, marching with the Phaſis on his left hand, till the Lazians underſtanding the River to be fordable, paſſed over and joined with him, neither the Perſians nor Romans themſelves knowing the Ford. Then did they jointly ſet upon a thouſand men, whom the Perſians had ſent out as a flying Guard to prevent any infeſting of their Camp, of whom none eſcaped, but moſt were ſlain, and the reſt taken. Incouraged by this ſucceſs, they proceeded farther; and learning the eſtate and condition of the main Body, unexpectedly fell upon them after midnight; and finding ſome aſleep, ſome hardly awake and naked upon their Pallets, but all ſurprized and without a thought of fighting, killed moſt of them. Some they took, and ſome few eſcaped in the dark. But of their Camp they eaſily made themſelves Maſters, with all their Enſigns, much Arms and Baggage, beſides a great number of Mules and Horſes. Following the execution far into Iberia, they cut off ſeveral other Perſian Troops they met with, and burnt a quantity of Meal and other Proviſions which was on its way for relief of Petra. So leaving at the Paſſage ſome numbers of Lazians to block up all acceſs with Proviſions to Petra, they returned with all their Booty and Captives. And thus ended the fourth year after the Quinquennial Ceſſation, being the fifteenth of the Gothick War, wherein Totilas took Rome the ſecond time, the twenty third of Juſtinian's Reign. A. D. DXLIX.

A great victory of the Romans and Lazians over the Perſians.

Procop. de Bell. Goth. l. 4.

195. The year following another Perſian Army invaded Lazica, commanded by Corianes a Perſian, and an experienced Commander, with whom joined alſo a number of Alans. They incamped in a Province called Muchiriſis, lying upon the River Phaſis, not navigable there, but paſſable by Men and Horſes, and they intrencht to the right hand of it at ſome diſtance. Full often had the Perſians invaded the Roman Territories under Choſroes, and done miſchiefs not by any Pen to be expreſſed, yet they got little by it, but returned ſtill with much loſs, ſo that they murmured againſt their King, and ſtuck not to call him the Ruiner of their Nation; Once particularly coming home out of Lazica, and being fallen into ſome great extremities, they were ready to mutiny, and had ſlain him, if he had not foreſeen and prevented it by gaining the Principal of them with fair words. Being therefore deſirous to find ſome real Apology and a ſerious excuſe, he had long beat his Head how he might notably advance the Intereſt of the Perſian Empire. He attempted Daras, and failing in this Enterpriſe, as we ſhewed before, thought of taking ſome other Roman Town; but to doe any thing of moment within the Countrey, he judged it impoſſible, leaving ſo many ſtrong Places at his back. For this reaſon he laid Antioch flat with the ground; and quitting the Roman Territories, his thoughts mounted after hopes farther off and full of difficulty. For hearing how the Barbarians, ſeated on the left hand of the Euxine Sea, about the Lake of Mæotis, did without controll waſte and overrun the Roman Provinces, he thought why might not he, having Lazica in his hands, without croſſing any Sea, make his Inroads as far as Conſtantinople? This made him ſo reſtleſs to become Maſter of Lazica, as we hinted before.

Corianes ſent by Choſroes.

196. Corianes with his Army removed to the River Hippis, whence it was reſolved by Gubazes and Dagiſthæus to fall upon him, to give a demonſtration of their courage, and abate the ſpirit of the Enemy. The Lazians were frollick and confident out of meaſure, diſdaining that the Romans ſhould ſhew themſelves equally valiant, the ſtake being theirs for which they were to ſtrive, their Lives, Fortunes, Wives and Children being all ingaged. Yet when they, marching before, came to charge the Avant Courriers of the Enemy, they fairly gave back and retired to the Roman Horſe, who renewed the charge, and forced the Perſians to retire and expect the coming of the reſt of the Army. Then came up the Infantry both of Gubazes and Dagiſthæus, and joining with the Horſe came to handy-blows. But the Roman Horſe proving too weak for the Perſian Cavalry, order was given for both Lazians and Romans to alight, and with the Foot they ſtood in a deep battalion oppoſite to the Enemy, and charged with their Lances. This puſled the Perſians, who could not graple with their Enemies now on foot, nor break their battalion, their Horſes flying back, diſordered by the heads of the Lances and noiſe of the Targets. They reſolved therefore to try if they could break them by ſhowres of Arrows, whereupon the Romans and Lazians let fly thick again upon them, and many were ſlain on both ſides; the Perſians and Alans diſcharging oftner, but their Arrows for the moſt part rebounding bounding from the Roman Shields. At length Corianes the Perſian General was ſlain by a ſhot in the Neck, and his death ſwayed the Victory to the oppoſite Party; for he falling from his Horſe, his men preſently ran away to their Camp with the Enemy at their heels, who thought to take it at the firſt Aſſault. But an Alan, a ſtrong and luſty Fellow, and very dextrous in ſhooting, put himſelf into the narroweſt entrance into the Trenches, and ſtopt the Invaders a long time, untill John Guzes, a valiant Roman Officer, killed him with his Lance, and then was the Camp ſpeedily taken. Many Perſians were cut off as well here as in the Fight, and the reſt returned home as they could: ſuch being the ſucceſs of this Perſian Invaſion of Lazica. After which another Army came, and victualling the Garriſon in Petra, retired without more adoe.

Is ſlain, and his Army overthrown.

Beſſu ordered to command in Lazica.

The Abaſgians and Apſilians reduced.

The Son of Choſroes uſurps.

Whom by blemiſhing his Eyes he makes incapable of the Kingdom.

197. In the mean time, whilſt Dagiſthæus was thus employed againſt the Perſians, the Lazians at Conſtantinople accuſed him of Treachery, and favouring their Enemies in the management of the Affair at Petra; the buſineſs of the Mines, and the Fortification by Sacksfull of Sand, being all ript up. Hereupon he was by the Emperour's Order confined to his Houſe, and Beſſas, lately come out of Italy, was made General of Armenia, with inſtructions to command the Army in Lazica, ſent thither before under conduct of Venilus and others. Nabodes the Perſian coming again into Lazica, drew the Abaſgians to revolt from the Lazians and Romans. For being tired out with the incroachments and oppreſſions of the Roman Garriſons, after they had depoſed their Kings, they grew deſperate, and choſe rather to reſume their former condition, though bad, than fall into abſolute ſlavery; and fearing ſtill worſe and worſe, ſet up Kings again, and revolted ſecretly to the Perſian. Juſtinian ſmelling it out, commanded Beſſas to march againſt them, who ſent a choice Party of his Army under Uligangus and John Guzes, by which their chiefeſt Fort was taken, and after much ſlaughter they were reduced to obedience; as alſo were the Apſilians, who having been anciently ſubject to the Lazians, had alſo of late revolted. Whilſt the Affairs of Choſroes ſucceeded not very well in Lazica, they were in a worſe condition at home, by means of his eldeſt Son Anaſozadus (which in the Perſian Language ſignified Immortal) who made no ſcruple to lie with his Father's Wives; and afterwards, being confined to Lapato, a City ſeven days journey from Cteſiphon, upon report of his Father's death, uſurped; and though his Father recovered, put the City into a Revolt, and eagerly purſued the War. Indeed Choſroes was dangerouſly ſick, being ever of a fickle conſtitution, which made him keep Phyſicians by him of all Countries, and amongſt others, one Tribunus of Paleſtine, a man inferiour to none of his time, and beſide that, both a wiſe, and a very good and conſcientious man. Ne had cured the King formerly, and came loaded home with Preſents; again at the Quinquennial Ceſſation, the Perſian begged of Juſtinian that he might have him with him for one year, which being ended, Choſroes bad him ask whatſoever he would, whereupon inſtead of Wealth he asked the liberty of ſome Roman Captives. He got free'd three thouſand men, beſides ſome of quality, whom he demanded by name; and by this Act of Generoſity obtained a great Reputation amongſt all ſorts of People. But Choſroes ſent thoſe who overthrew his Son in battel, and taking him Priſoner, brought him to his Preſence. He to prevent any farther effects of his Ambition, blemiſhed the young Man's Eyes, not by taking away the ſight, but by diſtorting the Eye-lids into much uglineſs, with hot Irons applied to their outſides, being ſhut. Hereby he cut off his hopes to the Kingdom, the Law not permitting any blemiſhed man to be King of Perſia.

198. Now was the fifth year of the Quinquennial Ceſſation expired, of which Juſtinian being aware, ſent to Choſroes to conclude an abſolute and laſting Peace for the Eaſt. Choſroes put him off, ſaying he would ſend ſome of his own to Conſtantinople to doe it; and he ſent indeed Iſdigunas, that inſolent and impudent Perſian, concerning whom it's hard to ſay, whether he was more ridiculous for his pride and humour, or the Emperour for the unfitting and extravagant honours he heaped upon him. As for Badicius his Interpreter he came not now with him, and ſome ſaid his King had put him to death for preſuming to ſit at Table with Juſtinian, who, he concluded, would not have admitted an Interpreter to ſuch an honour upon any account below the betraying of his Maſter's buſineſs. But Iſdigunas coming to his Audience, ſaid not one word of Peace, but complained that Arethas, and other Saracen Confederates of the Empire, had, during the Ceſſation, committed ſpoils upon Alamundarus, with other frivolous things, and of ſmall importance. In the mean time Beſſas ſits down before Petra with his whole Army, where the Garriſon had ſo plied their buſineſs, that after the Retreat of Dagiſthæus, by ſtones and beams of wood, they had made a pretty good foundation where the Wall was formerly ruined, ſo that the Aſſailants found great difficulty to aſſault the Town, becauſe they could no more Mine, neither could they bring the Ram to the Wall, the Place being ſteep, and the Ram not to be drawn but on even ground. In this ſtrait, when they ſaw the Romans deſpairing, three Princes of the Sabirian Hunnes, who being ſent to receive the Penſion paid them by the Emperour, were now at the Siege, deviſed ſuch an Engine, as never formerly had been thought of by either Perſians or Romans, though they had excellent Artiſts. Time ever proceeding with the wit of Man to new Inventions.

A new ſort of Ram.

199. In forming this new ſort of Ram they uſed no Timbers upright, nor lying acroſs, but inſtead of them ſmall Poles tied and fitted together. Yet had it the perfect form of an ordinary Ram; and in the midſt was placed the uſual Beam, with a top headed with Iron to batter the Walls. The whole Engine was covered with Hides, and was ſo light, that it needed neither Men nor Cattle to draw it, onely forty Souldiers within it, and covered with the Hides, carried it with eaſe upon their Shoulders, wound up the Ram, and let it fall againſt the Walls. On either ſide ſtood men well armed with long Poles in their hands, topt with great Iron hooks to pull off the ſtones which were looſened and unjointed by the ſtrokes of the Engine. The Romans, in making trial of this new device, did great execution, and the Town was at the point of being taken, when the Perſians from a wooden Tower, provided beforehand, caſt down Veſſels upon their heads full of Sulphur, Babylonian Pitch and Naptha, a Drug uſed by the Perſians, which the Greeks called Medean Oil. Theſe Veſſels failed little of burning the Rams, which were onely preſerved by the men with the long Poles, who cleared ſtill the fire away, but long they could not be able to doe it, the flame raging ſo vehemently, that where it toucht, it inſtantly took, if not as ſpeedily put off. Beſſas therefore cauſed Scaling-ladders to be ſet to a certain part of the Wall, which by Mining was ſunk, but ſtood upright as if it had been ſet with an Engine; and uſing the beſt ſort of exhortation, which was the example of his own valour, being an old man paſt ſeventy years of age, firſt mounted the Ladder. Never was a Fight more valiantly fought on both ſides, the Perſians being two thouſand three hundred men, and the Roman Army about ſix thouſand. Beſſas himſelf fell from the Ladder, whereat was made a great ſhout by the Perſians, who from all parts ſhot at him; but he was protected by the Targets of his Lanciers, that by his order dragged him away by the heels (that ſo they might beſt cover him) till coming out of ſhot into a ſafe place, up he roſe, encouraged his men, and gave on again, mounting the Ladder the ſecond time. The Romans following him, and doing very valiantly, the Perſians demanded time to quit the place; but he ſuſpecting it was craftily propounded to fortify the Wall, refuſed to ſtop the Fight, but offered to treat at another part of the Wall, while the Armies fought. The motion being not entertained, the Fight was hotly purſued with equal ſucceſs, untill the arrival of ſeveral ill Accidents on the Perſian Part.

200. Firſt another part of the Wall, where the Romans had formerly Mined, ſuddenly fell down. This neceſſarily divided the Perſians, and their fewneſs ſo much appeared by the diviſion, that they did not equally endure the charge. Then did John Guzes with ſome Armenians his Countreymen, while the Armies were here ingaged, mount the Rock where the City was thought impregnable, and by killing one of the nobleſt Perſians, made the Place acceſſible. And in the mean time, thoſe that from the wooden Tower caſt the fire upon the Roman Rams, were themſelves ruined by the force of a ſtrong Southern wind which kindled one of the Boards of the Tower, and they within being overtoiled and full of tumult and diſorder, perceived not the Accident, till the flame kindling by degrees with the Naptha and other ingredients burnt all the Tower and the miſerable Perſians in it, who conſumed to coals fell down, ſome within the Town, ſome among the Roman Engines. At the ruined Wall by this time the Perſians gave back, and now Petra was abſolutely taken; onely five hundred Perſians retired to the Cittadel, the reſt were taken alive, being ſeven hundred and thirty men, of whom eighteen onely were unhurt. To the Romans it proved a bloudy Victory, many gallant men having loſt their lives, amongſt whom John Guzes was killed with a ſtone whilſt he was valiantly entring. The next day thoſe in the Cittadel would neither with all the Rhetorick Beſſas could uſe, nor the terrour of burning be perſuaded to yield, but all periſhed in flames together with the Fort. By this placing of his beſt men in the Town, Choſroes ſufficiently declared how much a value he had for Petra: As alſo by the proviſions he made of Arms and Victuals. For the Romans found five mens furniture for every Souldier, beſides what was burnt; and ſo much Corn and other ſalted Meats as would ſerve for a Siege of five years. The Priſoners Beſſas ſent to the Emperour, and caſt down the Petra retaken by Beſſas.

Walls of Petra, that no more trouble might ariſe from it, which Juſtinian much approved, and commended him both for his Valour and good Conduct. After his ill fortune, or rather, his ill adminiſtration at Rome, and an apparent ruine of the Roman Intereſt, yet at his return to Conſtantinople, the Emperour made him General againſt the Perſians, to the wonder and deriſion of the World, which flouted Juſtinian's Reſolution herein, in committing the Perſian War to an old man who had had one foot long in the grave, and been lately ſo groſly beaten by the Goths in Italy. Yet notwithſtanding did Beſſas ſhew that valour, and found the good fortune we have now mentioned. So are humane Affairs determined, (ſaith Procopius) not as men imagine, but as God himſelf ſwayeth the Balance. And this they call Fortune, finding matters ſucceed in a way and Method by them not diſcerned, and ſo attributing a Name of Fortune to things which are above their own reach and Reaſon.

201. Beſſas, as appears from this Action at Petra, wanted not Courage nor Conduct; neither yet was he void of a fault familiar to old Men, and that vice which the continual proſpect of the Grave can hardly mortifie. This was his Avarice, by which formerly he had loſt Rome, and whereby he again ruined that Intereſt, which of late he had ſo notably advanced. For if after his victory he had made haſte to fortifie the Paſſages from Iberia to Lazica, the Perſians had not entred this Countrey, but he retired into Pontus and Armenia his Government, intending to toil himſelf no more, but get what he could by his place, and ſo as good as delivered Lazica to the Enemy by his neglect and careleſneſs of the Emperour's Indignation, who indeed was wont to connive much at the errours of his chief Miniſters, whence followed many great faults, both in the courſes of their Lives, and of their Governments. Mermeroes in the mean time, afraid of Petra, as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year would permit, was on his way with an Army thither, but hearing what had happened, he ſtaid his Journey, and paſſing over the Phaſis, becauſe the Lazians had no Towns but Petra on that ſide the River, he led on toward Archæopolis, the chief City of the Countrey. Beſſas had left in Lazica Twelve thouſand men, whereof Three thouſand lay in Archæopolis, with Odonachus and Babas, two expert Commanders; the reſt incamped near the Phaſis, with intention to ſuccour any place where the Enemy ſhould fall, and were commanded by Bonilus and Uligangus; beſide, Eight hundred Tzanians were brought hither out of Italy by Varazes the Perſarmenian. Mermeroes therefore for fear the Roman Army at his back, which quartered upon the Phaſis, would not ſit down before Archæopolis, went toward them firſt; which the Commanders hearing, and finding themſelves too weak, got them aboard their Barks, and having carried with them what Baggage they could, caſt the reſt into the River. Mermeroes arriving ſhortly after, was much out of humour, to find never a man in the Roman Camp, which having burnt in much wrath, he returned to Archæopolis, and ſet all his wits on work how to aſſault the City.

His Avarice ſpoils all again.

202. He made uſe of the ſame Ram which the Sabirian Hunnes had invented for Beſſas at Petra, having many of this mercenary Nation now in his Army. This was for the plain ground; and againſt the rocky part of the City he ſet the Dolomites, a People dwelling in the midſt of Perſia, among unacceſſible Mountains, and therefore not ſubject to the Perſian, but free; onely in his Wars they were wont to ſerve him for Wages, being all Foot-men, with Sword and Buckler, and two Javelins, and as nimble to climb Rocks, and run along by the ſides of Mountains as on the plain ground it ſelf. By the Rams on one ſide to which Mermeroes joined his Elephants, (which he uſed as Towers to ſhoot on) and theſe Dolomites on the other, the beſieged were ſore diſtreſſed in making good the Walls. Odonachus and Babas in their extremity adviſed them to make a Sally, as the onely poſſible means of freeing themſelves, for though they might one day have the better from the Battlements, they ſhould gain nothing, the danger being renewed as freſh as ever the day following, and ſo they muſt periſh by little and little, and looſe at laſt what they had defended to ſmall purpoſe. Mermeroes before this had hired a certain Townſman to ſet the City Stores on fire, of which they had an inckling, and therefore left a ſufficient number in the Town, to prevent this miſchief, in caſe it ſhould be attempted. And the man did indeed ſet fire to the Stores, but it was timely quenched, without much damage; and thoſe who ſallied terrified the Enemy by the ſuddenneſs of the Enterpriſe, who ſuſpected no ſuch matter from ſo few Defendants, but were all in diſorder, and ſcattered about as upon an Aſſault, ſome having the Rams upon their ſhoulders, and without their Arms.

203. Here

How to fright an Elephant.

203. Here Procopius makes it a matter of wonder, that the Romans knowing ſo well the means of reſiſting, and rendring Elephants uſeleſs, did not at all apply themſelves to that courſe, being confounded it ſeems by their urgent buſineſs; the thing was this. When Choſroes beſieged Edeſſa, an Elephant was brought cloſe to the Walls, with many of the moſt gallant Perſians upon him, where ſtanding like a Tower, and the ſhot being made directly from him upon the Defendants heads, the taking of the Town was certainly expected. But the Romans avoided the danger, onely by hanging out an Hog from the Bulwark, which with his ſqueaking noiſe ſo ſcared the Elephant, that he turned about, and would not be kept to his Station, by all the skill his Governours could uſe. This was now omitted by them, but the beſt of it was, their good fortune ſupplied their forgetfulneſs or negligence, for one of thoſe Elephants now employed, either wounded or otherwiſe ſtarting, flew back, caſt his Riders, brake the Ranks, and drove the Perſians backward, while the Romans ſecurely cut down all in their way. The Perſians were by thoſe means ſo diſordered, that they in the Rere, ſeeing the confuſion of thoſe in the Van, ran away for fear. Nay the Dolomites, who being upon high ground ſaw all, ran away as ſhamefully as the reſt, and the Overthrow was now clear, four thouſand of Mermeroes his men being killed, with three principal Officers, and four Enſigns taken which were ſent to Conſtantinople. And two thouſand Horſes they loſt, either ſlain in the Battel, ſtarved or heart-broken. Mermeroes being thus Defeated at Archæopolis, however continued Maſter of the Field, and led his Army a days Journey off into the Province Muchiriſis a plentifull Countrey, with intention to re-edify an old City or Caſtle called Cotæſis, or Cotæſium, moreover to cut off Proviſions from Uthimerium, a ſtrong Fort guarded by Lazians, with ſome Roman Souldiers intermingled, and to hinder their march into the Countries of Suania and Scymnia, ſubject to the Perſians; an Army in Muchiriſis ſtopping eaſily the paſſage into theſe Countries. Such were the Succeſſes of the Armies in Lazica.

Mermeroes defeated. Yet is Maſter of the Field.

Juſtinian purchaſeth another Ceſſation for five years,

204. In the mean time Iſdigunas the Perſian Ambaſſadour, had many Conferences with the Emperour at Conſtantinople, concerning a Peace. After a long time ſpent in diſputes, at laſt they came to this Agreement. That in the Empire, and proper Dominions of Perſia, there ſhould be a Ceſſation of Arms for five years, during which, endeavours on both ſides ſhould be uſed to compoſe the Differences, concerning Lazica and the Saracens. That for this Ceſſation, the Romans ſhould pay to the Perſians twenty Centenaries of Gold, beſides ſix Centenaries more for the eighteen Months, paſſed betwixt the end of the Quinquennial Ceſſation, and their ſending Ambaſſadours to each other; the Perſians pleading that upon that Condition, they yielded to a conference about a Truce. The Emperour would have paid them by four Centenaries every year, and given caution for ſo doing; but Iſdigunas inſiſted upon preſent payment, and in the end, he prevailed to have the whole Sum paid down, the Romans yeilding to it, that they might not ſeem to pay a yearly Tribute to the Crown of Perſia. Thus are men more ſenſible of the diſhonour of Names than Things. But at the deſire of Iſdigunas alſo, who promiſed to perſwade his Maſter to remove his Army out of Lazica, one Barſabes, a Perſian of great Quality, and as great a favorite of Choſroes, who had offered for him a great Ranſome, having been taken Priſoner in Armenia, was ſent to Conſtantinople. Thus was the Ceſſation concluded, to the great diſcontent of the underſtanding Romans, who complained that the Perſians being now ſtrong in Lazica, might ſecurely and without interruption for five years to come, hold the faireſt places of the Countrey, and that they were never after to be driven out, but might have eaſie acceſs to Conſtantinople it ſelf. Moſt men indeed were troubled to ſee that which the Perſians ever aimed at, but which by War they could never effect, viz. to make the Romans tributary, now fully Eſtabliſhed under colour of a Ceſſation of Arms; for upon this ſpecious pretence, Choſroes did really impoſe a Tribute of four annual Centenaries, untill his forty ſix Centenaries were paid, calling his Tax a Truce, and ſhewing moſt manifeſtly, that he plotted it from the beginning of the War. And the worſt of it was, from this Taxation they could never hope to be freed, but ſaw themſelves conſtrained to remain in quality of Tributaries to the Perſian.

To the great trouble of the People.

205. So well ſucceeded the Embaſſy of Iſdigunas in his Maſter's behalf, who having received high honours from the Emperour, together with vaſter Preſents than ever Ambaſſadour before him, returned home probably the richeſt man in Perſia. This was the onely Ambaſſadour that had no Guard put upon him, he himſelf and his followers freely conferring and keeping company with whom they pleaſed;

A year of wonders.

pleaſed; and in the City buying, ſelling, and making contracts in their own Perſons with all liberty, no Roman attending them to obſerve their doings, as in thoſe times was wont to be. But this was a year of ſtrange Accidents, there being ſuch Heats at this time, as none ever could remember the like; Roſes towards the Winter growing in abundance as in the Spring, with no manner of difference, and the weather as hot as at Midſummer; beſides the Vintage being long paſt, new Grapes came as they had done before. Much talk hence there aroſe, as is wont in ſuch caſes, of ſtrange things betokened, and likely to ſucceed; but the natural cauſe of this temper of the Air, was the continuance of the Southerly winds longer than ordinary. This Ceſſation was concluded, and theſe Heats happened in the twenty fifth year of Juſtinian's Reign, the ſeventeenth year of the Gothick War. A. D. DLI.

The Perſian Maſter of Lazica.

206. Now we muſt behold the fruit of the Ceſſation, and conſider the veracity of Choſroes, as alſo how true Prophets the underſtanding ſort of Romans were in their predictions concerning the Iſſue. During the Negotiation then at Conſtantinople, King Gubazes in Lazica affected the Romans, becauſe he found Choſroes to plot his Death; but the generality of his People now again inclined toward the Perſians, offended with the oppreſſions of the other, and the Inſolency of the Roman Officers, of two ills chuſing that which they did not at preſent feel, not for any love to the Perſian Government. The Romans lay concealed, ſome near the Phaſis, others in Archæopolis, and others in Fortreſſes, and Gubazes lay quiet upon the tops of the Mountains, ſo that the Perſians viſited all the Towns at their pleaſure, and the Garriſon of Uthimerium frighted with falſe tales, concerning a total Defeat both of Gubazes and the Roman Army, yeilded the Caſtle on condition to have their Lives and Goods ſecured. By this means the Perſians became Maſters of the Countrey, and held Scymnia and Suania, ſo that all places from Muchiriſis to Iberia, were inacceſſible to their Enemies, who durſt not appear abroad nor ſtir, the Romans from their Fortreſſes, nor Gubazes with his Lazians from off the Mountains. Mermeroes plied his buſineſs, reinforcing ſeveral Garriſons, and he marcht toward the Phaſis, where he underſtood that the Romans and Lazians had incamped and newly made head; but at the firſt news of his coming, they all ſeparated and fled; Gubazes betaking himſelf to the Mountains with his Wife and Children, whence notwithſtanding the extremity of Poverty and hard weather, he would not be drawn down by all the good words and fair promiſes Mermeroes could give and make him. For ſo ſtrong was his hatred and averſion to Choſroes, that it ſuffered him not to deſpair of ſuccours from Conſtantinople, the Judgments of men being generally biaſſed by their wills and affections. The Winter being now ended, Iſdigunas arrived at the Perſian Court, where Choſroes ſigned the Treaty, and received the money, but with intentions ſo cordial to the drift of Juſtinian, that with the ſame Treaſure he levied a great Army of Hunnes, and ſent them to Mermeroes, reſolving what ever he did, not to quit Lazica. With theſe Forces Mermeroes coaſted about the Countrey, and the Romans oppoſed him not, lying quiet in their Fortifications, about the mouth of Phaſis in Company of Gubazes. Having without ſucceſs attempted ſeveral Garriſons, he retired with his Army, which then the Romans followed in the faſt Countrey, intercepted many, and killed the chief Commander of the Sabirian Hunnes. But fighting about the dead body, the Perſians forced away the Enemy, and retired to Cotæſis the Fort of Muchiriſis formerly mentioned.

Things go well in Africk.

207. So went the Emperour's affairs in the Eaſt, rather backward than otherwiſe. In the South all things were in a fair Condition, by the incredible ſucceſſes of John the General in Africk, who firſt drew to his Party Cutzinas a Prince of Numidia, then overthrew all the other Numidians in Battel, and ſoon after brought Antalas and Jabdas Princes of the Moors, inhabiting Byzacium and Numidia, to follow him in no better Quality than that of Slaves. Thus in this Province Juſtinian had no Enemies, and indeed not many Subjects, whom the former Wars and diſorders had miſerably waſted. And that Fortune might ſeem now and then, to caſt a gratious aſpect upon the Empire in her extreme and decrepit old Age, amid all her frowns, another thing happened about this time, which tended much to the inrichment of the Provinces. Certain Monks coming out of India, and getting Acceſs to the Emperour, promiſed him to effect what he had long deſired, that the Romans ſhould not need to buy any more Raw Silk of the Perſians, or any other Nation. For having lived long in a Countrey called Serinda, which contained many ſorts of Indians, they had learnt the way how the ſame might be had in his own Dominions. Juſtinian being very curious and inquiſitive to know how, they told him, that certain Worms taught by Nature, did Spin this Silk, which Worms to bring alive was not poſſible, but eaſie to get their Bags, wherein were innumerable Eggs, which being covered in Dung, and thereby heated, produced the Worms. The Emperour promiſed them great Rewards, to bring their undertaking to effect, and they returning to Serinda, brought thoſe Eggs to Conſtantinople, where being by the means aforeſaid grown to Worms, they fed them with Mulbery-leaves, and ſo brought the making of Raw Silk into the Roman Territories.

Silk Worms brought into the Empire.

208. In Europe in the mean time, the Gepidæ, who, as we formerly ſaid, made a Truce with the Lombards, not compoſing thereby their differences, reſolved to renew the War, which grew as hot as ever, the Gepidæ being led by Thoriſin, and the Lombards headed by Auduin. Their Armies coming near each other, were both ſeized with ſuch a pannick fear, that as well the one as the other ran away, leaving their Commanders with ſome few behind, who neither with fair words, nor threats could ſtop their running. Auduin not knowing the Enemy was in the ſame condition, ſent Ambaſſadours to demand a Truce, who finding Thoriſin deal truly with them, freely alſo told him how the Lombards were run away, and perſwaded him, ſince God, as they ſaid, had caſt upon both Nations that ſaving fear, to concur with that gratious diſpenſation, and make an end of the War. A Ceſſation was accordingly concluded for two years, during which term, they were to ſend their Ambaſſadours mutually to compoſe all differences; yet not being able to end their Debates, they fell again to their old courſe of Hoſtility. Now the Gepidæ fearing the Romans would joyn with the Lombards, procured twelve thouſand men from the Uturgurian Hunnes, inhabiting on this ſide the Lake of Mæotis; whom, for that one year of the Ceſſation was yet to come, and having no occaſion for ſuch a Multitude, they perſwaded in the interim to invade the Romans, who kept no exact Guards upon the Danube, either on the Coaſts of Illyrium or Thrace. Hereupon the Emperour ſent to the Uturgurian Hunnes, planted beyond the Lake of Mæotis, and by money won them to invade the Countrey of the Uturgurians, whom, having paſſed the Tanais, aſſiſted by two thouſand Tetraxite Goths dwelling near them, they routed in a Battel long fought, and having killed many, took their Wives and Children Captives, and returned home. During the Conteſt betwixt them, ſome thouſands of Romans took the opportunity, and ſlipping away, recovered their Native Seats. And ſuch Uturgurians as had before invaded the Emperour's Territories, were perſwaded for money to retire, and if they could continue in their Countrey, to remain faithfull to the Roman intereſt, otherwiſe to come back, and have Towns aſſigned them in Thrace, where living as Confederates, they ſhould protect the Roman Provinces from all Barbarians whatſoever. Of them already two thouſand, after the Overthrow received from the Uturgurians, came into the Roman Dominions, and becoming Servants to the Emperour, were ſeated in Thrace, which Sandik King of the Uturgurians underſtanding, grew very angry, and ſent a Meſſage to the Emperour by word of mouth, (for the Hunnes knew no Letters nor Grammar, nor bred their Children to Learning,) wherein he compared the Uturgurian Hunnes to Wolves, which would never be tamed, and upbraided him both with folly, for nouriſhing them amongſt his Sheep, and with ingratitude toward his Subjects the Uturgurians, whom he likened to Shepherds Dogs, for their Service and fidelity. But Juſtinian ſoothed the Ambaſſadours with good words, preſented them richly and ſent them home.

Audvin & Audovin, virtus Vincendialii Audoin in voc. Al. Autoin, Aut-vin. Thoriſin, Thoriſindus, Toriſin: Thoriſind, Ferox Senſu, id enim vox Thor ſignificabat quod nunc pro ſtolido ſumitur.

A ſtrange pannick fear.

Tetraxitæ, Tetrang-Sitten, ſub Induciis ſedentes; quod nomen græca voce ἐκεχειρεῖς reddidit, additque Scylaci, ut multa alia, Exſcriptor aliquis. Gothica Gens quietis amans ad Pontum Euxinum. Sic dicti ab Utur-garis. Grotius.

Juſtinian ſets one ſort of Hunnes againſt another.

209. From theſe Hunnes, its time now to return to the other ſort, which we ſaid put a ſtop to the Voyage of Narſes into Italy, and forced him to ſtay at Philippopolis. They having driven and carried all away without oppoſition, and being gone ſome towards Theſſalonica, and ſome toward Conſtantinople; he marcht on, having hardly diſingaged himſelf from them. Totilas in the mean time had burnt moſt part of Rome, eſpecially beyond the Tiber; but now expecting the coming of Narſes, placed ſome of thoſe Senatours in the City, who had been formerly confined to Campania, with other Romans, Commanding them to Guard it, and profeſſing to repent for what he had lately done unto it. Yet were thoſe men in a condition, little better than that of Slaves, being ſtript of all they had, and ſo unable to vindicate the publick Intereſt, that they could not recover every man his peculiar right, although the Romans, in the judgment of Procopius, were the beſt Patriots in the World, ſtudying to regain from all parts, what belonged to their City, and to ſave all the ancient Ornaments of Rome from periſhing. During ſo long a ſubjection to Barbarians, (ſo he writes,) how did they preſerve their publick Buildings and Ornaments! Even the Original Ornaments of their Race do yet continue, the ſufficiency of thoſe ancient Workmen holding out againſt the Ruines of time, and the negligence of men; and then he inſtanceth in the Ship of Æneas, which Totilas burnt moſt of Rome.

His Fleet at Sea doeth harme to the Romans.

which to his time remained ſo uncorrupted, (for he ſaw it himſelf) as if it had been but very lately built. But (not to follow our Authour in his Digreſſions out of the Road,) Totilas alſo manned three hundred Gallies with Goths, Commanding them to pillage and ſpoil the Coaſts of Greece. Yet they hurt nothing till they came to Corcyra, the onely inhabited Iſland in the paſſage from the Straits to Scylla, which they foraged together with the Iſlands adjacent called Sybotæ. They landed alſo in Epirus, and pillaged the Towns about Dodona, eſpecially Nicopolis, and Anchialus, where Anchiſes Father to Æneas Died, and gave Name to the Town. They took alſo upon the Coaſt many Greek Ships, and amongſt them ſome Tranſporting Proviſions to Narſes his Army.

The Romans beat the Goths at Sea.

The Goths dejected.

Juſtinian will give them no terms.

210. In Italy Totilas cauſed Ancona to be blocked up both by Sea and Land. Valerianus was then at Ravenna, but being unable to releive it, he wrote to John as yet lying in Salonæ, acquainting him how this Town which onely remained to them of all that part of Italy, lying upon the Ionian Gulf, was ſtraitly beſieged, and likely to be loſt, if he would not come ſpeedily, and joyn the Forces with him for its Aſſiſtence. The Emperour had forbidden John to ſtir, yet conceiving that Neceſſity muſt diſpenſe with his Inſtructions, he adventured to go, and with his beſt men Shipt in forty Veſſels, appeared before Ancona, whither Valerianus came ſhortly up to him with twelve Ships. The Commanders of the Goths Manned out forty ſeven of their choiceſt they had againſt them, leaving the reſt to block up the Caſtle, and to a Sea Fight they came, which was ſtoutly Fought, and much like to a Land Battel; they ſtanding with all their Ships in Front againſt one another, and plying their Bows. But the unexperience of the Goths in Sea Fights, and their diſorder undid them, their Ships jumbling like ſo many Baskets together, ſo that they could neither ſhoot at the Enemy, nor manage any Weapon, being perpetually employed in getting clear of one another, and ſpending all their Shouts and Cries not upon the Romans, but their own men, to keep off. The Romans on the other ſide behaved themſelves both Valiantly and Skilfully, making uſe of the advantage which the folly of their Enemies preſented; ſo that they took and ſunk all with the men in them, except eleven Ships which got away, and were ſet on Fire after the men were Landed, leſt they ſhould come into their Hands. Such as eſcaped in them going on foot to Ancona, and relating there the Accident, the Siege was raiſed, and the Camp left to the Romans, who having put Proviſions into the Caſtle, ſailed away; Valerianus to Ravenna, and John to Salonæ. This Defeat much abated the power and intereſt of Totilas, whoſe affairs went to wrack in Sicily, where Artabanes having ſucceeded Liberius, took all the Caſtles from the few Goths lying in the Iſland. The Hearts of the Goths were ſo dejected with theſe Loſſes, that ſhould any Succours come to the Romans, they had no thought of ſubſiſting, or keeping one foot in Italy. And from the Emperour they had no hope to obtain any thing, for Totilas had ſent to him many Ambaſſadours, ſhewing how the Franks had ſeized on a great part of Italy, and the reſt was become waſte and void. He offered that the Goths ſhould quit to him Sicily and Dalmatia, which onely remained unſpoiled, and ſhould pay Tribute for the waſted Lands in Italy, and ſerving his Majeſty againſt all the World, in all other things alſo be obedient to him. But Juſtinian would take no notice of theſe Overtures, but ſtill ſent away the Ambaſſadours being diſtaſted at the very name of a Goth, and purpoſing to hurry them all out of the Roman Empire.

211. In reference to what Totilas ſaid concerning the Franks, the Reader muſt underſtand that Theodebert their King who lately Died, had unjuſtly made Tributary ſome Towns in Liguria and the Cottian Alpes, together with a great part of Venetia; he thus getting without blows, what the two angry Antagoniſts were buſily Fighting for. Indeed in Venetia the Goths had little, the Sea Towns were in the hands of the Romans, and the Franks ſeized on the reſt, while neither Goths nor Romans had leiſure to look behind them. The Goths thought it ſufficient to agree with them, that during the War with the Emperour, both ſhould hold what they had, and forbear Hoſtility, and in caſe Totilas ſhould become Conquerour, then the Acquiſitions of the Franks were to be diſpoſed, as ſhould be agreed on among the Parties. But to Theodebert had ſucceeded Theudibald his Son, to whom Juſtinian ſent an Ambaſſadour, to demand the Towns unjuſtly ſeized in Italy during a Truce, and to perſwade him to a League againſt Totilas. As to the latter he put him off, with a modeſt refuſal, telling him, that ſhould he prove falſe to the Goths, no Friend ſhould ever have reaſon to truſt him; and as to the former, he denied that his Father had been an Oppreſſour of his Neighbours, or an Intruder, but in caſe it ſhould appear he had taken them unjuſtly from the Romans, and not rather ther outed Totilas of his unjuſt poſſeſſion, he would refer the matter to Arbitration, and ſend himſelf Ambaſſadours to Conſtantinople, which he did, and they effected what they went about. Totilas in the mean time, being ambitious to get the Iſlands belonging to Africk, into his hands, ſent an Army to Corſica and Sardinia, and made them tributary to him. A mighty Company of Sclavi at the ſame time fell upon Illyricum, and doing miſcheifs not to be expreſt, went home with innumerable Priſoners, and all their Booty, none incountring them. The Gepidæ tranſported them over the Danube, having for every head a Golden Stater, as their fare. This troubling the Emperour, who hereby had no means to hinder their paſſage over that River, he made a League with the Gepidæ; but they notwithſtanding ſtill tranſporting the Sclavi over the Danube, he ſent an Army to the Aſſiſtence of the Lombards their Enemies, who invading them with ſo great a Force, overthrew them in Battel, and made great ſlaughter of them.

The Sclavi infeſt Illyricum.

General Narſes draws near Italy, gallantly provided.

And attended.

212. Great Earthquakes happened in thoſe days, in ſeveral parts of Greece, about the Gulf of Criſæum, overthrowing many Cities, as Chæronea, Corone, Patra and Naupactus, and many men periſhed. In Italy, Crotone was ſtraitly beſieged by the Goths, and wanting Neceſſaries, ſent to Artabanes in Sicily for releif, proteſting that if none ſpeedily came, they muſt be forced to Surrender the Town; yet none came, and ſo ended the Winter, together with the ſeventeenth year of the War. But in Spring, the Emperour Commanded Crotone to be releived by the Garriſon of Thermopyle in Greece, which Sailing for Italy, the Goths upon ſight of the Ships, ran away from the Siege and were dejected; inſomuch that two of their principal Commanders began to capitulate for the rendition of the Towns under their Government. And now at length, Narſes began to draw near Italy, with a very gallant Army, as well he might, having received very much Treaſure from the Emperour, to leavy and furniſh the ſame. And what was of more Conſequence, he brought wherewith to pay the Souldiers in Italy their Arrears, which were very great, and had been due for many years together: Nay he was furniſhed with money to invite the Revolted, to return again from the Goths to their ancient Obedience. The great and effectual Engin which moved all, was the Emperour's Reſolution, who in the beginning managed the War very coldly and careleſly, but now ſet himſelf with all earneſtneſs and ſincerity to the Work. And Narſes was to be commended for making uſe of his preſent temper, who ſeeing him very eager, that he ſhould lead the Army into Italy, proteſted plainly he would not therein obey his Commands, unleſs he might have competent Forces; by which ſtoutneſs he procured men and money, with Proviſions of Arms and other Neceſſaries, all befitting the Roman Empire. Now might he chearfully ſet about his buſineſs, and had credit enough to raiſe Forces, and obtain Auxiliaries out of all Places. And many gallant and eminent Perſons, willingly accompanied him in the expedition. John waited on him, both with his own Troops, and thoſe left him by Germanus his Father-in-Law. Dagiſthæus alſo accompanied him with his Troops, being diſcharged of his Impriſonment for this purpoſe. Cabades the Son of Zames, and Grandchild of King Cabades, (who having by the practice of Chanaranges, eſcaped his Uncle Choſroes his cruelty, long agoe came into the Emperour's Dominions,) followed him in the expedition with many Perſian Fugitives. Beſides theſe Asbades a young Gepida and very Valiant, with four hundred of his Nation all good Souldiers; Aruth an Herulian, accompanied him with many old Souldiers of the Herulians; and John Phagas commanding many Roman Volunteers, well practiſed in War. Moreover Auduin Prince of the Lombards, by virtue of the League, and for a good Sum of money given him by the Emperour, ſent him five and twenty hundred ſelect men, accompanied with a retinue of above three thouſand others. He had three thouſand Herulians, commanded by Philimuth and others, beſides many Hunnes; but his cheifeſt levies were out of the Conſtantinopolitan Guards, the Garriſons of Thrace, and the Countrey of Illyrium. The truth was, Narſes was very obliging, eſpecially to the Barbarians, and to this his great Power with the Emperour being added, as well Commanders, as common Souldiers, were eager to ſerve under him; both in acknowledgment of former favours, and in expectation of great advancements in time to come.

The Franks deny him paſſage through Venetia.

213. Being arrived at the Confines of Venetia, he ſent to thoſe that commanded the Franks, demanding paſſage for himſelf and followers, as for Friends, to which they returned a denial, proteſting they would hinder him, both in reſpect to the intereſt of Franks and Goths, and farther pretending a frivolous excuſe, as that he had Lombards in his Army, their greateſt Enemies. Yet he was told by ſome Italians, that had the Franks given him paſſage, he could not poſſibly have gone farther than Verona. For in this City Totilas had placed Teias a moſt Valiant man, with a choice number of Goths, who by his order had ſtopt up all the Paſſages with Works, and with much art and labour, had made in ſome places Thickets, in others Ditches, deep holes and bogs, and drowned the Grounds, being ready to fight the Romans, in caſe they ſhould force their way. Totilas did this, upon conſideration that Narſes could hardly be able to paſs along the Sea Coaſt, by ſo many great mouths of Rivers, having not Ships enough to tranſport his Army over the Gulf at once, and he imagined that coming but in ſmall parties, he might eaſily hinder their Landing. But John who knew thoſe Parts exactly, adviſed him notwithſtanding to march by the Sea ſhore, the People there being the Emperour's Subjects, and to be attended with ſome Ships and many Boats, with which Boats, they might make Bridges over the Currents of the Rivers. He followed his advice, and got to Ravenna with his whole Army, where Valerianus and Juſtinus the Generals, with the remainder of the Roman Forces joyned with them.

Yet he gets to Ravenna.

214. After nine or ten days ſtay, he left Juſtinus Governour of Ravenna, and began his march. At Ariminum being to paſs the River, and ſearching diligently for a paſſage, Uſdrilas the Governour of the Gothick Garriſon there, Sallied with ſome of his beſt men, thinking to ſurprize and kill him in that poſture. But ſome Heruli by meer accident encountred and killed him, and a Roman knowing him, brought his Head to Narſes, which filled the Romans with much Courage, taking it as a ſign of God's favour and a good Omen, that the Enemy having a deſign upon their General, ſhould ſo ſuddenly looſe their own Commander without any humane Plot or forecaſt. Though he might have had incouragement upon the Death of Uſdrilas, yet he medled not with Ariminum, nor with any other Town, that he might not retard his main deſign, nor divert it by any other buſineſs. And the Enemy diſcouraged at the loſs of their Governour, gave him no impediment in making a Bridge and paſſing the River, which having done, he left the Via Flaminia, and took the left hand, that huge Street being unpaſſable, by reaſon that the Goths had ſeized on the Rock called Petra Pertuſa, and all other places lying upon it. Totilas in the mean time, hearing what had paſſed in Venetia, expected Teias and the Army about Rome, which being all come up, except two thouſand Horſe, he marcht away with the reſt, intending to fight the Romans at his beſt conveniency. Underſtanding how matters ſtood at Ariminum, he went through Tuſcany toward the Appennine, where he incamped in a Village called Tagiria; And afterward came Narſes and ſate down upon the Appennine alſo, at twelve miles and an half diſtance near the little round Hills, wherein the Galls ſlain by Camillus were buried, and at that day called Buſta Gallorum.

Uſdrilas the Goth ſlain.

'Ουσδείλας, i.e. Waſre-las, ex aqua liberatus, d. interjicitur, ad mitigandum ſonum, ut in Waldrada.

215. Narſes preſently ſent to Totilas, to adviſe him to entertain peaceable Councils, and not contend, becauſe he was backed by a few lawleſs men, with the ſtrength of the whole Roman Empire; And in caſe he was reſolved for War, he inſtructed the Meſſengers to bid him appoint a day for a pitcht Battel. He with a reſolute and daring Countenance, told them they ſhould have War, and that eight days after he would not fail to meet them. But Narſes ſuſpecting ſome cunning in the anſwer, prepared to fight as the next day, and he was in the right; for the day following, Totilas came with his whole Army. Both had a mind to gain a little Hill for an advantage of upper ground, and Narſes by Night ſent fifty men, who ſeized it without oppoſition. Againſt them Totilas ſent a Troop of Horſe, but ſtanding thick and firm, they frighted the Horſes with the noiſe of their Sheilds and with their Lances; the men who failed often in the attempt, at length gave it over, and Totilas ſent ſeveral Troops afterward, who came off with the ſame diſgrace, ſo that he gave over the enterprize, and thoſe fifty men deſervedly got great reputation, eſpecially one Paul who indeed did wonders, and for this Service was made one of Narſes his Targetiers. In the mean time both Armies prepared for Battel, and the Generals beſpake the courage and fidelity of their Souldiers, uſing arguments fitted to the occaſion. The Lombards, Heruli and other Barbarians, Narſes cauſed to alight and ſerve as Footmen, that in caſe they ſhould turn Cowards, they might flye but ſlowly. And his left wing he caſt into the form of a Wedge, ſetting there fifteen hundred Horſemen, whereof five hundred were to releive their Friends, in caſe they were put to the worſt, and the other thouſand get the backs of the Enemies Foot, and gall them in the fight. In like manner Totilas placed his Army, and rode about with Countenance and words animating his Souldiers. Narſes did the like, holding out to them gilt Chains and Bridles, as the Prizes of their Valour.

Narſes ſends to Totilas.

Totilas will have War.

216. Both Armies ſtood ſtill a while, expecting the Aſſault of their Enemies, till one Cocas a Goth of good repute for Valour, rode up to the Roman Army, and challenged any to fight with him, having formerly ſerved the Emperour, but ſince revolted to Totilas. But Anzalas an Armenian, and Lancier to Narſes, encountred and ſlew him, at which the Romans made a great ſhout. Now by this time Totilas underſtood that his two thouſand Horſe were at hand, and therefore laboured all ways poſſible to defer the Fight. He came in his bright Armour, and very goodly to behold, on a prancing Horſe, betwixt the two Armies, not to challenge any to a Duel, but by ſeveral poſtures and feats of Activity, to attract the eyes of Gazers, and behaved himſelf like a cunning and skilfull Rider of a managed Horſe. In theſe Exerciſes he ſpent a great part of the Afternoon, then to gain more time, ſent to Narſes and offered a Parley. Narſes ſaid he jugled; and before the meeting was agreed on, came the two thouſand Horſe, which when Totilas underſtood, and it being now Dinner time, he cauſed the Army to draw off, and going to his Tent commanded his men to Dine, then he put on other Armour, and ſuddenly led out againſt the Enemy, thinking by ſo unexpected an Onſet to ſurprize them. But Narſes was aware of his deſign, and forbad his Troops to retire to Dinner, to repoſe themſelves, or ſo much as to put off their Corſelets, or unbridle their Horſes, Commanding them to take a bit as they ſtood in their Ranks, and have a watchfull eye upon the Enemy. They accordingly ſtood ſtill in the ſame order, onely the General with an addition of four thouſand Foot, put both his Wings into the form of an half Moon. The Infantry of the Goths ſtood behind their Horſe, to receive them if routed within their Ranks, and joyntly to renew the charge.

Caco (& Cocus mutatis vocalibus) Contractum ex Cagan-hart, ut in voc. All. aut Cakan-hart, Libo ſimile Cor. i. e. dulce. Sic Grotius Interpret.

A pitcht Battel.

217. But Totilas commanded his men to uſe onely their Lances, and not their Arrows, which ſenſeleſs Strategem ruined him; making hereby his Army inferiour in their offenſive Weapons, as in all things elſe. For the Romans as they had occaſion, uſed both their Arrows and Lances, and came up to the Sword, and did all which convenience required, either on Horſe back or on Foot, ſometimes ſurrounding the Enemy, and ſometimes receiving his Charges. The Gothick Horſe without their Infantry, ruſhed on with unadviſed fury, truſting onely to their Lances, and preſently found their Errour, being ingaged amongſt eight thouſand Foot, ſo that before they could reach the Roman Cavalry, they had loſt both many Men and Horſes, and coming up to it very late, they found both Romans and Auxiliaries, ſtriving who ſhould moſt warmly firſt receive, and then repell them. Not able to ſtand after their firſt furious Charge, they began to retire, and the Romans to purſue, the Evening coming on; for the Goths thought that ſome Spirits fell upon them, and that Heaven it ſelf fought againſt them. And when they came to their Foot, then their miſcheif increaſed, for they made not any orderly retreat, as to take breath for a new Charge, or for any other point of War, but ran in among them ſo confuſedly, that they ſpoiled many, and the Foot opened not their Ranks to receive them, but ran away with them for Company; and it growing dark, they deſtroyed one another. Already Maſtered by Terrour and Cowardiſe, the Romans killed them ſparing none. And now the darkneſs put an end to the Fight, ſix thouſand being ſlain, and many taken, who were not long after put to the Sword; amongſt them many Roman Souldiers periſhing, that had revolted to Totilas.

The Romans have the better.

218. The King himſelf with five men fled in the dark, but was purſued by ſome Romans who knew him not, and by one Asbades a Gepidæ, was mortally wounded with a Lance, but was drawn on by them that accompanied him, who rode amain, and having run about ten miles, they came to a Town called Capræ, where they reſted and dreſſed his wounds, but he ſoon after expired in the place, and there they buried him and went their way. Such a concluſion had the Life and Reign of Totilas, after he had been King of the Goths eleven years, not ſuitable to his former Actions and Succeſſes. For in him Fortune inſulted upon the frail condition of Mankind, and ſhewed the abſoluteneſs of her Dominion, having without apparent merit beſtowed on him a long time of happineſs, and now hurrying him at her own pleaſure, into Cowardiſe and an ignoble Death. The Romans knew nothing of it, till a Gothick Woman ſhewed where he was Buried, and then ſome diſtruſting the Report, opened the Grave, digged up the Coffin, and upon ſearch finding it to be Totilas, put him in the ground again, and reported all to Narſes. Yet there were who gave out a quite different relation of theſe matters, as that the Goths made not this unadviſed Retreat, but in the firſt Encounter, an Arrow by chance light on Totilas, who being Armed like a common Souldier, and ranked among them to conceal himſelf, could not be known nor purpoſely ſhot at. But that being mortally wounded, he gallopt away in great pain to Capræ with ſome few, and after much Miſery and Languiſhing died under the Cure. That the Goths amazed at what had happened to their King, being otherwiſe too weak, were wholly out of Heart, and ſhamefully ran away. But however it fell out, Narſes rejoycing at the ſucceſs, took the right courſe, as Procopius well obſerves, to attribute all to Almighty God.

Totilas dies of his wounds.

Narſes aſcribes the ſucceſs to God.

Teias made King of the Goths.

Teia, Tuias, Tei, Lentus. Frid-gern, Pacis amans in voc. Allem. Friduger.

Narſes takes Rome.

219. That he might order his affairs, as was ſutable to ſuch an acknowledgment, and take order for preſent occaſions; he ſent away his Lombards, who were infinitely unruly, burning Houſes, and raviſhing Women that fled into Churches. Preſently after, Valerianus beſieged Verona, but the Franks who ſought to get the whole Countrey into their own hands, hindred the Deſign when the Garriſon was coming to Capitulations, ſo that he retired without effecting any thing. The Goths that eſcaped the Overthrow, went over the River Poe, to the City of Picenum, and the Towns thereabout, where they advanced Teias the Son of Fredigerna, into the place of Totilas. He ordered his matters as well as he could in the low Condition, to which they were reduced, and having the Treaſures laid up by Totilas in Picenum, endeavoured to draw the Franks to his Aſſiſtence. Narſes underſtanding that he intended to aſſemble his Goths together, commanded Valerianus to keep with his Troops about the Poe, and if poſſible to prevent their Uniting. He himſelf with the reſt of the Army, marcht toward Rome, taking in ſeveral Towns in Tuſcany, as Narnia, Spoletum and Peruſia. Totilas having burnt moſt of Rome, and conſidering he had not men enough left, to Guard the whole Circuit of it, had taken in with a Wall a leſſer part of it about Adrian's Tomb, joyning to the City Walls, which making a ſort of Caſtle, the Goths therein put their beſt things, and lookt to it carefully, neglecting the other Parts. Yet now to try Narſes, who was come to the Siege, they left a few to Guard the Caſtle, and put themſelves upon the Battlements. But the circuit of the Walls being ſo vaſt, that they could neither man them, nor the Romans attacque them all, while ſeveral Parties aſſaulted in ſeveral places, Dagiſthæus ſet Ladders to a part quite deſtitute of Guards, and mounting without any reſiſtence, ſet open the Gates, which the Goths beholding, quitted all their Poſts and ran away, ſome to the Caſtle, and ſome to Portus. Here our Authour makes more Reflexions upon Fortune, how ſhe plays with poor and helpleſs Men, changing her looks with times and places, and varying ſuddenly, not onely her own humour, but even the value and worth of Perſons. Beſſas formerly loſt Rome very unworthily, and afterward recovered Petra in Lazica very bravely. On the contrary Dagiſthæus poorly ran away from Petra, and now ſoon after recovers Rome to the Emperour.

The Roman Senate miſerably uſed, and the People.

220. Then marcht Narſes to the Caſtle, and the Goths quickly yielded it, on condition of ſecurity for their Perſons, Juſtinian paſſing the twenty ſixth year of his Reign, in which it had now been taken five times, and Narſes ſent the Keys of the City to him. But to the Roman Senate and People this Victory proved extreme Ruine; for the Goths now deſpairing of the Dominion of Italy, killed them where ever they could find them in their flight. The Barbarians of the Roman Army at their entrance, uſed them no better than Enemies. And ſuch Senatours as Totilas had confined to Campania, and were returning to the City, upon report that it was in the Emperour's hands, the Goths Quartered in the Towns of thoſe Parts killed, leaving not ſo much as one Patritian alive. Totilas alſo going againſt Narſes, called for all the Sons of the Principal Romans, and chuſing out three hundred of the goodlieſt amongſt them, ſent them beyond the River Poe, under pretence of breeding them, but indeed to keep them as Hoſtages; and now Teias finding them there, killed them all. Moreover Ragnaris a Goth, who commanded in Tarentum, put to the Sword fifty Souldiers, whom he kept as Hoſtages. Soon after, the Roman Army had Portus delivered up by compoſition, Nepa in Tuſcany, and Petra Pertuſa. Teias finding himſelf too weak, importuned Theudebald by offers of great Sums of money to joyn with him in the War; but the Franks took that reſolution which was beſt for their own advantage, not to beſtow their Lives either upon Goths or Romans, but to reſerve them to the conqueſt of Italy for themſelves. Narſes now hearing how Teias had beſtowed the moſt part of his Treaſures, in the Caſtle of Cumæ in Campania, with a ſtrong Garriſon, ſtaid himſelf at Rome to repair the Ruines, but ſent to beſiege the Caſtle, as alſo another Party to attempt Centumcellæ. Teias fearing the loſs of it, and having no hopes to receive any ſuccours from the Franks, prepared for Battel, which Narſes underſtanding, appointed ſome Forces to intercept his paſſage through Tuſcany; but he left the nearer way on his right Hand, and fetching a great compaſs by the Sea Coaſt, ſo came into Campania. Narſes thereof advertiſed remanded the Forces, and with his whole Army marcht thither in order to fight.

A bloudy fight.

221. Both Armies incamped on either ſide the River Draco, which iſſueth from certain wholeſome Springs at the foot of the Mountain Veſuvius, and cloſe to the City of Nuceria. The Bridge upon it the Goths had ſeized, and had ſet upon it wooden Towers, many Engines, and Baliſtæ to Shoot down upon the Enemy. The River running betwixt them, there was no poſſibility for a cloſe ſtanding Battel, onely getting as near as they durſt to the Banks; both ſides plied it with Arrows, ſome Challenges and Duels alſo now and then happened; and ſo two Months were wholly conſumed. The Goths did well enough ſo long as they continued Maſters at Sea, being that way ſupplied with Proviſions. But afterward their Ships were betrayed to the Romans, who being alſo reinforced with many other Veſſels out of Sicily, and other Parts, Narſes alſo ſetting up his wooden Turrets on the Rivers Bank, they were mightily dejected, and for fear and Famine fled up to a Mountain near at hand called Mons Lactis, where the Romans for the Faſtneſſes could not come at them. But finding there no Proviſions at all, either for themſelves or their Horſes, they ſoon repented their coming up, and chuſing rather to die by fight than Famine, came ſuddenly upon the Romans and took them at advantage, neither being imbattelled, nor any way obſerving any Order, or Command. The Goths quitting their Horſes, ſtood in a deep Battalion: the Romans alſo forſook theirs, and ſtood together in a Front. Here Procopius tells us, that this Battel and the Valour of Teias in it, deſerves a long Diſcourſe, being equal to that of the ancient Heroes. Deſpair made the Goths venture all, and ſhame cauſed the Romans not to yeild to beaten men, though they ſaw them mad and deſperate, and ſo the one weary of their Lives, and the other to ſhew their Valour, fought with much fury, the fight beginning in the Morning betimes.

Teias doeth wonders.

Is killed.

The fight continues till night the ſecond day.

222. Teias accompanied not with many Souldiers, ſtood in the firſt Rank in open view, holding out his Sheild, and ſhaking his Lance. Many Romans knowing that by his Fall, the Controverſie would be decided for this time, combined againſt him, ſome falling on him with their Spears, and others plying him hard with Darts, which he received on his Sheild, and then flying out killed many. When his Sheild was ſtuck thick, he gave it to one of his Targetiers and took another, continuing in this manner a third part of the day. Having at length got twelve Darts ſticking on his Sheild, ſo that he could not weild it as he would, nor beat off the Aſſailants, yet for all this he quitted not his Rank, nor loſt one inch of ground; nay he did not ſo much as turn his body, nor reſt his back upon his Target, but ſtood upright, as if he had been faſtned in the Earth, killing with his right hand, warding with his Sheild, and calling upon his Targetier to give him a new one, for his old one was loaded with Darts. In this inſtant as he made the change, his breaſt lying open was hit with a Javelin, and he inſtantly died. The Roman Souldiers put his head upon a Pole, to incourage their men, and diſhearten the Goths, who though they ſaw their King ſlain, yet gave not over the Fight till Night came on, and then both ſides retired and lay in their Armour. Early the next day they began again, and continued alſo till Night, their Savage hatred carrying them through all difficulties; for the Goths made account it would be their laſt Fight, and the Romans ſcorned to be overmatcht.

The Goths offer to depart Italy.

Narſes conſents.

223. At laſt the Goths ſent to tell Narſes, that they perceived their Conteſt to be with God himſelf; that they ſaw the Power which ſtood againſt them, and now conſidered their true Eſtate and Condition by their former Succeſs: in concluſion, they promiſed to lay aſide their deſperate Reſolutions, upon condition not to be put under the ſubjection of the Emperour, but to enjoy their own liberty, with ſome other Barbarian Nation. The Romans they intreated to afford them a peaceable Retreat, and in a moderate conſideration of their wretched Condition, to beſtow their own Goods upon them for their Journey, ſuch as they had left in any Forts of Italy. Narſes holding a conſultation hereupon, John adviſed him by all means to grant their Petition, and not to contend any more with men weary of their Lives, nor to provoke a Courage growing from Deſperation, which commonly proves fatal, not onely to thoſe that are poſſeſſed with it, but alſo to ſuch as venture to encounter them. He affirmed that to moderate men, it was enough to be Victorious, whereas the deſire of too much might end in Inconvenience. Narſes could not but allow of the advice, and they agreed on theſe Conditions, That the Goths ſhould have their Goods, and immediately depart out of Italy, never any more to bear Arms againſt the Romans. About a thouſand of his Company went away away to Picenum, and the parts beyond the River Poe, under Conduct of Ildulph, and ſome others. The reſt ſtaid and ratified the agreement by their Oaths; And the Romans took in Cumæ and all the reſt. So ended the eighteenth year of the Gothick War, and together with it the fourth and laſt Book, written by Procopius concerning the Subject, of whom yet we muſt not here take our leave, having occaſion hereafter to make farther uſe of a certain ſecret Hiſtory going under his Name.

Sect. I.

Here the Books of Procopius end.

224. Here being arrived at the end of his Travels in the Gothick matters, we muſt take Agathias for our Guide in our way forward, who profeſſes to begin where the other ends his Hiſtory; yet the concluſion of the one, and the beginning of the other, do not well agree. Procopius writes, that the Goths deſired to depart out of the Emperour's Dominions, and that all of them except about one thouſand, ſealed the Agreement with their Oaths. But in Agathias not a word of this; for he tells us, that ſuch as ſurvived the Overthrow, (not mentioning a Party,) being proſecuted by the Romans without intermiſſion, and preſſed by frequent Aſſaults and drought of the places whither they betook themſelves, made an agreement with Narſes, that they ſhould without moleſtation poſſeſs the Lands they formerly held, and thenceforth live in obedience and ſubjection to the Emperour. Theſe things being thus determined, ſaith he, every one imagined, that there would be no more Wars in Italy, whereas they became but the ſeeds and occaſions of farther Diſſentions. For whereas it might be juſtly expected that the Goths, who had now recovered their Habitations on both ſides the Poe, throughout Tuſcany, Liguria and Venetia, ſhould ſit ſtill and be quiet, and ſuffer Italy to take ſome breath and repoſe; thoſe about the Poe had not long there continued, but they began to lay the Foundations of new miſcheifs. And thinking themſelves too weak, and inconſiderable to grapple with the Romans, reſolved if poſſible, what they could not doe in their own Perſons, to effect by the power of an Alliance, and betook themſelves to the Franks their Neighbours; the other Goths not joyning in the Embaſſy, but ſtanding at gaze and deſirous of alterations, yet doubtfull concerning the event, and lately having had their hands in the fire, they deſired for a while to look on, and then joyn with the ſtronger Party. The Meſſengers having got acceſs, endeavoured to perſwade the King and his Nobles, that to joyn with them was the onely way to preſerve themſelves from Ruine, the avarice and ambition of the Romans being ſuch, that the devouring of the Goths would but whet their Appetites, to make a greater Meal of the Franks and other Nations. They promiſed them not onely much Booty and Spoil, but to pay them liberal ſtipends. And deſired they would ſend them a good and ſufficient Army, over which they would ſet an able General of their own, who ſhould ſpeedily recover their ancient Lands and Poſſeſſions.

Agathias begins as he profeſſes.

Οἵ τε περισωθέντες τῶν Γότθων ἐγκειμένων σφίσι Ῥωμαίων καὶ οὐκ ἀνιέντων πιεζόμενοι τῇ τε ἐπιδρομαῖς, καὶ ὅτι ἐν χώρῳ ἀνύδρῳ ἐτύγχανον ξυνειλεγμένοι, σπονδὰς ἔθεντο πρὸς Ναρσῆν ἐφ᾽ ᾧ τὴν μὲν οἰκείαν ἀδεῶς νέμοιντο χώραν, Βασιλεῖ τῷ Ῥωμαίων κατήκοοι τὸ λοιπὸν ὄντες διατελοῖεν, &c. Agathias, lib. I. ad initium.

The Goths ſolicite the Franks to joyn with them againſt the Romans.

225. Theudebald being of a mean Spirit, and nothing fit for matters of War, beſides of a weak and ſickly Conſtitution, no way liked of their Meſſage, neither thought it convenient for the benefit of other men, to involve himſelf in difficulties and dangers. But Leutharis and Butilinus, two Brothers, for all that contracted an Alliance with them, being Allemans by Nation, but of vaſt Authority and Power amongſt the Franks, whom indeed they governed, being firſt brought in by the late King Theodebert. Having got an Army of ſeventy two thouſand men together, they made themſelves Cockſure of the Victory, concluding that Narſes would not once dare to look them in the Face, and that they ſhould ſpeedily become Maſters both of Italy and Sicily. Narſes though he had not fully diſcovered their Intentions, yet ſuſpecting and providing for the worſt, reſolved if poſſible to prevent them, and for that purpoſe to take in ſuch Towns in Tuſcany, as yet continued under the power of the Goths. He preſently laid Siege to Cumæ, a ſtrong Town ſituate on an high Hill, and difficult to come to on the Shore of the Tyrrhenian Sea, where he was warmly entertained in his Aſſaults, by Aligern the Brother of the deceaſed Teias, whoſe wonderfull ſtrength and activity appeared in many particulars. Not able to take it by Storm, he conſidered that part of the Fort ſtood over a mighty Hole or Cave, where it was reported, that one of the Sibylls of old gave her Anſwers, and particularly to Æneas the Son of Anchiſes. This Cave he cauſed to be inlarged, ſo far till they came to the Foundations of the Fort, which being underpropped with wood, ſtill as they digged, and then that ſet on fire, down fell the Wall, with ſeveral of the Buildings thus undermined. Yet did not the Project ſucceed, for the Cave being deep and vaſt before, was now inlarged to ſuch a depth and wideneſs, that a mighty Chaſm and Precipice being thereby made, Cumæ remained as ſecure as formerly. Therefore Narſes reſolved not to ſpend all his time, and Al-gern, Omnium Amans. Pamphilus Græce. in voc. Allem.

Alker & Alcarius, Algernoon non ita pridem in uſu apud Comites Northumbriæ, atque etiamnum in variis Angliæ familiis.

and employ his whole Force againſt this one place, inconſiderable in reſpect of what was farther to be done, but ſent the greateſt part of his Army to the Poe, there, if poſſible, to hinder the irruption of the Franks.

Narſes takes in ſeveral places.

226. He himſelf in the mean time attempted other Towns with good ſucceſs, having left a ſufficient power to block up Cumæ. For the Florentines readily and willingly yielded up their City, ſo did the Inhabitants of Centumcellæ and Volaterræ, with all the Maritime Coaſts; thoſe of Piſa alſo, onely the Citizens of Luca ſtood out, and were very refractary, although they had promiſed by Oath, and engaged by delivery of Hoſtages, to receive Narſes, if they had no relief within thirty days, in which ſpace they hoped the Franks would be with them. Narſes was much concerned to find he was ſo abuſed, but carried it very moderately, and with great wiſedom, not ſuffering himſelf to be ſwayed by Paſſion or Revenge, though he had the Hoſtages in his hands. Yet did he deviſe a way by a feigned ſort of execution to terrifie them in the Town, preſenting them with a ſight of the Hoſtages made ready for death, placed at ſuch a diſtance, and ſo ſhadowed by cloaths, hung up on purpoſe, that when they ſaw the Axes lift up, the ſtroke of the Executioners, their Relations fall, and heard the noiſe upon the boards, they thought it a real Tragedy, though a Comical part was onely acted. Receiving ſuch impreſſions as their deluded ſenſes preſented, they had a ſutable operation upon their affections, ſo that lamentable cries, and great tumult followed amongſt the Kindred and Allies of thoſe they ſuppoſed to be dead. And Narſes was reviled as an Hypocrite, who had covered the moſt cruel humour imaginable, with a ſpecious zeal to Piety and Mercy. He told them that what had happened was by their own fault, being the puniſhment of their perfidious dealings, and that they muſt expect no better at his hands, yet poſſibly he could ſhew a trick, and make them alive again, if he might but be convinced that they deſerved ſuch a favour at his hands, and by their ſpeedy repentance would make amends for their former faults. They laughed at the conceit of raiſing them from death, and conceiving he mocked them, reſolved to be even with him, promiſing to ſet their Gates open, and receive him in, ſo ſoon as they ſhould perceive that their Hoſtages were ſafe; for though they never meant it, yet concluding he had killed their Friends, they thought they ſhould be releaſed from the Bargain by the impoſſibility of the condition.

227. Narſes thereupon preſented the Hoſtages ſafe and ſound to their view, with which ſight they were mightily affected; but ſeeing their Relations alive, and in good plight, though not out of danger, they began to make excuſes, and at laſt it was reſolved, notwithſtanding their obligations, not to yield the City. Then did the Roman General ſhew a remarkable pattern of Magnanimity. He diſmiſſed the Hoſtages freely without any Reward or Ranſome, ſending them into the Town, and with them this Meſſage, That it was not his cuſtome to flatter or delude any one with vain hopes, for they ſhould underſtand that in caſe they did not ſpeedily ſurrender, that thing in his hand, meaning his Sword, ſhould oblige them to it, without the help of Hoſtages. But the men thus diſmiſſed returned into the City, and there coming amongſt their acquaintance, extolled the Juſtice, Magnanimity and Clemency of Narſes to the skies, ſaying, there was never a man of ſo noble a Diſpoſition, and it ſoon appeared, that the Diſcourſes of them were ſtronger and more effectual for the taking of the Town, than all the battering Rams and Engines of Narſes. They did their endeavour to promote his Intereſt, and while they diſcharged this office of gratitude, ill news comes to him out of Æmilia, where the Roman Army at firſt obſerving good order, did that for which it was ſent, but afterward through the temerity of Fulcaris the Captain of the Heruli, made an excurſion to the Gates of Parma, and received a defeat there by certain Franks, whom Butilinus had placed in ambuſh in the Amphitheatre. Narſes was troubled for the loſs of the man, who was a Perſon of extraordinary valour, had he been but prudent, and more in reſpect of the conſequences, which he feared might be great; but he was much afflicted when he heard how the other Captains, after the death of Fulcaris, for fear of the Franks, (who they knew would be much elevated with this ſucceſs,) had forſaken the Countrey about Parma, and retired to Faventia. For he had ſent thoſe Forces thither on purpoſe to be as a Wall and Rampart to keep off the Franks till ſuch time as having diſpatched his matters in Tuſcany, he could bring up his Army, and joyn with them. But now he perceived he might have ſudden diverſion, being by their removal expoſed to the firſt Aſſaults of an encouraged and daring Enemy.

228. But accommodating himſelf to the preſent exigency of Affairs, as well as he could, he firſt by a Speech encouraged his Souldiers, whom he found a little dejected at the News, ſhewing them that there was no Army, how victorious or valiant ſoever, which muſt not ſometimes encounter with adverſe fortune. And to the Officers lying at Faventia he ſent one Stephanus, to require them to return to the Poſt formerly aſſigned them, which (having with incredible difficulty and ſpeed, accompanied by two huudred ſtout men, paſſed through a Countrey filled with Franks) he did with ſuch moving and convincing arguments, that, aſhamed of their Retreat, they returned to their old Quarters about Parma. Narſes then, delivered in ſome meaſure of his former fears, beſieged Luca more ſtraitly than ever, diſdaining they ſhould deal ſo peremptorily with him. He ſet his Engines to the Walls, and began to attacque them in earneſt, which the beſieged perceiving, now more ſeriouſly weighed the Motives and Reaſons of the Hoſtages, who uſing more diligence than ever, as the preſent occaſion required, the Townſmen were inclined to yield; the onely obſtacle was, there were certain Officers of the Franks in Town, to look to the Garriſon, who omitted nothing whereby they might inflame their minds, and make them ſtand it out, though with never ſo much diſadvantage, for part of the Walls were already broken down. They cauſed them to make a Sally, but they did it ſo unwillingly, and fought ſo coldly when out, that they ever had the worſt, returned with loſs and diſgrace; and ſtill being more preſſed upon by the Roman Army, at length, after three months ſiege, they came to a full reſolution to yield their City, on condition, that what had hitherto paſſed might be forgot and forgiven. So Narſes took poſſeſſion of Luca, in behalf of Juſtinian his Maſter.

Luca is yielded to him.

229. Leaving Bonus, a prudent and valiant Perſon, Governour of Luca, he marcht with his Army to Ravenna, and diſpoſed of his Souldiers into their Winter-Quarters; Autumn now declining, and the winter Solſtice at hand, and with order in Spring to meet together at Rome. By this time Aligern, the Brother of Teias, who held Cumæ againſt the Romans, upon notice that the Franks were coming to his Aſſiſtence, began ſeriouſly with himſelf to conſider the reaſon of their coming, with the effects of their Conqueſts, in caſe it ſhould be their good fortune to beat Narſes out of Italy. He concluded their coming was for their own ends, not for any good meant to the Goths, and that if they remained Conquerours, they would turn Lords, and domineer over them. He thought it moſt fit and equal, that if the Goths poſſeſſed not Italy, the ancient owners ſhould recover and enjoy it, and governed by theſe Reflexions, he came to Narſes, and gave him the Keys of Cumæ, thereby delivering both that City and the Treaſures of the Goths into his Hands. Narſes joyfully and courteouſly received him, and cauſed him to go to Niſſene, there to ſhew himſelf upon the Walls to the Franks, that they might ſee their expedition to Cumæ would be inſignificant, the Riches of the Goths, and all the conſiderable Places being now in the power of the Emperour's Officers. And they indeed were ſtartled by ſeeing him there, perceiving how matters were ordered, and ſate in Council, ſeriouſly conſidering, whether they had not beſt to retreat, and decline the War, upon which they muſt enter with much diſadvantage. But that Party prevailed which was for ſtaying and puſhing for Italy, let the ſucceſs be what it would. Then did they licentiouſly forage and plunder the Countrey with Two thouſand men coming near the Walls of Ariminum, where Narſes being at that time, and beholding ſome of them ſtragling from a Turret, could not hold, but mounting on Horſeback, called on ſuch Souldiers as he met to follow him. About three hundred accompanied him into the field, whom the Franks ſeeing, united themſelves in a cloſe body, ſo as they could not be broken, and therefore the Romans plyed them with darts afar off. But this not breaking them, and they refuſing to ſtir, he cauſed his men to counterfeit a flight, which they beholding, made after them as faſt as the could follow, and then the Romans turned about, made head againſt them, and by a ſudden and unexpected Aſſault ſo terrified them, that they cut off nine hundred men, and cauſed the reſt to run away. After this Narſes returned to Ravenna, where having ſet all things in good order, he removed to Rome, and there paſſed the Winter.

Cumæ and the Treaſures of the Goths delivered up to him.

230. At the beginning of the Spring, thither all his Forces repaired according to order, where he cauſed them to be Exerciſed, and continually trained to all points of War, to ſhake off any indiſpoſition which in Winter they might have contracted. The Barbarians in the mean time, (ſo the Imperial Writers call all but the Emperour's Subjects, and eſpecially the Northern Nations, which poured themſelves in upon the Roman Territories,) made their Inrodes into all the Countrey, Agathias, lib. 2.

pro-

The Franks forage Italy.

proceeding leiſurely that they might make the greater Depredations. They peirced as far as Samnium in one body, but there dividing their Forces, they foraged all quarters of Italy to the ſtraits of Rhegium on one ſide, and the City of Otranto on the other. Leutharis (whom Lazius calls Rabaris,) having taken the way of Apulia and Calabria to Otranto, when he had ſufficiently inriched himſelf with Plunder, had enough of the War, and reſolved to return home with his Booty, and then ſend his Army to the aſſiſtence of his Brother Butilinus, who would not be drawn back till he had diſcharged himſelf of the Oath made to the Goths. But in his Retreat through Picenum, he loſt many of his men, who were ſurprized by the Roman Forces, lying then about the City Piſaurus, and afterward croſſing the Poe into Venetia, both he and his Army were ſeized with a great Plague, which diſpatched him amongſt the reſt by ſtrange ſymptoms, for he fell Diſtracted, raved like a mad Dog, and tore the fleſh from his own Body; being thus puniſhed by the juſt hand of God, for his Injuſtice and Rapine, as Agathias cannot but obſerve. In the mean time, Butilinus (by Lazius called Baldvinus,) having waſted all as far as Rhegium, returned towards Rome, where he heard that Narſes had got his Army together, whom he intended to ingage as ſoon as poſſible, becauſe he having prudently removed all Proviſions out of the Countrey, the Franks were conſtrained to ſupply their want with Grapes, it being now the beginning of Autumn; which unwholeſome food had brought moſt of them into a Flux, killed ſome, and he feared would make an end of more, and leſſen the number of his Forces. Being arrived in Campania, he pitched his Camp not far from the City Capua upon the River Caſulinus, which flowing from the Appennine Mounts, empties it ſelf into the Tyrrhenian Sea, having it for a Rampart on one ſide, and with his Carriages and other materials, blocking up all acceſs on the other; the Bridge alſo he ſeized, and fortified it as he ſaw convenient. Narſes hearing where he was, haſted from Rome to incounter him, and ſate down alſo at a convenient diſtance.

231. The Armies thus placed in view of each other, the Franks began according to their Cuſtome to make incurſions, to forage and plunder; which Narſes obſerving and thinking it a diſgrace to ſuffer them to doe it under his Noſe, he gave order to Chanaranges an Armenian, whoſe Regiment was placed next the Enemy, to intercept their booty, and to put a ſtop to their confident pilferings. He accordingly ſeized on ſeveral Carriages they were bringing to the Camp, and killing the Convoyes, drove one of them that was loaded with Hay to the Bridge, where ſetting it on fire, he burnt down the Turret which the Franks had newly Erected, and made himſelf Maſter of the Paſſage. Such as were ſet to the defence of the Turret, hardly avoiding the flames, retired in a great fright to the Camp, where the Fire being alſo ſeen, all the Franks fell into a great rage, and with diſdain and the greateſt height of confidence, required inſtantly to be led out to Battel. Narſes alſo upon notice given, was not backward to Marſhall his men, and being now mounted, and ready to ſet forward, complaint was made to him, that a certain Herulian of good account had killed his Servant, upon ſome ſlight occaſion. The man denied not the Fact, confidently maintained what he had done, and aſſerted his power over his Slaves, to extend to Life or Death as he pleaſed. But the General conceived himſelf obliged to make an atonement for bloud, by the bloud of him that ſhed it, and commanded the Crime to be expiated by the Death of him that committed it. Hereupon the Heruli were ſore offended, and reſolved to give him no aſſiſtence in the fight, moreover two of them fled to the Camp of the Franks, acquainted them with the Accident, and adviſed them to fall on whilſt the tumult, (for they made full account that would follow,) ſtill continued. Narſes little ſolicitous whether the Heruli followed or not, led on to an ingagement; but Sindual their Captain ſeriouſly conſidered that for reſpect to a dead man, he and his Countreymen were not to be branded with Revolt and Faction, and deſired the General to ſtay a little for him. He told him he would not ſtay, but in caſe he came, he would leave a place for him and his Heruli, though he ſhould arrive a little with the lateſt.

232. The Franks incouraged by the Story told by the two Heruli, made on with more haſte than good ſpeed, being in all thirty thouſand fighting men, formed into the likeneſs of a Wedge, the figure of the letter Delta, or the ſhape of the head of an Hog, as our Authour obſerveth. The Roman Battalion conſiſting of ſcarce eighteen thouſand, was Marſhalled with two Wings, and a main body of Foot, amongſt which was left a void place for Sindual and his Heruli. Into this void place, when the Armies came to joyn the Franks peirced, which the Roman General perceiving, gave order to his Wings that they ſhould receive, and then cloſe upon them, by which means ſuch as ſtood in the middle being uſeleſs, and thoſe on the outſides laid at from all quarters, the number of them was ſtill by degrees diminiſhed, and when the Heruli came to take Poſſeſſion of their place, ſuch Slaughters were made, that Butilinus and his whole Army, being caught as it were in a Net, were every one cut off; five Germans onely eſcaping home; yet of the Romans were Slain but eighty men, and thoſe were ſuch as ſuſtained the firſt fury of the Enemy. All the Romans did ſingularly well, and of the Barbarians, Aligern the Goth who was preſent at the Fight, and Sindual Captain of the Heruli did eminent Service; but all admired and extolled the General, by whoſe wiſedom and Conduct, they acknowledged they had obtained ſo great Glory. Taking then the rich Spoils of the Enemies Camp, the victorious Army marched to Rome, where having the News of the deſtruction of Leutharis and his Forces, they could not contain themſelves for joy, which they expreſſed in Feaſts, Dances, and all other ways they poſſibly could. And there was great danger the Romans ſhould ſurfeit of this their good fortune, for now conceiving that they were rid of all their Enemies, and that the coming of more was not to be feared; they gave up themſelves to Luxury, and all effeminate practices, being ready to exchange their Swords and Helmets for Barrels of Wine, and Inſtruments of Muſick. But Narſes as a wiſe and skilfull Phyſician, ſaw there was neceſſity of applying ſome thing that ſhould be preventing to this growing Diſtemper. And by a ſeaſonable and prudent ſpeech, ſo convinced the Souldiers of their folly, that repenting of their looſe kind of Life, they betook themſelves to their wonted Exerciſes, and former Auſterities.

Butilinus and his Franks Cut off.

233. But a company of Goths, to the number of ſeven thouſand men, conſcious of their guilt, and deſpairing of the Clemency of the Romans, ſecured themſelves in a Fort called Campſæ, being headed by one Regnares by Birth an Hunne, of that ſort called Vittores, who to raiſe his Fortunes, animated them to this deſperate courſe, and perſwaded them never to yeild themſelves. Narſes preſently was there with his whole Army, and perceiving there was no ſtorming the Caſtle, reſolved to begirt and ſtarve them out, yet having laid in abundance of Proviſions with all their Wealth, they bore it out with much chearfulneſs all the Winter. When Spring came, Regnares was reſolved to try if he could make a better Market with Narſes, and at his deſire a conference was granted. But the General perceiving, his pride and ambitious reaches, refuſed to grant what he demanded, and ſent him back, whereat inraged as ſoon as he was got upon the Hill, and near the Wall, he let flie an Arrow at Narſes, which hit neither him nor any other, but thoſe of his Guard, being out of patience, ſent a ſhower of Darts after him, wherewith he was mortally wounded, and being carried into the Caſtle, died two days after. Then did the beſieged ſend to the General, and begging his pardon, yeilded to quarter, which he gave them becauſe of his Oath, but leſt they ſhould raiſe any more troubles, he ſent them all to Conſtantinople. At this time great Earthquakes happened, in that City and ſeveral parts of the Eaſt; particularly Beritus that beautifull eye of Phœnicia, and famous Univerſity for the ſtudy of the Roman Laws was overthrown, and multitudes of its Inhabitants buried in the Ruines, which cauſed the Students to remove to Sidon near at hand, till it could be reedified. Alexandria alſo in Ægypt to the wonder of all men, (that Countrey being counted free from ſuch accidents,) felt the power of theſe ſubterrane Vapours, or what other cauſe there may be of ſuch Concuſſions, and the poor Iſland of Cous was miſerably ſhaken, as Agathias himſelf an eye witneſs informeth us, who chanced then to travell that way, toward Conſtantinople from Alexandria, where ſtudying the Law at that time, he perceived amongſt others, that City to quiver and ſhake, to his great terrour and aſtoniſhment.

Campſæ yeilded
Great Earthquakes.

234. In the mean time, whilſt things thus proſperouſly went on in Italy, the Perſians in Lazica under Conduct of Mermeroes, advanced their affairs, and the Romans ſuffered themſelves to be fooled out of a ſtrong place, which hitherto they had held in that Countrey. For Mermeroes not being able to take by Aſſault the Caſtle of Telephis, of which Martinus was Governour, the Souldiers diligence and Circumſpection, together with the natural ſtrength of the Place, defeating eaſily all his Indeavours, he counterfeited himſelf ſick, and cauſed it at length to be reported that he was Dead, on purpoſe that it coming to the Ears of the Romans, they might neglect their Guards, omit their Watches, and thereby preſent him with ſome notable opportunity. The Plot took as he had laid it, for they believing the Perſian General to be Dead, concluded it folly to put themſelves to any farther trouble, whereby he ſo gained upon them, that perceiving they were now in his power, and that he would preſently become Maſter of the Place, they fairly forſook it, and betook themſelves to their Friends, the Roman Army, which then lay incamped but ſeven Furlongs off, Commanded by Beſſas, and Juſtinus the Son of Germanus. But all of them came not ſafe to the Camp, Mermeroes falling upon their Rere, ſome of them were intercepted and ſlain, and the reſt in a pannick fear, running to the Army, brought news of the approach of the Perſians, and ſtruck them all with ſuch amazement, that the Officers could neither give, nor the Souldiers receive any Directions, but in confuſion all ran away, to an Iſland an hundred and fifty Furlongs off, whither Mermeroes thought it not convenient to follow them. For he neither had Proviſions, nor was otherwiſe furniſhed for a Siege, and therefore reviling the Romans for their Cowardiſe, he made a Bridge over the Phaſis, and paſſing over all his Army, returned into the Province of Muchiriſis, where he Died not long after. He was a man both of great perſonal Valour, and of excellent Conduct. Being old, and of a long time lame of both his Feet, ſo that he could not Ride, yet he forbore no ſorts of Labours, but carried in his Litter to the Fight, both terrified the Enemy, and incouraged his own men, and otherwiſe diſcharged all the parts of a General, ſo as he obtained many Victories. But Dead, he had the Burial in uſe at that time with his Countreymen, which was to be expoſed naked in the Air, to greedy Dogs, and other Ravenous ſorts of Creatures.

The Romans quit Telephis in Lazica.

Mermeroes Dies.

Agathias lib. 3.

Nachoragan made General in his room.

235. Choſroes much concerned for the Death of Mermeroes, that his Forces might not be without an Head, and miſcarry for want of Government, made Nachoragan General in his Room, a man of great Repute for Military Matters. Whilſt he prepared for his Journey, great Heart-burnings and Quarrels aroſe in Lazica, betwixt King Gubazes and the Roman Officers, which ſtill increaſed by degrees to ſuch an Height, that at length it procured his utter Deſtruction. The firſt occaſion was the Cowardiſe and flight of the Romans, which the King bore ſo ill, out of reſpect to the wellfare of his Countrey, that he complained thereof by Letter to Juſtinian, who being formerly offended with Beſſas for quitting Lazica, when he ought to have ſtopped up the Avenues from Iberia, turned him out of Command, and confined him for the preſent into the Territories of the Asbagians. Martinus was as much to blame for Negligence, as he for Covetouſneſs, yet he removed not him, but placed Juſtinus next to him, and Buzes was the third in degree; but there was a Quæſtor called Ruſticus then with the Army, not being employed to gather any of the Emperour's Revenue, but having charge of the Money paid out of his Coffers, for reward and incouragement of ſuch as behaved themſelves Valiantly in the War. This Ruſticus joyned with Martinus in his enmity to Gubazes, who perceiving how they ſtood affected to him, ceaſed not however to imbitter them by continual reflexions upon their careleſs and imprudent management of Affairs. They reſolved not to endure it, and ſtill keeping in mind, what he had written to the Emperour againſt them, reſolved to remove him out of the way, and that quickly, by ſome means or other.

Quarrels betwixt Gubazes and the Roman Officers.

236. But upon a long and ſerious debate, at length it was reſolved, to ſend and accuſe him of Treachery to Juſtinian, and of a Conſpiracy with the Perſians againſt his Intereſt, thereby either to procure Orders to make him away, or at leaſt render the Fact excuſeable, and obtain Connivence. John the Brother of Ruſticus, was the Meſſenger, who telling ſuch a tale to Juſtinian, he was much ſtruck with the Story, but recollecting himſelf, and knowing what Malice there was betwixt Gubazes and his Officers, did not fully believe it, but holding a middle courſe, replied that if it was ſo, he would have him ſent up to Conſtantinople. John apprehended preſently, that if he ſhould come up, the Cheat would be diſcovered, and therefore asked him, whether, in caſe he refuſed to come, he were not to be compelled. The Emperour ſaid, yes, being a Subject, and that he ſhould be ſent with a ſufficient Guard. Again, John demanded what was to be done with him, in caſe he reſiſted; Juſtinian anſwered, he was to be ordered as a Tyrant, and ought as ſuch to periſh miſerably. Then, ſaith he, the man ſhall need to fear nothing that kills him; nothing, replied the other, if making reſiſtence, and refuſing to obey, he periſh as an Enemy. He having got ſuch an anſwer, and Letters written to the Officers in Lazica, to the ſame purpoſe, they thought they had a ſufficient bottom for what they deſigned, and therefore ſent for Juſtinus and Buzes, who knew nothing of the Conſpiracy to accompany them to Gubazes, and be preſent at the Execution. Gubazes being ſent to, readily met them, to whom Ruſticus ſpake, and bade him joyn his Forces with theirs, and ſet upon Onogoris, a certain Fort which he ſaid it was a ſhame ſhould continue in the Perſians hands, lying as it did in the

Sect. I. in the midſt of the Countrey. He according to his Cuſtome fell foul upon them, and reviling them for their Cowardiſe and Negligence, ſaid the fault was theirs, that that Fort was not already reduced, and he plainly told them, he would neither follow, nor accompany them in any Enterpriſe, till they had made amends for what they had formerly done amiſs. This would they take as a Demonſtration of his Revolt to the Perſians, and thereupon immediately Murthered him in the place.

They Murther him.

237. All Lazica was preſently in an Uprore, the Inhabitants of which ſenſible of the Affront, refuſed any more to keep company with the Roman Souldiers, Juſtin and Buzes ſhook their Heads, aſtoniſhed at ſo horrid an Act, but contained themſelves, imagining that certainly they had received ſome ſecret Order and Warrant from the Emperour. The Regicides to divert theirs, and the thoughts of others, from what was now done, as alſo to ingratiate themſelves with Juſtinian, reſolved to ſet upon the Fort Onogoris, ſo called of old time from the Onoguri, or Hunnes there defeated in Battel, but ſince that it was named the Fort of St. Stephen. Having begirt it round, and playing with their Engines, a ſuſpicious Perſon was taken and brought to the Camp by Juſtin his followers, who upon Examination proved to be a Perſian, and was ſent to ſignify to his Countreymen in the Caſtle, that Nachoragan would preſently be with them, having already reached Iberia, and that ſuch Perſians as lay in Muchiriſis and Cotæſium, were upon their way in order to their Releif. A Council of War was inſtantly called, and the Officers ſpake their opinions. Buzes adviſed that they ſhould go with their whole Army, and meet the approaching Succours, which having defeated, as there was no danger but they ſhould, Onogoris deſtitute of releif, would fall in eaſily of it ſelf; and there wanted not who were of his Opinion, in particular Vligangus Captain of the Heruli, who uſed that blunt but ſignificant Proverb, that drive away the Bees, and then with eaſe they might gather the Honey. But Ruſticus very malapertly fell foul upon Buzes, upbraiding him with a general weakneſs in Council, and urged vehemently that they might ſtay and take the Fort, and ſend a Party in the mean time, to put a ſtop to the Perſian Succours. This his Advice was approved, and the good Council of Buzes rejected by the Generality, becauſe the Multitude poſſibly having contracted ſome guilt in reference to the bloud of Gubazes, from Juſtice it ſelf as Agathias obſerves, was to have a miſcheif.

238. In purſuance of the order, ſix hundred Horſe were ſent againſt the Forces coming from Muchiriſis, under Conduct of two Barbarian Commanders, who falling upon them unawares, and out of order, put them to flight, though they were three thouſand men, for they imagined that the whole Roman Power as it was their Intereſt, was come upon them. But when they perceived their Errour, and that they had to deal but with a ſmall Party, they ſtood their ground, faced about, and making head, by an eaſie reſiſtence, beat back and purſued the Purſuers; who meeting with ſo unexpected a freſh Charge, were neither able nor willing to endure the ſhock, but fled amain back to their Friends, who were now buſily employed in the Siege of Onogoris. Here they fell tumultuouſly, and pell mell upon the Beſiegers, when they did not think of it, who, a mighty tumult being thereupon raiſed, with great fear and Conſternation, quitted the Leaguer and ran away with their flying Friends, as faſt as their Legs could carry them, which the Perſians in the Fort obſerving, iſſued out and joyning in the Chace, did conſiderable Execution, eſpecially at a Bridge laid over the River Catharus, over which the Running Army muſt neceſſarily paſs. In probability they had all been cut off, (fifty thouſand, by no more than three,) if Buzes had not rallied his men, and making head againſt the Purſuers, gained ſome time for them to paſs over. The Perſians in their Entrenchments before the Fort, found good Plunder, and all the places thereabout forſaken by the late Inhabitants, who leaving their choiceſt things behind, thought it enough they could eſcape ſo with their Lives. Now the Winter came on, and the Souldiers were diſpoſed into their Winter Quarters.

The Romans defeated.

239. In the mean time, the moſt conſiderable Lazians had great Diſputes amongſt themſelves, what courſe to take, and the people was wholly unſetled and diſſatisfied. The Nobility when they thought the Romans leaſt minded them, having their hands and heads full enough ſince the late Defeat, called the Multitude together into a Valley near a part of Mount Caucaſus, as moſt out of the way, to conſider whether they ſhould ſtill adhere to the Romans, or be revenged upon them by aſſociating themſelves with the Perſian King. A great Noiſe and tumult happening, when with much adoe ſilence was obtained, one Æetes ſtood up, a man extremely addicted to the Perſian Faction, who with vehement words, inflamed the multitude againſt the Romans, taking occaſion from the death of Gubazes to tax them with all that ſavoured of Ambition and Cruelty. On the other ſide he commended the manners and diſpoſitions of the Perſians, put the People in mind they were the Poſterity of the ancient Colchi, who could not brook any thing that ſavoured of Diſgrace or Slavery, and by the late defeat ſo vilified the Courage and Conduct of the Roman Governours, that the multitude inraged and impatient of delay, required that his Advice might be ſpeedily put in execution. And this had been done, though the Romans were at hand, and they had all poſſibly periſhed in the attempt, had not the folly and raſhneſs of Æëtes been ſpeedily detected by another of the Company, called Phartazes, who firſt mightily inculcated this Doctrine, that nothing raſhly was to be reſolved. Having let them ſee the inconvenience of the contrary practice, by little and little he inſinuated his opinion, that by no means were they to join themſelves with the Perſians, uſing Arguments drawn from the difficulty of the thing, the inconſtancy of Fortune in War, (though in the late Action ſhe had favoured the Perſians,) but eſpecially by Motives taken from Religion, and the ſafety of their Souls, which he ſhewed muſt needs be in danger, if the Infidel Perſian ſhould once come to reign over them. In concluſion, he argued that it was unjuſt to condemn any before they were heard, affirmed it to be his opinion, that neither the Emperour, nor other of his Officers, beſides Martinus and Ruſticus, had an hand in their King's death, and, as a mean, propounded to ſend to Juſtinian their Complaint, and a Demand of Juſtice, from whom if they ſhould receive ſatisfaction, then to continue quiet, if not, to doe as Piety, and the Exigency of their preſent Affairs ſhould require.

Tzathes, Brother of Gubazes, made King of the Lazians.

240. His prudent Speech quieted their minds, and made them change their Reſolutions, eſpecially moved thereunto by his Argument taken from Religion. And preſently certain ſelect Perſons were ſent to the Emperour Juſtinian, who readily gave them ſatisfaction, ſending down Athanaſius, to inquire into the Murther, and puniſh it according to the Roman Laws; as alſo in another thing they requeſted, which was the granting of Tzathes, the younger Brother of Gubazes, to be their King, to whom, as the cuſtome was, he delivered the uſual Enſigns of Royalty. The late ſorrow of the Lazians, upon his Promotion, was turned into exceſſive joy, and he entring upon the Government, ruled according to the Cuſtoms of the Countrey. Ruſticus and John were by Athanaſius committed to cuſtody in the City Apſarunthis, in order to their Tryal; but an ill accident befell one Soterichus, who had accompanied him from Conſtantinople. He was ſent by the Emperour with a great ſumm of money, to be diſtributed, according to the ancient cuſtome, amongſt ſuch Barbarians as bordered upon the Empire, to purchaſe their friendſhip and ſociety in War; and in purſuance of his Truſt, was to paſs through the Territories of the Miſimians, a People ſubject to the Lazians, and inhabiting toward the North-Eaſt of them. They imagined he came to ſeize on one of their Forts, to deliver it up into the Hands of the Alans, and ſent ſome to require him to depart thence, promiſing, in caſe he would ſo doe, to furniſh him with neceſſaries for his Journey. He diſdaining they ſhould ſo uſe him in the Character he was, cauſed his Followers to beat the Meſſengers, who being men of good Account, and inraged at the diſgrace, ſtirred up the People againſt him, and in the night, while he ſlept ſecurely and confidently in the place, ſlew him, with his two Sons, and moſt of his Company. When the heat was over, and they came to conſider in cold bloud what they had done, they too late repented; for they could not but expect the Romans to come and revenge the injury. Therefore, to prevent it, they revolted, and ſent to the Perſians, to deſire they might be taken into their protection, promiſing to be obedient to their Commands. The Roman Officers in Lazica were much troubled at the News, but could not require ſatisfaction, being taken up with matters of a far higher nature.

Soterichus murthered.

241. For Nachoragan with full ſixty thouſand men, by this time drew near the Iſland where the Forces were incamped under Martinus and Juſtin, the Son of Germanus. Martinus, aware of his coming, had placed two thouſand Sabirian Hunnes near Archæopolis, to ſtop his paſſage, againſt whom he ſent three thouſand of the Dilimnitæ, a moſt warlike ſort of People, inhabiting Perſia, within the River Tigris, who thinking to come upon them unawares, and in the night, when they were all aſleep and ſecure, had certainly deſtroyed them, but that taking a Lazian, whom they met by chance, for their guide; he leading them through the Woods, took the advantage the darkneſs of the night afforded to ſlip from them, and coming to the Camp of the Sabirians, rouſed them from their ſleep, and gave them warning. They forſaking then the former place of their incamping, diſpoſed

of

A Party of Perſians defeated.

of themſelves into Woods and Thickets, where, as they paſt by, they fell upon them with ſuch advantage, that they ſlew eight hundred of them there, and then giving the chaſe, the Garriſon of Archæopolis ſallied out, and did great Execution, ſo that of three ſcarce one thouſand returned back to Nachoragan, who then went to the Iſland, and deſired a Conference with Martinus. The Conference producing nothing but greater Animoſities, Nachoragan laid a Bridge over the River Phaſis, and tranſported his Army to the other ſide, where he incamped himſelf betwixt the Iſland and a City of the ſame name with the River, ſtanding juſt upon the mouth of it. This Town being in the hands of the Romans, Martinus and his men were much concerned, and endeavoured all they could to prevent the Perſians, but coming too late to effect this, they left Buzes in the Iſland to order matters there as he ſhould ſee occaſion, and if need were, to afford them relief. The reſt entred the City Phaſis, both to preſerve the place, and becauſe they were not ſtrong enough to ingage with Nachoragan in a pitcht Battel.

242. Now did the Perſian General beſiege the City; ſome were buſie in ſhooting at thoſe that appeared upon the Battlements, others employed in filling up the Ditches, and ſome in moving the Engines for Battery to the Walls. Martinus and his Romans, were looked upon by Nachoragan but as a company of Sheep driven up into a Pownd; and he conſidering what a multitude he had to deal with, thought it was requiſite to employ his Wits more than his Hands. He counterfeited Letters ſent from the Emperour, which intimated, that he, out of his abundant care, had ſent another Army to their aſſiſtence; though he knew ſuch was their valour, that they would not ſtand in need of it. Hereupon he took occaſion to ſtorm, that he and his Fellow-Souldiers having born the heat of the day, and ſuſtained all the labour and travel, others ſhould be ſent to reap the fruit of it, and now they had even almoſt obtained the Victory, to wreſt the Laurel from off their Heads; and he told them that his opinion was, there ſhould be ſome ſent to ſtop them at the River Neognus, where they lay incamped, but four Perſian Paraſanges diſtant from the City. They, incouraged with the News, all cried out, the thing was to be done, being unwilling any others ſhould partake of their booty; and the rumour of this fictitious freſh Army coming to the Ears of the Perſians, had the quite contrary operation upon them, filling them with terrour and dejection. Nachoragan ſent a Party to lie in the way, and to ſtop the paſſage of theſe No-bodies, till he ſhould take Phaſis; and ſetting a conſiderable number of ſubſtantial Souldiers to combate with theſe men of Air, deprived himſelf of the uſe of a very good part of his Army. Yet being a man of an arrogant humour, he made himſelf cock-ſure, and triumphed before the Victory, openly boaſting that before it was night, he would rid his hands of Phaſis, and the Romans, by ſetting fire to the Town, and burning both it and the Army together.

The Perſians raiſe their Siege from before Phaſis.

243. In purſuance of this Reſolution he prepared for an Aſſault with all the vigour and diligence imaginable. Juſtin, the Son of Germanus, in the mean time, betook himſelf to the beſt means of reſiſtence, going to a Church not far diſtant from the City, with a Party of the ſtouteſt Foot, and five thouſand Horſe, where he put up his Prayers to Almighty God, the giver of all Victory. In the mean time the Aſſault of the City began, wherein was nothing omitted becoming either the Courage of the Aſſailants, or the Reſolution of the Beſieged. Juſtin at his return from his Devotions, perceiving what was in hand, cauſed his Men to ſet up a great ſhout, and fall upon the backs of the Perſians, who thinking verily it was the ſame Army which Martinus had feigned to be ſent from the Emperour, and to lie incamped by the River Neognus, began in a tumultuous manner to retire from the Walls, and at length drew off quite from the Siege. The Romans made what advantage they could of their flight, and routed quite one of their Wings; but the other fought ſtoutly, and made effectual oppoſition, being guarded by their Elephants, which hindred the Horſe from doing any conſiderable Execution, till ſuch time as Ognarus, one of Martinus his Guard, ſeeing himſelf in great danger to be deſtroyed by one of the Beaſts, ſtruck at him with his Javelin, which he left ſticking in the lower part of his Forehead, near his Eyes. The Elephant inraged with the pain, and impatient to have the Javelin ſticking and hanging at his Face, bore down all before him, tearing the Horſes, and trampling on the Men, ſo that their Ranks were broken, and the whole Wing ſo diſordered, that their General, how confident and arrogant ſoever before the Aſſault, now both by words and example moved them to flie, and away all ran to their Camp, with the Romans at their heels, who ſo far gave the chaſe as Martinus thought it was convenient.

Run away to their Camp.

244. Ten

Twelve thouſand of them ſlain.

244. Ten thouſand Perſians in this Action loſt their Lives, beſides two thouſand more, which Nachoragan by his mere folly and arrogance deſtroyed. He had ſent them to cut down Wood, and fetch other materials for the Siege, with order, that as ſoon as they ſaw a ſmoak ariſe, they ſhould preſently return to aſſiſt in the Aſſault, and ſhare in the Plunder; for he boaſted that he would quickly ſet the Walls and Ramparts on fire. But now when he was thus ſhamefully beaten, the Romans returning, ſet fire to all his Engines, and other materials, which they ſeeing at a diſtance, in all haſte and diſorder returned, leſt they ſhould come after the Feaſt, as Agathias expreſſeth it, and ſo falling into their hands they leaſt expected, were all of them cut in pieces. The Romans took the Plunder of the Field, which was very rich, and honourably buried their dead, the number of whom amounted to ſome two hundred. Nachoragan afterward made as though he intended to give Battel; but ſetting the Dilemnitæ in the Trenches, to make an appearance of his ſtay in the Camp, he, with the reſt of the Army, ſtole away to Cotæſium, and ſo marcht into the Province of Muchiriſis. When he had paſſed the half of his way, and was out of danger, they being lightly armed, ſtrong, and nimble of body, retired alſo. And after them came that Party which had been ſent to watch for the Chimerical Army at the River Neognus, underſtanding what had happened to their Friends before Phaſis, and by privy and intricate ways, at length, got alſo into Muchiriſis; where all the Perſian Forces now being met, Nachoragan leaving the greateſt part of the Horſe, and to command them, Wafriſes, a man of great Repute, himſelf with a few in company, went and wintered in Iberia.

Nachoragan ſteals away.

Agathias, lib. 4.

245. All being now in repoſe in Lazica, it was thought fit to call Ruſticus and his Brother John, the murtherers of Gubazes, to their Tryal. For this purpoſe all ſorts of Officers had been ſent from Conſtantinople, and a very formal proceſs was made. Athanaſius, the Judge, appearing in his Robes, like a Prince ſeated upon an high Throne. There were Scribes, Cryers and Lictors, who brought their Irons, Gives, Fetters, and other inſtruments of Torture and Examination, into the Court: On the left hand ſtood the Priſoners and over againſt them the Accuſers; the Judgment being ordered, with this ſtate and ſolemnity, by Juſtinian, both to ſtrike the beholding Lazians with more Awe and Reverence towards his Laws and Government, as alſo to give them full ſatisfaction, however the matter ſhould be determined and judged, ſo much adoe being made, and ſuch pains taken, to give them content in what they deſired. Some of the wiſeſt Colchians appeared as Accuſers, who firſt deſired that the Emperour's Letters, written to the Conſpiratours, might be read; which being to the ſame effect as formerly we mentioned, they thence took occaſion to ſhew how they had acted without any order, and killed him merely out of Revenge and Malice. Ruſticus coming to anſwer, inſiſted chiefly upon this, that he had killed neither a King nor a Friend, but a Tyrant and an Enemy, alledging that he envied the Proſperity, and inſulted in the defects and miſcarriages of the Romans, betraying their Affairs to all the Barbarian Nations round about, and to the Perſians eſpecially, with whom, he ſaid, he held a correſpondence. In concluſion, he affirmed nothing had been done without the knowledge, approbation and conjunction of Martinus, and put ſuch falſe colours upon the Fact, that the Judge at firſt, not able to diſtinguiſh them from true, gave an ear to what he ſaid, till having twice debated the matter, he found that Gubazes had been no Traitour, neither what he refuſed to doe in the buſineſs of Onogoris, proceeded from any Intelligence or Confederacy he had with the Perſian, but out of Indignation againſt the Roman Officers, fault of whom it had been that that Fort was not already reduced. He then pronounced ſentence, that Ruſticus and John ſhould be beheaded, referring the matter of Martinus to the cognizance of the Emperour. When the Lazians ſaw them carried upon Mules to their Execution, and all the ſolemnity and terrour thereof, they were ſufficiently ſatisfied with the puniſhment of theſe two, and continued very quiet, and obſervant of the Romans.

The Murtherers of Gubazes beheaded.

246. The Spring following the Roman Commanders reſolved upon an Expedition againſt the Miſimiani, who had killed Soterichus, and revolted to the Perſians upon that occaſion. Buzes and Juſtin were left in the Iſland, and four thouſand Men drawn out for this ſervice, who, according to order, but ill commanded, marcht away to the Countrey of the Apſilians. Here the Perſians interpoſed, having had intelligence of the deſign, and ſtopt their paſſage all the ſummer; but Winter coming on, they fairly retired, their Laws and Cuſtoms not binding them to be out on ſervice in that unpleaſant ſeaſon of the year. The Romans now being rid of them, and having free paſſage, ſent Meſſengers to the Miſimians to adviſe them to bethink themſelves, and by an early repentance prevent that miſery and deſolation which muſt neceſſarily fall upon them, having to doe with ſo potent an Enemy, and being now deſtitute of their friends the Perſians. But they, preſuming upon the unpaſſableneſs of their Countrey, and the ſteepneſs and ruggedneſs of the Mountains, were ſo far from relenting, that, contrary to the Law of Nations, they killed the Meſſengers, being Men of Repute amongſt the Apſilians, their Neighbours, and who ſpoke nothing harſh or unreaſonable, but, in a civil obliging manner, laid before them the danger into which they would infallibly caſt themſelves. The Roman Army therefore, animated with great Diſdain and Anger, marches againſt them, but does little good for want of a ſufficient Commander, ſome ſpeaking one thing, ſome another, and every one abounding in his own ſenſe. At length Martinus, who had been on the way himſelf, but, falling ſick, was forced to return, ſent them one John a Cappadocian, commonly called Daixas, who, obſerving that all the Miſimians had betaken themſelves to one Hold, preſently laid Siege to it.

The Miſimians beſieged.

247. This Fort being ſeated upon Rocks, at the bottom thereof were pleaſant Springs, whence the beſieged, in the night, and by ſtealth, fetched their water. This was taken notice of by one Illus, an Iſaurian, who followed them ſo far up, till he perceived the path how it lay, and then revealed his diſcovery to John the Commander. He ſent with him an hundred choice men, who eaſily mounted the Rock ſo far, till they could ſee the Centinels lie all aſleep by a fire ſide; but then it happened, that one of them falling, and his Target breaking, made a noiſe, which awakened theſe Guards, and made them all buſtle and take their Weapons. But being by the fire ſide, they could not ſee thoſe in the dark, and they knowing in what danger they were, ſtood ſtill, ſo fearfull of making any noiſe, that they durſt hardly draw their breath; for they were not yet got fully up, and had the Centinels diſcovered them, they might, by the tumbling down of one huge and maſſy ſtone, whereof there were plenty, have broken their bones in pieces. But they continuing mute, and ſo firm as if growing to the place, and no more noiſe being heard, the Guards, who being formerly aſleep, could not gueſs what the matter was, betook them to their reſt again, which ſeeing, up they went, ſoon cut their Throats, then entred the Fort, killed all they met, and ſet the Houſes on Fire. The Miſimians had given too juſt occaſion to be ſeverely dealt with, but they neither ſpared Women, nor the tender Infants, which were not guilty of the fault of their Parents, but daſhed them againſt the rocks, and toſſed them on their Spears at their pleaſure.

248. All the night they ſpent in this work, ſecure, as they thought, of any Enemy. But five hundred ſtout Miſimians, who had iſſued out of the Fort, ſet upon them unawares by break of day, and killing ſome, wounded more, but made all run in great diſorder to the Camp, where it was reſolved no more to attempt the Town by way of the Rock, but to ſet to their Engines of Battery, and attack the Fort. Herein they had ſuch ſucceſs at the beginning, that the beſieged, fearfull of what ſhould follow, ſent to beg pardon, acknowledging their crimes had been great, but pleading the exceeding greatneſs of their puniſhment; for their Houſes were wellnigh all burnt, they had loſt five-thouſand Men of the flower of their Nation, beſides Women and Children, ſo that the Name of the Miſimians was not far from being quite obliterated. John, for this Reaſon, was content to receive them to terms, and the rather, becauſe of the coldneſs and barrenneſs of the Countrey, which afforded but little Accommodation for the Army. Paying therefore all the money back they had taken from Soterichus with the Emperour's Gold, and other things, they gave Hoſtages, and were permitted to live under the obedience of the Roman Empire, as formerly. And the victorious Army returned into the Colchian Countrey, having loſt no more than thirty Men. After this Juſtinian removed Martinus from all his Commands, bearing him, and that deſervedly, ill will ever ſince the death of Gubazes, and reſolving in time to be even with him; but he wiſely concealed his Indignation for the preſent, knowing him to be a Man much beloved by the Souldiers, conſidering the fickleneſs of Affairs in Lazica, and his Skill in matters of War, and eſpecially his good Conduct of late, which was the cauſe that he was not involved as well in the puniſhment as he had been in the crime relating to Gubazes. In his place was Juſtin, the Son of Germanus, made General, with full authority over all the Forces throughout the Colchian Regions and Armenia. Being the Emperour's near Kinſman, he ſent for him to Conſtantinople, and there putting the whole power into his Hands, cauſed him to return back into Lazica.

Are brought under again.

Juſtin made General in the room of John.

249. But Choſroes King of Perſia was inraged at Nachoragan, for what had happened at the City of Phaſis, and commanding him to repair to his Preſence, cauſed him to be flay'd alive, which done, his skin was hung upon a Rock, diſtended in it's full Proportion, and there it remained a Spectacle of the Cruelty of the King, as well as of the Cowardiſe and Indiſcretion of the General. Afterward conſidering how the Romans were Maſters at Sea, he thought it would be to little purpoſe to ſend another Army into the Colchian Countrey, for his Men found it moſt difficult to come by any Proviſions, whereas the Romans had all things at their Pleaſure imported to them. Therefore he judged it moſt Convenient for his Affairs to make Peace, and for that purpoſe ſent an Ambaſſadour to Conſtantinople called Zich; who, after much debate on both ſides, came to this appointment with the Emperour, that the Romans and Perſians ſhould hold and enjoy ſuch places, as they were at preſent in Poſſeſſion of, by the right of War, and keep themſelves quiet, and forbear all Acts of Hoſtility, till a more ſtrict and perfecter League could be agreed on, betwixt the two Princes. The Commanders on both ſides having notice, and receiving Orders conformed themſelves unto them, and what before was done voluntarily, now became neceſſary by agreement.

Nachoragan flayed alive.

250. Wearied with the Cares and the ſeveral Accidents of War, theſe powerfull Princes thus ſheathed their Swords, and continued quiet a long time after. Although the firſt overture came from Choſroes, who was utterly diſcouraged by the defeat at Phaſis; yet Juſtinian ſecretly, and in his private Thoughts highly approved of it, eſpecially having the Honour of the Refuſal. For he was grown old, and conſequently impatient of Noiſe and Action, which made him enter into a new Courſe, for preventing the many Inrodes of the barbarous Nations; and that Charge and Trouble which in his Youth he had ſtill been put to. He ſet them together by the Ears at home, hired one Party to fight againſt another, procured Emulations, Jealouſies, and Diſſentions amongſt them; and if any Invaſion happened to be made, he had ſome or other of that Nation by him, whom by large Gifts and Preferments, he ſo far made his own, that he could truſt them to lead an Army againſt their Countreymen, knowing well that they beſt underſtood the Nature of the place, and Condition of thoſe they had to deal with; where their weakneſſes moſt lay, on which part they were Naked, and moſt liable to be hit and wounded. He thought this new Craft to be ſo effectual, that it made him ſlight his Military men, as ſtanding now in no need of them, and the Fortifications were neglected, and ſuffered to fall to nothing; together with the Legions generally throughout the Empire. The Armies were in all Countries leſſened, and nothing comparable to the ſtanding Forces of the Ancient Emperours, which being wont to conſiſt of ſix Hundred and forty five Thouſand fighting Men; at preſent, there were hardly found an Hundred and fifty Thouſand, and of theſe ſome lay in Italy, others were diſperſed through Africk, Spain and Lazica, and ſome lay at Alexandria, and the Ægyptian Thebes, and a very few upon the Borders of Perſia.

Juſtinian grown Old and loving quiet, ſets the Barbarians one Nation againſt another, and at difference amongſt themſelves.

This made him neglect Military men.

251. About the Concluſion of the Peace, a number of Zani inhabiting to the South of the Euxine Sea, about the City of Trapezond, having been formerly Subjects of the Empire, fell upon the Territories of Pontus, and piercing as far as Armenia, haraſſed and pillaged all in their way: Againſt them was ſent Theodorus their Countreyman, one very eminent for his Services, who eaſily Maſtered them, having no good Commander to Govern them, and impoſed a certain yearly Tribute upon them, by order of the Emperour; who ſo highly valued this ſubduing, and bringing them under the Yoke, that in one of his novel Conſtitutions, reckoning up his ſeveral Victories, he makes mention of this, as one of the Chief. About this time happened another Earthquake at Conſtantinople, ſo great and Terrible, that it ſeemed about to ſwallow up the whole City. Agathias ſpends many words, in deſcribing the Fear and Conſternation, which ſeized upon the Inhabitants of all ſorts and Conditions, and makes the ſame Obſervation, as Procopius did in the Plague, of the great ſhew of Reformation, and many remarkable Acts of Piety and Mercy, which were Practiſed for the time; but when the Judgment was once removed, moſt of theſe Men then licked up their Vomits, and returned though leaſurely to their former ways. Yet ſtill one Puniſhment followed at the Heels of another, for the very next Spring the Plague which had never ceaſed all this while, but wandred about from place to place, again returned to the City, and ſwept away an infinite multitude: Some dyed ſuddenly, as ſeized with a violent Apoplexy, and ſuch as were ſtrongeſt ſuſtained the violence of the Diſeaſe not paſt

The Zani reduced under the Roman yoke.

An Earthquake at Conſtantinople.

The Plague returns.

the fifth day. But the Symptoms were for the moſt part the ſame, as had been in the former Viſitation.

An Invaſion of the Hunnes.

252. No ſooner was Conſtantinople freed from this Diſtemper, but another miſchief fell out, which filled the Inhabitants with as great Terrour and Tumult as the other. For a multitude of Cotrigurian Hunnes taking advantage of the Froſt, paſſed over the River Iſter and invaded Thrace, where dividing themſelves into two Parties; one went for Greece, and the other for Cherſoneſus of Thrace, under Conduct of Zamergan, who grudged that Sandil, or Sandilchus the Captain of the Vturgurians ſhould be Courted and inriched by the Emperour, while he and his Compatriots ſate ſtill at home, and continually ſtrugled with Penury and Hardſhip. Reſolving therefore to doe ſomething whereby they ſhould be taken notice of; they paſſed directly toward Conſtantinople, waſting all in their way, making abundance of Captives, puniſhing the very Women they haled out of Cloiſters, and committing all other ſorts of Inſolence and Violence. They paſſed over the long Walls, and came near to the Forts, made for the defence of the Royal City, where all matters relating to War being, as we ſaid, utterly neglected, there was not as much as a Man to oppoſe, nor a Dog to bark againſt them, as Agathias phraſeth it, the Money which had been formerly employed in paying the Souldiers, being now converted to the maintenance of diſhoneſt Women, Chariot-drivers and other ſorts of looſe or Effeminate Perſons. The Hunnes now were come within an Hundred and fifty Furlongs of the City: Within it appeared nothing but Confuſion and Tumult, nothing was heard but Lamentations, ſhutting of Shop-windows, and Clapping together of Doors. The Emperour himſelf was not a little diſmayed, by whoſe Order all ſuch Churches as ſtood without the City, toward the Europe-ſide and the Sea-ſhore, had all their choice Ornaments, and Utenſills removed into places of ſecurity at a diſtance.

253. So dreadfull was the approach of theſe Barbarians, that ſcarcely could any Military men be got, to make good the Walls and Gates of the City; in Caſe their boldneſs ſhould bring them ſo far: Onely thoſe they called Scholarii, made a ſhew with their Gay clothes, and Courtly dreſſes, being indeed inrolled amongſt the Souldiers, that continued under pay, and watching by their turns in the Palace, but meanly skilled, and as little practiſed in matters relating to War, or the Diſcipline of a Camp, ſerving rather for Pomp and ſhew, than any thing elſe. For whereas, in former times, none were admitted to this Employment, but Perſons of Merit, and in reward of their former Services in the Field, who paid no Money for their places; Zeno the Iſaurian firſt of all Princes, after his Reſtitution, broke this laudable Order, admitting Towns-men of his Familiars, and Acquaintance into the Number; which Courſe being followed in after-times, when raw and unexperienced Men crowded in, then became the Employment a ſort of Merchandiſe, and he that would pay down his Gold, was received without any farther ſcruple or Inquiſition. For want of experienced and old Souldiers, ſuch as theſe were ſet to the defence of the City; but the Barbarians ſtill coming on, and the Tumults and diſorders thereupon increaſing, Old Beliſarius whoſe hands could ſcarcely now hold a Shield, or his Armes weild a Sword, was by Order from the Emperour, ſent out againſt them. His Army conſiſted of about three Hundred ſtout Fellows, which had ſerved under him in his latter Wars, the reſt were a rude Company, having neither Skill nor Courage, and to theſe many Countreymen joyned themſelves, who were driven from their Habitations by the Hunnes. Being conſtrained to make the beſt advantage he could of this ſlender Army, he fortified his Camp, and ſent out his Scouts to diſcover the Motions of the Enemy.

Old Beliſarius ſent out againſt them.

254. He cauſed many Fires to be kindled, and Lights to be ſet by Night in ſeveral places, to amuze the Barbarians with thoughts of a great Force coming againſt them. And the device took for ſome time, ſo as to ſtop their Carriere; but when they heard how ſmall the Roman Army was, and not able to graple with them, they held on their way, and renewed their former Practices. Beliſarius his Men, in the mean time, were very confident, and mightily elevated with the Thoughts, of what they had formerly done; with the Conſideration that they were Romans, and who thoſe were with whom they ſhould contend; which he perceiving, by a prudent Speech, ſhewed them the difference betwixt Courage and Careleſsneſs, raſh Confidence and Hope, and put them in mind with what diſadvantage in reſpect of number they were to fight. Uſing ſuch Arguments, as made them more Cautious, but not leſs Valiant, when he underſtood that two Thouſand of the Enemies Horſe marched againſt him; he placed two Hundred of his Men in a Wood, to lye in Ambuſh and fall on upon the Signal given. The Countreymen he ordered to follow with great ſhouts, and as much noiſe as they could make; and in this manner with the reſt, he fell upon the Enemy, which for the duſt and noiſe, not diſcerning the number of the Romans, thought them more than indeed they were; and then the Signal given, theſe in the Wood aroſe and fell upon their Backs, ſo that laid at on all ſides, they Contracted themſelves into a narrower Compaſs as he deſigned, and thereby were leſs able, either to defend themſelves, or hurt their Enemies, theſe behind not being able to protect thoſe before, and their great number being uſeleſs, and in no Capacity to compaſs, or incircle their Enemies.

Over-powers them.

But is re-called.

255. By degrees therefore their number was ſo leſſened, that judging themſelves to be incompaſſed with a great Army, they bore back and began to run, which advantage the Romans improving, killed about four Hundred of them, and beat the reſt to their Camp, where they were received with opprobrious Language, and exceeding great Terrour of their Companions; who quite out of heart with this defeat, cut their Cheeks with Knives, and uſing other Expreſſions of grief proper to their Nation, bewailed their Condition; for they gave themſelves, for little better than loſt. And ſuch indeed, or worſe, might have been their Lot, had Beliſarius by a quick and effectual purſuit made uſe of this Conſternation of their minds. But he was ſpeedily called to the City, the Inhabitants whereof were a little too kind, and gratefull to him. For this preſent Victory calling to their minds the Glory of his former Atchievements; they began to admire his Conduct, extoll his Valour, and Cry him up for ſuch a Souldier, as no former times could parallel, whom Old Age it ſelf could not enervate, nor that which puts an end to all humane Abilities, abate the Vivacity of his Spirit. This the great Men of the times could not endure to hear, and indeed the whole Court, as well the Prince himſelf as others, being of late years fallen to Idleneſs, and Effeminate Courſes; and having reſolved upon a new Expedient, to divert the Invaſions of the barbarous Nations, were quite out of Love with War, and ſlighted him, who had been the great Inſtrument in martial Actions. They calumniated him as a Vain-glorious Perſon, gaping merely after Popularity, and hunting perpetually after the Applauſe of the People, urging that he nouriſhed ſome hopes, and had private deſigns more than the World was aware of. This reward had Beliſarius for his good Services, and ſo ingratefull were the Courtiers, as Agathias obſerves. That he was in diſgrace after his great Employments, is affirmed by all Writers, and ſome would have him ſo far out of Favour, that the taking away of his Life had been a Mercy to him, being reduced to ſuch neceſſities, that he begged his Bread upon the Highway. This, as a thing much talked of, we muſt examine, and here being to take our Farewell of this great Commander, we ſhall be ſo far from Impartiality, as to take notice of what the pretended Procopius has written concerning him in his ſecret Hiſtory. For although in his former Books he had told the Truth, and nothing but the Truth; yet you muſt know that the whole Truth in thoſe times he dared not to tell, neither concerning the Emperour, nor other Great ones: In brief therefore, what is ſaid there concerning the Faults, and Diſgraces of Beliſarius.

He was very Uxorious.

Her Lewdneſs.

256. The ſource and Original of moſt of his Failings and Miſcarriages, he makes to be an Extravagant, Uxorious humour, or a fond doting upon his Wife, which was the moſt cunning, and moſt Incontinent of all Women. His Domeſticks revealed to him the ſecret Dalliances ſhe uſed with that Theodoſius we have formerly mentioned, and he was ſo poſſeſſed with the affront for a time, that nothing would content him, but the death of the Adulterer; but ſhe again ſo ſoothed him up with good words, that he was content to think her wronged, and gave up her Accuſers to her Mercy, which ſhe turned into extreme Cruelty, as we ſaid before; and Conſtantianus, becauſe he ſhewed himſelf much concerned for his General's Honour, loſt his Life in that manner, as it is deſcribed in it's due time and place. After this, her diſhoneſt Actions being taken notice of by Photius, a Son ſhe had by a former Husband, he grew impatient, and extremely inraged againſt Theodoſius, which ſo far ſet her againſt him, that ſhe ſought his death, and left nothing unpractiſed which was conſiſtent with ſecrecy to make him away, the rather becauſe Theodoſius had ſignified to her, that he could not come near her ſo long as he continued with her. But Photius more netled ſtill with his Mothers harſh uſage, and her known Plots to be rid of him, procures one to tell her Husband all he knows, concerning the Grand Infelicity of them both in ſuch a Relation. Beliſarius hears it with great Indignation and Grief, and falling at the Feet of Photius, deſires his Aſſiſtence for removing Theodoſius out of the way: Whereupon they ſwear ſecrecy, and fidelity each to other, but the Execution of the Plot is put off, till Theodoſius ſhould return to Epheſus. For thither he had once retired, pretending he would take upon him the habit of a Monk, which put her into an Agony, and made her ſo troubleſome, that neither her Husband, nor the Emperour and Empreſs could be at reſt till he was remanded, which he was willing enough to be, acting onely this part, till Beliſarius ſhould be upon his way into Perſia. And he once gone, and Photius with him, he returned to Conſtantinople; but Antonina being to follow her Husband (for ſhe would never be abſent from him, leſt once from under the Influence of her Tongue, he ſhould come ſeriouſly to deliberate, and reſolve upon ſomething that might not make for her Intereſt) he was to repair again to Epheſus, where Photius reſolved to fall upon him, and ſeize upon his Wealth, which was very great. For out of the Adminiſtration of the publick Treaſure at Carthage and Ravenna, he had ſcraped up no leſs than ten Thouſand pounds of Gold.

Antonina fuit Imperatricis Theodoræ Ζωστὴ, à Veſte, dignitate Patritiâ, mulier ſolertiſſima & ut Procopius, ſcribit ἱκανωτάτη ἀνθρώπων ἁπάντων μηχανᾶσθαι τὰ ἀμήχανα. Beliſario conjugi ſuperfuit ad Juſtinum ſecundum Imp. jamq; exactâ ætate ſuaſu Vigilantiæ Juſtiniani Auguſti ſororis, Templum S. Procopii poſt conflagrationem, Byzantii reſtauravit. Vide Alem. in notis ad Arcan. Hiſt. p. 3.

257. Beliſarius in the mean time invaded Perſia, and took Siſibranum, or the Fort of the Iſaurians; where, when he yet lay, News was brought that his Wife was coming to him, which did ſo perplex him, that out of a great deſire to be upon the Roman ground, to have the better occaſion of being revenged, he retreated to the Borders, and to his great Diſgrace omitted the Expedition he once deſigned into the upper Countries, whereby he might have waſted all Aſſyria as far as Cteſiphon, have delivered the Antiochians from their Captivity, and intercepted the return of Choſroes out of Lazica, where his Army upon notice of the Romans being in the Heart of their Countrey mutined againſt him. But Beliſarius returning into the Roman Territories there found his Wife, and kept her for ſome time as a Priſoner, without any reſpect at all, purpoſing often to put an end to his Vexation and Diſgrace together with her Life; but as our Authour verily believeth, was again overcome with Love, or as others gave out, was ſome way or other inchanted by her. Then goes Photius to Epheſus, as faſt as his Horſe could carry him; where he finds Theodoſius, upon the Report of his coming, having taken Sanctuary in the Church of St. John, but Andrew the Biſhop for Money betrayed him into his hands; and then upon notice that his Mother by her Intereſt with the Empreſs, had procured both her, and her Husband to be called to Court, ſent him into Cilicia with ſtrict Order to his Keepers not to diſcover where he was, and went away with his Treaſure to Conſtantinople. Here Theodora the Empreſs, to requite Antonina for the Treachery ſhe had uſed in the Perſecution of John the Cappadocian, proſecuted ſeverely thoſe, that had had any hand in the taking of Theodoſius; and Photius was extremely laſhed, to declare where he had put him. He was a man very ſickly, and had been ever very tender and carefull of his Health, yet he endured all, rather than he would break his Oath, and diſcover the ſecrets of Beliſarius.

The Empreſs a Friend to her.

258. But all came out at length. The Empreſs having got Caligonus the Eunuch, and Pander of Antonina, who reſtored him. Then did ſhe reſtore to her, her Minion, and cheering him up with all the Delicacies and Divertiſements the Court could afford, threatned ſometimes ſhe would make him General of a Roman Army; but Divine Juſtice prevented the Infamy, for he dyed not long after of a Dyſentery. In the mean time Photius was kept in Priſon, where he could ſee no Light, and though he twice eſcaped and took Sanctuary in the Churches of the Bleſſed Virgin, and St. Sophia; yet the Empreſs who made light of all places Sacred, to the great Grief and Aſtoniſhment of the Clergy, pulled him from the Altars, and returned him to his Dungeon, where having ſpent more than two years, Zacharias the Prophet in a Dream commanded him to make his third Attempt, promiſing to be his Protectour, and accordingly he made his eſcape to Jeruſalem, where being ſhorn, he took upon him the Profeſſion of a Monk, and eſcaped the Cruelty of Theodora. But Beliſarius having broken his Oath, whereby he ingaged to ſtand by him to the utmoſt, ever after found Providence croſs him in his undertakings. For although in his third Expedition againſt the Perſians, he ſet Choſroes packing to his great Honour; yet he was accuſed of ſomething which ſtuck hard to him afterward. He was by ſome, either thought Guilty of Treachery or Cowardiſe, for letting Choſroes paſs the Euphrates, without any moleſtation, though he led away an infinite number of Roman Captives taken at Callinicum. Not long after, when the Plague raged at Conſtantinople, the Emperour alſo happened to fall very dangerouſly ſick, the News whereof flying to the Army, ſome of the Officers uſed this Expreſſion; That if the Roman People ſhould be permitted to Name his Succeſſour at Conſtantinople, it would come to paſs that they ſhould ſpend all their days in the Camp. The Emperour preſently after recovering, one Commander

'Αλλά τις προτερήσασα δίκη νόσῳ ἁλόντα δυσεντερίας ἐξ ἀνθρώπων αὐτὸν ἀφανίζει. Δυσεντερίαν Alemannus interpretatur Inteſtinorum difficultatem magis Grammaticè quàm medicè.

Photius eſcapeth the Empreſs.

Beliſarius having broken his Oath, ever after finds Providence Croſs.

Commander accuſed another; but Peter and Johannes Helluo, affirmed they were the words of Beliſarius and Buzes. The Empreſs thought that by that ſpeech they meant her, and in great wrath commanded them all to appear at Conſtantinople.

Put out of Command.

259. Buzes ſhe clapt faſt up in a Dungeon under the Palace, where he lay well nigh two years, given over by all men for loſt, and then being ſuddenly let out into the light, ſeemed Minerva's Bird both to himſelf and others, for he remained Purblind ever after, and never had his health to his Dying day. Beliſarius though Convicted of no Crime, was preſently put out of Command, and Martinus ordered to head the Army in the Eaſt. His Guard was beſtowed upon great Courtiers and Eunuchs, who caſt Lots for them, and his Friends were forbidden to keep him company. An incredible ſight now it was to behold this lately Great man walk through the City alone, ever ſad and thoughtfull, as expecting daily to be ſent to another World. A great Sum of money, which the Empreſs heard he had in the Eaſt, ſhe ſent an Eunuch to ſeize; and when he came to Court, cauſed him to be ſlighted by her Husband, and derided by all their Attendants, herein gratifying Antonina for her aſſiſtence in the buſineſs of John the Cappadocian, that ſhe might triumph over him as her Slave and Vaſſal, as indeed it came to paſs. He retires from Court with a dejected both mind and Countenance, looking ſtill behind if there were none ſent to diſpatch him, and coming into his Chamber, there ſits down all alone, not meditating on any thing becoming a Valiant man, which he forgets himſelf ever to have been. He ſweats, he trembles, he is anxious and fearfull, and much diſquieted at the Cowardly thought of Death. Antonina walks by, pretending not to be very well to ſhun ſuſpicion, and it being now almoſt dark, one Quadratus appears at the door, ſent, as he ſaid, from the Empreſs. At that word Beliſarius falls backward upon the Bed, neither able to ſtir hand nor foot, ſo deſtitute of Courage, that he expected the ſtroke of Death, when Quadratus produced Theodora's Letter, wherein ſhe told him, he could not be ignorant what he had deſerved at her hands, yet ſhe pardoned him, and granted him his Life at his Wives requeſt, to whom ſhe was exceedingly obliged; and whereas he ought to acknowledge his ſafety and fortunes obtained for her ſake, ſhe ſhould obſerve very ſtrictly what returns he would make unto her.

260. He having red the Letter, could not contain himſelf for Joy, but before Quadratus, that he might be an Eye witneſs, how ready he was to obey Theodora, fell down at his Wives Feet, which taking in his hands, he firſt kiſſed the one, and then the other, calling her the Authour of his Security, and profeſſing for the time to come, he would carry himſelf not as her Husband, but her obedient Slave. Then did the Empreſs of that Money, ſhe had cauſed to be ſeized in the Eaſt, beſtow thirty Centenaries upon the Emperour her Husband, and left the reſt to Beliſarius, whom they both long before this had much envied and ſtomached for his great Wealth, yet the conſideration of his vaſt Services again checked them, and when they had a mind to accuſe him of converting the publick Spoils and Treaſure to his own uſe, they ſtill wanted whereon to fix, as having no evident proof in any particular. But now that ſhe ſaw him fearfull and dejected, ſhe caſt about by one device to get poſſeſſion of all he had, and that was by Marrying to her Grandſon Anaſtaſius, his onely Daughter and Child Joannina. He in the mean time, deſired to be reſtored to his former Power and Dignity, and that he might be ſent General into the Eaſt againſt Choſroes, which Antonina oppoſed, affirming he ſhould never Command the Roman Army, where he had put ſuch an Affront upon her. But at length he is made Maſter of the Emperour's Horſe, and ſent the ſecond time into Italy, upon condition, as the Report went, that he ſhould not ask of Cæſar one Penny toward the Expence of the War, but defray all at his own charge. And ſome imagined he was content to ſay or doe any thing, that he might but get out of Town, and have an opportunity to be revenged upon his Wife, and the reſt by whom he had been ſo much abuſed.

261. But forgetting all that had paſſed, as alſo the Oath whereby he ſtood bound to Photius, and the reſt of his Friends, he ſtill gave her as good Quarter as ever, being as paſſionately in love with her as at the firſt day, though ſhe was now above threeſcore years old. In Italy his Affairs ſucceeded as formerly we have related at large; Providence ſtill croſſing all his Indeavours. For whereas in his former War with Vitigis, his Councils and Strategems generally had good ſucceſs, how improbably ſoever deſigned; now his Plots and Devices, though founded upon good and ſubſtantial Reaſons, ever miſcarried; that being God's diſpenſation, which men without reaſon call Fortune and Chance, as Procopius well obſerveth. But amongſt mongſt other miſcheifs which happened in Italy, all the time he ſpent there, nothing more hindred the advance of the Emperour's Intereſt, than the jealouſie betwixt him and John the Nephew of Vitalianus. Whilſt he continued ſtill in that Countrey, the Empreſs reſolving to conſummate the Marriage betwixt his Daughter and her Grandſon, earneſtly ſolicited them both by Letters for their Conſent, but they ſtill put it off, till their return to Conſtantinople; but ſhe eaſily perceiving the ground of their Excuſe, and ſuſpecting that if once ſhe were Dead, Antonina would bear but ſmall reſpect to her Relations, Marries the Boy and Girl together contrary to all Law, and as was reported, ſhe cauſed her to be forced, that the Nuptials being confirmed by deflouring of her, the Prince himſelf might not be able to hinder the Match. However the thing being done, they lived as Husband and Wife together eight months, and loved each other exceedingly. Yet the Empreſs Dying, when Antonina came to Conſtantinople, ſhe quite forgot all her promiſes to Theodora, and without any ſenſe of her Daughters Honour, took her away by force from Anaſtaſius, with whom ſhe had lain ſo long, every one crying out againſt her for ſo unjuſt a deed. And when her Husband was arrived out of Italy, ſhe eaſily obtained his Conſent therein, by which he diſcovered the temper of his mind; For as to his breach of Faith with Photius, and others of his Friends, the World eaſily excuſed him, as ſuppoſing it done for fear of the Empreſs, and not as awed and governed by his Wife. But when it was perceived that ſhe and Caligonus her Pander, ruled him as they liſted, then began he to be deſpiſed by all men, and derided as little better than a Mad-man. In theſe things, to ſpeak freely, Beliſarius was to blame. So the pretended Procopius in his ſecret Hiſtory.

262. Three things are here principally charged upon Beliſarius, one of them as the cauſe of all, viz. the doating on his Wife, the next is his breach of Faith, and the third, his Cowardiſe or dejection of Spirit, which appeared in his ſo unmanly Carriage, at the apprehenſion he had of Death; for as to the ill ſucceſs he had in his laſt Expedition into Italy; Procopius confeſſes his Councils were well enough laid; tells us in ſeveral places, that he carried the War on at his own Expence; that the Emperour never ſeriouſly applied himſelf to that War, till he ſent Narſes as General; and eſpecially he attributes this great change of Succeſs to the various effects of divine Providence. As for his uxorious humour, he had too great an example in the Emperour, whoſe Lady having ſuch a ſcope given her, deſired, and indeavoured to have the ſame Rule erected in all great Families; and having allowed his Wife that liberty in the days of the Empreſs, after her Death ſhe had been too long in Poſſeſſion of it to be turned out. His Faith he ought not to have broken to Photius nor his Friends, if he could lawfully keep it, but he ſaw there was no contending with that imperious Woman, who had reſolved that the Luſt of his Wife, ſhould become a Law to him, and though at firſt, he might be highly ſenſible of the diſhonours offered to his Bed; yet, as other prudent men, who are afflicted in that Nature generally practiſe, he might think it better to make as little Noiſe as poſſible, and conceal that misfortune for which he had no Cure, but ſuch a Remedy as would make him full as Unfortunate, as the preſent Calamity could do. For the pretended poorneſs, and abjectedneſs of his Spirit; his Actions in the World were too glorious, and carried more demonſtration of Valour and Courage with them, than to ſuffer ſuch a foul Aſpertion to ſtick to his Memory. How many hundreds of times had he met Death in the face, how often did he rather ſeek for it, than ſhun it, venturing his Perſon far beyond the obligations of a General? Gallant minds have an antipathy to Baſe, Cowardly, and clandeſtine Attempts. No man was ever ſo valiant, but had ſome Reluctancy at the thought of an Aſſaſſination. We could inſtance in ſome mighty Commanders, that readily ventured their Lives in a Battel at the Head of an Army, and yet by all Provocations imaginable, could never be brought to indanger them onely in a Duel. Nature it ſelf has an averſion for Death, but gallant Nature eſpecially for a baſe and infamous Death, by the hand of an Executioner, or ſome Effeminate or paltry Eunuch. But although the whole ſeries of the late Hiſtory ſeems a glorious and laſting Monument of Beliſarius his worth to intelligent Readers, yet having wittingly omitted, and referred to this place, a particular Character of him, we ſhall doe him the Right, having preſented the worſt of him, to give his Picture alſo as it is drawn though in little, yet to the beſt advantage, and that by none other than the Pencil of Procopius too his conſtant Aſſeſſour.

Procop. Bell. Goth. lib. 3. ad initium.

263. Beliſarius was the Diſcourſe of all the World, having gained the Honour of two unmatchable Victories, brought two Kings Priſoners to Conſtantinople, and beyond all expectation, made the Race and Wealth of Genſerick and Theodorick,

(the moſt renowned of all Barbarians,) the Spoils and Trophies of War. To the Roman Empire he recovered its own Wealth, from out of the hands of its Enemies, and in a ſhort time, the Dominion of almoſt one half of the Lands and Seas thereof. It was a great pleaſure to the Conſtantinopolitans, and ſuch as they could not be ſatisfied with it, to behold him daily paſſing from his Houſe, and returning thither through the Forum; for his going in the Streets was a kind of Triumph, Multitudes of Vandals, Goths and Moors ever following him; beſides, he was a beautifull Perſon, Tall, and of the goodlieſt Countenance that could be ſeen. To Suitours he was ever eaſie of Acceſs, and as mild as the meaneſt man whatſoever. Both the Souldier and Countreyman were ever in love with his Government, being to Martial men exceeding bountifull, releiving the Sick and Wounded with large Sums, and rewarding ſuch as did valiantly with prizes of Honour. If any in Battel loſt his Horſe, Bow, or any other thing, preſently he was ſupplied with another by the General. Where he Commanded in the Field, never Countreyman ſuffered Violence, but all, where his Armies came, had the fortune to grow Richer, ſelling their Commodities at their own Rates to the Souldiers; who by Guards kept off Horſe from ſpoiling the Corn, while it was yet growing; and the other ripe Fruits were in as great ſecurity. He had a wonderfull care of his Fame and Chaſtity, never touching any Woman but his Wife, and of ſo many beautifull Priſoners of the Vandals and Goths, (ſuch as none ever ſaw the like,) never ſuffering one ſo much as to come in his Preſence. He had a very ſharp wit, and was exceedingly dextrous in a doubtfull Caſe; he was valiant in War with cautiouſneſs and advice, bold when there was Reaſon, and ever ſwift or ſlow in his Undertakings, as the occaſion required. In great difficulties reſolute, full of hope, and free from perturbation. In Proſperity, he was neither Elevated nor Voluptuous. And no man ever ſaw Beliſarius Drunk.

264, Thus during his Commands in Africk and Italy, he was ſtill Victorious; And when he came to Conſtantinople, his worth was yet more taken notice of. For being himſelf eminent in Vertue, and exceeding all the Generals that ever were, in Wealth, and in the ſtrength of his Lanciers and Targetiers, both Commanders and common Souldiers ſtood in awe of him. He had in conſtant readineſs of the Retinue of his Houſhold, ſeven thouſand choice Horſemen, whereof every one thought himſelf fit to ſtand in the Front at a Battel, and to challenge the moſt daring of the Enemies, which being obſerved by the ancient men at Rome, who took notice what thoſe men did in the Fights, with great wonder they affirmed, that one man's Family ruined the Power of Theoderich. Thus was Beliſarius powerfull, both in Dignity and Council, ever adviſing to the Emperour's beſt advantage, and chearfully executing what was reſolved; whereas the other Commanders equal in power, and attending onely their private gain, made ſpoil of the Roman Subject, and expoſed him to the Injuries of the Souldier. They neither apprehended any thing worthy themſelves, nor had the common Souldiers in Obedience, and ſo committing many Errours, the Roman Affairs were in a ſhort time Ruined. Thus Procopius in that part of his Hiſtory, which precedes the Account he gives us of Beliſarius his laſt and fruitleſs Expedition into Italy. Afterward he farther tells us, that the Emperour having ſent for him home, held him in Honour, upon the Death of Germanus, yet would not ſend him into Italy, and though he were General of the Eaſt, he made him Captain of his Guards, and kept him at Conſtantinople. And Beliſarius was the cheif of all the Romans in Dignity; ſome indeed had the priority of being made Patritians, and Conſuls before him, yet yielded him precedence, being aſhamed to make uſe of the Law, and to aſſume that Right it gave them againſt ſo eminent Merit: And the Emperour took it well they did ſo. Thus the Reader hath an account of what is ſaid both for and againſt him, by one who pretended to be as free from flattery, as void of Prejudice.

265. But however theſe Noblemen carried themſelves in the point of Precedence, certain it is that his great felicities contracted abundance of Envy, and although he was not ſo remarkable for any thing as his conſtant Fidelity and Allegiance, notwithſtanding all his temptations and opportunities, yet no leſs than thrice was he accuſed of ambitious and treacherous purpoſes, viz. Once when he was in Perſia, and Juſtinian was ſick; a ſecond time when he had newly Conquered Gelimer, and the laſt when he was grown old in Conſtantinople, perhaps not long after his Victory over the Hunnes; for Agathias ſeems to take notice of it. We are told that on the fifth day of December, the Emperour being very angry with him aſſembled the Senate, wherein was preſent Eutychius the Patriarch, and cauſed the Confeſſions of his Accuſers to be read, which Beliſarius took very hainouſly, for by Cæſar's Command, mand, he was deprived of his Guards and Attendance, and kept Priſoner in his own Houſe. But in the following year, on the nineteenth day of July, he was again reſtored to favour, and to his ancient Dignity and Honours. And at laſt in the thirty eighth year of Juſtinian's Reign, on the thirteenth day of March, Beliſarius Died at Conſtantinople, and his Eſtate was aſſigned to the Auguſt Houſe of Marina. For the Reader muſt know, that before the time of Juſtinian, there were five ſeveral Imperial Houſes or Courts at Conſtantinople, by the Authour of the Deſcription called Palaces, beſides ſix known by the names of Domus Divinæ Auguſtarum, or Divine Houſes of the Empreſſes, and three other that were ſtyled Nobiliſſimæ. Eminent amongſt theſe laſt were the Houſes of Placidia and Marina, in the firſt Region of the City. In ſome of them the Emperours would ſometimes Lodge, others ſerved for Treaſuries, their Keepers being called Curatores, and choſen out of the prime Nobility, particularly in thoſe days, George the Couſin of Theodora the Empreſs was Curator of that of Marina. To thoſe Houſes and Palaces Juſtinian added others, built very magnificently in that Suburb called Heræum, as alſo in the other called Jucundianum and Juſtinianeum, at this day known by the names of Galata and Pera.

Vide Alemannum in Notis ad Procopii Hiſtor. Arcan. p. 85.

Chronicon Anonymum Vaticanum Zonaras. apud Aleman.

Vide Aleman.

266. But ſuch was the fortune and end of Beliſarius, contrary to the Fables which ſome later Hiſtorians have deviſed, as that his eyes ſhould be put out, and that he was reduced to ſuch Poverty, that he ſhould beg an half-peny on the Highway, which ſeems a miſtake, for John the Cappadocian, a man of Patritian Dignity, Exconſul and Præfectus Prætorio, concerning whom Procopius relates, that being baniſhed into Ægypt, he was compelled by the Souldiers that carried him to beg Bread, or an half-peny of thoſe they met. But of thoſe who firſt related the ſtory concerning his Blindneſs, and Begging, ſome confeſs that other Chronologers delivered that his eyes were not put out, but being deſpoiled of his Dignity, and almoſt all his Honours, he was again reſtored to his ancient Glory and Reputation. And in this condition we are willing to leave him, being glad to vindicate his Honour, but ſuppoſing him a man ſubject to Faults, and Infirmities, eſpecially conſidering the greatneſs of his Place, the vaſtneſs of his Command and Power, with the largeneſs of his Fortune, all which are ſo pregnant of temptations, that he ſtood in need of the Aſſiſtences afforded by Chriſtian Religion, of which it appears, that he was a Profeſſour, from what Procopius relates concerning the Baptiſm of Theodoſius, (upon the Expedition into Africk,) whatever any one hath fanſied of his being a Pagan.

Vide Aleman.

267. Now to return to our ſtory of the Wars, which we ſhall preſently diſmiſs after Beliſarius the General; the Hunnes underſtanding he was recalled, and none other ſent againſt them, began to make a ſtop of their flight, and that Party which invaded the Cherſoneſus fell with all their force upon the Wall. The Leader of thoſe that defended it, was one Germanus the Son of Dorotheus, a Stripling whoſe Beard began but to ſprout; yet being born in the ſame Town with the Emperour, from eight years old he had bred him up, and now ſet him at the Head of an Army. The Hunnes not being able to force the Wall, made a company of Boats with Reeds, Ropes and Wool, whereon having put ſix hundred men, they thought to paſs by the Fortifications and ſeize upon the paſſage; but this their Deſign being known, the Romans manned out their Boats, and eaſily deſtroyed this new ſort of Invention with all the men in them. The Barbarians being much dejected with this loſs, they made a ſally upon them, wherein they ſlew many, and might have done more Execution poſſibly, but that Germanus their Leader, in heat of his young bloud, ventured farther than a prudent General would have done, and received a wound in his Thigh. However, the Hunnes diſcouraged with this loſs at Land, and more by that received upon the Water, retreated from the Wall, and joyned themſelves with thoſe under the Conduct of Zabergan; thoſe alſo that went for Greece, receiving a ſtop at the Straits of Thermopylæ returned, and all reſolved to march homeward. But Zabergan and his men threatned that they, as well as the Cotrigurians, would carry back a good quantity of the Roman Gold, and except the Priſoners were ſpeedily ranſomed, they would cut the Throats of them all. The Emperour ſent them ſo much Gold, as he thought would ſuffice to redeem them, and to purchaſe the Retreat of the Barbarians, who having received it, ſet at liberty the Captives, and amongſt the reſt Sergius the Son of Bacchus. Which done, they left off pillaging, and returned to their own Seats.

Agathias, lib. 5.

The Hunnes bought off retire.

268. The Citizens of Conſtantinople murmured exceedingly, that thoſe Hunnes, having put ſuch an affront upon the Empire, ſhould return home rewarded, as if the Romans themſelves had committed the offence: But the Emperour had another deſign which they were not aware of, and afterward produced ſo good effects, as our Authour obſerveth, that they who now blamed him, did then exceedingly admire and commend him for it. For, as we ſaid, he had reſolved upon this Project, to ſet the Barbarians at variance amongſt themſelves, and cauſe them to deſtroy one another. Therefore Zabergan marching but ſlowly homeward, he wrote to Sandilchus, Captain of the other Hunnes, his Mercenary and Confederate, letting him know how the Cutrigurians had invaded his Dominions, not ſo much for greedineſs of gain, as to approve themſelves as good, or better, than the Uturgurians, in reſpect of valour. He tells him they had received the ſtipend which was to be conferred upon him, and if by a ſpeedy Revenge he did not demonſtrate himſelf to be the ſame for which he had formerly taken him, he was reſolved to make a League with the late Invaders, as thoſe who by their courage did moſt deſerve. Sandilick, enraged upon receipt of the Letter, preſently invades the Territories of the Cutrigurians, and having thence taken a great number of Captives, falls upon thoſe that returned out of Thrace, and having killed many of them, takes away their Gold, and all their booty. Such as eſcaped home recruiting themſelves as well as they could, waged War with Sandilick, and for a long time after theſe Nations raged againſt each other to all extremity, till at length both were ruined, and they loſt their very Countrey name, (if Agathias obſerves right) ſo that if any of them remained, they ſerved other ſorts of People, and being diſperſed, received a name from them. So far were they then from invading the Roman Territories, that it was not as much as known in what part of the World they inhabited. But the utter deſtruction of theſe Nations, ſaith Agathias, fell out afterwards, and every thing relating thereunto ſhall be declared in its order, and according to the true account of time, as near as poſſible. And ſo he concludes the fifth Book of his Hiſtory, which being the laſt of thoſe that are now extant, we have hence too great occaſion to complain of the injury of Time, which has deprived us of the reſt of his labours upon this Subject. For he was not onely an Hiſtorian, but an excellent Poet, and poſſibly had be been not ſo good a Poet, he had been a better Hiſtorian. For his Fancy tranſports him out of the way, and makes his digreſſions about ſeveral matters ſometimes impertinent, delighting to hear himſelf talk, and thinking to edifie his Reader by needleſs diſquiſitions. He was, as he tells us himſelf, the Son of Memnonius, born at Murina, (not Murina in Thrace, but that in Aſia, ſituate upon the River Pythicus, a Colony of the ancient Æolians,) and by Profeſſion a Lawyer, and common Pleader, of no conſiderable Fortune, which he bewails, becauſe his private neceſſities forced him from his beloved Studies. It is no whit his Advantage that he immediately ſucceeds Procopius; but his Digreſſions, when hiſtorical, are ſome of them ſo profitable, that we make uſe of them upon other occaſions.

Juſtinian ſets one ſort of Hunnes againſt the other.

269. All things at this time were not well in Italy, which when every one expected it ſhould never more be troubled or embroiled with the Goths, again began to be diſturbed by another Sedition. Vidinus, a certain Comes of that Nation, revolted from Narſes, and implored the aſſiſtence of Amingus, (or Omnirugus) who had been formerly the Aſſociate of Bucellinus. Narſes reſolved to cruſh the miſchief in the Egg, and marching preſently againſt them, defeated them in battel, took them both, and ſending Vidinus to Conſtantinople, put Amingus to death; and to this time and occaſion ſeems to relate what Cedrenus mentions of Narſes his taking Viria and Brincæ from the Goths. So was Italy cleared of the Goths, and the greateſt part of it of the Franks, though they had ſeized and held the Parts of Venetia. There yet remained the Heruli, whom, after the defeat of Odoacer their King, Theodorich had placed near the Alpes. Theſe alſo, at this time, an occaſion was preſented of turning out of Italy by Sindualdus, who being ſet over them by Narſes, preſently again rebelled, and being taken, paid dear for his ambitious purpoſes; for he cauſed him to be hang'd on a very high Gibbet, and afterward, by the Arms and Conduct of Dagiſthæus the Magiſter Militum, cleared all the Coaſts of the Countrey. And ſo at length a period was put to all theſe direfull Calamities wherewith the Barbarians, and eſpecially the Goths, had afflicted Italy for ſo long a time, which by Fire and Sword had its Cities defaced, was deſpoiled of its Men, Wealth and Dignity, and, from the higheſt pitch of felicity, brought to the loweſt and moſt deſolate condition. The greatneſs and variety of its calamities were ſuch, that no Mind can conceive, much leſs any Tongue expreſs, or Pen deſcribe. But now by the ſingular goodneſs of God, after wellnigh an hundred and ſixty years, it began to have repoſe, and Narſes, leſt he ſhould ſeem inferiour to Beliſarius, ſet himſelf

Paulus Diaconus.

Italy at laſt enjoys Repoſe by means of Narſes.

all manner of ways to ſtudy its quiet, and the reſtitution of it to its former luſtre and felicity.

A Plot againſt Juſtinian detected.

270. The repairing of its Cities, and beautifying it with new and magnificent Buildings, was, within a year or two, much hindred by the breaking forth of a Peſtilence, which added to the former miſeries, almoſt exhauſted the Countrey of of its Inhabitants. This Plague, which from the Eaſtern Parts invaded Italy, was called Inguinaria & Bubonis Peſtis, becauſe Bubo's, or Swellings, aroſe in the privy and other glandulous parts, and were followed by a violent Fever, which diſpatched the Party within three days, or elſe he recovered. This being over, Narſes went on with his publick works, and eſpecially with the Reparation of Bridges, particularly that over the River Anienis, which had been broken down by Totilas, as an Inſcription, yet remaining, teſtifies, which ſhews it was perfected in the thirty ninth, and laſt Year of Juſtinian. While he was in hand with theſe works, a notable Conſpiracy was hatched at Conſtantinople, againſt the Life of the Emperour, on the Nones of November, by Ablavius, Marcellus and Sergius, Men of no mean Quality, who purpoſed to kill him by night in his Chamber; but Ablavius making acquainted therewith Euſebius the Exconſul, and John the Logotheta, they revealed the Plot, and the Conſpiratours were ſeized with Swords about them, of whom Marcellus inſtantly killed himſelf. Sergius, upon Examination, impeached Iſaacius and Beliſarius, who were alſo accuſed by Vitus and Paulus, ſo that Beliſarius was impriſoned, as we ſaid before, but afterwards again ſet at Liberty, as an innocent Perſon. Though this Conſpiracy took not, yet have we brought the Reader almoſt to the period of this Prince's Life, and given him a proſpect of all the turbulent Actions of his Reign. Another conſiderable Part is yet behind, which hath made him rather more remarkable to the World in later times; for who hath not heard of the Laws and Law-Books of Juſtinian? The Marks and Prints of his Sword are very long ſince obliterated, but multitudes of Men to this day wear Gowns which are looked upon no otherwiſe than as his Livery. Laws in his days, contrary to the old and received Saying, made a noiſe amongſt Weapons, and his Government, a thing not ordinary, became famous in after times for both. Firſt therefore what he did in reference to the Laws. And then we ſhall conſider of the Temper and Diſpoſition of this Man, ſo much ſpoken of, as to his own Perſon.

SECT. II.

Of the Laws altered, made and modelled by Juſtinian.

Matters previous to Juſtinian's Laws and Model.

Principum Placita.

Scriptum autem Jus eſt Lex, Plebiſcitum, Senatuſconſultum, Principum Placita, Magiſtratuum Edicta, Reſponſa Prudentum.

De hac re vide Libergeum Cenomoraum & alios.

Reſponſa Prudentum.

The Office of theſe Prudentes what.

1. THE Original of the Civil Law, from the Law of the Twelve Tables, we have diſcovered in its due place, together with the Progreſs of it in its Infancy, and how many parts there were of it, or what thoſe were which obtained the Force and Power of Law. After that the ſupreme Authority came to be inveſted in one ſingle Perſon, the Principum placita gave force and efficacy to all the reſt, or could reſcind them, the Power of both Senate and People being, by the Lex Regia, transferred upon him. Yet the Reſponſa Prudentum, and the Magiſtratuum Edicta, continued to be in uſe, and were given out, upon occaſion, for the clearing of Doubts and Difficulties, and letting the People know what was their Duty. Foraſmuch as all Difficulties could not poſſibly be removed by Laws formerly, or Conſtitutions and Edicts afterwards, the Interpretations and Anſwers of wiſe and learned Men were found neceſſary, nay, as Pomponius witneſſeth, when the Laws of the Twelve Tables were made, the Authority of ſome prudent men was requiſite to interpret them, the Credit and Reputation of whom ſo much increaſed, that, in practice, a great part of the Suits and Controverſies were referred to their Council and Determination. Now their Office, Duty and Employment conſiſted chiefly in four thing. Firſt, in preſcribing forms for Stipulations and Judgments. Secondly, in giving Council and Advice to ſuch as asked it, in matters of Law eſpecially, but indeed in all matters whatſoever, as Cicero writes, that in old time they had recourſe to Pub. Craſſus, T. Coruncanius and Scipio, in all things, whether Divine or Humane. Thirdly, they interpreted ſuch Laws as were hard to be underſtood, or ſeemed contrary, as alſo Inſtruments of Contracts and Teſtaments. And laſtly ſuch matters as were neither by Law, nor Agreement and Conſent of Parties, ordered and concluded, they took up and determined, ex bono & æquo, æquo, as ſeemed moſt right and equitable in their apprehenſions, who, from their ſtudying the known Laws, had moſt reaſon to underſtand what was agreeable to, or might be deduced from, them. They made Profeſſion of this Art either walking croſs the Forum, or ſitting on Benches at home, in a grave and ſtately manner, where they admitted all Clients, as appears by the Books of Cicero, which he wrote concerning Oratory and Laws. But their Reſponſes were concerning matters of Law, not of Fact, whereupon Celſus hath defined their Art very well to be Ars Boni & Æqui.

Where they profeſſed their Art.

2. Pomponius tells us, that before the time of Auguſtus, it was free to every one to practiſe, who had confidence of his own Ability, neither did they ſign their Anſwers, but wrote moſt commonly to the Judges themſelves, or told their opinions to ſuch as conſulted them. But Auguſtus vindicated the honour of the Civil Law, and provided for the ſecurity of the Eſtates of the Subject, by taking away the power of giving Anſwers from all, except ſuch as ſhould be authorized by the Prince. Of thoſe who excelled in this Art or Myſtery, Pomponius reckons up about ſixty, from Sextus Papyrius, who lived in the Days of Tarquinius Superbus (when the Laws made by Kings were in force) to Salvius Julianus, who flouriſhed under Hadrian the Emperour. Theſe, and others, omitted by him, are too many here to be reckoned up. Of them Tit. Coruncanius, who flouriſhed not long after the time of Pyrrhus, firſt made publick Profeſſion of the Law, whereas thoſe before him gave onely Anſwers in private. Scipio Naſica, a young Man, was of ſuch eſteem, that an Houſe was given him by the State in the Via Sacra, that he might more opportunely be conſulted. A little before the 3d Punick War Q. Mucius Scævola, M. Junius Brutus and M. Manilius, who laid the foundations of it, by the many Books they publiſhed, gave, as it were, life to the Civil Law. For Mucius, who was Pontifex maximus, the year wherein Tib. Gracchus was ſlain, left ten Books concerning Law, M. Brutus ſeven, and Manilius three, though Cæſar ſaid, he heard Scævola ſay, that Brutus left but three in all, and his Method was not well liked of, becauſe he expounded not Theſes, but Hypotheſes. P. Mucius Scævola, the Augur, his Houſe, for his Skill in the Law, was called the Oracle of the City. Q. Mucius Scævola was Pontifex maximus, and firſt gave form to the Civil Law, by reducing it into eighteen Books.

Auguſtus takes away the Power from all but ſuch as ſhould be licenſed by the Prince.

D. de Origine Juris.

T. Coruncanius firſt made publick Profeſſion of the Law.

Scipio Naſica.
Q. Mucius Scævola.
M. Junius Brutus.
M. Manilius.

3. Servius Sulpicius, who was Conſul together with M. Marcellus, and one of the moſt eloquent in Tully's Age, came, on a time, to conſult Q. Mucius in a point of Law. Mucius gave him an Anſwer, but he underſtood it not, and asked him a ſecond time; but neither upon a ſecond Anſwer did he underſtand the matter. Hereat Mucius fell on chiding him, ſaying, it was a ſhame for one who was both a Patritian, and pleaded Cauſes, to be an Ignorant in the Laws of his Countrey. Servius, nettled with the diſgrace, applied himſelf preſently to the ſtudy of the Law, and came to ſuch Eminency therein, that dying in an Embaſſy, his Statue was erected in the Pleading place at the Publick charge. He left wellnigh an hundred and fifty Books, as they counted them, and had many eminent Auditours, who lived to ſee the great Change of the Roman Government, from a Free State, as they termed it, to a Monarchy. And the Government was changed at ſuch time, as many eminent and learned Men had often conſulted concerning a Model of the Civil Law, and reducing it into a Form of Art. For the multitude of Books began then to be cumberſome, and Pompey, Cæſar and Cicero laid their Heads together, how to regulate this great variety, and preſcribe to it certain bounds and limits. Cicero wrote a Book concerning the modelling of it, but ſome think he never finiſhed it, though elſewhere they own he hath given his thoughts, and complains of the great confuſion, and want of ſome able Perſon to undertake the Task. Yet notwithſtanding after the time of Julius Cæſar much more was added by heaps of Writings, and more Laws made, the Conſtitutions of Princes now coming to bear a great part in this myſtery. But this Service Auguſtus did to this noble Science, that beſides the Leges Juliæ, formed and named from him, adopted into the Julian Family, he vindicated the honour of it, by taking away the liberty uſed formerly by every Pretender, and allowing onely ſuch to give Anſwers as ſhould be authorized by the Prince.

Servius Sulpicius.

The multitude of Law-books begins to be cumberſome about Cæſar's time.

4. Trebatius was a Man of great authority with him in this kind, whom he uſed as his familiar friend, commended by Cicero for his ſingular memory and knowledge in the Civil Law, who much cheriſhed him when he was young, writing to him his Topicks, and many Epiſtles, full of very good humour. Much about this time Atteius Capito, and Labeo Antiſtius, by their contrary opinions, ſowed ſuch ſeeds of Civil Diſcords, that their Scholars being addicted to ſeveral Sects, and per-

Trebatius great with Auguſtus.

Atteius Capito and Labeo Antiſtius ſow ſeeds of Diſcord.

Hence the Sabiniani, or Caſſiani, and the Proculiani, or Pegaſiani.

Maſurius Sabinus.

Caſſius Longinus.

Pegaſus.

tinaciouſly adhering to their Principles, thoſe Diſſentions could not be compoſed in many years, and the Heads of many of their Controverſies yet appear in the Pandects. For to the Party of Capito adhered Maſurius Sabinus, and then Caſſius Longinus, to whom ſucceeded Cælius Sabinus, as to him Jabolenus, and to Jabolenus Salvius Julianus. To the ſide of Labeo ſtuck pertinaciouſly Cocceius Nerva, then Proculus, to whom ſucceeded Pegaſus, as to him Celſus, and to Celſus Neratius. Hence thoſe of the former Party were called Sabiniani, and Caſſiani; and thoſe of the later Proculiani, and Pegaſiani. The Emperour Tiberius favoured much the ſtudy of the Law, and from him Maſurius Sabinus received Authority to anſwer publickly all queſtions. Caligula and Nero were rather Enemies than Friends to the Myſtery of the Law. Caligula intending to aboliſh quite the Art and Profeſſion it ſelf, often boaſted he would ſo order the matter, that they ſhould be able to anſwer nothing but Eccum, quibbling, as though he would have them anſwer nothing but what was æquum, but meaning Ecce illum, and intending himſelf, from whom all Anſwers in matters of Law ſhould thenceforth proceed. Nero baniſhed Caſſius Longinus, whom afterward Veſpatian recalled, in whoſe time Pegaſus was Prefect of the City, and bore the Office of Conſul. He was the Son of a certain Maſter of a Ship, which had Pegaſus for its Enſign and Name, and thence was this great Lawyer ſo called. And from him received its name the Senatuſconſultum Pegaſianum, mentioned by Juſtinian. During the Government of Nerva and Trajan the Profeſſion of the Law flouriſhed, as appears from their many excellent Conſtitutions mentioned in the Pandects. And the peaceable Reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus, as alſo of Severus, Caracalla and Alexander, produced many excellent men, rendred famous by their Writings, of whom ſeveral we have mentioned in due places.

Salvius Julianus compoſed the Edictum Perpetuum.

Whereupon the Jus Prætorium ceaſed.

Vide Vinnium in Inſtit.

What it was.

5. Here Salvius Julianus, who flouriſhed under the Emperour Hadrian, muſt be remembred, that Eminent Lawyer of Milan, who compoſed the Edictum Perpetuum, which being allowed, and receiving authentick Stamp from the Prince, ſo as to be ſtanding Law, another ſort of Law now fell off, which was the Edicts of Magiſtrates, made, upon occaſion, or at their entring upon their Offices. This was called Jus Prætorium, becauſe chiefly made by Prætors, as alſo Honorarium, from their bearing theſe Offices of Magiſtracy or Honour. But how the Prætors ſhould come to make Laws, which is a Prerogative of Majeſty, they being but Magiſtrates, appointed for pronouncing, and not enacting, is queſtioned; eſpecially ſeeing that we no where meet with any Law that gave them this Authority. Some think that at firſt they onely propoſed Edicts by right of their Office, denoting, of what matters, and in what manner, they would adminiſter Law. In progreſs of time, the People not oppoſing it, they took upon them alſo to make Law in declaring it, yet ſo, as their Edicts had leſs force than the Laws themſelves, neither could they abrogate ſuch Laws as were conſtituted or received, but onely help, ſupply and correct, that is, mitigate the rigour of the Law, and ordain ſomething ex bono & æquo, concerning ſuch things as were not mentioned nor forbidden by the Laws, though it were beſides the tenour of the Civil Law. That the Prætors, as to theſe matters, could doe more than either the Lawyers or private Judges, appears from ſo many Exceptions and Actions, ſo many Poſſeſſions of Goods and Eſtates, introduced by the Prætor, being beſides the manifeſt tenour of the Civil Law, in which, before what was thus introduced by the Prætors, no private Perſon could claim or attribute ſo much to himſelf. But, during the Commonwealth, other Magiſtrates, as the Cenſors, Conſuls, and the Ædiles Curules, propoſed their Edicts, all which went under the name of Jus Honorarium, being contained in it, and indeed in the Jus Prætorium, becauſe the Prætors being made on purpoſe for adminiſtration of Juſtice, and having all the Juriſdiction, in a manner, had the honour to have the whole taken together denominated from themſelves.

6. But an end was put to all their pretences, by the forming and authorizing of the Edictum Perpetuum, though the whole Power of Senate and People, being given up into the Emperour's Hands, all Powers before were but indeed precarious or derivative, as was that of giving Anſwers, in the Lawyers. Who the Lawyers of Eminency were, in the days of Hadrian, and his Succeſſours, we have already ſhewn, who were famous for their Learning and Writings, which, for the moſt part, reſpected the Edictum Perpetuum. Now, however Perſons began more than ever to conſult the Prince himſelf, who had always at his hand the beſt Lawyers to adviſe with. From the time of Hadrian, to that of Alexander Severus, (both incluſive) flouriſhed thoſe great and eminent Men, out of the Books of whom the Pandects, for the moſt part, were taken. This Knowledge and Profeſſion being then

When the Eminent Lawyers failed.

then arrived at the higheſt pitch of Excellency, as all ſublunary things are ſubject to change, began thenceforth to fall away and diminiſh. For after this time no Lawyer of any note or Eminency appears, and, by degrees, the Profeſſion ſo much decayed, that in the time of Ammianus Marcellinus (or Valentinian and Valens, Emperours,) ſuch as profeſſed it, if we believe him, were eſteemed rather Apparitions and Shadows, than Men, not being able to reconcile the hundredth part of theſe Differences and Contradictions, which, to men unskilfull, ſeemed to be in the Civil Law it ſelf, and yet they valued themſelves at no leſs a rate than as the Interpreters of the Sibylline Oracles. Thoſe that practiſed at the Bar were ſo rude, covetous and ſordid, that they neither underſtood what Juſtice was, nor remembred that they ever had read any thing concerning it.

Yet learned Men there were after that time.

Codex Gregorianus & Hermogenianus.

Theodoſianus.

The difference betwixt the Conſtitutions of Princes.

7. The Emperours therefore muſt have taken upon them the whole care of the Law, and many of them, if not moſt, deſerved well of it, as appears by their Reſcripts. And yet in penning theſe Reſcripts, ſeveral Lawyers, of great worth and Learning, muſt have been employed, though they have not otherwiſe rendred themſelves famous by any work now remaining, what ever Ammianus, or any other, may write. For both before and after Conſtantine, Princes gave out Conſtitutions of very great Equity and Judgment, which certainly they themſelves had not Skill to compoſe. Theſe grew to ſuch a number, that ſeveral Books of them came abroad, but of principal note and eſteem were thoſe of Gregorius and Hermogenianus, about the Reign of Diocletian. The Authours themſelves are unknown, and ſome Fragments of their Books are onely come to hand; but St. Auguſtine, as many take notice, makes mention thence of a certain noble Reſcript of Antoninus, which learned men juſtly admire, that it ſhould be left out of Juſtinian's Code. About an hundred years after, Theodoſius the Second cauſed to be compiled another Code, wherein were contained the Conſtitutions of Chriſtian Princes, from the beginning of Conſtantine to his own time. Betwixt them and thoſe of the precedent Ages there is this difference: The Conſtitutions which precede Conſtantine, are moſt of them ſhort and acute, weighty and elegant, as are the Writings of Lawyers of thoſe times. Thoſe that follow are generally tedious and lofty, more ſuiting the ſtyle of an Oratour, than the Majeſty of an Emperour. They ſavour of the flanting Aſiatick ſtyle, which was that of the Court, after it came to be removed to Byzantium. Eſpecially the Conſtitutions of Martianus, Zeno, Anaſtaſius, Juſtin and Juſtinian, which are neither comparable with the other in point of Eloquence, nor yet in reſpect either of Gravity or dexterity of Drawing.

A great Alteration made in the Law by Conſtantine the Great.

A Diſcrimination of Lawyers made in the time of Valentinian the younger.

8. A great Alteration was made in the Law by Conſtantine, who corrected it ſo, as to make it more ſuitable to the purity of Chriſtian Religion, and the tenderneſs and compaſſion thereof. Which he did by adding many Edicts, full of Mercy, and taking off the rigour of former Rules and Cuſtoms, both as to the materials of Law, and the forms and quirks of it. This alſo was imitated by his Chriſtian Succeſſours, as we have largely ſhewn in the courſe of our Hiſtory, down from his time, till that of Theodoſius the younger. But as every day, almoſt, produced ſome new occaſion, by reaſon of the variety of circumſtances, for ſome new Decree, theſe Imperial Conſtitutions grew to that infinite bulk, together with the other ancient ſorts of Laws, that, before Theodoſius began his new model of a Code, the Government in the Weſt, or that under young Valentinian, thought it ſelf obliged to make a diſcrimination, both of the Conſtitutions of Princes, declaring which ſhould be of force, and which not, and of the Writings of Lawyers, as to the value and eſtimate of their Opinions, to be alledged and followed in Courts of Judicature. What theſe Diſcriminations were we have ſhewn particularly in their places. The Lawyers were nine in Number, of which Papinianus was to have the Preeminence, ſo as if in difference of opinions, he made one of an equal number, that of his party was to be followed. This Conſtitution, as Gothofred notes, may ſerve to diſcover how few learned Lawyers there were in thoſe days, how few that knew the Writings of the Ancients; to be ſure, it ſhews that the numbers and heaps of the Writings of Authours were very great.

The deſign of Theodoſius in compiling his Code.

9. But as it is very rationally thought, that the Codes of Gregorius and Hermogenianus were compoſed of ſuch Conſtitutions of Emperours, as preceded Conſtantine, (ten years before whoſe beginning they end, at the Tetrarchy of Diocletian,) on purpoſe to exhibite the Pagan Law, which Chriſtian Princes in their new Decrees had altered; ſo Theodoſius might reſolve for the contrary reaſon, as well as to ſelect a competent number, to make a Body of ſuch as were compoſed by thoſe of our Religion. He ſays indeed he was moved by this conſideration, how few in his Age were rich in the knowledge of the Civil Law, and were ſolidly learned, although though twelve years before he had founded two Profeſſrous of the Law for the Illuſtration thereof, in the Univerſity of Conſtantinople. He deſigned to eaſe Students of ſo great Labour as they underwent, in turning over ſo many Heaps, by cutting off ſuperfluities, and introducing brevity, as alſo to provide againſt obſcurity. For he furniſhed them with ſuch Conſtitutions, as related both the Jus Publicum, and Privatum, and with all ſorts, not onely Edicts ſtrictly ſo called; but various Reſcripts ſent to Magiſtrates, who had conſulted their Princes Letters given out to Magiſtrates, Orations to the Senate, Pragmaticks, Acta had in the Conſiſtory, Mandates and Inſtructions given to Governours of Provinces, to Cenſitores and Peræquatores ſent abroad, and to ſuch as ſhould hear Debates concerning Religion. But though no part of, either, the Jus Privatum, or Publicum, be left untouched in that Code; yet the Collectours are taxed for omitting ſo many material Conſtitutions, as they have done, and for ſtudying ſo much Brevity, that by depriving the Laws of their neceſſary Ornaments of words, they made them moſt obſcure. For, cutting off the Prefaces, and ſuch Diſcourſes as were connexed, or coherent to them; they deprived the Readers of all knowledge of the ſeveral occaſions of the making of them, and other Circumſtances which would have contributed much to the underſtanding of them.

Vide Gothofred. in Prolegomenis Cod. Theod.

Faults committed in the compiling of it.

10. Beſides, notice is taken, how ſeveral Laws are repeated in the ſame words, and ſometimes with a few things added and altered, and thoſe not onely made by ſeveral, but one and the ſame Emperour. Many contrary one to another, and repealing one another, are to be found in this Code: The Rubricks are ſometimes larger than the Text. But it is chiefly objected, that to Julian therein is given the Title of Divus, and that ſome of his impious Conſtitutions are inſerted often, though not obſcurely they contradict, and that out of Deſign, thoſe of Chriſtian Princes. Some of Conſtantine and Valentinian alſo, which though they might be forced out in their days, to grant leave to uſe and continue unchriſtian Practices, yet when Chriſtianity was advanced into the Throne, they were by no means to be regiſtred as Laws, by thoſe who pretended to collect a Body ſtanding and Authentick to be referred to, and whereby Caſes were to be pleaded and decided. Some Edicts are alſo placed in this Book, though againſt the Orthodox Profeſſours of Religion. Many Laws are Fugitives or miſ-placed, ſome are ſo lacerated and diſmembred, that no Senſe can be made of them. And Errours and Miſtakes, are too frequent in the Inſcriptions and Subſcriptions of Laws. Now it muſt be ſaid, that though this Body, or Collection, even in ſome things here objected be of great uſe; for knowledge of the Hiſtory of the times, yet theſe were ſome of them Faults very unſufferable in a Standard and Rule of Law, as it was intended to be. It may be ſaid for the Collectours, that ſome Faults were formerly committed, and tranſcribed by them, and ſome might be juſtly laid to the Charge of the Tranſcribers; having paſſed through ſo many hands. However in matters wherein ſuch Excuſes cannot be admitted, the inſufficiency of the Code, ſufficiently appeared, as to its being a Standard of Law, and ſtill thoſe that were concerned in the Practices of it were at a loſs.

It's Defects.

11. Yet was it for want of a more perfect, of great uſe, and readily imbraced both in the Eaſtern and Weſtern parts of the Empire, both at this time, and by ſucceeding Princes. And not onely within the Empire, but by Barbarians was it received, even as a Standard of Law, as we ſhall ſee in the Hiſtories of thoſe Kingdoms: Yet its defects to the skilfull could not but be ſufficiently known. Though all parts of the Jus Privatum were touched at in it; yet were there many Caſes omitted in it, and to be found in the Conſtitutions of the ancient Emperours. And eſpecially in the Writings of ancient Lawyers, were they to be found, which thoſe that practiſed found neceſſary to have Recourſe to as formerly, and the memory of this Code, as well as the Conſtitution of Valentinian, growing by degrees more out of mind; they had Recourſe to their former Helps, and then again grew ſenſible of their Heaps. Now again they were affrighted at the Piles of Imperial Conſtitutions, at the Mountains of Interpretations and Anſwers of Lawyers; the Duſt did not conceal the Old Plebiſcita, Senatus conſulta, and Edicts of Magiſtrates. They could not but look at the Old Laws made by Kings in the Infancy of Rome, and take notice of the Rhodian Laws, concerning Sea matters, and owned by Imperial Authority. Theſe Heaps are ſaid to have contained two thouſand Volumes, and thirty times an hundred thouſand Verſes or Paragraphs. All ſorts of them afforded help to Students, and yet the far greater part, muſt of neceſſity be unknown, and a great ſhare be obſolete and uſeleſs in Judgments, and Deciſion of Controverſies. It was therefore Diſcourſed, that there wanted a Prince, who by his Sovereign Urge another Body, or Bodies to be Compoſed.

vereign Authority ſhould abridge the number and ſubſtance of theſe Volumes, reduce them into Order, and give ſtamp to a Body or Bodies, more exquiſitely framed than yet had been; which ſhould remain as the Authentick Monuments, and the Standard of Law and Juſtice to Poſterity.

Juſtinian imbraceth the Deſign.

12. Juſtinian was a man whoſe Humour the deſign did very well ſuit, being naturally a lover of new things, and greedy of Fame; eſpecially, to be thought very vigilant and ſolicitous for the good of his Subjects; as his Prefaces to his Novel Conſtitutions do ſufficiently ſhew. But he imbraced a much larger deſign, than that of abridging the Law. He was brought to be of Opinion, that the Law not onely wanted abridging, but altering and changing from that Tenour and Genius, which it had in the days of the ancient Lawyers and Legiſlatours; not onely accuſing, it as Conſtantine had done, to need Reformation as to Charity and Mercy, and that it was to be pruned of its needleſs, and troubleſome quirks and ſcruples, as Valentinian the Third and other Princes thought, but even as to the reaſon and Complexion of much of it. But however, in many things he might be in the right, it had been much better, if he had ſtaid ſome time to make his Obſervations, if he had made an Apprenticeſhip firſt in the Government, and been ſilent for the time enjoyned by Pythagoras. But he introduced that, which hath been ſince in reference to the old Tenour and Frame, called Jus Novum, and began this courſe in the beginning of his Reign. And indeed ſcarcely is there any part of the Roman Juriſprudentia, wherein he did not make ſome Alteration. How he both altered and modelled it, it's now time to make a ſhort diſcovery, according to the Nature of our deſign, which will permit us onely to hint at the moſt remarkable things in ſuch a vaſt number, as his Laws and Books afford.

But not onely modelleth, but altereth the Law.

13. Juſtinian, then as we ſaid, was made Collegue by and with his Uncle on the Calends, or firſt of April, in the ſole Conſulſhip of Mavortius, with whom he Reigned till the Calends or firſt of Auguſt, on which Juſtin his Uncle dyed. Now for all the five Months of this year, or Conſulſhip, he made no Law, nor conſiderable Alteration in any thing. But having all this while it ſeems reſolved, and meditated on it, he opened the ſecond year, or his own ſecond Conſulſhip with great Attempts this way, as if then he had begun to Reign indeed This he did on the very firſt day of the year, or the Calends of January, on which ſeveral of his Laws bear date. Four we have ſtill extant in the Code, which mention the Calends of January as the day of their Originals, and poſſibly more there were, which have loſt their date, ſtill extant in the ſame Book without any Conſulſhip annexed, or any Month or Day, though directed to the ſame Mennas, who was Præfectus Prætorio for this year, and alſo that which followed till the month of Auguſt; to whom a vaſt number of Conſtitutions are inſcribed. He thought fit to give to his Subjects, a more free Scope of making their Teſtaments than formerly had been allowed, though by the twelve Tables themſelves it ſeemed to have been indulged. He declared that no Errour or miſtake of the Drawer or Writer of a Teſtament, either, in omitting, or inſerting any thing therein contained, ſhould make it Null; neither if he wrote down a Legacy before the naming of the Heir. And though this Prepoſterours courſe might have been taken according to the mind, or direction of the Teſtatour himſelf, yet he would have the Teſtament good, which the former Law did not permit. He tolerated it alſo afterward in Stipulations, as well as Legacies. And ſtill that he might add greater Freedom in this Nature, a few days after he declared that the formal obſervation or uſage of the Ancients, as he termed it, ſhould not be neceſſary in Nuncupative Wills. For of old, thoſe that made ſuch Teſtaments without Writing, were to proteſt in ſolemn Words, that the Witneſſes were met together for that purpoſe, becauſe before them he would name his Heir without Writing.

He begins on the firſt day of his ſecond Conſulſhip.

Indulges his Subjects as to making Wills.

l. 8. de Naturalbius liebris, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 27. l. 24. de Teſtamentis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 23. l. Un. de his qui pœnæ nomine, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 41. & l. 3. Quando & quibus quarta pars, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 10. tit. 34. Quatuor ſunt quamvis trium tantum meminerit. Fr. Balduinus in Juſtiniano ſub de Jure novo Commentariorum libris 2. Quem de his rebus omnino conſule.

14. This form of Ptoteſtation he declared not to be neceſſary. And he remitted as many other things to Teſtatours; ſee the forms of Words which they were bound to obſerve when they made their Wills. Amongſt others, there was this called Nuncupatio. The Teſtatour holding the Teſtament in his hands ſaid: As is contained in theſe Tables, and under this Wax, ſo I give, bequeath and ordain. Therefore ye Quirites bear Teſtimony. And the Witneſſes thus required were wont to bear Teſtimony to the Teſtatour, who ought to hear what they ſaid, ſo that of old a deaf man could not make a Teſtament. Whereas alſo in old time no Legacy could be left, ſo as to burthen the Heir by way of puniſhment, as if it was written: In caſe thou marrieſt thy Daughter to Seius, then ſhalt give Caius an hundred pounds, he left it free to leave ſuch Legacies, provided as in other Conditional Legacies and Stipulations, if the Heir was Commanded to doe no unworthy or impoſſible thing.

l. 26. Cod. Juſt. de Teſtam.

thing. To natural Children he allowed that more ſhould be left in Legacy than formerly had been Lawfull; but afterwards publiſhed a Novel Conſtitution more in their Favour, which afterward we may take notice of. And he alſo made proviſion for Children obnoxious to the Services of Corporations, which he alſo thought fit afterwards to increaſe. All theſe things he enacted this firſt day of his ſecond Conſulſhip, or the firſt day of the firſt January after his coming to the Government.

He acquaints the Senate with his Deſignment of a new Code.

Præfatio prima de novo Codice Faciendo præmiſſa, lib. Primo, Cod. Juſt.

15. The making of theſe new Laws, did not ſo divert him, but that ſtill he was thinking and conſulting about a new Model of the Old, and he came to ſuch Reſolution therein, that on the Ides of February following, he expreſſed it in an Edict, directed to the Senate of Conſtantinople. "In this Edict he tells them, that " thoſe things which to many former Princes ſeemed neceſſary to be amended, but " which none of them were ſo bold as to bring to Effect, he now by the help of " Almighty God thought fit to Communicate to the publick, and to take off the " prolixity of Suits, by cutting ſhort that multitude of Conſtitutions, contained " in the three Codes of Gregorius, Hermogenianus and Theodoſius, of thoſe alſo that " were made afterwards by Theodoſius, other ſucceeding Princes and himſelf; " and by Compoſing one new Code, which ſhould bear his own happy Name, in " which were to be Collected as well the Conſtitutions of the three Codes lately " mentioned, as other newer Conſtitutions made after them. Therefore for ſo vaſt " a work, which relates to the Suſtentation of the Commonwealth it ſelf, he tells " them, he hath made choice of Perſons fit for ſo great care and trouble, viz. of " the excellent John, Exquæſtor of his Sacred Palace, of Conſular Dignity, and " a Patritian; and the moſt ſublime Leontius, a Magiſter Militum, Expræfectus prætorio, of Conſular Dignity, and a Patritian; the moſt eminent Phocas, a Magiſter " Militum of like Conſular Dignity, and a Patrician; the moſt excellent Baſilides, " Exprefect alſo of the Eaſt, and a Patritian; the moſt glorious Thomas, Quæſtor of " his Sacred Palace, and Exconſul; the Magnifick Tribonian adorned with the Magiſterial Dignity among the Agentes; the Illuſtrious Conſtantine, Comes Sacrarum " Largitionum, among the Agentes, Magiſter of the Scrinium Libellorum and of the " Sacræ Cognitiones; the moſt famous Theophilus a Comes of his Sacred Conſiſtory " and Doctour (or Profeſſour) of Law in that City; Dioſcorus and Præſentius moſt " eloquent Gowned men, of the moſt ample Prætorian Forum.

The Compilers of it.

16. "To theſe, he ſaith, he had given eſpecial Power, having firſt cut off Prefaces (being ſuperfluous as to the Solidity of Laws) as alſo left out ſuch " as were of the ſame Tenour, or contrary (except another diviſion of Law required it) as alſo ſuch as were grown out of uſe, to compoſe out of them three " Codes and later Conſtitutions, Laws which were to be certain and written in " ſhort, to place them under ſeveral Heads or Titles, adding and ſubtracting, and " even changing their Words, where the Convenience of the thing ſhould require; " gathering into one Sanction, ſuch things as had formerly been diſperſed in various Conſtitutions, and making their meaning more evident. Yet ſo that the Order " of times of the ſaid Conſtitutions ſhould be manifeſt, not onely from the addition " of Days and Conſuls, but alſo from their very Compoſition, the firſt being placed " in the firſt place, and thoſe that followed in the next; and if any were found " without Day and Conſul, either in the three above mentioned Codes, or in thoſe " wherein later Conſtitutions were contained, they ſhould yet be placed with the " reſt, without any doubt to ariſe concerning their general Force and Efficacy; as " alſo ſuch Conſtitutions as were given out by way of Reſcript to certain Perſons, " or by a Pragmatick Sanction at the firſt, if inſerted in this new Code, ſhould be " of the ſame Efficacy with the general Edicts. Theſe things he tells the Senate, " he haſted to bring to their knowledge, that they might underſtand how great " his daily care was for the common Utility, deſigning for the time to come to have " certain ſetled Conſtitutions and not to be doubted, and thoſe Collected into one " Code; that out of it being called by his Name, in all judicial Proceedings, Conſtitutions might be produced for the more ſpeedy ending of Suits. Dated on the " Ides of February at Conſtantinople, the Lord Juſtinian, Father of his Countrey, Auguſtus, being the ſecond time Conſul, which was in the Year of our Lord, DXXVIII.

17. To work now go theſe Lawyers, about the compyling of a new Code; but while they were ſo employed Juſtinian ſate not idle, but buſied himſelf with ſuitable Induſtry; either for adorning, and filling up that Code, or for the Illuſtration of the Civil Law. For of this year, beſides theſe already mentioned, we find twenty four Conſtitutions bearing Date, whereof ten of the Calends, or firſt day of June. Of all theſe the Nature of our Deſign will not permit us to give an Account, becauſe we write not a Book of Law, but Hiſtory, and ſo vaſtly numerous

Sect. 2.

The Querela Inofficioſi Teſtamenti.

Lib. 2. c. 21. Querela Inofficioſi Teſtamenti.

merous are the performances of Juſtinian in this kind, that onely the moſt material of his Laws, and of moſt publick concernment muſt be touched. The Romans were ſo tender of the obligations ariſing from Nature and Bloud, that by a Law not introduced by the Prætor, but by Claudius Glicias a Dictatour, as Cujacius was of opinion, it was permitted to bring an Action or Complaint againſt a Teſtament to make it void, wherein a Parent, Son or Brother, was paſſed by or Diſinherited, as contrary to the Duty of ſuch Relations. But about this Complaint, there aroſe in proceſs of time manifold Queſtions, and in compoſing and ſetling the matter, Juſtinian very much laboured by publiſhing various Laws concerning this Subject, wherein yet he ſcarcely ſatisfied himſelf. It was of old ſtrongly debated, whether one who had ſomething left him by Will, but leſs than the ſhare allowed him by Law, could bring this Complaint to null the Teſtament, as well as he that had nothing at all. Pliny was of opinion, that if the Heir offered to one ſo paſſed by, to whom nothing at all was left, the Legitimate part, which if left by Will, would have Excluded the Complaint, it would be a bar to this Action. In the opinion of Learned Baldwin he was miſtaken. But by the ancient Law, if a Son was by his Father inſtituted in part, but leſs left him than his Legitimate ſhare, he had an Action againſt his Brethren the Coheirs, for making up and ſupplying his ſhare, rather than that of the Complaint for nulling the Teſtament, which was granted to him, in caſe they were not Brothers but Strangers, that were joyned with him as Heirs.

Quem conſule de Legibus Juſtiniani in lib. cui Titulus Juſtinianus ſive de jure novo Commentariorum libri 4.

18. In like manner, if a Son was born after his Mothers Teſtament, being paſſed by, he was made Coheir with his Brothers, if ſuch were inſtituted as Heirs, but if Strangers were inſtituted, he might bring his Querela or Complaint for diſſolving the Will. In caſe a Son was not named Heir, but a Legacy was left him onely which yet reached not to his Legitimate ſhare of the Inheritance, he could not bring his Complaint but onely his Action, for what was wanting, if the Teſtatour expreſly ordained, that it ſhould be made up by an indifferent Umpire. If ſo be, the Teſtatour left no ſuch order, he was of old allowed to Complain. But Juſtinian would not even in this caſe permit him to Complain; his pleaſure being that onely the remainder ſhould be ſued for, where ſomething was left; and this he did he ſaid for the baſhfull reverence that's due to Nature: And when the Legitimate ſhare ſhould be computed, he would have an Employment purchaſed with the Father's money, to be reckoned into it. By another Law made this very day, he ordained that Employments ſhould in certain caſes be underſtood to be tacite cautions obliged to the payment of Debts. On the ſame day he alſo publiſhed another Noble Conſtitution, concerning Legitimate Succeſſions, in what manner either a Mother or a Father might be joyned, with the Siſters or Brothers of the Dead, the Law having formerly been in no other part more various than in determining how Parents ſhould ſucceed their Children dying Inteſtate. When Juſtinian came to the Government the cuſtome was, that the Mother ſhould ſo be joyned with Siſters, that ſhe ſhould ſucceed to one half of the Inheritance, and they to the other half. This Right of the Mother he now confirmed, adding that if there were Brothers, the Inheritance ſhould be divided by Poll, not diſtinguiſhing as the old Law did betwixt Brothers. And whereas by a Conſtitution of Conſtantine, the Mother was bound to give a third part of the Inheritance to the Uncle, by the Father's ſide of the Deceaſed, his Son or Grandſon. Juſtinian now ordained that ſhe ſhould not be obliged to doe it. Neither ſhould it be material, whether ſhe had the Right of three Children or not, which diſtinction was formerly made by the Senatuſconſultum Tertullianum.

Regulated by Juſtinian.

L. 30. de Inofficioſo Teſtam. Cod. Juſt. lib. 3. tit. 28.

L. ult. de pignoribus, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 8. tit. 14.

He alters the Law as to the ſucceſſion of Mothers.

L. ult. ad S. C. Tertullianum. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 56.

Jus trium liberorum.

19. For by that Senatuſconſultum, Mothers had the privilege given them to ſucceed their Sons, but of old it was limited, in caſe a Woman of ingenuous Condition had three Children, and a Libertina four. But by another Law bearing date alſo on this very day, or Calends of June, Juſtinian removed this limitation, giving them full Right of ſucceſſion, whether they had brought forth ſo many Children or not. What now he eſtabliſhed as to the Mothers Right, he afterward confirmed in his Inſtitutions; but in the tenth year of his Reign, when he publiſhed his two and twentieth Novel Conſtitution, he forbad that the Mother ſhould have a greater ſhare of the Inheritance, when ſhe was joyned with Siſters, than when ſhe ſucceeded with the Brothers of the Deceaſed; but would have it divided to them by Poll. After this he granted that Right ſimply to the Father, which he now gave to the Mother. But in caſe there were a Father, to joyn in the Succeſſion with the Mother, Siſters and Brothers of the Deceaſed, the Father ſhould have the full profit or Uſus fructus of the Eſtate, but the propriety ſhould remain to the other, and be divided amongſt them, in ſuch manner as is aforeſaid in caſe no Father was ſurviving.

L. ult. de Jure liberorum, Cod. Juſt. lib. 8. tit. ult.

20. From the Calends of June, we can obſerve no Conſtitutions made for the ſpace of a month. But on the Calends of July, we find him and his Quæſtor at work again, as if he had appointed the firſt day of the month to this Service, there being five Laws now extant in his Code, which bear Date of theſe Calends. On them we cannot inſiſt, as belonging to the Jus Privatum, and not ſo proper for our Cogniſance, who write not a Book of Law but Hiſtory. Neither can we take much notice of moſt that follow of this year, though ſome of them be to be mentioned. On the ſixteenth of November, by publiſhing a new Conſtitution againſt Rapes, he thought fit to aboliſh all thoſe Paragraphs of the Julian Law, concerning this crime committed either againſt Virgins, Widows, or ſuch as were veiled in Cloiſters, whether found in the ancient Books of Laws, or in the Sacred Conſtitutions, ſo as this new Law of his, ſhould anſwer all the Proviſions made by them. Herein he ordains, that ſuch as take away by force any Woman of free Condition, be puniſhed with Death; as alſo ſuch as give them aſſiſtence, eſpecially if they be veiled. Such alſo as thus offend againſt Widows, though but Libertinæ, and the Slaves of other men. And eſpecially thoſe that committed this offence againſt Married Women. All liberty of Appeal he takes away from the Offenders, according as had been anciently determined by a Law of Conſtantine: If the Women on which the Rape was committed, were onely Slaves or Libertinæ, no Eſtates ſhould be forfeited; but if of ingenuous Condition, their Goods moveable and immoveable, both of Principals and Aſſiſtents, ſhould be recovered to the uſe and property of the Women ſo injured. He forbids ſuch Women to be Married to thoſe that committed the Rapes, but to be otherwiſe beſtowed as their Parents ſhall think fit. The aforeſaid Pains of Death and confiſcation he declares ſhall be undergone by the Offenders, and thoſe that aſſiſt them in Perſon at the commiſſion of the Crime; all other Abettors and Receivers ſhall onely be puniſhed with Death. All ſuch Perſons ſhall undergoe ſuch pains though the Women be conſenting. Parents not Proſecuting, ſhall be puniſhed with Deportation. And if any of the Aſſiſtents be found to be of ſervile condition, the party whether Man or Woman, ſhall be Burned, as had alſo been provided by the Law of Conſtantine.

He publiſheth a Conſtitution againſt Rapes.

L. Un. de Raptu virginum, ſeu viduarum, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 9. tit. 13.

21. For the two firſt months of the third year of Juſtinian, wherein Decius (in the Weſt) was ſole Conſul, no Laws are found dated, though poſſibly ſome of thoſe that are without date, (and inſcribed to Mennas eſpecially,) might thence derive their Original. The Code went now briskly on till the ſeventh before the Ides of April, on which day being finiſhed, it was directed to Mennas the Præfectus Prætorio, and before it was finiſhed, Juſtinian haſted to make ſeveral Conſtitutions upon divers Subjects to be inſerted in it. For beſides what probably might be done in theſe two lately mentioned months, we find by certain Dates, that in March and afterwards, the Quæſtor was at work, and from the eleventh before the Calends of April incluſive, to the ſaid ſeventh before the Ides, eleven Conſtitutions to have received ſtamp from Imperial Authority. By one on the eleventh before the Calends, he took away more difficulties in making Teſtaments, ſo as they ſhould opperate in favour of concerned Perſons. On the Calends themſelves, or the firſt of April, three Conſtitutions bear certain Date. I call it certain, becauſe the Conſul with month and day is alſo expreſſed; but there is another which though it want the Name of the Conſul, yet becauſe the Calends of April are expreſſed, and it is inſcribed to Mennas the Præfectus Prætorio, Baldwin with reaſon ſets it to this day alſo of this very year. The three former do ſo nearly concern the Jus Privatum, that they are not ſo fit for our Cogniſance; this is of a more general Nature, and may be taken notice of by us. It determines that Criminal Cauſes ſhall be terminated within the ſpace of two years, reckoned from the Conteſtation of the Suit, after which the Party ſhall by all means be abſolved without any allegation or pretence to be admitted; or the Judges and their Officers ſhall fine in twenty pounds of Gold.

L. 32. de Inoffic. Teſtam. Cod. Juſt. lib. 3. tit. 28.

Ordains that Criminal Cauſes ſhall be terminated in two years.

L. ult. ut intra certum tempus, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 9. tit. 44. Dat. Cal. Apr.

22. Of old time, a Criminal Action was to be finiſhed within the ſpace of one year, ſo favourable ſeemed the cauſe of accuſed Perſons to be, who, while in Bonds they defended themſelves, could neither manumit, nor make Donations, neither be witneſſes for nor againſt, nor look after Honours. The year was to take its beginning from the Inſcription (of the Accuſer's Name, who if he proved not the Crime, was to undergo the Lex Talionis,) in ſuch caſes where an Inſcription was required, and where it was not from the conteſtation of the Suit. If the Accuſer did not finiſh what he had to doe in a years time, he was branded with Infamy, Tit. 36. lib. 9. Cod. Theodoſ. Vide Gothofr. in Com. Balduin. ubi priús. p. 51. Cujacium, lib. 1. Obſ. 8.

Infamy, or if of more baſe Condition Baniſhed; and beſides this forfeited the fourth part of his Eſtate. But now inſtead of one, Juſtinian thought fit to grant two years for proſecution, and therefore when Tribonian compoſed his Code, and was to inſert in it the Laws of that of Theodoſius, the Title which runs that within a year a Criminal Action is to be terminated, he thus interpolated and changed, within a certain or determinate time, and he did the ſame thing in the Laws themſelves. Yet notwithſtanding, ſuch was his careleſneſs or forgetfulneſs, that in ſeveral places of the Digeſts, he left ſome remainders of the old Law, which circumſcribed the time of proſecuting a criminal Action within a year. Hereupon the miſtake of ſome Interpreters hath riſen, who after a years time imagined that an accuſed Perſon might ſue for Honours, which opinion was founded upon his inſerting ſtill the remainders of the old Law. But Juſtinian afterward allowed the term of three years for deciding Civil Cauſes, and pecuniary Matters, but allowed two for Criminal onely, and out of reſpect to the accuſed Perſons, is thought to have inlarged it ſo far and no farther. Of old time poſſibly he was put in mind, that in pecuniary Cauſes time of delay could be given but once, in Criminal to the accuſed thrice, and to the accuſer but twice. But hereby nothing was altered as to what Zeno had Ordained, that a Magiſtrate ſhould ſpeedily be tried after the coming out of his Office, as Juſtinian made it a ſingular Caſe, that what was objected againſt a Clerk, ſhould be decided within two months.

23. Of the ninth before the Ides of this ſame April, is a Conſtitution bearing Date, whereby he declared that if one Stipulated, to give or doe ſomething at a certain time, under a certain Penalty, in caſe he faild, the Penalty ſhould take place, though he pretended he was not put in mind; for he himſelf ought to have remembred it. Now this, he ſaith, he doeth, to take off the obſcurity of the old Law, which gave occaſion to the protracting of Suits, but Baldwin ſhews in ſeveral particulars out of the Pandects, that the opinions of the ancient Lawyers in this particular were very expreſs, and this was not any new Law. On the day following, or the eighth before the Ides, ſeven Conſtitutions bear Date. Whereas Perſons were not at Age, till they had completed twenty five years; yet when young men were found to be frugal and diſcreet, after that of twenty, they were ſometimes allowed to govern their own Eſtates by the indulgence of the Prince. Now Juſtinian thought fit to prohibit them, as alſo other Minors, to alienate or ingage their immoveable Eſtates, without the authority of a Decree interpoſing. By another made this day, he declared the Emperour and his Empreſs free to make gifts to each other during Matrimony, which others could not doe, ſo as they ſhould forthwith be Valid, without expectance of the Death of the Prince; foraſmuch as Imperial Contracts (he calls them,) are as ſo many Laws, and need no aſſiſtence from without. By another Conſtitution of this day, he provided for Modeſty, otherwiſe than what before had been practiſed, at leaſt as he imagined. There had been ſome controverſie how Puberty ſhould be made out and proved; ſome ſaid by the Habit of the Body, and ability to generate; but moſt agreed upon the Age of fourteen years in a Man, as twelve in a Woman, as is proved from Tertullian and others. But though this opinion of the Proculeians was the moſt received, yet to take off all doubts and controverſies, Juſtinian thought fit to Eſtabliſh it by Law, and to prohibit all unſeemly inſpections of the Body: This was convenient to be ſetled, becauſe one not arrived at Puberty, could not contract Matrimony, make a Teſtament, give Teſtimony, nor be bound to any thing without the authority of his Tutour intervening. Full Puberty ended, of a man in his eighteenth year, and of a Woman in her fourteenth. And a Boy was wont to nouriſh the Hair of his Head till his fourteenth.

L. 12. de contrahenda & committenda ſtipulatione, Cod. Juſt. lib. 8. tit. 38.

He reſtrains Minors from alienating their Eſtates on their own heads.

L. 3. de his qui veniam ætatis impetraverunt, Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 45.

L. 26. de donationibus inter virum & uxorem, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 16.

L. ult. Quando Tutores vel Curatores eſſe deſinant, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 60. vide Notas in l. & Balduinum ubi prius. p. 74.

Clears all doubts as to Puberty.

24. There is another Law bearing Date alſo of this ſame day, which with others of the ſame nature, relate to a remarkable Subject. The Subject is that of Uſury, or intereſt for Money and other things borrowed: And this Conſtitution relates to the Treaſury, prohibiting that it receive any Intereſt, but according to a former Law made by him, which hereby he confirms. Now that Law muſt be one which is of the ſame tenour with this which confirms it, and indeed no other than a Noble Conſtitution directed alſo to the ſame Perſon, viz, Mennas, now Præfectus Prætorio, in the Conſulſhip of Juſtinian; though how many times Conſul and the day be not added. Indeed Juſtinian made many Laws concerning Uſury, though he ordained nothing but what had formerly been ſuch concerning the Obligation, the cauſe whence Uſury deſcended, or how it was contracted, whether by Stipulation, Pact, or Delay; but concerning the manner, end and quantity of juſt and lawfull Intereſt, he firſt enacted many things, liking none which had formerly

L. Ult. de fiſcalibus uſuris, Cod. Juſt. lib. 10. tit. 8.

He regulates the matter of Uſury.

L. 26. de Uſuris, Cod. Juſt. lib. 4. tit. 32.

How the matter of Uſury ſtood in old time.

Tacitus, Annal. lib. 6. Vide Calvini Lexic. in v. Unciarium fœnus.

been made by the Romans upon the ſame points. And in the old Common Wealth, they varied much as to their Laws and practice in this kind. By the Law of the twelve Tables, that Uſury was onely permitted, which they called Vſura Vnciaria being one in the Hundred, whenas before that time it was as pleaſed the monied Men. After that, (ten years its ſaid,) it was brought by a Tribunitian Law to half an one in the hundred; and when even this proportion alſo ſeemed grievous, L. Genutius propoſed a Law to the People, that no Uſury at all ſhould be taken. But the practice being ſuppreſſed, Covetous or Concerned Perſons betook themſelves to Frauds. They had a way to tranſmit the Obligation to others, who were not obnoxious to the Laws, as thoſe they called Socii Latini Nominis. To obviate this M. Sempronius the Tribune, by order of the Senate, propoſed a Law, and the People enacted, that the ſame Law ſhould hold in the caſe of Borrowing and Lending money, with the Aſſociates of the Latine Name, as with Roman Citizens. However Tacitus writes, that though many Laws were made by the people for to cut off all Fraud; yet though repreſſed, it renued again by ſtrange ſlights and devices. However, for the ſake of Commerce and other Conveniences, it ſtill was found convenient if not neceſſary, that Uſury ſhould be permitted, and the higheſt roſe to the Vſura Centeſimaria, which contained twelve times the Vſura Vnciaria but now mentioned.

The Vſura Centeſimaria, and Vnciaria.

25. For the better underſtanding of this, and many other matters relating to the Roman Laws and Cuſtoms, it is neceſſary that the Reader know ſomething concerning their Uſage, and Diviſion of their As. Here, in ſhort, it may ſuffice to ſay, that this word being the ſame import with a Nummus, with Libra and Pondo, was alſo received to ſignify any thing that was whole and Integral. For the Ancients when they divided any thing into equal parts, as an Inheritance, or any ſuch other thing, were wont to call it As, and the parts of it ſo divided, Vnciæ. And into twelve Vnciæ they divided it, as the Pound is ſtill into ſo many Ounces. And the ſeveral parts had their proper Names, as two Vnciæ were called Sextans, three Quadrans, four (or a third part of the As,) Triens, five Quincunx, ſix Semis or an half, ſeven Septunx, eight Bes, nine they called Dodrans, ten Dextans, eleven Denax, and the twelve, or the whole, As. Now to apply this to our preſent matter of Uſury or Intereſt, it muſt be known that the principal money was wont to be reckoned by the Hundred, as now-a-days. And this the Romans are ſaid to have taken from the Greeks, who for a more commodious way of Accounts, reduced their Principal to a Mina, which contained an hundred Drachms. Now then when one in the Hundred was paid for Intereſt by the year, this they called Vſura Vnciaria, but not Centeſima; for the Vſura Centeſima was when one Vncia or the hundredth part of the Principal was paid every month, and ſo twelve Vnciæ or the whole As in a year, which indeed was twelve in the Hundred. But their Cuſtome was to pay their Intereſt every month, and when one Vncia was monthly paid, this was called the Centeſima indeed, or full Intereſt, being the As of Uſury. Hence followed other leſſer as Parts of this As. Semis when but half of it was paid in the year, or ſix in the Hundred, viz. Half an Vncia every month, or half an one in the Hundred; Quadrans when a fourth part, and ſo proportionably.

The As was divided into twelve Vnciæ and their names.

26. Notwithſtanding all Indeavours to the contrary, yet the Centeſimaria Vſura ſeems to have been the moſt common, and even that called Legitima in the Law Books. Some have held that it was leſſened by the Lex Gabinia, becauſe Cicero ſignifies to Atricus, that ſome ſuch thing was comprehended in that Law, which he himſelf followed in his Edictum Tralaticium, or that which according to the Cuſtome of the Ancients, he took and tranſcribed from the City into his Province. Plutarch alſo writes, that Lucullus in Aſia preſcribed thoſe bounds. Both Tacitus and Suetonius mention a Law made by Cæſar the Dictatour, concerning the manner of Lending and holding Poſſeſſions within Italy. What it preciſely determined we know not, though it ſeems that in the time of Tiberius, the Lenders took more for their Money, than by that Law they might do, which Law lay neglected, the publick good, he ſaith, being leſs valued than private Commodity. This cauſed a multitude to riſe up as Informers, againſt ſuch as tranſgreſſed the Law, and Gracchus being Prætor, unto him the examination of the queſtion fell. He being conſtrained by the multitude of ſuch as were indangered thereby, propounded the matter to the Senate. The Senatours being afraid, for there was none of them free from that fault, craved reſpite of the Prince. He granted them a year and ſix months, within which time every man, according to the preſcript of Law, ſhould ſettle his Eſtate, and make up his Domeſtical Accounts. Upon this, every man calling in his Debts, on a ſudden there followed a great ſcarcity of Money; and by reaſon that ſo many were condemned, and their Goods ſold, all the Coin ran either to the publick Treaſury, or that of the Prince. The Senate ordained, that two parts of the Uſe-money ſhould be laid out on Lands in Italy: but the Creditours diſliked it, and urged the payment of the whole, as a matter impairing the Reputation of the Parties convented, to go from their word.

Vide Balduinum ubi ſuprà.

The great ſtir that happened in Tiberius his time about Uſury.

27. At firſt there was great running hither and thither, and Entreaties uſed. Then they flocked about the Prætor's Tribunal: and thoſe things that were propoſed for a Remedy, as ſelling and buying ſuch Mens Goods, turned to a contrary effect, becauſe the Uſurers had hoarded up all their Money to buy Land. And becauſe the multitude of Sellers made Land very cheap, the more a man was indebted, the more unwilling he was to ſell. Many were thruſt out of all they had, and with their Wealth their Credit alſo ſank, till Tiberius relieved them, by putting an hundred Million of Seſterces into a Bank, and lent it for three years without Conſideration or Intereſt, provided the Debtour could give ſecurity to the People of Rome in Lands double the value of the Debt. By that means their Credit was reſtored, and other private Creditours by little and little appeared. Neither was the buying of Lands practiſed, according to the Decree of the Senate. Though it was hotly at the beginning purſued, in the end it was careleſly neglected, as almoſt all ſuch things are. Such was the ſtir about Uſury, as Tacitus relates it, in the time of Tiberius, and it ſeems that the Practice returned to be much as formerly, and the Uſura Centeſima continued even to the time of Juſtinian. He was againſt it, as too hard and exacting; but to ſettle the full matter of Intereſt there was need of good conſideration. It could not be done in a word or two, but was to be fitted to various circumſtances.

Juſtinian diſlikes the Uſura Centeſima.

Reſtrains that of Senatours to four,

Though not that of his own Treaſury.

28. For a diſtinction was to be made between Creditour and Creditour, Debtour and Debtour, the thing that was lent was to be conſidered, with the Condition of the Obligation, what delay there was in the caſe, or how long the Creditour wanted his money. Arcadius and Honorius, as we have formerly ſeen, ordained that Senatours ſhould not ſtipulate or receive more than half the As, or ſix in the Hundred. But now Juſtinian thought fit to reſtrain Illuſtrious Perſons, under whom they were comprehended, to a Triens, or four in the Hundred. But as Baldwin words it, he did not think his own Treaſury ſo illuſtrious, but that he permitted it to receive ſix. For a little after that Conſtitution he publiſhed another, whereby he enacted, that his Treaſury ſhould be bound by that Law, yet ſo as it might require the Uſura ſemiſſis, which was vulgar and common. Paul, the great Lawyer, had formerly anſwered, that one who had received Intereſt leſs than ſix, yet if he became a Debtour to the Treaſury, ſhould to it pay the full ſix. Now Juſtinian, in general, defines that always ſix ſhall be allowed to the Treaſury, but no more, whether it be a Debt principally and originally belonging to it, or that Actions be tranſferred to it from other Creditours. But Illuſtrious Perſons he will allow to receive but four, which ſort of Intereſt is, by Lawyers, called the lighter, as ſix, by Pliny, is termed civil, and moderate. Lampridius writes of that excellent Prince, Alexander Severus, that he to took but four in the Hundred; and in old time it was anſwered, that when any thing were yearly left to the Commonwealth, the Intereſt was to be of four onely, in the Falcidian Law. When any thing was delayed to be paid to the Commonwealth, as the ſetting up of a Statue, left as a Legacy to the People of Rome, Paulus alſo ſaid, that but four in the Hundred were to be exacted for that delay. In like manner Juſtinian ordained, that if the Dower was not paid for whole two years after Matrimony contracted, or if after the diſſolution of the Marriage the Husband did not reſtore back the Dower, conſiſting in moveables, for ſuch Mora, or Delay, Intereſt of four in the Hundred ſhould be paid. To which ſomething like had formerly been appointed.

Permits Trafſickers to take eight, and others onely ſix.

Eaſes Husbandmen in Intereſt of Money.

But rather burthens them in that of Fruits.

Novel. 32, 33, 34.

29. But Traders Juſtinian permitted to take eight in the Hundred, others in general onely ſix, whereas twelve had been formerly permitted to all. Herein he conſidered the Perſons of the Creditours, or of thoſe who put out their money. And he alſo had reſpect to thoſe who received upon Intereſt. He had at length pity upon miſerable Husbandmen, to whom the State is ſo much beholden, ordaining, that to no Creditour whomſoever they ſhould pay more than four in the Hundred, or not much more than four, viz. one Siliqua yearly for every Solidus, of which it was the four and twentieth part. But thoſe whom he eaſed in the Intereſt of Money, he ſeems to have burthened in that of Fruits. For he allows the eighth part of a Modius to be ſtipulated for every Modius, which a little exceeds the Uſura Centeſima, or twelve in the Hundred. And indeed when he publiſhed his firſt Conſtitution formerly mentioned, he permitted all Perſons to take the Centeſima upon Commodities, though not on Money. And now he remits nothing, except it be for Bread-corn lent to Husbandmen. The reaſon was, becauſe Husbandmen are wont from ſowing ſuch ſeeds to receive the Intereſt of two hundred, or more, and otherwiſe the prices of ſuch things are ſo uncertain, that he ſeemed to find reaſon therein to conſult the advantage of the Creditour, to whom the thing borrowed might be paid, in, or at, a time wherein the value of it was faln, which rarely happened unto Money, the quantity of money conſiſting in the value, but that of other things in weight and meaſure. Conſtantine, as we formerly obſerved, put a reſtraint upon the Uſury of Fruit, forbidding more to be taken than a third part, or, allowing that, if two Modii of Corn were lent, a third ſhould be returned back for the uſe of the two, ſo as theſe two, and it, ſhould make up three parts, and, in reality, an half of the whole ſhould be returned for Intereſt. This was a Reformation of the old Extravagance and Extorſion, made by Conſtantine; but notwithſtanding this, and that, the Vſura Centeſima was left by him as it formerly was, though he forbad it to be exceeded, the Intereſt of Fruits was three times greater than that of Money.

And why.

Other Intereſt than that of Money he forbids to exceed the Centeſima.

30. Both the one and the other ſort Juſtinian found to be too great, and what he did as to that of money we have already ſaid. Other Uſury than that of Money he forbad to exceed the Centeſima. That he allowed, and he allowed it to be taken of Husbandmen, from whom otherwiſe he forbad ſo much to be exacted for the uſe of Money, as from other men. For Fruits he grants they might take double of that of money, permitting, though but a Siliqua yearly for every Solidus, yet for a Modius of Corn an eighth part to be ſtipulated. To evade this Law, Creditours afterward were wont, when they lent Money, to ſay, they lent it to buy Corn, and ſtipulate the Intereſt to be that of Corn, to obviate which fraud Juſtinian took care in the law formerly mentioned. Thus he had reſpect to what was lent, and conſidered who it was that borrowed, and who lent, in theſe his Conſtitutions. But he alſo diſtinguiſhed according to the Danger and Riſque the Lender was like to run. So that if he was to bear the loſs, if the fruits that were to be ſown miſcarried, he reſtrained him not by Law. Neither was that the Lawyers call Antichreſis formerly ſo reſtrained by Conſtitutions, but that it might be uſed, provided there was no fraud therein. They called it Antichreſis, when the Creditour received the Fruits of a piece of ground, or other thing, which was given in pledge for Money lent. And Lucullus ſeems to have attempted to reſtrain the practice of it, and to reduce it to moderation. To be ſure both the obligation of it, and of other ſorts of Pledges, was diſſolved, if the Principal was tendred. However Juſtinian forbad, that the Fields or Goods of Husbandmen ſhould be held by the way of Antichreſis. The Ancients indeed prohibited the Inſtruments of Husbandry to be taken or obliged this way, but he extends the Prohibition to other of their things, though the Creditour lent them the Corn, and underwent the danger of the miſcarriage of the ſeed. For miſerable muſt be the eſtate of the Husbandman, and Husbandry it ſelf muſt be diſturbed, if their grounds be held and tilled by other men.

L. 16. de Vſuris.

Forbids the Antichreſis in the Lands or Goods of Husbandmen.

The Fœnus Nauticum uncertain.

31. There was another ſort of Uſury, as remarkable as any of the reſt, if not more, and that aroſe from Money lent for Traffick by Sea, called Fœnus Nauticum, and Trajectitium. In caſe the Creditour took upon himſelf the danger of Sea and Navigation, nay and in ſuch caſe ſubjected the very Principal to danger, the Ancients judged Uſury to be free, and by no means to be circumſcribed, it being indeed the price of the danger rather than any thing elſe. But ſuch Contracts Juſtinian thought fit to reſtrain to the Vſura Centeſima. Yet afterwards he found, that theſe Contractus Trajectitii were ſo various, that they could not conveniently be regulated by one Law, and his Reſolution was various about them. In order to a right determination, concerning lawfull Intereſt in ſuch Caſes, a diſtinction muſt be made in reference to the condition of the Money lent, and the peril undergone by the Creditour. Moreover it's to be known, that the Law ſo often mentioned concerning the moderation of Uſury, properly belongeth to Stipulations and Contracts, and that ſometimes, even by the Imperial Conſtitutions, greater Intereſt was due without contract. As Juſtinian himſelf afterwards declared, that the Intereſt of ſuch things as had been decreed in Judicature, concerning which the Law had paſſed, ſhould be that of the Centeſima, if ſo be the Party caſt did not make payment after four months, provided it ſhould be onely for the Principal, not for any former Intereſt due upon the Principal, though they had been joined together as one in the condemnation. And yet he declared by the former Law, that no greater Intereſt ſhould be exacted for Contracts, than he therein allows, though the Contracts had been made before the

L. 26.

Intereſt of things obtained in Judicature allowed to be of the Centeſima.

L. ult. Cod. Juſt. de Vſura rei judicatæ, lib. 7. tit. 54.

Sect. 2.

L. penult. Cod. de Uſuris.

Intereſt not to exceed the Principal.

the Law, in the time when it was lawfull to ſtipulate greater. And what is more obſervable, he permitted not the courſe of Intereſt to exceed the double, or more to be paid for Uſe, than the whole Principal amounted to; nor though there was a Pledge in the caſe.

32. This was received of old for Law, that when the Intereſt did equal the Principal, the payment of it ſhould ceaſe, although it was the Uſura Nautica and Trajectitia. But Juſtinian inſinuates, as Baldwin obſerves, that there were ſome old Laws, by which, if the Creditour had a Pledge, he might retain it, and ſo by it, exact even greater Uſury; which Laws, whatſoever they were, he took away, that ſo the Moderation of Intereſt, which he brought up, might be preſerved. He alſo obſerves another effect of this Moderation of our Legiſlatour. In reference to the doubling of the Principal, and ſtopping of Intereſt when it ſhould have equalled it, Antoninus the Emperour, by his Reſcript, declared, that to the making up of that ſumm which equalled the Principal, ſuch Intereſt as had formerly been paid ſhould not be reckoned, but onely ſuch as were in arrear from the Debtour. But Juſtinian conſidering, that by this means a knaviſh Debtour might have the advantage above the honeſt and well meaning, who conſtantly kept his day of payment, and that a covetous and exacting Creditour ſhould fare better than one who was generous, and not exacting or preciſe in getting Money, though he had at firſt taken that Reſcript or Law of Antoninus into his Code, yet at length he thought fit to repeal it, and ordained that Intereſt already paid, and the ſeveral payments of it ſhould be reckoned to make that ſumm, which equalling the Principal ſhould diſcharge the Debtour from farther Uſury. This his favour was abuſed by certain Creditours, who extended it to extinguiſh ſome pecuniary Incomes, which otherwiſe were perpetual, which conſtrained him to publiſh another Novel Conſtitution whereby he repreſſed that interpretation. For when the Creditour can call in or recover his Principal, it is a fault in him to chuſe rather to oppreſs the Debtour with Intereſt; and therefore where he doth not call it in, the Law ſtops the Uſe-money; and he may thank himſelf for ſuffering his Principal to lye dead in the Debtour's hands: But if it be ſo alienated, that it cannot be recovered, and by the payment of it, a Penſion or Annuity be purchaſed, though with that Condition, that the Debtour, by repayment of the Principal, might diſcharge himſelf, it ſeemed hard, that having for ſome years onely paid as much to the Creditour as it came to, he ſhould refuſe to pay Intereſt ſtill for that Money which he kept in his hands, and which the Creditour could not recover out.

Former payments to be reckoned in.

Novel. 121.

Novel. 160.

But this now reſtrained.

33. Another particular is ſtill behind, which ſhewed how moderate this Legiſlatour was in point of Uſury. The old Laws forbad that Uſe ſhould be taken for Uſe-money, or Uſe upon Uſe, inſomuch that they marked him with Infamy that ſhould require it. Yet, as Juſtinian obſerves, they did not make ſufficient proviſion againſt the practice, but by permitting the Intereſt to be turned into Principal, and then the Intereſt of the whole ſumm, ſo put together, to be ſtipulated, made it all one thing to the Debtours, and thereby regulated not Things but Words. But he reſolved to obviate this fraud by defining, that, to take off this colour and vizard of Juſtice, no Uſe-money or Intereſt ſhould be turned into, or receive the name of Principal, and Intereſt ſtipulated to be paid for it. Yet this Law ſeems to be imperfect, no Sanction or penalty being added for the fault it prohibits, and therefore it is demanded what puniſhment ſuch Offender is to ſuffer. In the Law at firſt mentioned, as well as in this, he added, that ſtipulations made contrary to theſe Laws ſhould be of no force; and in favour of Husbandmen he was more ſevere, ordaining, that ſuch as did not obſerve his Novel Conſtitutions in that point, ſhould loſe their Principal. This Baldwin obſerves, and ſince him Molinæus embraces the opinion of ſuch Lawyers, as think an infamous Uſurer may be puniſhed criminally, and may be tortured, though in the Laws no ſuch proviſion be made, and this he had ſeen done in the Parliament of Paris. Plato's Law was very ſevere alſo, which would permit the Debtour ſo exacted upon to pay neither Intereſt nor Principal. But Baldwin pronounces ſuch Theoremes of Philoſophers to be too confuſed, and to diſturb the Commerce of humane Societies. As alſo that the Laws of other Nations, as to Uſury, kept no mean nor diſtinction, but were intemperate and infinite, and either prohibited or permitted every ſort of Uſury. But how more wiſely, ſaith he, and conſiderately did Juſtinian act? And yet he adds, Poſterity bewitched with a fooliſh ſort of Superſtition, and ſillily abhorring the name of Uſury not underſtood, whenas they did not refuſe the thing it ſelf, hath dared to inveigh againſt ſo good a Legiſlatour in this kind.

Hoc certè erat non rebus ſed verbis, tantummodo legem ponere, l. 28. de Uſuris.

Intereſt forbidden to be changed into Principal.

L. 26.

Vide Notas in l. 20. ex quibus cauſis infamia irrogatur, Cod. Inſt. lib. 2. tit. 12.

The Laws of other Nations were extravagant in this point of Intereſt.

34. We have done with the buſineſs of Uſury, but ſhall farther take notice, that the ſame Day he made the Law which gave occaſion to the Diſcourſe upon this Subject, he publiſhed another on a different, wherein he altered the Law as it had formerly ſtood. The Ancients prohibited mere Donations betwixt Man and Wife, for according ſuch Inconveniences as extreme affection or importunity might procure betwixt them. They prohibited them not when they were firſt contracted; but this ſort of Donation is ſaid to have had a tacite condition, if Marriage followed, eſpecially by a Law of Conſtantine; for indeed before, when no cauſe was expreſſed, nor any condition, the ancient Lawyers ſeemed to interpret it to be a pure and liberal Donation, ſo as the thing became preſently theirs, to whom it was made. There was a third ſort of Donation before Marriage; which was not a mere Donation, but for conſideration, being, as it were, a certain compenſation of the Dos, or Portion, which the Wife brought; or our Jointure in England, which the Husband contributed as ſhe did her Dos. Baldwin ſaith, this ſort of Donation was unknown to the ancient Lawyers, even by confeſſion of Juſtinian; but in the time of the later Emperours, when Barbariſm diminiſhed the Dignity of Husbands, and when men became thereupon uxorious, it began to be in uſe, there being no mention of it in the Pandects. Hereupon though the Dos, or Portion, be ſaid to be by the Law of Nations, yet he ſcarcely allows this to belong to the Civil Law. And at firſt it was not preſcribed how much the Man ſhould give or contribute upon this Account. But Leo and Anthemius decreed, that ſome equality of Portion ſhould be obſerved in the Pacts of the Dos, and this Donation, that on ſuch terms as the Husband gained a third part of the Dos, the Wife ſhould gain in like manner a fourth of the Donation.

Donations betwixt Man and Wife prohibited.

Not when firſt contracted.

The Donation, anſwering our Jointure, not anciently known to the Romans.

Sponſalitia Donatio.

Et propterea ab Juſtiriano ἀντίφερνα vocantur quæ ita donantur. Primo appellata eſt Donatio ante Nuptias, ſed Juſtinianus eam vocari mandavit Donationem propter Nuptias, cùm eam etiam poſt Nuptias fieri permitteret, ut ipſam Dotem. l. ult. tit. 3. lib. 5. Cod.

35. This equality therefore might otherwiſe be unequal, and Interpreters commonly, though barbarouſly, ſaid it was quotitativè, not quantitativè; yet Juſtinian, when he made his Code, was content to admit it. He onely added, that if the Pacts were unequal, they ſhould be ſo reduced to equality, that the greater gain ſhould be brought down to the leſs, as if the Wife compacted to gain a third part of the Donation, and the Husband but a fourth, that Pact of hers ſhould onely be underſtood to be of the fourth part. He afterward in a Novel Conſtitution approved this Law; but ſome time after, by another, he enacted, that both in quantity and frame of this Donation for Marriage, ſuch equality ſhould be obſerved betwixt it and the Dos; that ſo much ſhould be contained in it as in the other. He had formerly ordained, that the Donation ſhould not be greater than the Dos. He was afraid that the Law which prohibits a ſimple Donation to be made from the Husband to the Wife, ſhould be infringed; and herein, contrary to his wont, he ſeemed little to favour Women, by repreſſing the liberality of their Husbands. But this Donation tended to their advantage, the Dos being better ſecured to them, and thereby the Husband being hindred from breaking the Matrimony by divorce, raſhly, and without a cauſe. Indeed the Wife, in reſpect of her Dos ſhe brought with her, had a great Obligation upon all her Husband's Eſtate; but beſides, this condition was profitable; for the Husband could not alienate ſuch things, eſpecially if immoveable, though the Wife conſented, as the Legiſlatour determined. And then, as the Woman divorcing her ſelf without cauſe, loſt part of her Dos, ſo the Husband, in ſuch caſe, loſt part of his Donation alſo.

Quotitativa non quantitativa.

Juſtinian takes pains in this Affair.

Nov. 22.

Nov. 97.

Nov. 61.

36. The day following the date of all theſe Conſtitutions lately mentioned, or the ſeventh of the Ides of April, preſents us with one directed alſo to Mennas, wherein Juſtinian will have all due honour and reſpect paid to Judges, and ordains, that in caſe a Judge have omitted to tax the Expences of a Suit, and to award them to him that overcomes his Adverſary, there ſhall be no need of any Appeal, but the Judge, ad quem, to whom the Adverſary caſt, of courſe appeals, ſhall have power to decree him a compenſation for the ſaid Coſts and Damages he hath ſuſtained. Though all or moſt of the other Conſtitutions were made before the Code was publiſhed, yet we can ſcarcely think that this was, becauſe on this very ſame day we find the Code it ſelf ſet forth, though Baldwin would have it the day following. It appears ſo to have been by the date of the Edict, prefixt to it for its confirmation, which, in our later Edition, bears date of the ſeventh of the Ides of April, and is directed alſo to Mennas, as Præfectus Prætorio, Exprefect of the City, and Patritian, which Mennas continued to be Prefect to the Month of Auguſt of this year. He begins his Edict by telling his Subjects, "That the main defence of the State "proceeded from two fountains, of Arms and the Laws, which exerting thence its "Power, had procured the happy Stock of the Romans to be preferred before all "Nations, had cauſed them to have Dominion over all People for the time paſt, Prohibits Appeals in point of taxing Coſts.

He publiſheth his Code.

L. ult. Quando provocare non eſt neceſſe, Cod. Juſt. lib. 7. tit. 64.

De Juſtinianeo Codice confirmando.

“ and with the Favour of God, would doe the like for that to come. One of theſe,
“ he adds, always ſtood in need of the Aſſiſtence of the other, the Affairs of War
“ being kept in ſafety by the Laws, as well as the Laws preſerved by the ſafe-guard “ of Arms. That therefore applying his Mind, and Indeavours to the chief The Edict of publication.
“ means of the Preſervation of the Commonwealth, he had by manifold means,
“ and provident Methods amended the State of the Militia, as well by reducing “ the ancient Laws into a better Frame, and that in a ſhort ſpace of time, as by “ ordaining new, yet without any new publick Expences.

36. “ But it being neceſſary by reducing into Brevity, the multitude of Conſti-“ tutions as well found in the three ancient Codes, as thoſe added afterward, to “ take away the obſcurity of them, which caſt a miſt before the Judges in “ their Deciſions; for the performance of this common Good, with the Aſſiſt“ ence of God, he applyed himſelf earneſtly to it, and having made choice of “ Men, who were moſt Glorious, for their learning in the Laws, their experience “ in the World, their indefatigable Induſtry for the good of the State, and their “ laudable Deſign, with certain Reſtrictions, he committed to them this great La“ bour, by which the Conſtitutions of the three Codes of Gregorius, Hermogenia- “ nus, Theodoſius, together with the Conſtitutions of the ſaid Theodoſius, of ſuc“ ceeding Princes, and ſuch as had been made by himſelf, he commanded to be “ collected into one Code; which ſhould be named after himſelf. The Prefaces
“ he tells us, were to be taken away, as affording no ſuffrage to the Sanctions, as “ alſo ſuch contrary Conſtitutions as were made void by others, more lately pro“ mulgated, ſuch alſo as being to the ſame purpoſe, and made no diſtinction in “ Law; beſides many other things, he gave in Charge to thoſe moſt prudent Per-“ ſons; and the Omnipotent God gave Aſſiſtence to his Endeavour, which was un“ dertaken for the Commonwealth. After this,he declares that thoſe Perſons formerly “ named, according to their ſeveral Titles and Qualifications, which here it will “ be needleſs to repeat, viz. John, Leontius, Phocas, Baſilides, Thomas, Triboni-
“ an, Conſtantinus, Theophilus, Dioſcorus and Præſentinus, being choſen for com“ pleting ſo great a Work, had by the help of God, brought what he had com“ mitted to them, through their ſedulous and moſt vigilant Induſtry, and their “ moderate digeſting of Matters to a proſperous Iſſue, and had preſented to him a “ new Juſtinianean Code ſo compoſed, as ſhould be profitable to the Common“ wealth, and agreeable to the Conſtitution and Intereſt of his Empire.

37. “ Then applying his Speech to Mennas the Prefect he tells him, that he “ thought fit to direct this Code, which for ever ſhould be of force to the Judg“ ment of his Highneſs, that as well all that have Suits, as the moſt eloquent Ad“ vocates may know, that in all Cauſes and Tryals, they inſiſt not for the time
“ to come on any Conſtitutions found in the three ancient Codes now mentioned,
“ or on any amongſt thoſe at this time called Novel Conſtitutions; but onely make “ uſe of thoſe inſerted in his Code, under pein of Forgery. For he ſaith, the “ reading of the Conſtitutions of his ſaid Code, if the Labours of the ancient Inter“ preters of Law be added, are ſufficient to decide all Controverſies; there being no “ doubt to ariſe, either for that, ſome of them are without Day or Conſul, or for that “ they are Anſwers to certain Perſons; it being moſt evident, that they all obtain the “ force of general Conſtitutions; although ſome of the ſaid Conſtitutions be ſo “ framed, that certain words be taken away, added or altered, which Liberty he “ had given to the ſaid moſt Excellent Perſons. He forbids that, any reciet them “ out of the Books of the ancient Lawyers, otherwiſe than they are in his Code, “ permitting them onely to commend the opinions of the Interpreters, which ſhall “ onely ſo far be of value, as they do not contradict the Conſtitutions of his “ Code. If there were any Pragmatick Sanctions which had not been received in-
“ to his Code, perhaps granted to Cities, Bodies, Schools, Scrinia or Offices, or “ to ſome certain Perſon; if ſo be they granted any ſpecial Privilege and Indul“ gence, they ſhould remain in force; or if they were deſigned for certain Heads “ or Chapters, then they ſhould be of force if they were contrary to no Con“ ſtitution in his Code. In like manner, if any thing had been done in the Court “ of Mennas, or other Civil or Military places of Judicature, or at the Principia “ Numerorum, in reference to publick Expences, or any Titles relating to the pub“ lick, he adjudges them to be valid as the common Utility doth require. And “ now he concludes with an Epilogue, which he, or his ten Compilers of the Code, “ have cut off from all the Conſtitutions therein comprized. Let therefore thy “ Magnifick and Illuſtrious Authority, according to the Vigilancy thou uſeſt in “ behalf of the Commonwealth, and in fulfilling our Orders, cauſe the ſaid Code

"to be known to all ſorts of People, by Edicts publiſhed according to the Cu-"ſtome. The Text it ſelf alſo of the Code, is to be ſent into all Provinces ſubject "to our command, with our Divine (ſo ſtill they uſed to word it) Subnotation, "that ſo the Conſtitutions of our Code may come to the knowledge of all; "and that there being Feſtival days to come, that is from the ſixteenth day before "the Calends of May, of this preſent ſeventh Indiction, in the Conſulſhip of the "moſt famous Decius; Quotations and Authorities of Conſtitutions, may be made "from our ſaid Code. Given on the ſeventh before the Ides at Conſtantinople, De-"cius, the moſt Famous, being Conſul, A. D. DXXIX.

The haſte of the Compilers cenſured.

38. In this Edict he commends much his ten Compilers, for their Induſtry and Skill; whatever their Induſtry was, their haſte ſeems to have been too great and precipitate, having taken but the time of fifteen Months, for the Collecting and Interpolating of this Code. This indeed they might the more eaſily doe, becauſe he gave them leave to take away the Prefaces to the ſeveral Conſtitutions; which afforded no light to the Sanctions. But they took away both Prefaces and Epilogues, and thereby deprived us of a great Light, which they would have afforded the occaſions, and conſequently the reaſons of the Laws. It were to be wiſhed they had taken away all contrary Conſtitutions, and thoſe of the ſame Tendency and Effect. And that the Liberty he gave them of taking away, adding and altering Words had been more cautiouſly uſed, as with great Grief to all underſtanding Men, it is found that it was not; their Interpolations being moſt notorious. And Juſtinian by the perſuaſion of them or others, ſeems to have made too too much haſte, having ſcarcely put into this Code, the tenth part of the Conſtitutions he found requiſite afterward to add of his own device. At the ſame time, that he publiſhed this Code (which he ordained ſhould be of Force, from the ſixteenth before the Calends of May, or the fourteenth of April) he was ſtill hammering new Conſtitutions, it is therefore admired that he ſhould not defer the Publication of it, till they were finiſhed. And he found ſo much occaſion for the increaſing their number, that for the collecting and inſerting of them, a new Edition of the Code was afterwards found neceſſary.

Privileges granted to Souldiers not to extend to them, when at home.

L. ult. de Reſtitutionib. Militum, & eorum qui Reip. cauſa abſunt. Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 51. Dat. 6. Id. Apr. Conſtp. Decio. V. C. Conſ. 529.

L. 17. de Teſtam. Militis, Cod. lib. 6. t. 21.

How far the Alienations made by Minors ſhall be good.

L. ult. ſi Major factus Alienationem factam ſive Decreto ratam habuerit, Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 74.

39. The very day following the Confirmation of the Code, we find a Conſtitution directed to this ſame Mennas, whereby the Emperour declares ſuch Privileges as were ordinarily granted to Souldiers, in declining Exceptions, and in the Reſtitution in integrum, ſhould onely hold in the time of Expedition, and not when they lay in other places, or at home. And whereas Military men had alſo allowed them great Liberty, in making their Teſtaments, which ſet them free from the Solemnities, which in thoſe of others were required, by another Edict directed alſo to Mennas, he declared that they ſhould onely hold in ſuch Expeditions, and not at all times. This bears Date on the fourth day before the Ides, and on the Ides themſelves, another Conſtitution is ſtill directed to Mennas, whereby he declares that ſuch Alienations as had been made of the Goods or Eſtate of a Minor, or one under Age, without the Intervention of a Decree ſhall be good; if the ſaid Minor after his coming to Age, or twenty five, did not contradict it, but held his Peace for five years. But whereas a Minor could make no Donations, though with a Decree, in the time of his Minority, except onely for the cauſe of Marriage, he will not have them valid, except ſuch Perſon after he came to Age, ſhall if preſent be ſilent ten years, and if abſent twenty. And if he dyed before thoſe Terms completed, his Heirs within the remainder of the Term may recall, if he pleaſe, the Donation; not after. Theſe Conſtitutions might eaſily have been taken into the Code before its Publication, according to what we now can judge; but the Truth is, there might be preſſing Reaſons not to ſtay ſo long, of which at this diſtance we are ignorant: So alſo we are not certain, but that many more might be made betwixt this and Auguſt; but yet we find a ſpace of near four Months of Intermiſſion, wherein the Emperour and his Quæſtor, ſeem to have taken their eaſe as to this Affair. For the next we find in the Code, bears Date of the eighth before the Ides of Auguſt; yet being directed ſtill to the ſame Mennas, we ſuſpect other inſcribed to him without Date might have been Compoſed in ſo much diſtance of time; but then as to the time we have no certainty.

L. 20. de Collationib. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 20.

40. That Edict ſo much concerns the Jus Privatum, that we ſhall not meddle with it, for Reaſons formerly given. We find on one day of the next Month, viz. the ſixteenth of September, or the fifteenth before the Calends of October, eight ſeveral Conſtitutions bearing Date, as now they are in the Code, not directed to Mennas, but to Demoſthenes. For Mennas being now out, Demoſthenes came in for the remainder of the Year and that following, together with one Atarbius, as Alamannus

Sect. 2.

In Secret. Hiſt. p. 92.

l. 8. Qui Teſtamenta facere potuit vel non, Cod. Juſtiniani, lib. 6. tit. 22.

Juſtinian favours Legacies, and Fideicommiſſa.

l. 1. Communia de Legatis, Cod. lib. 6. tit. 4?.

l. 5. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 57.

Prohibits the baſe Children of Illuſtrious women, to ſucceed them in their Eſtates.

Et hanc legem ipſi pudicitiæ quam ſemper colendam ſencemus, merito dedicamus.

nus obſerves from a Conſtitution publiſhed by Ant. Contius, though whence he tells not. This Demoſthenes alſo, as he obſerves, had been Præfectus Prætorio, eight years before in the time of Juſtin, in the firſt Conſulſhip of Juſtinian and Valerius, to whom that Emperour directs a Law concerning a blind man; whether, and how he may make a Teſtament. By one of the eight Laws lately mentioned, he made an Alteration from what had been before, granting an Action in Caſe of Legacies, and Fideicommiſſa, both againſt Thing and Perſon, and beſides an Hypotheca, or Obligation upon the reſt of the Teſtatours Eſtate, and he took away the Diſtinction of Legacies formerly uſed. By another, he expreſly forbad that, if an Illuſtrious Woman had legitimate Sons, and alſo Baſtards, of whom the Fathers were uncertain, that the Baſtards ſhould ſucceed her, together with the Legitimate, either by virtue of a Teſtament, or if ſhe dyed without a Will, or by any Deed of Gift, made betwixt the living. For that a Baſtard ſhould be named as Heir to a Woman, both of free and Illuſtrious Condition, he eſteemed it an horrible thing, and unworthy of the times. So much was he concerned therein, that he Dedicates this Law to Modeſty, and that deſervedly, which he thinks always is to be regarded. He was of Opinion, that the Greatneſs of Quality made the Crime the greater. But if a Woman of ingenuous Condition, was a Concubine to any Free-man, he permits that ſuch Children propagated by ſuch lawfull Conjunction, be admitted to ſucceed their Mother, together with her Legitimate iſſue, in her lawfull Patrimony.

l. 3. de Infant. expoſitis, Cod. lib. 8. tit. 52.

An Infant not to be diſ-inherited as ingratefull.

l. 33. de Inoffic. Teſtam. Cod. lib. 3. tit. 28.

Nor a Poſthumous Iſſue.

The ſame Perſon not to be Aſſeſſour and Advocate.

l. Ult. de Aſſeſſorib. Cod. lib. 1. tit. 51.

l. 6. de Bonis qua, lib. Cod. lib. 6. tit. 61.

41. He farther ordained, that ſuch Infants as were expoſed, ſhould be taken and held for free and of ingenuous Condition, and as at this time he defined, what Children ſhould be accounted ingratefull, upon that account, as that they might be diſ-inherited, or looſe part of the Inheritance; ſo a few days after, or on the twelfth before the Calends of October, he approved what the great Lawyer Paulus had written, that an Infant could not be ſtyled ingratefull by the Mother, nor be repelled from the Mothers Inheritance. But whereas it was held, that out of hatred to the Husband, a Woman might diſ-inherit her Son, he rejected it, and ordained that none ſhould be burthened by the hatred of another Perſon; that an Infant could not be ingratefull, and therefore could not be diſ-inherited, and if he were, might always have the benefit of the Querela Inoffícioſi Teſtamenti. As for Poſthumous Children, or thoſe that were unborn at the death of their Parents, though he was of ſeveral minds herein; yet at laſt, he reſolved that they could not be diſ-inherited. For he forbad it to be done at all, without juſt Cauſe, and no juſt Cauſe could there be as to Poſthumous Children. On the fifth before the Calends of October; he decreed that the ſame Perſon ſhould not be both Aſſeſſour and Advocate, or be Aſſeſſour to two Magiſtrates. On the ſixth before the Calends of November, he ordained that a Judicial Sentence of the Prince, ſhould have the Force of a general Law. And on the third before the Calends, or the twenty ninth of October, he made ſeveral Conſtitutions which are ſaid to have been recited ſeven times in the new Conſiſtory of his Palace. Of one we ſhall take notice, which declares what things theſe are, which a Son as yet in the Paternal power, and not Emancipated, acquires to his Father.

What Sons not Emancipated, acquired for their Fathers and what not.

l. Ult. ejuſd. tit.

42. By the moſt ancient Law, whatſoever ſuch a Son gained, he acquired it all for his Father, who had the full Propriety and Dominion of it. But by the Conſtitutions of the Emperours, Sons, if they were Souldiers, had the Privilege to acquire to their own Propriety and Dominion; what they got by the Service, or thoſe things called Bona Caſtrenſia, which by this example was alſo granted, to ſuch as ſerved the Commonwealth in a Militia non Armata, in ſuch Goods as thence were called, Bona quaſi Caſtrenſia. But for Adventitious Goods of a Son in Power, they were ſtill acquired to the Father. Conſtantine firſt excepted Goods coming by the Mother; and then other Emperours, ſuch as came by Matrimony, or betrothing. All theſe Conſtitutions in favour of a Son Juſtinian approved; but whereas other Adventious Goods were acquired for the Father, he judged it a more juſt thing in the General, that the Uſusfructus of Adventious Goods ſhould be granted to the Father, and the Propriety kept for the Son. As for thoſe they called Profectitia, which proceeded from any thing, or cauſe of the Father to the Son, thoſe he ſuffered to be acquired for the Father. But whereas he ſeemed to be ſo Indulgent to Sons in Paternal Power, as contrary to the old Laws, he gave them the Propriety of Adventitious Goods, though the Uſusfructus belonged to their Fathers, yet would not he ſuffer them, either, to make a Teſtament of them, or make any Alienation of them amongſt the Living, or ingage them, without the Conſent of their Fathers. Yet it ſeems very rational and conſequent, that the one ſhould follow the other; but he fearing he had done too much already, would doe no more, but left the old Law ſtill in Force. Or rather Baldwin is of Opinion, that if he had been moved about it, he would alſo have given this Liberty of making Wills; being otherwiſe ſo indulgent to Sons, that by his Novel Conſtitutions he would have certain Goods, beſides the Caſtrenſia, and quaſi Caſtrenſia in their full Propriety, without any Vſusfructus left to their Fathers, ſuch were Goods left to them with this Condition, that the Fathers ſhould not have the Vſusfructus of them, Goods that came from a Diviſion of a legitimate Inheritance, when the Son and Father were Co-heirs, and as ſuch the Son obtained by an unjuſt Divorce. As for Adventitious Goods, the Father was the Adminiſtratour, or Curatour of them at his own Charge, but not without the Son's Conſent, as neither could the Son act as to them without him. Although a Tutour and Curatour, had in General power to all without ſuch Conſent required.

Sect. 2.

Donations when not to be regiſtred.

Vide Balduinum quo ſuprà.

43. Whereas it was formerly unlawfull to make any Deed of Gift, or Donation, above two hundred Aurei, except it was publickly Regiſtred, he being a Friend to liberality, permitted firſt three hundred, and afterwards five hundred to be given without ſuch publick Solemnity. But as to the Donations of the Prince, he would have them free, and exempt from all Law of Regiſtring whatſoever. And he was ſo Crafty that as he would have the Emperours Donation free from the Law of Inſinuation, ſo alſo ſuch Gifts of private Men, as were made to the Emperour. The following Year, was the fourth of Juſtinian, and marked with the Conſulſhip of Lampadius and Oreſtes, who were both Conſuls in the Weſt; Juſtinian little regarding this Honour it ſeems, and not caring whether at all, or on whom he beſtowed it. Amongſt ſeveral he made this Year; we ſhall firſt take notice that on the ſixteenth of March he abrogated a Law of Honorius, and Theodoſius, whereby it was ordained, that a Teſtament made ten Years before the Death of the Teſtatours ſhould be void. For he took it as an Argument, that the man would have it to continue in Force, becauſe he did not all this while revoke it. Indeed if he did revoke it by another Teſtament legally made it was void in Law, or if he revoked it by Word of Mouth, before three Witneſſes it ſhould ſtand revoked, if ten Years paſſed before the death of the Teſtatour, but not elſe; or he might in ſuch a Caſe revoke it at a publick Regiſtry, and the Revocation ſhould ſtand good, provided ten Years paſſed as is ſaid. Of the Laws of this Year, made and altered by him, we ſhall take no farther notice, being all of ſuch Concernment as relates to the Jus Privatum, which the Reader, if he pleaſe, may find in Baldwin his Juſtinianus, a learned Book as to the Matter, though much as to the Alteration of Laws, to them that do not practiſe them, not eaſie to be underſtood. But at the latter end of this Year, or the eighteenth before the Calends of the next, he gave out, that memorable Mandate for collecting of that Body of Law from the ancient Writers, which now we call the Pandects and Digeſts. For theſe Books were to receive, and into them were to be diſpoſed the ſubſtance of the Civil Law, from the Writings of the greateſt Profeſſours thereof, digeſted under ſeveral Heads.

l. 27. de Teſtam. Cod. lib. 6. tit. 23.

Juſtinian gives out a Mandate for compoſing the Digeſts.

44. His Mandate he directs to Tribonian, with the Title of his Quæſtor, in whom he wonderfully confided for this Affair, though not ſo happy as Julius Cæſar would have been in his Sulpitius, or Hadrian in his Julianus for ſuch an Attempt, in the Opinion of Baldwin. " After ſome Preface he tells him, that moved " with the Confuſion that was in the Law, he had already framed his Code, from " the Conſtitutions of former Princes rightly amended, and digeſted, and that " chiefly by his Miniſtery and overſight. That having had experience of his Dex" terity in that Affair, he had committed to him alſo this preſent Deſign, of col" lecting and amending an intire Body of Roman Law, and given him Power to " take to his Aſſiſtence, ſuch of the moſt eloquent Anteceſſours, and Advocates of " the Prefecture as he ſhould think fit, to bring them into his Palace for this pur" poſe, and to give them Teſtimony, as to their fitneſs, to whom he had committed " the Work; yet ſo as all ſhould be managed by his moſt vigilant overſight. He " commands them then to reade and refine the Books of the ancient Lawyers, to " whom the Emperours had given Authority to write and interpret Laws, that " from them, all the Matter thereof might be collected, without any thing men" tioned, that was either to the ſame purpoſe, or of diſagreeing Senſe, as much " as was poſſible, but ſo as that one ſaying ſhould ſuffice for all. When this was " done, with high-flown Words he declares, that it ought to be digeſted into fifty " Books, and under certain Titles, in imitation as well of the Conſtitution of his " own Code, as the Edictum Perpetuum, as they ſhould moſt conveniently doe it.

Præfatio prima De conceptione Digeſtorum ad Tribonianum Præmiſſa Digeſtis.

The purport of it.

“ That ſo nothing might be left out of the Collection, but in theſe fifty Books “ ſhould be comprehended the whole ancient Law, which had lain confuſed for “ almoſt a Thouſand five Hundred years, but now was purged by him, and fenced
“ as it were in its own Wall. Herein they ſhould obſerve an equal Authority in “ all Authours of Laws without any Prerogative of Dignity. Becauſe all were “ not certain in all, but either better or worſe, in certain and peculiar Points.

45. “ But neither will he have them conclude, that to be moſt equal and juſt, “ which moſt Authours ſay, becauſe perhaps the Opinion of but one, and “ he inferiour, may be better. Therefore he will not have them preſently reject
“ what is alledged out of the Notes of Æmilius Papinian, by Ulpian, Paulus and “ Marcian, for the honour of that moſt ſplendid Perſon. But if any thing they “ meet with in them, which ſhould conſummate the Labour of ſo great a Wit, or “ neceſſary for Interpretation, they ſhould not delay to put it down for Law; as “ all other Opinions, which he confirms by his imperial Authority. He gives, “ them in Charge as a thing to be ſtudiouſly obſerved, that if they find in ancient “ Authours any thing not well placed, ſuperfluous or imperfect, without any Tediouſneſs
“ they amend it, and produce the work, as conſummate to all purpoſes.
“ Yet ſhould they obſerve, that if they found any thing not rightly written in the “ ancient Laws or Conſtitutions, put by the Ancients into their Books, they ſhould “ reform, and ſo regulate it that it might ſeem to be true, the beſt, and that “ as it were written from the beginning, which they made choice of and placed
“ there. And he declares that none dare by comparing the ancient Book, to reprehend “ their writing as vitious. For, whereas by the ancient Law called Regia,
“ all Right, and all Power of the People of Rome, was transferred into that of the “ Emperour, and whereas he did not divide all Law, into ſuch and ſuch Parts of the “ Lawmakers, but would have the whole to be his own, what could Antiquity “ abrogate as to what he ordained? Nay he will have all ſuch Laws to be of that “ Force, that though they were written otherwiſe by the Ancients, yet placed “ now contrarywiſe in this Collection, no Fault ſhall be imputed to the writing,
“ but this ſhall be aſcribed to his choice. In Concluſion, he will have no Antinomia
“ in any Members of this Collection; but one Concord, and one Conſequence, “ without any thing ſaid to the contrary.

46. “ But he again prohibits, that any thing like or to the ſame purpoſe, be inſerted
“ in this Work; as alſo that ſuch things as are ordained in the Conſtitutions “ placed in his Code, ſhall again there be put from ancient Law, the Imperial Authority “ of the Makers ſuffering for their Authority, except for the ſake of Diviſion, “ Repletion, or for fuller inquiry this happen; but this ſhall be very ſeldom “ done, leſt any knotty Controverſie thence ariſe. If any Laws had grown “ obſolete, he will have them by no means to ſuit them in; his meaning being,
“ that onely ſuch things ſhould obtain, as were moſt frequently practiſed in Judicatories, “ or the long Cuſtome of that City had approved, according to what “ Salvius Julianus wrote, that all Cities ought to follow the Cuſtome of Rome, “ which is the Head of the World, and not obſerve the Cuſtome of other Cities.
“ Now, ſaith he, not onely the ancient Rome is to be underſtood, but our Royal “ Rome, which by the Favour of God was founded with better Auguria or beginnings.
“ He commands therefore, that by theſe two Books or Collections, all “ matters be managed, the one of the Conſtitutions, and the other of the Jus Enucleatum, “ except he ſhould publiſh ſomething afterward, in way of Inſtitutions, that
“ the mind of the Student void of knowledge, being firſt inured to ſimple matters, “ might more eaſily be brought to a knowledge of greater prudence. Now
“ he declares and ordains, that this Elaborate work, which they by the help of “ God ſhall compoſe, ſhall have the Name of Digeſts or Pandects That no “ Lawyers for the future, ſhall dare to add any Commentaries to it, and by their “ verboſity confound the Compendiouſneſs of the ſaid Books, as had been of old “ practiſed, when almoſt the whole Law was diſturbed by the contrary Opinions “ of Interpreters; it being enough by Indexes, and the ſubtilty of Titles (called “ Paratitha) to make ſome Admonitories of it, ſo as no inconvenience ariſe by “ their Interpretations. And that no doubt may afterward ariſe by writing, he “ commands that this Book be not compoſed by the Captions of Sigla, and compendious “ Ænigmata, which had introduced many Antinomies; although the number “ of the Books be ſignified, or any other thing; for he will not grant that the numbers “ ſhall be made by ſpecial Sigla, but explained by the conſequence of Letters.
“ Then he concludes with a ſerious Epilogue, and dates this Mandate in the eighteenth “ before the Calends of January, Lampadius and Oreſtes being Conſuls, A. D.
“ DXXX.

Defects obſerved by Baldwin.

47. In obedience to this Mandate, Tribonian, Baldwin obſerves, took to him as Aſſiſtents Theophilus and Cratinus of Conſtantinople; Dorotheus and Anatalius of Berytus Anteceſſours of Law, and eleven Pleaders of Cauſes out of the Forum of the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt. And he wiſhes he had joyned to them Julianus a Conſul of thoſe times, and a Patritian of Conſtantinople, whom Priſcian teſtifies to have exceeded almoſt all the Ancients both Greek and Latine in every ſort of Learning. And he adds, it had been well, had he alſo employed Priſcian who lived at this time at Conſtantinople, a Grammarian indeed, but ſuch a Grammarian as excelled in the skill of Roman Literature and Antiquities, one who diligently peruſed the Monuments of the ancient Lawyers, and underſtood the learned way both of ſpeaking and writing. Many Books Juſtinian confeſſeth to have been brought by Tribonian to the management of this Affair, which otherwiſe were then unknown, and that two thouſand Books containing three hundred myriads of Verſes were to be peruſed. He talks of fifteen hundred years wherein the Roman Law till his time had lain confuſed, whereas his own Reign began but in the MCCLXXX of the City, as ſome obſerve, and Baldwin cryes out, that three hundred years were ſcarcely to be reckoned, for that Law which was reduced into the Pandects, and tartly makes an obſervation, how little and dark the memory of Roman matters was in thoſe times. But however, ſaith he, the reveiw of all Roman Law from the beginning of the City, and of all Antiquities is committed to a few Græculi; and others will have it, that the Envy of theſe Græculi brought more damage to the Roman Glory and Law, than the Burnings and Deſolations procured by the Goths. To be ſure it was a work of ſuch Labour and Judgment as is not expreſſible, to cut down materials out of ſo vaſt a wood, and to ſelect out of ſo many vaſt Volumes, ſtuff for erecting of ſuch a ſtructure: Not onely the words and matter, but even the writing it ſelf muſt bring with it much difficulty. But he requires that no Sigla be uſed in the Text, which had brought in great Inconvenience. By Sigla he means Sigilla, or ſmall Notes or Marks when whole Names and words were noted by the firſt Letters. Theſe Notes had been formerly diſowned in ordinary Teſtaments, though in thoſe of Souldiers they were permitted. Indeed if a thing was to be kept obſcure, it was convenient to have it written in them, and in ſuch manner Auguſtus commanded the Sibylline Books to be written by the hand of the Prieſts, with obſcure Notes, that ſo they alone might reade them. But Juſtinian had a deſign of another nature.

Vide Notas ad Præfat. prim.

48. Which Deſign did not yet fully take, though it was very good and profitable, becauſe the Interpretation of thoſe Notes was very difficult. Therefore Tribonian and his Companions, eſpecially in ſuch haſte, might well be miſtaken. Sometimes they were prone not to expound them, their meaning being for the moſt part ambiguous, otherwhiles to take Notes for Letters and Letters for Notes, which the old Tranſcribers of Books much confounded to the great vexation of Readers. But the end propoſed by Juſtinian in waving theſe Notes, is to ſhun an Antinomia, by which the Ancients meant the Repugnancy of two Laws rather by accident than Nature, as when two Theſes differed in one Hypotheſis, which often happeneth; but he means by it a contrariety and conflict of Laws in their very Nature. This Antonomia of his meaning was very difficult to avoid in a work of ſo vaſt a Bulk, ſo great diſſents of the Ancients, and ſuch variety of Opinions and Controverſies, with which thoſe Books abounded, out of which the Pandects were to be Compoſed, there being not onely diverſity of Opinion in private men, but two Sects and Families of diſſenting Lawyers as the Sabiniani and Proculi. There wanted a man of more ſolid Judgment than poſſibly Tribonian was, to weigh duly and determine thoſe great differences and various opinions met with by theſe Undertakers, who being many in number brought each as they had Collected, their ſeveral parts or ſhares which were all ſewed up together, ſo as one knew not what part the other had taken, in the choice of his Collections.

49. Another thing he charges them with, is not to inſert any obſolete Laws, which Baldwin thinks they did better not to obey him. For moſt of the ancient Law was in his time grown obſolete. Thoſe Cuſtoms of the ancient Roman Forum vaſtly differed from his. Not onely the Seat, but the form and face of the Empire was changed; the Religion, Juriſdiction, Manners, and in concluſion, the Commonwealth it ſelf was different. Not many Roman Antiquities had been inſerted into thoſe Pandects, if nothing had been therein comprized, but what obtained in the time of Juſtinian. It's farther to be noted as ill, that ſome things of the Roman Superſtition are left therein which the Chriſtian Religion abſolutely abhors. Which is to be attributed to the careleſneſs of the Compilers, and could not be confirmed by Juſtinian. Memorable is that other branch of this Mandate, whereby he orders them to accommodate what they tranſcribe to the Manners and Cuſtoms of their own Times, and upon that account, to change and transform the Writings of the Ancients, to add and take away what they ſhould think convenient. Now in Compoſing the Edictum Perpetuum, three or four alterations are inſtanced to have been made by Julianus the Compiler. But they that made the Pandects more audaciouſly interpolated as they thought fit, and as they were conſtrained to doe it, to accommodate the Laws to their own times. But they leave no mark of diſtinction what was old and what was theirs, and he commanded the Inſcription to be put as if nothing had been altered. But in this as the preceding part of the Mandate, ſometimes Tribonian obeyed his order, and ſometimes not, which makes the matter more in the dark, and if it be not diſtinguiſhed what is Ulpian's, and what is Tribonian's, great Inconvenience muſt come of it.

The Digeſts to follow the order of the Edictum Perpetuum, how they do it.

50. In the laſt place, he commands that the Pandects ſhould be Compoſed in the ſame method as the Edictum Perpetuum Hermogenianum, when he Compoſed his Books of Epitomies, he pretended alſo to follow the order of the Edict; yet added thereto many other Titles. For whereas the Law reſpects either Perſons, Things, or Actions, and Edictum Perpetuum onely handled Actions, there ſeemed need to add ſome Chapters concerning the other two. This Example Juſtinian followed. The firſt part of the Edict was inſcribed τὰ πρῶτα, or the Firſt, the ſecond was De Judiciis, and the third De Rebus, which Inſcriptions he gives to the parts of his Pandects. What in the Edictum Perpetuum was briefly expreſſed, he would have more largely explained, but yet not ſo largely as the Interpreters of the Edict, Paulus and Ulpian had done before. Theſe things he expreſſeth in his firſt Preface before his Digeſts, and in thoſe that follow, which being two other in number, are by us to be conſidered at their proper time, and not altogether. But to ſpeak in relation to theſe as they bear it one to another, the Mandate for making the Digeſts was dated on the eighteenth before the Calends of January, in the Conſulſhip of Lampadius and Oreſtes. And how much time did theſe Collectours now take to themſelves? Baldwin thinks that if the Decemviri took a whole year for Compoſing the ten Tables, and another for adding the other two, thoſe ſixteen men might well have required twenty for Collecting and digeſting of the Pandects. And it might have been wiſhed they had done it, the nature of the work requiring it.

How ſmall a time was taken in compiling them.

51. But they ſpent not therein the ſpace of three years. For Juſtinian confeſſes, that in three years three Volumes of the Roman Law were compiled, viz. The Code, Digeſts and Inſtitutions, whereas it was thought they could not be finiſhed in ten years time. Now the Code was publiſhed long before the Pandects were begun, on the Ides of April, in the Conſulſhip of Decius. In the following year Lampadius and Oreſtes were Conſuls, and not long before the end of the year he firſt commanded the Pandects to be compoſed, and after their compoſition, ſome time was required to his reading and conſidering of them, which he affirms. Now they were publiſhed and confirmed on the ſeventeenth of the Calends of January, in the third Conſulſhip of Juſtinian, which was but three years after the Mandate for their compoſing. And in the month of November before them, were publiſhed the Inſtitutions, the third Volume he meaneth. The thing it ſelf indeed ſufficiently declareth that there was too little time taken for collecting and reviſing ſuch Volumes. It was a matter of greater conſequence than to be ſo hudled over, eſpecially a perpetual Standard of Law, being to be delivered to Poſterity, which now complains, as Baldwin makes it ſpeak extravagantly, that not ſo much Laws as Croſſes or Difficulties are left unto it. But ſo it was: On the ſeventeenth before the Calends of January, he directed an Edict inſcribed with glorious Titles, under the name of Cæſar, Flavius, Juſtinianus, and with Additions from People as it were Conquered by him, though he had never fought with them, or had no cauſe to boaſt of Conqueſt, as ſome of them by way of capitulation afterward affirmed. But he ſtiles himſelf as having ſubdued the Alamans, Alamanicus, and ſo for like reaſons Gothicus, Francicus, Germanicus, Anticus, Alanicus, Vandalicus, Africanus. How far theſe Additions might be truly aſſumed by him appears by his Hiſtory. To them he adds the uſual Epithetes of Pius, Felix, Inclytus, Victor and Triumphator, ſemper Auguſtus, and directs his writing to Theophilus, Dorotheus, Theodorus, Iſidorus, Anatolius, Thalleleus and Gratinus, Illuſtrious Anteceſſours. As alſo to Gulamius the moſt Eloquent Anteceſſour.

52. "In the Edict he firſt declares all the Law of the Commonwealth, now to " be purged and compiled, viz. in the four Books of Inſtitutions or Elements; in
" the

He preſcribes Rules for teaching of Law by an Edict.

Præfatio ſecunda Digeſtorum.

Ad titulum uſque de honorum poſſeſſ.

Anciently what was wont to be read the firſt year.

What the ſecond.

What the third.

How they ended.

“ the fifty of Digeſts or Pandects, as in the twelve of Imperial Conſtitutions. That he had alſo by his Edicts both in the Greek and Latine Tongue declared what was convenient thereupon. But now he had thought fit to direct another Diſcourſe to them, for the information of them, as well as other Anteceſſours, what Rules he would have obſerved, for the moſt commodious Inſtitution of Students in this Science or Myſtery. He makes it utterly out of doubt, that it is neceſſary firſt to reade the Inſtitutions, and thoſe that deliver the firſt rudiments of the Science. Of the fifty Books of Digeſts, he judges thirty and ſix onely to ſuffice for their Expoſition, and the Inſtruction of Youth. He puts them in mind, that formerly from out of ſuch a multitude of Laws, as made up two thouſand Books, and thirty hundred thouſand Verſes, Students onely were inſtructed in ſix Books, and thoſe confuſed and containing but few profitable Laws, the other being now out of uſe, and not to be come by. In theſe ſix Books were the Inſtitutions of Gaius, and four ſingular Books. The firſt treated of the ancient way of Marriages, the ſecond of Tutorſhips, and the third and fourth of Teſtaments and Legacies, and theſe not in order, but paſſing by many parts. This was the Task of Students of the firſt year, not according to the method of the Edictum Perpetuum, but out of order and without choice. In the ſecond year after a prepoſterous manner, the firſt part of the Law was delivered to them, ſome certain Titles being taken from it. After a courſe of Study made up by parcels, and unprofitable in great meaſure, other Titles were delivered to them as well out of that part intituled De Judiciis by piecemeal, as out of the other De Rebus, ſeven Books being laid aſide as not proper to be taught. In the third year, that which had not been delivered in the ſecond out of both Volumes, viz. De Rebus and De Judiciis, they received according to the viciſſitude of them; and a way was opened to them to the moſt ſublime Papinian and his Anſwers. Of the nineteen Books of theſe Anſwers they received onely eight; neither was the whole Body of them delivered to them, but a few out of many things, and moſt brief out of moſt large, ſo as they might go away from them with a thirſt. Theſe things above being delivered by Profeſſours, the Anſwers of Paulus they read by themſelves, and them not all, but in an imperfect and inconſequent courſe after a kind of ill Cuſtome. Hence they paſſed into the fourth year, and therewith made an end of their Study; ſo that upon Count, one might find that out of ſo immenſe a multitude of Laws, they read ſcarcely ſixty thouſand Verſes, all the reſt being impaſſable to them and unknown, and then not to be made uſe of but in the leaſt part, as often either as the practice in the Judicatories required it, or they the Maſters of the faculty haſted to read ſomething out of them, to have more advantage in the skill of their Scholars. Such he ſaith had been the monuments of the ancient Learning, for which he appeals to their Teſtimony.

What he will now have taught the firſt year.

Dupondium duæ drachmæ Dupondii ergo duarum quaſi drachmarum ſtudioſi, i. e. viliſſimi & nullius pretii.

What the ſecond.

53. “ And finding ſuch a penury of Laws, as alſo judging it a moſt miſerable Caſe, he is reſolved to open the Treaſures of that Science, to ſuch as are willing to receive them, being prepared in ſome meaſure by the skill of thoſe to whom he directs this Letter, that they may become moſt able Oratours in the Faculty. In the firſt year he will have them fully skilled in his Inſtitutions, which had been conſummated out of the Bodies of almoſt all others that had been before them, and from all impure Fountains drained into one clear Receptacle by Tribonian the Vir Magnificus, Exquæſtor of his ſacred Palace, and Exconſul, and two of their number to whom he writes, viz. Theophilus and Dorotheus moſt Eloquent Anteceſſours. For the remainder of the year, he ordains that Students have the former part of the Laws delivered to them, which by the Greeks was called πρῶτα, which ſhould finiſh, as the other begin, their Studies for the firſt year. Such as had been Auditours for this year, ſhould not be called by the wonted name, as well frivolous as ridiculous, of Dupondii; but New Juſtinians, which he thinks fit to ordain for all time to come, as beſeeming the Reformation of Laws he had made, the firſt Volume of which was to be put into their Hands. In the ſecond year, during which they ſhould bear the Name formerly impoſed by Edict, he will have them ſtudy either ſeven Books De Judiciis, (from the fifth to the eleventh,) or eight De Rebus (from the twelfth to the nineteenth,) as the viciſſitude of time ſhall indulge them, which he will have preſerved inviolable, and without skipping or omitting any thing in the ſaid Books, which now were all graced with new beauty, nothing unprofitable, or what was out of uſe, being to be found in them. To either of the foreſaid Volumes he will have added, to be taught in this ſecond year the four Libri ſingulares, which he ſaith he had collected out of the whole compoſition of fourteen Books, viz. one out of three Volumes which he “had compoſed De Dotibus; one out of two which treated De Tutelis & Curationibus; one from two others concerning Teſtaments; and from ſeven Books handling the matters of Legata and Fideicommiſſa; alſo one of thoſe four Books placed at the beginning of the aforeſaid compoſitions, he tells theſe Maſters that he would have onely taught by them, the other ten being reſerved to a convenient time, it being impoſſible that in the ſpace of the ſecond year, theſe fourteen Books ſhould be read by them, and degeſted by their Scholars.

What the third,

54. “In the third year, whether it happens that they reade the Books De Judiciis or De Rebus, with them he will have to concur the Tripartite Diſpoſition of the Leges ſingulares, and in the firſt place that concerning Hypothecæ, becauſe being ſo near a-kin to Actions concerning Pledges, they may be joyned near together. After this he would have another added concerning the Edict of the Ædiles, and the Action called Actio Redhibitoria, concerning Evictions and the ſtipulation of Double, compoſed by him, becauſe they are near a-kin to the Doctrine of Sales, treated of in the former Edict. Thoſe three Books he will have joyned with the reading of the moſt acute Papinian Students, being wont to reade them in their third year, but not intirely, but a few ſcraps taken out of them. And he again recommends Papinian to be read by himſelf, of whom he ſaith excellent uſe was made in the Compoſition of his Digeſts, not onely from his Anſwers which were divided into nineteen Books, but alſo from his ſeven and thirty Books of Queſtions, his double work of Definitions, as alſo concerning Adulteries, and from all his writings almoſt. And leſt the Students or Auditours of the third year whom they called Papinianiſtæ, ſhould ſeem to loſe his Name and Feſtivity, he is again introduced into the third year by a moſt brave device, for Juſtinian had compoſed his Book of Hypothecary Actions, out of the writings of the ſaid Papinian, that both they may have a Name from him, and be called Papinianiſtæ, may rejoyce at the memory of him, and may obſerve that Feſtival day, which they were wont to keep when firſt they took his Laws into their Hands, and that by this means the memory of that moſt ſublime Præfectus Prætorio may continue for ever. With this the Audience of the third year ſhould be concluded.

i. e. Solvendis Juris quæſtionibus idonei.

What the fourth,

55 “And becauſe the Students of the fourth year were wont by a Greek word to be called Lyti, he will have them if they think fit ſtill to enjoy it. But inſtead of the Anſwers of the moſt prudent Paulus, which they read confuſedly, having reduced them from twenty three ſcarcely to eighteen, they ſhould ſtudy the ten Libri ſingulares, which remained of the fourteen lately mentioned by him, out of which they ſhould draw he affirms greater Treaſures of skill, than out of Paulus his Anſwers. If ſo be they well improved their time in theſe things, and in the fifth year wherein they were named Prolytæ, both read and ſubtilly endeavoured to underſtand the Code of Conſtitutions, nothing would be wanting to them of juſt and fit knowledge, and this Service of theirs would obtain a wonderfull Accompliſhment, which ſcarcely happened in any other though the meaneſt Art. He ordains then that theſe Scholars of theirs (Diſcipuli,) ſhall have all ſecreſie opened to them, and nothing hid, but all being throughly read and made known to them, which had been compiled for him through the Service of Tribonian and others, they might be found to be the greateſt Oratours, and the Satellites of Juſtice, the beſt Champions of Equity, and moſt happy Governours in every Place and Age. Now theſe three Volumes of his Compoſing, he will have delivered to Students in the two Royal Cities (of Rome and Conſtantinople,) and in the moſt beautifull City of Berytus, (which juſtly might be termed the Nurſe of the Laws,) and in them onely, as had been formerly ordained by Princes, not in other places which had not obtained ſuch privilege of old. For he had heard that in the moſt ſplendid City of Alexandria, in Cæſarea and other places, ſome unskilfull men wandered about, and delivered adulterate Doctrine to their Diſciples, whom now by threatning he repells from ſuch their Endeavours; and if they ſhall dare for the future to doe any ſuch thing in any ſuch places, he puniſheth them with a fine of ten pounds of Gold, and orders that they be caſt out of that City in which they do not Teach, but offend againſt the Laws. After this he prohibits the Sigla, formerly mentioned under pein of paying to the owner double of the price if he know nothing of the thing; and if he will have ſuch a Book it ſhall ſignify nothing, and no Judge ſhall allow any Pleadings, or Quotations to be made out of it. Then he ſeverely forbids all Students of the Laws, both at Conſtantinople and Berytus, to act any Plays wherein the Anteceſſours or Novices are reflected on, it behoving, he ſaith, firſt their Souls and then their Tongues to be learned. The Power and Care of obſerving theſe matters, and puniſhing both

i. e. Lytis doctiores vel ex præfinita lege ſtudiorum ſoluti, vel qui poſſunt Juris nodos & legum ænigmata ſolvere.

And where.

To whom he commits the care.

Bookſellers and Students, he commits in Conſtantinople to the High Prefect thereof; in Berytus both the clariſſimus Præſes of Maritime Phœnicia, the moſt bleſſed (beatiſſimus) Biſhop of the ſaid City, and the Profeſſours of the Laws. He concludes with this Exhortation: Begin then to deliver to them, with God's Government, the Doctrine of the Laws, and to open to them the way which we have found out. That ſo they may become moſt excellent Miniſters of Juſtice, and the Commonwealth, and the Teachers may be moſt highly honoured in all Ages. For that in their time ſuch a change of Laws was found out, as in Homer, the Father of all vertue, Glaucus and Diomedes, make betwixt themſelves, changing things very unlike, for which he quotes a verſe out of that ancient Poet. Theſe things he will have of force in all Ages, both of Profeſſours, Students, Bookſellers and Judges, to be obſerved. Dated on the ſeventeenth before the Calends of January, Our Lord Juſtinian, perpetual Auguſtus, the third time being Conſul. A. D. DXXXIII.

Χρύσεα χαλκείων ἕκατον Βοία ἐννεαβοίων. Aurea æreis centena novenariis, Iliad. 6.

On the ſame day he directs two other Edicts to the Grand Senate.

56. On the ſame day we find two other Prefaces or Speeches dated, one whereof is directed to the Senate, and all People, in Latin, and the other in Greek is inſcribed alſo by Contius to the Great Senate. 'Herein he ſignifies, that he had compoſed the Perſian War, as alſo that of the Vandals, which Nation he had ſubdued, and rejoined Carthage, and all Libya, to the Roman Empire; and then magnifying what he had alſo done about the Laws, gives an whole account of the ſeveral Works he had ordered to be compiled, declaring what their particular Parts and Books were, and of what Subjects, as alſo whence they were taken, ſuitably to what hath been already related. And he calls upon the Fathers of the Senate, and all the Men of the World, to give Thanks to God for reſerving ſo great a Benefit for their times. He declares he will have his Volumes of Inſtitutions, or Elements, of Digeſts or Pandects, to be of force, from his third Conſulſhip of the preſent twelfth Indiction, the third before the Calends of January, together with his Conſtitutions in all Ages. Which third Conſulſhip, he ſaith, by the help of Chriſt, had been moſt happy, in reſpect that the Parthian Wars were ended, a perpetual peace was made, and a third part of the World added to his Dominion. For, after Europe, both Aſia, and all Libya, was joined to his Empire, and a concluſion was put to ſo great a work of the Laws; all which heavenly Gifts were indulged to his third Conſulſhip. In concluſion, he commands all Judges to receive theſe his Laws within their Juriſdictions: And eſpecially he ordains, that the Prefect of Conſtantinople obſerve them. The three Præfecti Prætorio of the Eaſt, Illyricum and Libya, he requires to take care to make them known to all that were within their ſeveral Diſtricts.

His Preface to his Inſtitutions.

57. We mentioned the Inſtitutions (that we may now ſpeak of them altogether) their being publiſhed in the month of November: Before the Book we find a Preface, directed by Juſtinian, with the uſual ſwelling Titles, to the Youth that had a deſire to underſtand the Laws. He begins with telling them, 'That the Imperial Majeſty ought not onely to be adorned with Arms, but alſo armed with Laws, that ſo the Government may be fit both in times of War and Peace, and the Roman Prince may not onely be Victour in Battels fought with Enemies, but alſo by legal Proceedings, expell the Iniquities of Delinquents, and may as well be moſt religious in Laws, as magnificently triumphant in the Conqueſt of Enemies. Both theſe Courſes, he ſaith, he had run, and that to perfection, through his great Watches and Forecaſt, by the help of God. His ſweat and toil in Wars the Barbarous Nations, brought under his Yoke, ſufficiently knew; and as well Africk, as other innumerable Provinces, after ſuch ſpaces of time, being again added to the Roman Dominions, and his Empire, did proteſt. All People now are governed by Laws promulgated and compoſed by him. After he had put into due order, and made to agree, the moſt ſacred Conſtitutions, which before were confuſed, he extended his care to the immenſe volumes of ancient Prudence, and had by heavenly favour, travelling, as it were, through the middle of the Deep, brought a deſperate work to concluſion. This being, by God's favour, perfected, he called to him the Magnifick Tribonian, Magiſter, and Exquæſtor of his ſacred Palace, together with the illuſtrious Theophilus and Dorotheus, Anteceſſours, (the notable wit of whom, together with their knowledge of the Laws, and fidelity in obſerving his Commands, he had had experience of in many reſpects) and had ſpecially commanded them, by his Authority, and at his Inſtance, to compoſe Inſtitutions.

58. 'Hereby they, (the Youth) he ſaith, may learn the firſt Rudiments of the Laws, not from ancient Fables, but, as he words it, fetch them from Imperial ſplendour; and their Ears and Minds may receive no unprofitable nor idle thing,

‘ but what lies in the very Arguments of things themſelves. And what happened to them that were before them ſcarcely after four years, viz. to reade the Imperial Conſtitutions, they may now enter upon at the very beginning, being worthy of ſuch Honour, and found in ſuch Felicity, that both the beginning and end of the Laws to them ſhould proceed from Imperial voice. Therefore after fifty Books of Digeſts, or Pandects, (which were compiled indeed, but as yet not publiſhed,) wherein all ancient Law was collected, and which he had diſpatched by the indeavours of the ſaid High Tribonian, and the Illuſtrious Perſons, he had commanded the ſame Inſtitutions to be divided into four parts, that they might be the firſt Elements of the Myſtery of the Laws. In them, he ſaith, was briefly declared, both what formerly obtained, and what was grown out of uſe, and rendred obſcure, was illuminated by an Imperial Remedy. Which Books being compiled out of all the Inſtitutions of the Ancients, and eſpecially out of the Commentaries of his Caius, as well of his Inſtitutions, as daily occurrences, beſides many other Commentaries, had been preſented to him by the aforeſaid three prudent Perſons, and having read and conſidered of them, he had accommodated to them the moſt full force and ſtrength of his Conſtitutions. He concludes thus: Receive therefore theſe our Laws with all Induſtry and Charity; and ſhew your ſelves learned therein, ſo as fair hope may cheriſh you, that after the whole work (of ſtudy) is completed, our Commonwealth may be committed to your Truſt and Government in the ſeveral parts thereof. Given at Conſtantinople the Eleventh before the Calends of December, Our Lord Juſtinian Father of his Countrey, Auguſtus, the third time being Conſul.

He ſtill goes on with new Laws.

59. Such is the Account (though in an Aſiatick, rude and difficult ſtyle to be interpreted,) we have from Juſtinian himſelf concerning the compoſing of his Digeſts and Inſtitutions, about which, while he and his Compilers buſied themſelves, they were not otherwiſe idle, as to ſuch matters, but continued the former courſe of daily adding new Laws. Of theſe the Reader, if he pleaſe, may conſult Baldwin, and we ſhall touch at ſome of them as they beſt ſerve our purpoſe. He was continually conſulted, in ſome point or other, by the Judges or Advocates of the Provinces, as particularly in the beginning of the year that came next after the Conſulſhip of Lampadius and Oreſtes, by the Advocates of Cæſarea in Paleſtine, about a matter not fit for our relating. In February, on the tenth before the Calends of March, he took away the difference which formerly had been manifold, betwixt a Legatum and a Fideicommiſſum, and whereas formerly there was ſome agreement betwixt them, he now commands that it be perpetual. Hereby the Law of Fideicommiſſa, which began in time of Auguſtus, was perfected by him; and that of Legacies, which had been ancient, but narrow, was much amplified. Formerly the difference betwixt a Legatum and a Fideicommiſſum, was this: A Legatum was expreſſed by Imperative words, and Fideicommiſſa by Precative. Imperative were accounted Direct and Civil, as Do, Lego, Capito, Sumito, Hæres eſto. Precative were ſuch as theſe, Rogo, Peto, Volo, Mando, Cupio. Formerly he had taken away the old forms of Words in Legacies; now he will have no difference to be made betwixt the form of a Legatum and a Fideicommiſſum, and he ordains, that there with whatſoever ſignificant word expreſſing the Will and Pleaſure of the Teſtatour, a thing is left, it ſhall be valid, whether it be in Imperative or Precative words; and he adds, that it ſhall be the ſame if the Teſtatour uſe an Obſecration, which, becauſe he invoked Almighty God, is termed an Oath, and was upon ſuch occaſions wont to be uſed by the Romans, being called otherwiſe from the Greek word, exorciſing, which was a term uſed alſo by Chriſtians in thoſe times.

De Jure Novo lib. 3.

Takes away the Difference betwixt a Legatum and Fideicommiſſum.

L. Communia de legatis, Cod. lib. 6. tit. 43.

Where the Difference formerly lay.

Ἐξορκίζω.

60. The ſumm of the whole Difference betwixt a Legatum and Fideicommiſſum lay in this, that in the latter onely the Will and Pleaſure of the Teſtatour was regarded, but in the former ſubtilty of Law, for that the Legatum proceeded from the Law of the Twelve Tables, as did the Teſtament, and the Fideicommiſſum was received ex æquo & bono. A Fideicommiſſum might formerly be left by nodding or ſigns, in the Greek Tongue, which a Legatum could not be; nay in the Punick or Gallicane, which, by this Law of Juſtinian, muſt be interpreted to be extended to the Legatum, which in like manner might be left by one dying inteſtate, and by the poſthumous Son of a Brother; and by a Legatary both a Legatum and a Fideicommiſſum might be left, though formerly a Legatum could not. Both before the Inſtitution of an Heir, and after the death of an Heir, or Executour, both might now alſo be left, though formerly a Legatum could not. And whereas a Fideicommiſſum could not be ſued for in form, but by extraordinary cognizance, Juſtinian would not onely have it recoverable by ordinary Action, but alſo as in caſe of Legata, granted all three Actions, viz. Real, Perſonal and the Hypothecarian. But ſo great a Friend Juſtinian was to liberty, in making Teſtaments, that he alſo made free from reſtraint of words the manner of diſinheriting, a matter wherein good caution ſeemed to be requiſite, as being averſe to the courſe of Nature. On the ſame day he decreed, that if any one diſinherited his Son in theſe words, Let that Son of mine be a ſtranger to my Subſtance, he ſhould be eſteemed not paſt by (in which caſe he might have relief,) but diſinherited. He gives this as a Reaſon or Advice: When the ſenſe of the Teſtatour is moſt manifeſt, never let the Interpretation of words ſo much prevail, that it be better than ſenſe, or meaning it ſelf.

He gives full ſcope of words in diſinheriting.

L. 3. De liberis præteritis vel exhæredatis, Cod. lib. 6. tit. 28.

61. This year was indeed fruitfull of Laws made for regulating the ancient Juriſprudentia, and eſpecially the month of April, which would furniſh us with ſtore, but not proper for an Hiſtory, which being written in the Engliſh Tongue, and for the Engliſh, it is moſt proper to make choice onely of ſuch Conſtitutions as, with the diſcovery of the Legiſlatour's deſign of altering the Law, may beſt ſuit with the Knowledge, Cuſtoms and Genius of our Nation. There had been formerly a mighty contention, not onely betwixt the old Lawyers, but Princes themſelves, in their Edicts, concerning the Efficacy and Force of a disjunctive word, and this difference on the laſt day of the month, if he did not decide, he reſolved to remove, cut and take quite away. Sometimes it was written, He, or he, be mine Heir; To him, or him, I give, bequeath, or I will have given; Him, or him, I will, or command, be, or to be, a Tutour. It was controverted whether ſuch Inſtitution, Legacy or Aſſignment of a Tutour was good. Whether ſhould be underſtood to be meant, the former, or the latter; or whether he who had Poſſeſſion ſhould be thought to have the beſt right. So many and ſo various Opinions were held about this matter, that Juſtinian ſaith, No ſmall Book might have been filled in the bare reciting of them. He therefore thought fit to end the Controverſie by determining, that Aut, in this Caſe, ſhould be taken for Et, the disjunctive be received as a conjunctive, ſo as both ſhould be Heirs, or Legataries, in equal ſhares, as if it had been written, He and He. Paulus indeed, the Lawyer, ſpeaks in the Pandects of Disjunctives and Conjunctives, that they are after put one ſort for the other. And it may be ſo; but however this Deciſion of Juſtinian was new and extraordinary, and ſeemed to ſome not to agree fully with the mind and meaning of a Teſtatour. But in a dubious and perplex Caſe he followed what he thought moſt equal, and choſe rather to give to both, than all to one, and nothing to the other. In this partition betwixt them he judged leſs inconvenience and hardneſs to lie.

Ille aut ille mihi hæres eſto. Illi aut illi do, lego, vel dari volo, vel illum aut illum liberum aut tutorem eſſe volo.

L. 4. De verborum & Rerum ſignificatione, Cod. lib. 6. tit. 38.

He ordains that a diſtinctive word ſhall be taken for a conjunctive.

62. He began the month of September of this Year by correcting, as he ſaith, a very great fault of the ancient Subtilty, as to Law. This Subtilty, he tells us, thought fit that there ſhould be one ſort of Law for Males to ſucceed their Parents by Teſtament, and another ſort of Law for Women, though in ſucceſſion to thoſe that died inteſtate, there lay one common and equal Right to both Sexes. Of old they held and ordained, that with one ſort of words a Male, and with others a Female ſhould be diſinherited. In reference to the diſinheriting of Grandſons, ſometimes they introduced the Civil, and ſometimes the Pretorian Law. And if a Son was diſinherited, ipſo jure, he either nulled the Teſtament, or was admitted to the whole poſſeſſion of the Eſtate, contrary to the Will; but if a Daughter was paſt by, ſhe had the Jus accreſcendi, and did not break the Teſtament, by which ſhe did in part, as it were, break her Father's Will in the ſame moment, and as if ſhe had been mentioned therein, was placed after Legataries, yet, by the Pretorian Law, ſhe had an intire poſſeſſion of the Eſtate, contrary to the Teſtament. Now a Conſtitution of the great Antoninus did in ſo much hinder and ſtraiten the Daughter, as ſhe had advantage by the Jus accreſcendi. But theſe Law-makers Juſtinian accuſeth, as Accuſers of Nature her ſelf, in that ſhe did not make all Males, and none of which they ſhould be begotten. Now he pretends to follow the example of the more ancient Romans in correcting this Errour. For he ſaith Sons and Daughters, and all others, were diſinherited alike, till the Centumviri (who were Judges in Teſtamentary and Hereditary matters) brought in the difference, whereby it came to paſs, that a Daughter that was paſſed by had leſs than a Daughter that was diſinherited. He determines therefore, that a Daughter ſhall have no leſs right than a Son, either to break the Teſtament, or to ſue for the Poſſeſſion of the Eſtate againſt the Will. He alſo will have poſthumous Daughters to be diſinherited, as if they were Males, and no otherwiſe, that they may not be eſteemed as paſſed by. And what he ordains concerning Daughters, he will alſo have extended to Nephews and Neeces by a Son.

L. 4. de liberis præteritis, Cod. lib. 6. tit. 28.

He makes Daughters equal with Sons as to Teſtaments.

63. But it is obſervable, that on the firſt day of November of this Year, he delivered the Law and Lawyers of much trouble, by taking away the ancient Ceremonies

He takes away the ancient Ceremonies about Adoptions.

Lib. 5. c. 19.

monies about Adoptions. Here it will be convenient, from A. Gellius, to inform the Reader what the ancient Rites and Differences of this thing were, in old times obſerved. ‘When Strangers, ſaith he, are taken into another family, and into the ‘place of Children, it's either done by the Prætor, or by the People. That which ‘is performed by the Prætor is called Adoption, that which by the People, Arrogation. ‘They are adopted, who by the Parent, in whoſe power they are preſent, ‘are by three Mancipations, or Sales, parted with, and by him who adopts ‘them are challenged, and recovered before him, in whoſe Court lies the Action at ‘Law. Such are arrogated, who not being in any paternal, but their own power, ‘and at liberty, voluntarily give up themſelves into that of another man, and are ‘authours of this change themſelves. But theſe Arrogations are not lightly, nor ‘without ſcrutiny, celebrated. The Curiata Comitia are not granted, though the ‘Pontifices preſide. And it is conſidered whether the Age of the Perſon that arrogates ‘be not fit and proper it ſelf to beget Children, and whether the Eſtate of ‘him who is arrogated be not aimed at, and treacherouſly deſigned. Moreover it's ‘ſaid, that an Oath was conceived by Q. Mutius, then Pontifex maximus, to be ‘taken in Arrogation. But one cannot be arrogated that's under a Veſticeps, (ſo ‘he calls him) or one who takes his virile Gown. Now becauſe this ſort called Arrogation, ‘whereby one paſſed into another family, was performed per Rogationem ‘Populi, or aſking leave of the People; the words of it were theſe: Pleaſe you to ‘will, or command, that L. Valerius (for example) ſhall become Son to L. Titius, as ‘well in Law, and Right, as if he had been begotten by that Father and the Mother ‘of the Family; and that he may have Power of Life and Death over him, as over ‘a Son born. So as I have ſaid, ſo I deſire of you, Quirites. But neither a Pupil, ‘nor a Woman, can be arrogated, though ſhe be in the power of her Parent; for ‘the Comitia meddle not with Women; and for Tutours, it is unlawfull for them ‘to have ſo much Authority and Power over their Pupils, as to ſubject a free ‘Perſon, committed to their Truſt, to the Power of a Stranger. Now Maſſurius ‘Sabinus hath written, that Libertini might be adopted by Perſons of ingenuous ‘or abſolutely free condition in ſtrictneſs of Law; but he ſaith it is not permitted, ‘neither doth he think it ought ever to be, that thoſe of the ſtate and quality onely ‘of Libertini, ſhould invade the Right of Ingenui by the way of Adoption. ‘Otherwiſe, ſaith he, if the Antiquity of the Law ſhould be obſerved, a Slave alſo ‘ſhould, by intervention of the Prætor, be given by his Lord to be adopted; ‘which moſt of the Authours of the ancient Law have written might be done.

Adoptio. Arrogatio.

Adoption and Arrogation how of old they differed.

How celebrated.

Arrogation in the Comitia ceaſed long before Juſtinian.

64. So much, and ſomething more, writes A. Gellius concerning this matter. Now Baldwin obſerves, that theſe difficulties of Arrogation, as he terms them, in the Comitia, were taken away long before the time of Juſtinian. For Diocleſian declared, that an Arrogation made by the Indulgence or Grant of the Prince, and intimated before the Prætor or Preſident, ſhould be full as valid, as if it had been done according to the ancient Law by the People. But the ancient Rites of Adoption longer continued. Gellius writes what theſe were, viz. three Mancipations, or Sales, and Recoveries before a Magiſtrate; and Suetonius, before him, of Auguſtus, that he bought Caius and Lucius at his Houſe, by Money and Weigh-ſcales, of their Father Agrippa. Firſt, becauſe the natural paternal Power was to be diſſolved, the Rite of three Mancipations intervened. Then becauſe this was done for the cauſe of Adoption, the Party was not manumitted, but adopted, after three Mancipations. But now whereas Juſtinian had formerly determined, that the Power of a Natural Father ſhould not always be diſſolved by Adoption, and Anaſtaſius had before that reſolved, that without any other Ceremony a Son might be emancipated by the Reſcript of the Prince, it had been ridiculous and abſurd to retain the ancient form of Emancipation in Adoptions. Therefore on the firſt day or Calends of November, he took away the whole Pageantry of the ancient Emancipation, by aboliſhing the imaginary Sales, or Mancipations, wherein he ſignifies, that Manumiſſions and certain Rhapiſmata intervened.

He takes away the old formalities in Adoptions.

L. ult. de Adoptionibus, Cod. lib. 8. tit. 48.

65. ‘The ſame day of the month, of the foregoing Year, when Lampadius and ‘Oreſtes were Conſuls, he had taken away, as he terms them, the old Circuits in ‘Adoptions, which were wont to be made by three Emancipations, as to Sons, and ‘two Manumiſſions, or by one Emancipation in other children. And he gave ‘leave to a Parent, who deſired to give away by Adoption Children in his Power, ‘to manifeſt this thing before a competent Judge, by the way of regiſtring, without ‘the old Obſervation of Emancipations and Manumiſſions, he being preſent ‘who was adopted, and not contradicting, as alſo he who ſhould adopt him. Now on that day twelve month after, or the Year whereof we write, he ſig-

And the ancient Circuits.

L. ult. de Emancipationib. liberorum, Cod. lib. 8. tit. 49. Dat. Cal. Nov. Conſt. poſt Conſulatum Lampadii & Oreſtis.

nifies to John, the Præfectus Prætorio, ‘That having beheld in Emancipations a vain Obſervation, to be kept with Sales, figurated upon free Perſons, inextricable Circumductions, and injurious Rhapiſmata, of which no rational effect is found, he will have this ſort of Circuit to ceaſe for the time to come, and gives leave to him that will emancipate, either to doe it according to Anaſtaſius his Law, or without a ſacred Reſcript, to go before a competent Judge, or ſuch Magiſtrates as by Law, or long Cuſtome, were permitted to doe this thing, and to diſmiſs from his hand his Sons, Daughters, Nephews, Neeces, or ſuch Off-ſpring deſcending as were in his Power, and to retain his legitimate Rights, although he did not ſpecially reſerve any to himſelf; to give the peculium, or transfer other things upon them in way of liberality, to detain other things by the way of Vſusfructus, and doe all other things, the vain Cuſtome, as was ſaid, being onely taken away. The Cuſtome was, that the Son was thrice ſold by his Father, and, as it were, ſold back to him again, that he might manumit him, being redeemed, as a Lord did his Slave, and thereby have over him the right of Patronage. This was called Fiducia. The Rhapiſmata, ſome think, were Cuts on the Ear, wont to be given to Slaves at their Manumiſſion, as a Ceremony; others, that they were ſtroaks given by the Vindicta, or Rod of the Prætor's Lictor. Five Witneſſes were to be preſent at the imaginary ſale, with the Weigh-ſcales and Money ready. But Juſtinian, by removing thoſe Ceremonies, which, in the time of Romulus, and the twelve Tables, were thought convenient, delivered the Imprudentia from many Thorns and Briars, if Tribonian had not diſperſed their Stumps and Pricks into the Digeſts, by inſerting into them ſeveral remainders of theſe aboliſhed Rites. So ſhort was his memory or diligence in this and many other matters, as Baldwin ſufficiently diſcovers.

He took away the Dedititia Libertas.

L. unic. de Dedititia libertate tollenda, Cod. lib. 7. tit. 5.

66. Certainly our Legiſlatour laboured much in things of this nature, as appears, amongſt other Inſtances, from another Law he publiſhed this very day. He had formerly taken away that ſhadow of liberty, called Dedititia Libertas, declaring, ‘It ſhould no more for the future moleſt the Commonwealth; becauſe it was of no uſe, but was onely an empty name of liberty. For he, he ſaith, who was an obſerver of Truth, would have thoſe things onely to be in his Laws, which indeed were real. Such as had this liberty had little benefit, for they could neither make a Teſtament, nor receive any thing from one, be reduced to the former City, nor be made Heirs. ‘Having aboliſhed theſe Dedititii Liberti, the liberty of the Latini, as alſo imperfect, as ſetled upon uncertain foundations, did, he ſaith, reel and ſtagger, having at firſt been brought up in a tumultuary and confuſed manner. For the Latini Liberti ſeeming to have been introduced after the manner of the ancient Latinity, ſent in Colonies, it were very abſurd the Original it ſelf of the thing being taken away, to have an Image or Repreſentation thereof continuing. Now whereas after ſeveral Faſhions, and almoſt innumerable, the condition of theſe Latini was introduced, diverſe Laws and Senatusconſulta made thereupon, and thence many difficulties did ariſe, as well as by the Lex Junia, the Senatusconſultum Largianum, and the Edict of Trajan, of which Law-Books were full, but no good Experiment had been made; he now thinks fit to cut off all theſe things, and to reduce the Latine liberty by certain methods into the perfect Roman. For how can it be endured that there ſhould be ſuch a kind of liberty, as by virtue of it, at the time of death, liberty and ſervitude ſhould concur in the ſame Perſon? and that he that dies ſhould, dying as free, be ſnatched away, both into ſervitude and death, at the ſame time? Hereby it appears what a ſort of liberty this of the Latini was, and it will be convenient to obſerve, what this our Legiſlatour tells us elſewhere in his Inſtitutions, that the ſtate of Libertini, or ſuch as were made free, was of three ſorts. For ſuch as were manumitted ſometimes obtained the greater liberty, and were made Roman Citizens; ſometimes the leſſer ſort, and were made Latini by the Lex Junia Norbana, and otherwhile were onely Dedititii, by virtue of the Law called Lex Ælia Sentia.

L. un. de Latina libertate tollenda, &c. ibid. tit. 6.

And the Latine Liberty.

Inſtit. lib. 1. tit. 5. de libertinis. Vide notas.

Three ſorts of Liberty formerly.

One became Roman Citizens,

Another Latini,

A third Dedititii.

67. Roman Citizens were made, either by the Vindicta, or by the Cenſus, when they were inrolled, at the command of their Lords, in the Books of Ceſſe, or were manumitted by Teſtament. Or, as others have expreſſed, who by Teſtament in the Church, or before the Conſul, received this favour. Theſe could both make a Teſtament, and ſucceed in an inheritance, by virtue of one made. The Latini were made either by an Epiſtle, amongſt Friends, or even at an Entertainment or Banquet. Theſe could neither make a Will, nor ſucceed by virtue of one, but by a ſecond Manumiſſion might become Roman Citizens. Now the Dedititii were ſuch as had been ſubjected to puniſhment after Crimes committed; for the ſame publickly beaten, or in whoſe Faces or Bodies ſuch marks were made by Fire, or Iron, as could not be defaced, who had been bound in Chains, in way of puniſhment, by their Lords, been found guilty, watched and obſerved, and who had been delivered up, that they might combate with the Sword, or with wild Beaſts, or had been thrown into Cuſtody. Theſe could neither make Teſtaments, neither receive benefit by one, nor be made Citizens. They were called Dedititii from the example of Stranger Tributaries, who, being Rebels, were overcome by the Romans, and baſely did dedere, or give up themſelves into their Power. But to come nearer to the Latini. They were alſo called Latini Liberti, as Baldwin will have it, who were not manumitted altogether after the legitimate manner, and in ſolemn order; not by a Lord who was above twenty years of Age, one who was Lord ex Jure Quiritum; or when the Party manumitted did not exceed the Age of that of thirty. Yet whatever others ſay, he delivers it as Law, that being manumitted, they enjoyed ſuch liberty, as to have Commercium, and a right of receiving advantage from a Teſtament, though they had no Connubium, or privilege of Matrimony, nor could make a Teſtament, nay, indeed dyed as Slaves. This deſcended from the Law called Junia Norbana, preferred in the time of Tiberius by thoſe who were then Conſuls. Thence they were called Latini Juniani. But that Law, and its Interpreters, ſignifie, that many ways theſe Latini Liberti might be made Roman Citizens.

69. Suetonius relates how Veſpaſian married a Woman of Latine condition, being by a recuperatory Judgment pronounced ingenuous, and of free condition. Indeed ſuch were eaſily made Roman Citizens, ſo at leaſt as they enjoyed the privilege of Quirites, as long as they lived; and that they might not trouble themſelves in obtaining it, afterwards Trajan conferred on them the Jus Quiritum, as long as they lived in general, or permitted them to enjoy it, though their Patrons being unwilling, or ignorant of it, they had procured to be Citizens; but for all this, ſo as they ſhould die as Slaves. Afterward the Senatuſconſultum Largianum was made in the time of Antoninus Pius, that the Latini Liberti, who were manumitted at full Age, and by a Lord that was at full Age alſo, as was provided for by the Law, called Lex Ælia Sentia, although not ſolemnly, as by the Vindicta, or Teſtament, might be made Roman Citizens, and dying, might enjoy the privilege of a Citizen, otherwiſe they could not make a Teſtament, as in the time of Salvianus of Marſeilles, an hundred years before Juſtinian, they could not doe. At length, now this Emperour took away all theſe troubles and difficulties, and would own no other Liberty but what was joined with freedom of a Citizen. And afterward, as ſome have thought, by his Seventy eighth Novel Conſtitution, he would have all that were manumitted, not to be of libertine, but full, free and ingenuous condition. By this Law of which now we treat, he ordained, that Liberty it ſelf ſhould be conferred ſeveral ways, wherein the Latine Liberty was wont to be beſtowed. For example, a Lord might manumit his Slave by an Epiſtle, provided it were atteſted by five Witneſſes. He might doe it alſo amongſt Friends, if he took five Witneſſes, or did it apud Acta, and had the teſtimony of Witneſſes and publick Perſons.

Juſtinian takes away all troubles and difficulties about Liberty.

70. Claudius, the Emperour had of old made an Edict, that if a Slave were in ſome grievous Infirmity, forſaken by his Lord, who would neither look after him himſelf, commend him to others, nor ſend him to an Hoſpital, ſuch Slave ſhould enjoy the Latine Liberty, yet ſo, as his Lord at his death ſeized on his Goods. Now Juſtinian ordains, ‘That a Slave ſo uſed ſhall be abſolutely free, and his former unkind Maſter ſhall have nothing to doe with his Eſtate, either when he lives or dies. In like manner a She-Slave, if ſold on condition not to be proſtituted, if ſhe be by him that buyes her, or her former Lord, reſerving to himſelf a way of recovery, proſtituted afterward, ſhe ſhall obtain full Liberty and Franchiſe. Farther, whereas a Pileus, or Cap was uſed by Slaves manumitted, as a Badge of Liberty, he farther ordains, that ſuch Slaves, as at the Funeral of their Lords precede the Corpſe, or ſtand in the Bier, ſo as to ventilate the Body, and that by order of the Teſtatour, or the Heir, ſhall preſently become Roman Citizens; whereas formerly an entrance upon an Inheritance was neceſſary, as well as the Cap, for making free thoſe Libertini Orcini, as they were called. ‘If one by Will, or by the other courſe of the Vindicta, ſignified, that he would make his Slave a Latine Freed-man, he ſhould, for all that obtain his full liberty. If a Lord bequeath liberty to his Slave upon a condition, and while that condition depends, the Heir, being a ſtranger, gives him liberty, he ſhall not be as formerly, a Latinus Libertus, but a Roman Citizen. If the condition failed, he ſhould be his Libertus, who ‘ made him free; if the condition was fulfilled, he ſhould be as a Libertus Orcinus, and the Patronage go as otherwiſe by Law it ought. He eſteems it very hard what formerly was practiſed, in caſe a Slave upon a Controverſie and Suit was found to be ſuch, and caſt by his Lord, that then he ſhould onely be a Latine Freed-man, in caſe any other paid his price down to the Lord. He declares ſuch an one ſhall be a Roman Citizen, as alſo a She-Slave, given in Matrimony by her Lord to a Freeman, if the Lord by writing conſigned her a Portion, which was done for free and even noble Perſons. In like manner ſhall be free a Slave, whom apud Acta his Lord names his Son. A Slave alſo, to whom his Lord delivers the Writings, or defaces ſuch whereby the Slavery was proved, and made out, if it were done in the preſence of five Witneſſes. Theſe excepted, he declares, that all other ways and Methods found in any Lawyers Writings or Conſtitutions, ſhall ceaſe, and pretenders to liberty by them ſhall continue in ſlavery, as formerly. That the Latine Liberty may abſolutely be ſo, he repeals all Laws made concerning it, as to that particular, if mention be made of Liberty, and none of Latinity, it ſhall be taken for abſolute Liberty and Freedom. In concluſion, this Conſtitution ſhall take place in thoſe who ſhall onely for the future be Liberti, or Freed-men.

Ways how full Liberty might be obtained, as of old was the Latina Libertas.

Many Laws he repealed.

De Lege Fuſia Caninia tollenda, de Aſſertione tollenda, de Dedititia Libertate tollenda, de Latina Libertate tollenda, de tollendo nudo Jure Quiritum.

The Lex Ælia Sentia but in part.

71. Thus did Juſtinian both relaxate the bonds of Servitude, and open the way to Liberty; out of which good humour he publiſhed various Conſtitutions, which carry the name and form of Repeals. But amongſt theſe, none are to be found for taking away the Lex Ælia Sentia, for though ſome Heads of that Law he took away, yet others he retained. That Law forbad, that one under twenty years ſhould manumit a Slave, except he made good the cauſe thereof before Council. Juſtinian firſt declared, that the Age of ſeventeen ſhould be ſufficient; and afterward, as appears by his one hundred and nineteenth Novel, was content with that of fourteen, wherein the man was capacitated to make a Teſtament. The ſame Law commanded, that no one leſs than thirty years old, being manumitted by the Vindicta, or by Teſtament, ſhould become a Roman Citizen. On the contrary, Juſtinian would have no conſideration of Age to be had, but that he who was manumitted might be an Infant, and thereupon yet become a Roman Citizen. In concluſion, the ſame Law would have a Slave, who had been bound in Priſon by his Lord, if he was afterward manumitted, to be onely in the number of the Dedititii, of whom we have already ſpoken, as to the repealing of this Law. There was another difference of Servitude, when one was a Slave Jure Quiritum, by a ſolemn Rite or Ceſſion in Law, or onely by buying and ſale, which difference he alſo took away, by forbidding any Dominion but what was natural, and Jure Quiritum. If a Slave was given in pledge, if manumitted by the Giver, he would have him enjoy liberty, though not fully, without the Creditours conſent. If a Slave belonged to two Perſons, as Lords, if one of them manumitted him, the whole right of him came to the other, Jure accreſcendi, by way of accruing, yet if a Souldier did ſo manumit, his Companion was forced to ſell his ſhare in the Slave, who thereupon obtained full liberty. This Juſtinian would have alſo of force, though one who was not a Souldier did manumit, and the Slave ſhould obtain thereby his Freedom. In concluſion, he aboliſhed the uſe of the Aſſertion, ſo called, becauſe of old it was not lawfull for one reputed and held for a Slave, to ſue for his liberty though he had an occaſion, but by a Vindicatour, who was termed Aſſertour, who could act for him; and if the firſt Aſſertour was caſt, or deſerted the Cauſe, it was lawfull for a ſecond to take it up.

The Advocates of Cæſarea.

72. This ſame day of the firſt of November was ſtill more fruitfull in the production of another remarkable Law. And this was an anſwer to the Advocates of Cæſarea in Paleſtine, though directed to John the Præfectus Prætorio. Baldwin will have it Cæſarea in Cappadocia, formerly called Mazaca, which had its Society of eminent Government in the Forum of Lawyers, who, as Strabo relates, were Tigranes King of Armenia led away into barbarous Servitude; yet were as by the right of Poſtliminium afterward reſtored, and recovered their former Dignity. This Dignity, they and their Succeſſours ſeem to have retained more than five hundred years from that Accident, till the time of Juſtinian, whom they often were wont to Conſult in controverted points of Law, as were other Advocates of Paleſtine and Illyricum, Yet in this point to which this Anſwer is directed, there ſeems little or no difficulty worthy to move a Queſtion. It was an ancient Opinion of Lawyers, that a Convention, Bargain, or Compact, concerning the Eſtate or Goods of another man as yet living, was not onely unprofitable, but filthy and diſhoneſt, inſomuch that ſuch Bargainers and Contracters, were thought unworthy ever to be Heirs, and loſt the Right of ſucceeding to ſuch Perſons, which otherwiſe

Lib. 12.

Tales hæredipetæ olim appellabantur vultures.

wiſe accrued to them. Certainly if any do greedily expect and covet the Eſtate of another man, that Expectation is of Evil and dangerous Example, and may provoke to the Procurement of the Death of ſuch a Perſon. Indeed we may in ſome Caſes, ſell or give away our Hope and Expectation, as of the Draught of a Net; but the Hope of another's Inheritance is wicked, if we make a Compact concerning it without his Knowledge or Conſent. But the Advocates of Cæſarea doubted if ſuch a Pact might not be tolerated, as was conceived under an expreſs Condition, if the Inheritance ſhould fall to the Bargainers. 'Juſtinian ſo far Confirms the old 'Law, as not to tolerate any ſuch Paction, and forbids not onely any Gift, but any 'Obligation or Security to be made thereby.

Conſult Juſtinian.

L. ult. de Pactis, Cod. lib. 2. tit. 3.

72. If there had been made onely a Paction concerning a future Eſtate in general, whenceſoever it ſhould come, it might have been of Force, becauſe there was no appearance of thinking of the Death of any one Perſon. So a Society was wont to be rightly contracted, that if any juſt Inheritance ſhould happen, it might be common. And ſo Juſtinian elſewhere doth extend an Hypotheca, or tacite Obligation to ſuch Eſtates as ſhould happen by Succeſſion. But where a Convention is ſpecially directed to a certain ſort of a ſingle Inheritance, it ſeems to be intent upon the Death of ſome ſingle Perſon, though by a Condition this wicked deſign, and preſent thought be covered and diſſembled. 'Juſtinian onely ſaith, the Pact ſhall 'be null; but whereas he addes according to the ancient Laws, he ſignifies that 'the Penalty formerly mentioned is to be inflicted. Which is to hold if the thing was done Craftily by them, that knew the man to be alive; for if they thought him dead, and by that Errour were drawn into a Compact concerning an Eſtate as faln, the Pact indeed ſhould be null, but there ſhould be no Penalty. 'One 'exception Juſtinian makes, which is, the Conſent concerning whoſe Goods the 'Compact is made; and this, ſaith he, he hath alſo from the ancient Laws. Baldwin yet affirms, that there is no mention made of it, in thoſe Laws that are extant, however the Reaſon is plain, for this Conſent removes the Suſpicion, for which ſuch a Pact otherwiſe is rejected. Such a Conſentor ſhews the Compact to be made Bonâ Fide, and yet he is not obliged, but he may if he pleaſe change his mind before his Death. If he change not, the Pact obliges the Parties. In like manner, if two Perſons agree to ſucceed each other in their own Inheritances, the one thinks of the other's Death, both lyes at catch, but neither purpoſes to give to the other; and therefore ſuch a Pact is alſo rejected, eſpecially amongſt Pagani, or ſuch as are no Souldiers. But where there is a ſimple and liberal Conſent, there is no Suſpicion of Treachery, and the Pact is eſteemed honeſt, eſpecially if made by otherwiſe Legitimate Heirs, concerning the dividing of an Inheritance, when faln. As if the owner Conſenting, an Agreement be made betwixt the Brother and Sons of another Brother, that they ſhould ſucceed by Poll, and not altogether as repreſenting their Father. But without the Conſent of the Owner, the Agreement were againſt good manners, and made too much haſte.

His Anſwer.

In Capita non in Stirpes.

73. He made Anſwer to the ſame Advocates upon another Queſtion this ſame day, which is not much material to mention; but ſo much in ſhort. It was how Writings were to be Credited, which atteſted the Preſence of a Party, and his return was, that they were to ſtand to them, till the contrary was proved. 'This ſame 'day he alſo decreed, that no temporal Preſcription but of the largeſt time ſhould 'operate againſt a Minor, or one under the Age of five and twenty. At the ſame 'time he alſo took away a Legacy from a Legatee, that ſhould conceal or ſup'preſs a Teſtament, and aſſigned it, not to the Treaſury as formerly had been 'done, but to the Heir. The Lawyers in the Pandects often ſay, that a Legatee who oppoſed a Teſtament, affirming it to be void or falſe, and was caſt in the Suit, ſhould obtain nothing by the ſaid Teſtament, but what ſhould have belonged to him, fell to the Treaſury; but this Juſtinian doth not aſſign to the Heir, which he might have done as well as the other, and wanted ſome Heir to put him in mind of it. However, though he had not as yet made his new Law, for taking away the Caduca, yet he had begun to take away many things from his Exchequer, and to leave them to private Men. He was ſo favourable to the Cauſe of Women, as to the Dos or Portion they brought to their Husbands, that whereas formerly he had given them a certain tacite Obligation upon the Eſtates of their Husbands, for the repaying of it; 'Now on the fifth before the Calends of December, he pre'ferred the Cauſe of them, before that of others, who had ſuch ſort of Obligations. Yet in this the Treaſury is to be excepted, which having a Cauſe firſt in time was to be preferred to a Dotale Cauſe that came after. 'In this matter of Favour to 'Women, he declares at the beginning of his Law, that he was diſturbed by the Vide Balduinum lib. 3.

Another, to a ſecond Queſtion.

L. ult. in quibus cauſis in integrum Reſtitutioneceſſaria, non eſt, Cod. lib. 2. tit. 41.

L. penult. de Legatis, Cod. lib. 6. tit. 37.

Juſtinian takes away from his Treaſury, and leaves to private Men.

Favourable to Women.

L. ult. qui Potiores in pignore habeantur, Cod. lib. 8. tit. 18.

'daily Applications of thoſe of that Sex, and that he had had Reſpect to the ancient 'Laws, and looked onely at the time to come.

74. Great was the danger which of old an Heir or an Executour underwent, in entring upon an Eſtate. For, all Hereditary burthens he was loaded with, and ſtood ingaged, and anſwerable to Hereditary Creditours in Solidum, even beyond the Eſtate that came unto him. Neither to free and diſcharge him, did properly belong the benefit of Separation; for it was rather introduced for the ſake of ſuch as were Creditours of the Heir before he entred on ſuch an Eſtate. Indeed when a Liberta as Heir entred on an Eſtate and was inſolvent, and had her Patron for her Heir, it was given as an Anſwer in Law, that it was not unjuſt that the Patron ſhould be relieved, and not burthened with Debts contracted by his Liberta in that manner, and therefore her own Goods were ſeparated from the Hereditary: But this was a ſingular Caſe. A Minor alſo, or one under five and twenty was relieved, who had raſhly entred on a bad Eſtate; and in like manner a Souldier. Adrian the Emperour gave relief alſo to one above five and twenty, when great Debts appeared after an entry made upon the Inheritance which lay concealed at that time; and Juſtinian had done ſomething to the ſame purpoſe. But by all theſe the Heir ſeemed little to be relieved: And there being ſuch danger in venturing on an Inheritance, the Right of deliberating was deſired, which having formerly been indulged for a few Months, Juſtinian gave the ſpace of a year. 'But there being found great difficulty in this Deliberation, and no other 'Fruit, for the moſt part, appearing than a ſuſpending of the Cauſe of the Inheritance to no purpoſe; at length it ſeemed good, that the Executour, or Heir ſhould 'make an Inventary or Repertory of the particulars thereof, and enter upon the 'Eſtate with that Condition; That he ſhould not be obnoxious to the Hereditary 'Creditours, farther than the Contents of the Inventary, and the Eſtate it ſelf did extend. In caſe the Legatees were abſent at the making of the Inventary, he 'would have certain called together, with the Tabularius or Scribe. And however ſolemn the making of it was, he now gave leave to Ceditours and Legatees to diſprove it, if they could make out, that all the Goods of the Deceaſed 'were not therein expreſſed, Bonâ fide: Nay they might fetch Evidence from 'the Family of the Deceaſed, and call Hereditary Slaves to the Queſtion it ſelf; 'upon this Account as had been generally ordained, that ſuch might be put to the 'Torture in Hereditary matters.

L. 12. Cod. de Jure deliberand.

L. penult. Cod. de inofficioſo Teſtam.

L. ult. de Jure deliberand. Cod. eod. die edita quo prior. Qui potiores in pign.

An Heir to make an Inventary and to be no farther burthened.

The penalty of not making an Inventary.

75. 'In Caſe an Heir, notwithſtanding the making of an Inventary, would inſiſt upon the time of Deliberation, this over Cautious humour was ſuſpected, and 'odious in Juſtinian's eſteem, and he thought him ſo much to renounce the benefit of an Inventary, that it ſhould be eſteemed as none; and notwithſtanding 'it, he ſhould be obnoxious in Solidum, to the Hereditary Creditours even above 'the value of the Eſtate. If one would not make an Inventary, he loſt his Claim 'to the Lex Falcidia, and could deduct nothing from Legatees: Nay Juſtinian ordained afterwards, that Legacies ſhould be paid intirely, as Debts were, without 'Reſpect to the quantity of the Eſtate. By the benefit of an Inventary, a Confuſion 'of Obligations was prevented, in caſe a Creditour became Heir to the Debtour. 'If in the Inventary with the Goods he deſcribed and collated Debts, he ſhould 'reckon alſo his own Debt, and ſhould be numbred amongſt the Creditours. But on the other ſide Baldwin is of Opinion, that if a Debtour ſucceeded as Heir, or Executour to a Creditour, his Name is to be put into the Inventary amongſt Debtours, and amongſt ſuch he is to be reckoned: That as there ought to be no Confuſion to the defrauding of an Heir, where the Creditour ſucceeds the Debtour, and makes an Inventary, ſo there ought to be no defrauding of the Creditours of the Deceaſed, when a Debtour is Heir. Nay, both Lawyers and Princes of old time anſwered, that as to the Lex Falcidia; ſuch things ſhould be reckoned as in time of Death were owing, either by the Deceaſed to the Heir, or by the Heir to the Deceaſed. 'Juſtinian farther in ſome ſort Infringed the right of an Hypotheca; that if any one buy a thing of an Executour, who hath duely made an 'Inventary, he ſhall have that thing free, and ſtand in fear of no Hypothecary Actions. So much doth our Legiſlatour commend all manner of ways, with many 'Privileges adorn, and almoſt obtrude the Benefit of the Inventary upon Heirs, 'even againſt their minds, it being of his own invention.

76. The following Year, or the ſecond after the Conſulſhip of Lampadius and Oreſtes was turbulent, and when Juſtinian was in danger at the beginning thereof, to be depoſed by the Nica, and Sedition of the People about the Nephews of Anaſtaſius, he muſt needs have been put upon other thoughts, than the making of Laws. But all being quiet, he returned to his former Courſe, and on the laſt of April made a Deciſion, which Baldwin thinks needleſs, as having formerly been done. It was, that a Condition which a Legatee could not perform, ſhould be taken for none; eſpecially when Liberty was bequeathed. From the end of April, Baldwin paſſes without thinking it fit, to take notice of any Laws, till the beginning of September. On the firſt of this Month was dated a Conſtitution not ignoble, whereby he confirmed the old Law concerning the Teſtaments of Souldiers, who were in the Power of their Fathers: Such Sons might by Military Right make Teſtaments concerning their Caſtrenſe Peculium, neither could ſuch Teſtaments be called Inofficious. And when they left the Wars, they might alſo make Teſtaments concerning the ſame things, Jure Communi, againſt which no Querela of Inofficious ſhould lye; but this latter Privilege Juſtinian will not have extended to Sons Emancipated. Now as Sons that were Souldiers had their Peculium Caſtrenſe, which they got by their Labours and Dangers in the Wars, ſo others by their pains obtained Wealth, which Princes thought fit alſo to appropriate to them, and what was ſo gotten was called, quaſi Caſtrenſe Peculium. Such was that got by the Palatines Officers, and ſuch as ſerved at Court; by Profeſſours of liberal Sciences, Archiatri and others. Of old to Proconſuls, Preſidents of Provinces, and ſome others, it was permitted to make Teſtaments concerning ſuch a Peculium, which 'Privilege now Juſtinian extended to all that had Wealth ſo acquired. And as he 'had formerly given the Privilege to Clerks, that againſt their Teſtaments made 'of their Peculium, no Querela ſhould lye, ſo now he grants it to all in General. Although what he formerly gave to Clerks in a ſpecial manner, he ſeemed by a Novel Conſtitution in a ſpecial manner to take away; commanding them abſolutely to leave a Legitimate to their Parents or Children, as being obliged to give Example of greater Piety and Duty, than others were.

A Condition impoſſible to be taken for none.

L. ult. Cod. de Condit. inſert.

L. ult. de Inofficioſo Teſtam. Cod.

Juſtinian gives Liberty to all, to make Teſtaments of the quaſi Caſtrenſe Peculium.

L.38. de Inofficioſo Teſtam. Cod.

123.

77. It is not to be forgotten, 'That this year Juſtinian directed another Conſtitu-'tion to John the Prefect, whereby he forbad a Marriage ſhould be prohibited 'betwixt a Man older than ſixty, and a Woman than fifty, as had been diſcounte-'nanced by the Lex Julia and Papia. Now this Law did not abſolutely forbid the Marriage of ſuch a Man, with ſuch a Woman; but it judged it not fitting, nor ſufficient to prevent the pain of Celibate, becauſe it was late and barren; it imagined it a Marriage without Marriage. Afterward it was thought fit, that a Man of ſixty might Marry, but not a Woman of fifty; which was approved by the Senatuſconſultum Claudianum, and the reaſon was fetch'd from Nature, and declared by Ariſtotle, a Man being by him ſuppoſed to be able to Generate till ſeventy, and a Woman but till fifty; to which Opinion the Lawyers were ready to ſubſcribe. 'But 'Juſtinian thought Nature might be fruitfull beyond theſe bounds, aud he conſider-'ed that Procreation was not onely the honeſt end of Matrimony; and therefore as 'he found other Heads of that Law to be repealed before his time, ſo in Favour of 'ancient People, he reſolved to take this away likewiſe. And it happening afterward, that a Woman above fifty had brougnt a Child; and of this being conſulted by the Advocates of Cæſarea: 'He could not refuſe to admit of the Child as Le-'gimate, though born after the wonted Age of the Mother, but reckoned it amongſt 'Legitimate Heirs. And this was a Queſtion rather of Fact, than of Law; it being alledged, that the Birth was Suppoſititious as not proceeding from ſo ancient a Woman. 'In a matter doubtfull and queſtionable, yet he pronounced that the 'Cheat was to be proved by him that alledged it, it being no proof to alledge the 'ordinary Courſe of Nature, which might ſometimes exceed her ordinary Me-'thods, and to be ſure it was a thing equitable to Favour the Infant. But when another Queſtion was moved, whether a Child born in the eleventh Month after the death of the Husband was Legitimate; the difficulty was greater, it being not onely a Queſtion concerning the force of Nature, but of the Fidelity of the Woman, who might lye and diſſemble the true Father. What elſe was to be judged in this Caſe, he prudently and Cautiouſly determined in a Novel Conſtitution. As for the Birth of a Child after the fiftieth year of the Mother: Baldwin inſtanceth in an Hiſtory, which ſerves better, than any Gloſs to make good Juſtinian's Law. It is this, Conſtantia the Wife of Henricus Suevus, the fifth Emperour, being fifty four years old was with Child, and that there might be no Fraud had Keepers appointed to watch her. And at that Age ſhe brought forth a Son, who by the Name of Frederick the ſecond ſucceeded his Father, A. D. MCC. As for a Birth in the eleventh or twelfth Month after the death of the Husband, let the Faculty of Phyſick, and the Lawyers of Paris ſpeak, in the behalf of a late Prince of their own Bloud.

L. 27. de Nupt. Cod.

He permits a Man of ſixty, and a Woman of fifty to marry.

L. 12. de Legit. Hæred. Cod.

39.

No Conſtitution this Year.

But the Pandects and Inſtitutions came abroad.

78. In the ſeventh year of Juſtinian's Reign, he himſelf the third time was Conſul in the Eaſt, and without a Collegue. For in the Weſt he who now Reigned in Italy, was content there ſhould be no Conſul in the Weſt; Nay, for the foregoing years there were none in the Eaſt, the Emperour not regarding this Title, which had long agoe degenerated into mere Name and Form, and the barbarous Princes eſteeming it but as a Badge of the Empire. And now Juſtinian ſeems to have intermitted his buſineſs of making Laws ſo practiſed by him in the five preceding year; there being no new and ſingular Conſtitution publiſhed this year, as Baldwin obſerves, which he doth not attribute to his diſtraction about Martial Affairs. For the Perſian War was diſpatched, that of the Vandals in Africk was ended, and the Gothick in Italy was ſcarce begun. He ſuſpects him and his Lawyers to have been buſied in peruſing the Pandects, and compoſing the Inſtitutions, with the Edition of which this year was over and above Ennobled. The Inſtitutions were compiled more lately, and yet publiſhed a little before, but obtained not Authority or Force in the Forum, but from the ſame day the Pandects were publiſhed. Concerning the Edicts and Prefaces premiſed and conjoyned, to both we have ſpoken already, and altogether. That of the Inſtitutions is a Book indeed, wherein the Authour much Glories and Prides himſelf. He pretends it ſo to be Compoſed, as to be a ſort of Index, of both Laws Ancient and Modern, a Breviate of many Conſtitutions formerly publiſhed by him; and to appertain no leſs to the Code, than the Pandects.

Quem vide lib. 4. de Jure Novo.

The Memory of ſome Conſtitutions preſerved in the Inſtitutions.

Juſtinian makes it Lawfull to leave Legacies to uncertain Perſons.

79. Now Baldwin will have it ſo far from compriſing the Heads of all his New Conſtitutions, that he affirms not the fourth part of them to be touched, ſcarcely ſixty of two hundred and fifty. Yet where the place permitted it, and occaſion required, he acknowledges that the Architects of this Epitome were mindfull of their Juſtinian, and not ſo exceedingly forgetfull of their New Law as they had been in the Pandects. He owns that the Memory of ſome Conſtitutions are herein preſerved, which elſe had been loſt; as thoſe De Jure Patronatus, and De Incertis Perſonis, which poſſibly were written in Greek, and therefore ſome few hints of them onely remain in the Code. As for the Patronage of ſuch as had been Slaves, it has been ſpoken to. By the other Conſtitution it ſeems, he made it lawfull to leave a Legacy to an uncertain Perſon, which before could not be done: For Example, a Legacy thus left; Let mine Heir give to him, that ſhall give his Daughter in Marriage to my Son, &c. For though this uncertain Perſon became after certain, yet the Legacy was null, becauſe it ſeemed given raſhly, and without good Advice. Amongſt the Living, Liberality might be conferred on an uncertain Perſon, as in throwing Money to a multitude; but the Ancients required a more ſetled and Compoſed mind in Teſtatours. To ones own Poſthumous Child, a Legacy they permitted to be left, but not to one of another Man; and though the Prætor was Aſſiſtent to the latter, in obtaining an Inheritance, yet he granted no Action for Legacies. This being but too nice and ſubtile, was Corrected by Juſtinian. Indeed it had been lawfull to leave Legacies to the Poor in general before his time, which he confirmed by a peculiar Conſtitution: This was a ſingular Exception and could not avail, that a Legacy left for the redeeming of Captives could be good, till Leo the Emperour expreſly confirmed it. Him Juſtinian followed, and afterwards ordained Univerſally, that a Legacy might be left to uncertain Perſons.

80. Though the Conſtitutions of Juſtinian, concerning Legata and Fideicommiſſa be extant; yet a noble Head of this Subject had been wanting, if not mentioned in the Inſtitutions. Concerning Legacies paid by Errour to pious Uſes, their being irrevocable. Baldwin farther obſerves, what Antinomia, or repugnancy in Law had been found in the Pandects, if it had not been for this little Book, which ſhews whether of theſe repugnant Teſtimonies brought out of Authours, is to be followed. But ſo great was the Oſcitancy of Tribonian, that he wiſhes he had alſo made ſome Notes upon his Pandects, to ſhew us what to doe in ſo many diſſenting places, and tells us what Opinion we are to follow, and which of them was moſt liked by Juſtinian. He declares, that ſuch a Book of Annotations had abſolutely been as neceſſary, as the Inſtitutions. Not to ſay, that many things are raſhly delivered in the Inſtitutions, which upon good Grounds were rejected in the Pandects. But truely theſe things, ſaith he, are Cautiouſly and Conſiderately to be weighed, that from the thing it ſelf we may prudently determine, what is to be imputed to the Careleſneſs, and (if one may ſay ſo) to the folly of Tribonian. For his miſtake, and to uſe Cicero his Word, his Heedleſneſs (non Curantia) ought not to overthrow the Reaſon and Verity of the Law. The Inſtitutions were publiſhed on the eleventh before the Calends of December, and the Pandects on ſeventeenth before the Calends of January. But the Inſtitutions were not to be of Force till this latter day, together with the Pandects. And it is to be obſerved, that the Inſtitutions are to be eſteemed the latter, and that conſequently they derogate from, and repeal the Pandects upon occaſion, and not the Pandects them.

The Inſtitutions derogate from the Pandects.

81. Baldwin alſo is out of Humour, to find in the Title of the Pandects, that they are ſtyled Books, Juris Enucleati, or Kernels of the Law, being Collected from all the ancient Juriſprudentia. Juſtinian calls the Compilers of them, Compoſitores Juris Enucleati, and he wiſhes they had been ſuch as was Q. Mucius, of whom Cicero teſtifies, that he did ſpeak Enucleatè & Politè. But perhaps, he adds, it would be ſilly to expect ſuch a thing from ſome Græculi, eſpecially in what concerns the Roman Juriſprudentia. Certainly they who boaſt, they give us Law in the Kernel, have given us a Kernel incloſed in a very hard Nut; or rather one with the other, ſo bruiſed and intermingled, that they can ſcarcely be diſcerned. But as for what the Inſcription tells us, that ancient Law is gathered together in the Pandects, as Juſtinian alſo boaſts in his Preface to the Inſtitutions, how this is to be taken, is not obſcure. For, as was formerly ſaid, he would have the Pandects accommodated to the uſe of his own time and the Forum, and they are ſo interpolated, as to contain a certain mixt Law, partly Old, and partly New; ſo they ſeem to be a Compoſition of both Laws. And Juſtinian himſelf, ſomewhere calls them a Compoſition of new Law. But I have, ſo he concludes, formerly ſhewn what diligence and fidelity Tribonian uſed in the patching of them together.

Juſtinian takes away Caducæ.

De Caducis Tollendis.

He will have five Witneſſes to a Teſtament ſuffice in Villages.

82. In the year following, wherein Juſtinian was Conſul the fourth time, together with Paulinus, though the Roman World was buſied in turning over theſe new Books, yet was it ſtill plyed with hot and new Conſtitutions; yet theſe not many, but ſinuous and mightily pretending to the Civil Law. Auguſtus Cæſar indeavouring to bring all Men to marry, as we have ſeen in our ſecond Part, and not able to doe it, after ſeveral other Laws called Leges Juliæ, brought up Lex Papia Poppæa, to puniſh Celibate, and increaſe the publick Revenue; that if the Commonwealth could not be ſupplied with Men, it might with Money. Now a great deſign of this Law, was to make Legacies and Eſtates to be of the Nature of Caduca, and in many Caſes to fall to the Treaſury for certain Defects, of which it's not fit here to inquire; and Baldwin concerning this Subject hath written largely. ‘Theſe Caduca, ſome Caſes excepted, did Juſtinian now take away, and let ‘theſe things fall to Heirs and Legatees, and would not have them to accrew to ‘his Exchequer. This he did by a Conſtitution directed on the Calends of June, to the Senate of Conſtantinople. Beſides this Conſtitution publiſhed after the Pandects, on the third before the Nones of July, he gave out another for facilitating ſtill more, the making of Teſtaments, and that in Favour of Pagani, or Countreymen. In the Pagi or Villages, he is content five Witneſſes be ſufficient where more fit ones are not to be had. In Cities and Caſtra, or leſſer Towns, he will have the ancient Law to be obſerved. As five Witneſſes here are ſufficient, ſo formerly to all Codicills, and in ſuch Teſtaments wherein ſuch Heirs are inſtituted, as otherwiſe were to ſucceed by Law. Leo the Emperour afterward would have three Witneſſes ſuffice in Cities, and three in the Countrey for making Teſtaments. And indeed it was thought fit to depart by degrees from that ſcrupulous ſeverity of the Ancients in making Wills, though ſome reaſons (as lately to ſhun Perjury) drive again ſometimes a State to a more near obſervance of them.

He makes a ſecond Edition of his Code.

83. Now towards this time, Juſtinian began to bethink himſelf, what a vaſt number of Conſtitutions he had made, ſince the firſt publiſhing of his Code. They were grown up to near as great a Bulk as it had been: He thought therefore, to put them all together and make a new Edition. Therefore this year on the ſixteenth before the Calends of December. The Code in this ſort augmented, corrected and interpolated came abroad. Baldwin blames them that reckon onely fifty Deciſions to be inſerted, there being, he ſaith, above two hundred new Conſtitutions added at this new Edition. And here he affirms, according to his Cuſtome, that it had been no leſs neceſſary to have had another review, Interpolation and Edition of the Pandects, for making the Law complete and agreeing. Nay, that the Compoſition of the Code and Pandects, was not onely to be driven to the ninth year, as Juſtinian ſaith, but even the Promulgation of them to the time of his Death, that Perfect, Enucleate and Conſummate Law, might have been delivered to Poſterity, to be conſtant and perpetual; and ſo he might have ſaved the pains of throwing out ſo many Edicts, which afterwards he again rejected, according to experience and uſe of things which Livy affirms, to be the moſt ſevere Examiner, and Exploratour of Laws. At the publiſhing of the Code, he commanded that out of its Body no Conſtitutions ſhould be read. He meant ſuch Conſtitutions as were already abroad, not thoſe he ſhould afterward publiſh; for he foreſaw there might be occaſion from various experience, yet to make others. And he was not deceived. For ſcarcely had a Month and an half paſſed from this new Edition, when in the beginning of the following year, he ſet upon making Novels, of which he poured out ſo many that their Volume almoſt at length exceeded the Code it ſelf. And as formerly he Compoſed his Edicts in the Latine Tongue, rather than the Greek, now he made uſe more of the Greek, than the Latine. For both the Eaſtern and Weſtern part of the Empire, was to be gratified; and the Gothick War now raging in Italy, it ſeemed moſt fit to Conſult the Eaſt, in the making of Laws.

And Novel Conſtitutions preſently after.

Twelve the following Year.

The firſt is ſevere againſt Heirs or Legatees, who perform not the Teſtatours Will.

Nov. 1.

Nov. 13.

